Mendelssohn: Sonata for pianoforte and 'cello.
Schubert: Quintet in C major, op. 163.

The feeling of quasi-boredom that comes over one on seeing one of the Lobkowitz quartets announced on a programme is more than compensated for by the pure contentment and delight with which one listens to the music when the performance has once begun. The case-hardened concert-goer may feel a little sceptical about his power of enjoying one of these quartets for the thousand-and-first time; but the experiment shames his little faith. The one in G given last evening—which, from the frequent unison and octave passages it contains might be called the "quartet in octaves"—is surely a thing of beauty that might well be a joy forever. It was admirably played, and enthusiastically received by the audience.

The Mendelssohn sonata for pianoforte and 'cello makes one think once more of a phase of Mendelssohn's classicism which we are all too liable to forget nowadays. Even those of us who have taken and well digested the significance of Bülow's dictum that "Mendelssohn is to be recognized as the most complete master of musical form since Mozart," have to be reminded from time to time that this is not the only side of his classicism. There is another, almost equally remarkable one: his fine instinct for making all instruments speak strictly in accordance with their own nature, his never forcing an instrument beyond the boundaries of its own native domain. Today, when virtuosi and composers aid and abet each other in "extending the field" of every possible instrument, from the pianoforte to the cymbals, this fine and intrinsically classical instinct is growing more and more uncommon. It were hard to find a more splendid example of it than this sonata of Mendelssohn's. Apart from the melodic invention, purely organic development, and beauty of form there is to be found in it, what an admirable, thrice admirable, piece of pure pianoforte and 'cello writing it is! How each instrument is always made to say just what it can say best! It were well for our modern instrumental conjurers to see to it that this sort of thing do not become entirely a lost art. The sonata was splendidly played by Mrs. Hopekirk and Mr. Schroeder; there is no new praise to be heaped upon Mr. Schroeder either for his solo or quartet playing; but we had never heard Mrs. Hopekirk do any concerted playing before, and her performance last evening was such as to place her very high in the ranks of concerted players.

Schubert's C major quintet is written for a selection of instruments uncommon both in his day and since, but by no means new in the history of chamber music for strings: for two violins, viola, and two 'celli. The two-'celli scheme was habitual with Boccherini, one of the earliest writers in this form. But Boccherini's purpose was different from Schubert's; he was a brilliant 'cellist, and meant the first 'cello part in his quintets for himself, making it as prominent and elaborate as possible; some of his quintet movements are really nothing but 'cello solos with quartet accompaniment. Schubert's object in using two 'celli was evidently, to get a stronger and deeper bass from the second 'cello than could be got from a second viola, while the first 'cello played prominent melodic phrases, or doubled the first violin in the lower octave.

This C major quintet shows Schubert in his most Hellenic ideal mood. Doubtless the development of each one of the four movements is excessive; as is too often the case with Schubert, the whole thing is overgrown. But, long as it is, it is a "heavenly length." And what an original idea that profound, almost tragic, Trio is, in the midst of the hearty, rustic joviality of the Scherzo! The whole work was admirably played and thoroughly enjoyed.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB 16, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

The Kneisel Quartette gave the fifth concert in their series at Union Hall, last evening, with the assistance of Mme. Helen Hopekirk, pianist, and M. Leo Schulz, 'cellist. The following programme was presented: Quartette in G major, op. 18, Beethoven; sonata for piano and 'cello, Mendelssohn; quintette in C major, op. 163, Schubert. The Beethoven quartette was well rendered, the ensemble attack and shading being wellnigh perfect, while the interpretation was artistic and in perfect sympathy with the character of the music.

The Mendelssohn sonata for piano and 'cello was finely rendered and was heartily applauded. Mme. Hopekirk has played too often and is too well known in Boston to call for extended comment here. Suffice it to say that she fully upheld her reputation in last evening's performance. The beautiful Schubert Quintette was rendered in a manner that was thoroughly enjoyable, and sent every one away with a feeling of real pleasure. The sixth concert will be given Monday evening, March 7.

The postponed fourth concert, with Mme. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler, soloist, will be given at the close of the season.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the fifth concert of the series '91-'92 in Union Hall last evening. Mrs. Hopekirk was the pianist, and Mr. Leo Schulz took the second 'cello part in the quintette. The programme was as follows: Beethoven's quartette, G, op. 18; Mendelssohn's sonata for 'cello and pianoforte; Schubert's quintette, C, op. 163.

There have been many fables told about the origin of the first set of Beethoven quartettes and the reception of the six by the critics and the public. It is generally said that they were written in 1800, the year before publication, but Thayer has shown that they were, in all probability, composed at intervals during the five years preceding their appearance, and played in private circles that Beethoven might judge of them. To gain a more intimate knowledge of the violin, he studied that instrument under Krumpholz; and about the end of 1799 he carefully revised his written work, rejecting and adding. After the quartettes were published, a friend told him that only the second (the one played last evening) and the fourth met with public approval. Beethoven's answer was vigorous and terribly coarse. The unfavorable reviews that are said to have appeared in the Leipzig music journal were written about the quartettes of another man and the only notice taken of Beethoven's set was by a correspondent who described them as excellent; "but they should be often played, as they are very difficult and in no sense popular music."

Schubert wrote his great string quintette in 1828, the year of his death. It is regarded by many as the finest piece of his chamber music, and the German critics have almost exhausted the language of praise, finding in it, according to their wont, all manner of things; "Stars," and "sombre woods" and "the dark shadow of death." Hanslick, on the contrary, calls it the summing up of the strength and weakness shown by Schubert in his instrumental compositions. The learned thus disagree; but the concert-goer who is charmed by spontaneous and beautiful melody and by rich harmonies listens with delight. To him the scherzo is not weak, nor is the finale too light.

The playing of the members of the quartette was characterized last evening by the many artistic qualities that make their ensemble work so famous, and the sonata by Mendelssohn was thoroughly enjoyed by the large audience.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCI., NO. 47.

TUESDAY, FEB. 16, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The fifth of the season's programmes by the Kneisel quartet was given at Union Hall last evening, the works performed being Beethoven's quartet, G major, op. 18; Mendelssohn's sonata for piano and violoncello; and Schubert's quintet, C major, op. 163. Mme. Helen Hopekirk and Mr. Schroeder did excellent work in the piano and 'cello sonata, winning a ready recognition of their artistic interpretation of the composition. Mr. Kneisel and his associates had the assistance of Mr. Schulz as the second 'cello of the quintet, and in both their ensemble numbers the good record of the quartet was fully maintained.

Clipping from [illegible]

Date

With the exception of the concert of the Boston Symphony Society, under the direction of Mr. Nickish, at Chickering Hall, on Tuesday evening, the last week has been distinguished for musicales and chamber concerts, of which there have been several good ones and one very dull one; the latter being the Hubbard song recital at "Chamber Music" Hall. The Nickish programme was purely orchestral, and tested the patience of one of the largest audiences ever gathered in Chickering Hall, that seemed to be charmed with every number rendered. It is rarely that a symphony concert is given without a soloist, but in this instance, although the selections were of the most severely classic type and one would think a vocal number might have been hailed as a pleasant relief to what, with any other orchestra, would have been a tiresome succession of instrumental numbers, such was not the case. Long as the programme was, several numbers were redemanded. The first number was the old fashioned concerto for strings, by Handel, given with a delicacy and nicety of detail unsurpassed. It is safe to say that no such splendid orchestral playing has ever been heard in this city. This composition, as rendered under Mr. Nickish's direction, was a novelty, and indeed the whole programme was of a rare character. The "Harold in Italy" symphony, by Berlioz, one of the most difficult and scholarly of compositions, was played as only the Boston Symphony Orchestra can play it. Mr. Nickish deserves great credit for producing this symphony, which is rarely given.

* * *

The Kneisel Quartet, of Boston, assisted by Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, the charming mezzo soprano, gave their last concert of the season at Music Hall on Friday evening. The programme was an excellent one, including Beethoven's G major quartet of 18, op. 2; Schubert's lovely variations in G minor; and Beethoven's E flat quartet. Mrs. Wyman sang delightfully several songs by Wekerlin, Delebes and Chammade.

* * *

[illegible]

CITIZEN, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 1/14

THE FOURTH REHEARSAL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

The fourth rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place Friday afternoon at the Academy of Music under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, in the presence of a large though not crowded audience.

For once the Academy was chilly and the audience hard to enthuse. The programme included the following: Wagner, A "Faust" overture: Mozart, (a) Page's Canzenetta, (b) Page's Aria, from the "Marriage of Figaro;" Saint-Saens, concert for violoncello in A minor, Tschaikowsky, andante, and sherzo, second and third movements from Symphony No. 4, in F minor; songs with piano; (a) Goldmark, "Die Quelle;" (b) Gensen, "Am Manzanares;" (c)Brahms, "Vergebeliches Staendchen;" Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, "Heroic;" Allegro con bria, Adagio assai (marcia funebre), Sherzo (allegro vivace); finale; soloists, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. Alvin Schroeder, Much curiosity had been excited in the city by the announcement of the appearance of the wife of the famous director as a vocal soloist, and when that lady stepped to the front, richly though plainly clothed, modest and almost shy in demeanor, but pretty beyond a peradventure, some disappointment was felt because of her avoidance of showy stage habiliments, but as soon as she commenced to sing every musician present recognized at once that she was an artist as well as a lady, lacking, perhaps, in emotion, scarcely aggressive and demonstrative enough, but an undeniably capable singer, correct in intonation and faultless in phrasing; a little cold, like the day and the audience, but pleasant to listen to. When Mr. Schroeder left his place among the violincellos to play his difficult solo, one could tell by the configuration of his head, which bears a striking resemblance to the Chandos portrait of Shakespeare, that good work would be heard, nor were they disappointed. Mr. Schroeder is not a phenomenal executant, though he is eminently a legitimate and conscientious performer, deft in his execution, broad and expressive in tone, thoughtful and picturesque in his phrasing; he was warmly applaueed.

The principal orchestral number was the "Heroic" Symphony No. 3 by Beethoven on which the great tone poet spent years of incessant labor, embodying in it the ripened experience of a long, eventful and useful life, and surely a more ample and satisfactory display of this masterpiece could scarcely be desired. It was almost as superb in its execution as in its conception.

The second and third movements from Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor, were simply perfect in both conception and execution, and in Wagner's "A Faust Overture" the orchestra was equally at home. This "Faust" is a complicated study by the most complicated of all writers and requires to be heard at least a dozen times in order to be understood.

It presents so many ever varying aspects that to the intelligent mind new beauties and new sources of admiration are ever discoverable. It required Wagner to paint this beautiful, though illusory picture, a many sided man, a poet, a musician, philosopher and artist, and all that belongs to the grand creation of Goethe is utilized with that critical care and skill only shown in minds of vast capacity; pleasing it certainly is not, but vivid, life-like and true to nature it is, and must be so considered by those who will make the necessary sacrifices of time and prejudice to correctly gauge its merits.

—More than one European musician traveling in this country has taken occasion to speak in most emphatic terms of praise of the now famous Boston Symphony orchestra, and its accomplished conductor Mr. Nikisch, and now read what Paderewski said after playing with the Symphony Orchestra at the recent concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. He said: "I consider the Boston Symphony Orchestra the best in the world, not excepting the orchestra of the Conservatoire in Paris. There are a few better instruments in the Conservatoire, but, as a whole, the Boston Symphony Orchestra stands above it. It is fortunate in its director, for Mr. Nikisch is much superior to the conductor of the Conservatoire. After the performance of my concerto in Brooklyn, in which Mr. Nikisch directed the accompaniment, I declared I would never play the piece again; and I will not, as its perfection may not be reached again."

GLOBE, Fall River, Mass.

te 272

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Good seats are scarce at Talbot's for Tuesday's concert. People are apt to be altogether too apathetic when a really first class musical entertainment is offered them, an occurrence rather rare. Manager C. A. Ellis, of the Symphony Orchestra has done more than almost all other out of town managers together to offer the public first class music; and the public seem to be awakening to that fact.

Any one now who desires to purchase two orchestra chairs, back of section C, will find it an absolute impossibility and from the rapidity of the sale it looks as though the balance of the house would be in about the same condition before Tuesday night. If you want to hear one of the greatest and best orchestras in the world, in one of their choicest programmes get your seats now. Those who cannot afford the best seats can hear this great concert in the gallery just as well, and at a price as low as they pay for third rate ministrel shows.

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 2-13

PHILHARMONIC REHEARSAL.

A Fine Programme Given at the Academy of Music.

The fourth rehearsal of the Philharmonic Society took place yesterday afternoon at the Academy of Music under the direction of Mr. Nikisch. Though the programme was a rich one, the attendance was slim, and the audience rather cold. Women are decidedly in the majority at the rehearsals, and when the high teas just before Lent are in progress, a decided falling off in the attendance is perceptible. Those who were fortunate enough to be at the rehearsal, however, heard a very fine concert. The soloists announced were Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Alwin Schroeder, the first 'cellist of the orchestra. Owing to a severe cold, however, Mrs. Nikisch was unable to appear, and Mrs. Julia L. Wyman sang in her place. This necessitated a change in the programme, and the aria, "Oh, Love, Aid Thou Me in My Weakness," from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah," was substituted for the selections originally chosen from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." Three French songs—"Regrets," by Delibes; "Bonne Nuit," by Massenet, and "A une Fiancee," by Ferrari—were put on in place of the three German songs by Goldmark, Jensen and Brahms, chosen by Mrs. Nikisch.

The concert opened with Wagner's "Faust Overture." This work, not as well-known as it ought to be, is overflowing with rich coloring, and was intended to form the first movement to a "Faust" symphony. One not aware of this latter fact, is apt to suppose that the whole idea of "Faust" is contained in this single so-called overture. The first part explains itself sufficiently as portraying the meditations of "Faust" alone, but in the latter half occur several tender passages, which are often supposed to refer to Gretchen. This, however, is said not to have been the composer's idea, except as these passages happen to express in a general way the loneliness and longing of "Faust." It is a pity that the title Wagner gives the piece in a letter to Liszt, that of "Faust in Solitude," has not been retained. Mr. Nikisch gave a broad and masterly rendering of it.

Mrs. Wyman, a popular singer, with a well-placed, sweet mezzo-soprano voice, sang the Saint-Saens aria faultlessly enough, but with very little dramatic effect. Her interpretation might almost have been called monotonous. The three little French songs were delightfully accompanied on the piano by Mr. Nikisch, who in assuming the task, followed the popular example of Mr. Seidl. Mrs. Wyman's singing of these songs was excellent. She was refined and sympathetic. The songs by Massenet and Ferrari, are gems of their kind.

Mr. Schroeder's fine rendering of the Saint-Saens' violoncello concerto in A minor was heard attentively. The work is, of course, a "show-piece," like many concertos, but it is unusually rich in attractive themes. Some exquisite alternating passages between the violins and the soloist were remarked in the course of its development, and a delicate sort of perpetual motion movement in one part rather suggested the movement of the "Rouet d'Omphale," by the same composer.

The second and third movements from Tschaikowsky's F minor symphony were full of the plaintive minor motives so often found in the Russian's music. The andantino is perhaps the more interesting of the two movements, though the scherzo pleased the audience. The concert closed with the always-wonderful "Heroic" symphony of Beethoven. It is doubtful if Brooklyn has ever heard a finer rendering of it than Mr. Nikisch gave yesterday. In itself it is so inexhaustible that each new hearing is a surprise. When it is interpreted by a splendidly-equipped orchestra, under the leadership of an able and reverent conductor, one listens with absorbed enjoyment, only to sigh when the end is reached. When the rendering of all the movements is admirable, it is hard to select any one for commendation. Probably, out of four persons, no two would agree upon the same movement. The writer found the handling of the funeral march unusually satisfactory, and was delighted with the massive breadth and fine contrasts of the last movement. The programme was, as usual, supplemented by interesting notes upon the selections, including a translation of Wagner's estimate of the symphony, from his "Programmatische Erlauterungen."

The entire programme will be repeated this evening, commencing at 8:15, instead of at 8 as formerly.

Those delightful artists, the Henschels, will begin their American tour on March 15, under direction of Charles A. Ellis, who is likewise managing the Boston symphony orchestra, the Kneisel quartet, Eugen D'Albert and Mrs. Nordica. The first appearance this season of Mr. D'Albert will be made on the 11th of March. It is noticed in the circulars that Mr. D'Albert is called Herr, though he was born in Glasgow and his father was an alleged Frenchman and it is said that his real name is Jones. But he can play on the piano, so what does it matter.

J. N. Pattison was one of the best known of concert pianists in the country fifteen years ago and he wrote operatic fantasias and waltz songs that were popular everywhere, beside a "Niagara" symphony that never was popular because it never was played. Recently, however, he composed a "Patti Waltz Song" and dedicated it to Patti, who is alleged to have been so pleased with it that she is alleged to have given an alleged diamond of large size and much brilliancy to the composer. Such conduct is most unusual with Patti.

Post
Louisville Ky.
2/12

Mr. C. A. Ellis, Manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has charge of the American tour of the renowned pianist, Eugen D'Albert, who has been called a second Liszt. He comes to America in March, and after appearing with the Boston Symphony, will go on a tour of recitals through the large cities.

☐

Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel will come to this country next month for a tour of vocal recitals under the same management, and will also sing in oratorio. They will have a warm reception in Boston where they are well known, Mr. Henschel having been conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for three years.

☐

Brooklyn, N.Y.
Date 2/13

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society course took place yesterday afternoon at the Academy. The orchestra played the "Faust Overture" of Wagner, the second and third movements from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony in F minor, and Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony. Alwin Schroeder gave Saint Saens' concerto for cello in A minor. Mrs. Nikisch was to have sung two arias from Mozart and three songs with piano, but was prevented by a cold. Mrs. Julia L. Wyman took her place, singing an aria from "Samson and Delila" and fragments from Delibes, Massenet and Ferrari. The concert takes place to-night.

HERALD, Fall River, Mass.
Date 2-13

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This great band, which arrived home yesterday after one of the most successful trips it has ever made, will be with us tomorrow night. Last Tuesday it gave a concert in New York city which awakened the greatest enthusiasm, the musical critic of the Sun saying the next day: "No more beautiful concert ever was or ever could be given." It is no every day event for such an entertainment to be offered our citizens, and it should not, nor will it be, overlooked.

The immense expense of giving this concert necessitates a higher price for seats than for most concerts, but the managers have wisely concluded to put the extra price on the orchestra chairs, keeping the gallery at 25 cents, thus giving the poor an opportunity to hear the very best music at as low a price as they frequently pay for the worst. The lower portions of the house will be packed tomorrow evening, and it is probable that the gallery too will be filled by an appreciative audience.

Chicago Ill.
Times 2/4

Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Music hall, Boston Symphony orchestra, etc., is arranging another American tour for the eminent pianist, Eugen D'Albert, to begin March 11 next, and also a tour for Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel, in song recitals, to begin March 13. Of course, they will include Chicago in the list of cities to be visited.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1892.

—It is to be hoped that the Kneisel Quartet has so far succeeded with its concerts in New York this winter that the experiment will be repeated next year. It is little disparagement to the various string quartets here to say that the playing of no one of them will bear comparison in technical excellence or in interpretative skill with that of the Boston men, and one enthusiastic critic, after the concert last Friday, declared that the quartet was "one of the very best in the whole world." The concerts of the Symphony Orchestra last week in New York and Brooklyn, too, were successful in every way.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

THE fourth concert of our Boston visitors saw Chickering Hall crowded with a most fashionable and enthusiastic audience on Tuesday night of last week.

The first portion of the program consisted of the Händel concerts for string orchestra and two wind choirs in F major and Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, about both of which we can only repeat what was said in last week's MUSICAL COURIER after the performance in Boston of these works:

> The concert opened with a concerto in F major for strings and two wind choirs by Händel. It was repeated on this occasion by special request, and we must confess that, although we are not as carried away by Händel's genius as some of his English admirers are, this concerto is so charming and at times so fresh, especially in harmonies, that it can easily carry away even the most blasé of modern audiences. As it was to have been played also last night in New York, one ventures to predict that it will in no less degree delight our metropolitan public than it did the vast Boston audiences who enthusiastically applauded each of the five movements of the concerto on the aforementioned occasions. The work of the two oboe players was especially admirable in the last movement, and the strings, flute and horns did beautiful work throughout.
>
> Exquisitely played and also much applauded was Berlioz's best symphonic work, his "Harold in Italy." It received loving and most intelligent treatment at Mr. Nikisch's hands, and Concertmaster Franz Kneisel's playing of the viola solo part was simply admirable, pure throughout in intonation and beautiful in tone quality.

The prediction about the success of the Händel concerto came true to the letter. But still more success did Mr. Nikisch and his artists attain with the beautifully, though a trifle too slowly, interpreted "Lohengrin" Vorspiel. Hans Richter's orchestral arrangements of "Siegfried's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock," "Morning Dawn" and "Rhine Journey," from Wagner's "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung" were the vastly appreciated closing numbers of this interesting concert. The selection has been heard here before under local conductors and also by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Gericke's direction; but it never before sounded as fresh, fiery and fine as it did on this occasion, as, although Gericke had his men trained down to a fine point of finish, his awful left hand used to choke every attempt at joyous force in the brass, and without these outbreaks a vigorous interpretation of Wagner cannot be imagined.

The Kneisel Quartet.

THE fourth, and one is sorry to say the last, of the present season's chamber music soirées of the Kneisel Quartet, of Boston, took place at the Carnegie Chamber Music Hall on last Friday night, and was, one regrets to have to state, like its predecessors, not adequately well attended. The quality of the audience, however, was of the most desirable, and it certainly made up in enthusiasm what it lacked in numbers. It is to be hoped that these delightful and instructive entertainments will be renewed next season, and that the taste for this highest class of musical performances may have developed in New York at least so far as to assure to Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder an attendance worthy of their efforts. Certainly New York has never before heard such chamber music playing; and as for refinement of interpretation, exquisite finish and absolutely flawless ensemble the Kneisel Quartet stands unrivaled to-day, not only in this country, but also abroad.

The program embraced last Friday two Beethoven string quartets, the early one, op. 18, No. 2, in G, which plainly shows the influence of Mozart, and that gem among quartets, even Beethoven's, the "Harp" quartet, op. 74, in E flat. The latter was especially beautifully and purely played, in spite of its great technical and other difficulties.

Between the Beethoven quartets, and entirely worthy of their position on the program, were Schubert's G minor variations from the posthumous D minor quartet, and they were interpreted in a touchingly beautiful manner. Especial mention, besides of course Kneisel, must be made of Schroeder, whose tone on a most valuable genuine Amati violoncello, in a perfect state of preservation, was exquisite.

Interspersed among these German chamber music treasures were some very small (in every way) French songs, viz.:

"Ritournelle" "Chant d'Amour"	Chaminade
"Regrets"	Delibés
"Mon petit cœur soupire"	Unknown Author
"Au bord d'une fontaine"	Wekerlin

which, though rather interesting, especially those of Miss Chaminade, seemed hardly sufficiently relevant to so serious a program. Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, however, sang them with very nice musical taste and perfect phrasing, for which she was justly applauded.

Nikisch in Baltimore.—The Academy of Music in Baltimore was crowded last Thursday evening at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The "Freischütz" overture; the Pilgrim's March from the "Harold in Italy" symphony, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony were the purely orchestral numbers. Mrs. Julie L. Wyman sang, with piano accompaniment, songs by Delibes, Massenet and Ferrari, which seem to be on her repertory permanently, and an aria from Saint-Saëns' "Samson and Delila," with orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Richard Burmeister played Liszt's A major piano concerto, and made with it his greatest success yet attained in that city. It is but proper to say that he had the use of a really superb Knabe grand piano—an instrument of rare merit.

NEWS, Fall River, Mass.
Date 2/17

THE SYMPHONY.

Finest Concert Ever Given in Fall River.
A Large and Appreciative Audience.

For once a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew a satisfactory and a paying audience to the Academy. The gathering was both large and fashionable, and if any among them were not satisfied they did not say so. The concert has been universally pronounced by critics to be the best that was ever given in this city. Not only were the critics pleased, but those among the audience who love music for itself, and not because of any technical knowledge of it, enjoyed every note. The whole concert was a musical treat of the richest description, and it will go a great way toward making such events popular in this city. The strongest evidence of the pleasure of the audience was the character of the applause which followed each number. There was nothing thunderous about them, for the effect of the music was against any demonstrations. The expressions of approval were, however, earnest and very honest, and that no encores were given was owing to the fact that the time for the completion of the rather long program was limited, as the orchestra was due to start on the return to Boston at 10:30 o'clock.

Naturally the central figure last night was Mr. Arthur Nikisch, acknowledged to be one of the greatest conductors living. He was warmly applauded when, a few minutes after 8 o'clock he advanced to the center. He evidently appreciated the enthusiasm with which the numbers were received. Only one other singer has ever created so favorable an impression in Fall River as did Mrs. Julie L. Wyman last night. That singer was Emma Juch. Mrs. Wyman's voice is called an alto, but she sang soprano solos splendidly and without the least apparent effort. Her best number was the aria from "Samson and Dalila," when her alto was heard in all its richness. The songs were of a lighter character, but were given with wonderful feeling and sympathy, and would have been duplicated had the audience been consulted. In response to the continuous and persistent applause the singer would not go beyond a courtesy in acknowledgment, although after one number she was called out twice.

The arrangement of the programme was satisfactory to everybody and could hardly have been improved upon. Placing the symphony first assures strict attention to its close without any possibility of tiring those unfamiliar with the score. The longer selection was followed by the short ones, and in these the variety was so great and the execution so perfect that there was neither excuse nor chance for becoming tired.

The symphony was Schumann Symphony No. 1 in B flat, which ranks as one of his best, if not his very best work. It is one of the best of the symphonies and is new to Fall River people. It probably gave the most general satisfaction of any symphony ever given here. The following five movements occurred in the number: Andante un poco maestoso, allegro molto vivace, larghetto, scherzo, allegro animato e grazioso. The classical composition was only understood by the educated musicians present, but to the uneducated music lovers it appealed through the contrasting movements and the finish and brilliancy of the rendering.

The numbers following, with the exception of the two from Wagner, were also new in this city. They are favorites now, and the sight of their titles on a programme in the future will arouse happy recollection and pleasant anticipation. While the feature of the second number—aria, "O Lord, aid thou me in my weakness," from "Sampson and Delila," Saint-Saen,—was the singing, the accompaniment by the full orchestra probably excited fully as much admiration. The personal appearance of the singer proved as attractive as did her singing. The selection gave her opportunity for splendid work in the lower register, her tones being full and clear without being forced.

The third selection, also from Saint-Saen's works, was the most general favorite. It was the symphonic poem, "The Spinning Wheel of Omphale," a wonderfully descriptive work. The selection was given very brilliantly and with great delicacy and expression. Those who were familiar with the story could follow the progress of the Lydian Queen Omphale in her triumphant victory, with all her weakness, over Hercules with his terrible strength.

The "Last Movement," by Tschaikowsky, was particularly good in showing the technical work of the orchestra. Their precision had been noticeable before, but in this selection it was particularly prominent. The number was marked from its contrast in its power and impressiveness with the number just preceeding it.

The violin solo by Mr. Kneisel was very fine, showing great technique and excellent and pure tone.

The songs with Mr. Nikisch accompanying at the piano followed. In the three the singer had ample opportunity to exhibit her capabilities. The first, "Regrets," by Delibes, was pathetic, and brought tears to the eyes of some of the more sympathetic, even though they did not understand the words. "Bonne Nuit," by Massenet, was tender [illegible] The clear enunciation of the singer was especially praiseworthy. While the words were in a foreign language their meaning was most clearly conveyed by the singer even to those who would not have been able to read them.

The concert closed with those selections by Wagner that are everywhere such favorites, the prelude from "Lohengrim" and the overture from "Tannhæuser." The selections are known to all patrons of music, and only the brass in the overture needs particular mention. This part was given with a prompt and pure tone and at the same time with a force that has seldom been equalled. In the prelude it was the string work that was prominent.

Now that the success of last night's concert is fresh in everybody's mind a number of people prominent in musical circles in the city are talking up subscriptions for two or more such concerts for next year.

---

ping from Herald
Washington D.C.
2-14

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday evening the chief interest was naturally centred in the first appearance, since her return from abroad, of Miss Leonora Von Stosch, the reports of whose triumphs in New York and Boston had prepared her hearers for a rich treat. They were not disappointed. Miss Von Stosch has returned to the scene of her first studies, an artist already, and with the positive assurance that with continued study, she will become one of the very first in her line. The writer is unable to recall any female violinist except the great Camilla Urso, who uses the bowing arm with such poetic force—uniting a man's strength with a woman's tenderness—and as it is years since Urso has appeared at her best, Miss Von Stosch may be said to be without a rival among women of her profession. When the announcement was made of her engagement with Mr. Nikisch's orchestra, there was much disappointment expressed that she should not have first appeared with her old associates in the Georgetown Orchestra, but those who were present on Wednesday night clearly saw that the young artist was "in her set" on that occasion, and gladly withdrew their objections. The Wilhelmj Club paid a graceful compliment to their former associate, in sending Miss Von Stosch a beautiful basket containing a rose for each member. Her selection was Saint-Saen's Rondo Capriciosso, and it is a high tribute to her interpretation of this difficult work to say that she played it "like a man." Indeed, her fine physique enables her to impart a broadness of tone even in the passages requiring rapid execution, which is seldom given by female players. Responding to a most emphatic encore, the young artiste played a movement of one of Bach's sonatas, without accompaniment, giving an exhibition of techique which was entirely satisfying. Miss Von Stosch has a future before her which will beyond doubt bring her many ovations and much lucre, but in years to come she will look back upon last Wednesday's performance before her friends with feelings of pride which no subsequent success will ever dim.

* * *

Post
Louisville Ky
2/12

Mr. C. A. Ellis, Manager of the Boston ymphony Orchestra, has charge of the American tour of the renowned pianist, Eugen D'Albert, who has been called a second Liszt. He comes to America in March, and after appearing with the Boston Symphony, will go on a tour of recitals through the large cities.

□

Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel will come to this country next month for a tour of vocal recitals under the same management, and will also sing in oratorio. They will have a warm reception in Boston where they are well known, Mr. Henschel having been Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for three years.

□

Date 2/13

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society course took place yesterday afternoon at the Academy. The orchestra played the "Faust Overture" of Wagner, the second and third movements from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony in F minor, and Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony. Alwin Schroeder gave Saint Saens' concerto for 'cello in A minor. Mrs. Nikisch was to have sung two arias from Mozart and three songs with piano, but was prevented by a cold. Mrs. Julia L. Wyman took her place, singing an aria from "Samson and Delila" and fragments from Delibes, Massenet and Ferrari. The concert takes place to-night.

HERALD, Fall River, Mass.

Date 2 3

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This great band, which arrived home esterday after one of the most successful rips it has ever made, will be with us tomorrow night. Last Tuesday it gave a oncert in New York city which awakened he greatest enthusiasm, the musical critic f the Sun saying the next day: "No more eautiful concert ever was or ever could e given." It is no every day event for uch an entertainment to be offered our itizens, and it should not, nor will it be, verlooked.

The immense expense of giving this oncert necessitates a higher price for eats than for most concerts, but the managers have wisely concluded to put the xtra price on the orchestra chairs, keeping the gallery at 25 cents, thus giving the oor an opportunity to hear the very best music at as low a price as they frequently ay for the worst. The lower portions of he house will be packed tomorrow evening, and it is probable that the gallery too will be filled by an appreciative audience.

Chicago
Times 2 7

Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Music hall, Boston Symphony orchestra, etc., is arranging another American tour for the eminent pianist, Eugen D'Albert, to begin March 11 next, and also a tour for Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel, in song recitals, to begin March 13. Of course, they will include Chicago in the list of cities to be visited.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1892.

—It is to be hoped that the Kneisel Quartet has so far succeeded with its concerts in New York this winter that the experiment will be repeated next year. It is little disparagement to the various string quartets here to say that the playing of no one of them will bear comparison in technical excellence or in interpretative skill with that of the Boston men, and one enthusiastic critic, after the concert last Friday, declared that the quartet was "one of the very best in the whole world." The concerts of the Symphony Orchestra last week in New York and Brooklyn, too, were successful in every way.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

THE fourth concert of our Boston visitors saw Chickering Hall crowded with a most fashionable and enthusiastic audience on Tuesday night of last week.

The first portion of the program consisted of the Händel concerts for string orchestra and two wind choirs in F major and Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, about both of which we can only repeat what was said in last week's MUSICAL COURIER after the performance in Boston of these works:

> The concert opened with a concerto in F major for strings and two wind choirs by Händel. It was repeated on this occasion by special request, and we must confess that, although we are not as carried away by Händel's genius as some of his English admirers are, this concerto is so charming and at times so fresh, especially in harmonies, that it can easily carry away even the most blasé of modern audiences. As it was to have been played also last night in New York, one ventures to predict that it will in no less degree delight our metropolitan public than it did the vast Boston audiences who enthusiastically applauded each of the five movements of the concerto on the aforementioned occasions. The work of the two oboe players was especially admirable in the last movement, and the strings, flute and horns did beautiful work throughout.
>
> Exquisitely played and also much applauded was Berlioz's best symphonic work, his "Harold in Italy." It received loving and most intelligent treatment at Mr. Nikisch's hands, and Concertmaster Franz Kneisel's playing of the viola solo part was simply admirable, pure throughout in intonation and beautiful in tone quality.

The prediction about the success of the Händel concerto came true to the letter. But still more success did Mr. Nikisch and his artists attain with the beautifully, though a trifle too slowly, interpreted "Lohengrin" Vorspiel. Hans Richter's orchestral arrangements of "Siegfried's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock," "Morning Dawn" and "Rhine Journey," from Wagner's "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung" were the vastly appreciated closing numbers of this interesting concert. The selection has been heard here before under local conductors and also by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Gericke's direction; but it never before sounded as fresh, fiery and fine as it did on this occasion, as, although Gericke had his men trained down to a fine point of finish, his awful left hand used to choke every attempt at joyous force in the brass, and without these outbreaks a vigorous interpretation of Wagner cannot be imagined.

The Kneisel Quartet.

THE fourth, and one is sorry to say the last, of the present season's chamber music soirées of the Kneisel Quartet, of Boston, took place at the Carnegie Chamber Music Hall on last Friday night, and was, one regrets to have to state, like its predecessors, not adequately well attended. The quality of the audience, however, was of the most desirable, and it certainly made up in enthusiasm what it lacked in numbers. It is to be hoped that these delightful and instructive entertainments will be renewed next season, and that the taste for this highest class of musical performances may have developed in New York at least so far as to assure to Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder an attendance worthy of their efforts. Certainly New York has never before heard such chamber music playing; and as for refinement of interpretation, exquisite finish and absolutely flawless ensemble the Kneisel Quartet stands unrivaled to-day, not only in this country, but also abroad.

The program embraced last Friday two Beethoven string quartets, the early one, op. 18, No. 2, in G, which plainly shows the influence of Mozart, and that gem among quartets, even Beethoven's, the "Harp" quartet, op. 74, in E flat. The latter was especially beautifully and purely played, in spite of its great technical and other difficulties.

Between the Beethoven quartets, and entirely worthy of their position on the program, were Schubert's G minor variations from the posthumous D minor quartet, and they were interpreted in a touchingly beautiful manner. Especial mention, besides of course Kneisel, must be made of Schroeder, whose tone on a most valuable genuine Amati violoncello, in a perfect state of preservation, was exquisite.

Interspersed among these German chamber music treasures were some very small (in every way) French songs, viz.:

"Ritournelle" "Chant d'Amour"	Chaminade
"Regrets"	Delibés
"Mon petit cœur soupire"	Unknown Author
"Au bord d'une fontaine"	Wekerlin

which, though rather interesting, especially those of Miss Chaminade, seemed hardly sufficiently relevant to so serious a program. Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, however, sang them with very nice musical taste and perfect phrasing, for which she was justly applauded.

Nikisch in Baltimore.—The Academy of Music in Baltimore was crowded last Thursday evening at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The "Freischütz" overture; the Pilgrim's March from the "Harold in Italy" symphony, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony were the purely orchestral numbers. Mrs. Julie L. Wyman sang, with piano accompaniment, songs by Delibes, Massenet and Ferrari, which seem to be on her repertory permanently, and an aria from Saint-Saëns' "Samson and Delila," with orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Richard Burmeister played Liszt's A major piano concerto, and made with it his greatest success yet attained in that city. It is but proper to say that he had the use of a really superb Knabe grand piano—an instrument of rare merit.

NEWS, Fall River, Mass.

ate 2/17

THE SYMPHONY.

Finest Concert Ever Given in Fall River. A Large and Appreciative Audience.

For once a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew a satisfactory and a paying audience to the Academy. The gathering was both large and fashionable, and if any among them were not satisfied they did not say so. The concert has been universally pronounced by critics to be the best that was ever given in this city. Not only were the critics pleased, but those among the audience who love music for itself, and not because of any technical knowledge of it, enjoyed every note. The whole concert was a musical treat of the richest description, and it will go a great way toward making such events popular in this city. The strongest evidence of the pleasure of the audience was the character of the applause which followed each number. There was nothing thunderous about them, for the effect of the music was against any demonstrations. The expressions of approval were, however, earnest and very honest, and that no encores were given was owing to the fact that the time for the completion of the rather long program was limited, as the orchestra was due to start on the return to Boston at 10:30 o'clock, Naturally the central figure last night was Mr. Arthur Nikisch, acknowledged to be one of the greatest conductors living. He was warmly applauded when, a few minutes after 8 o'clock he advanced to the center. He evidently appreciated the enthusiasm with which the numbers were received. Only one other singer has ever created so favorable an impression in Fall River as did Mrs. Julie L. Wyman last night. That singer was Emma Juch. Mrs. Wyman's voice is called an alto, but she sang soprano solos splendidly and without the least apparent effort. Her best number was the aria from "Samson and Dalila," when her alto was heard in all its richness. The songs were of a lighter character, but were given with wonderful feeling and sympathy, and would have been duplicated had the audience been consulted. In response to the continuous and persistent applause the singer would not go beyond a courtesy in acknowledgment, although after one number she was called out twice.

The arrangement of the programme was satisfactory to everybody and could hardly have been improved upon. Placing the symphony first assures strict attention to its close without any possibility of tiring those unfamiliar with the score. The longer selection was followed by the short ones, and in these the variety was so great and the execution so perfect that there was neither excuse nor chance for becoming tired.

The symphony was Schumann Symphony No. 1 in B flat, which ranks as one of his best, if not his very best work. It is one of the best of the symphonies and is new to Fall River people. It probably gave the most general satisfaction of any symphony ever given here. The following five movements occurred in the number: Andante un poco maestoso, allegro molto vivace, larghetto, scherzo, allegro animato e grazioso. The classical composition was only understood by the educated musicians present, but to the uneducated music lovers it appealed through the contrasting movements and the finish and brilliancy of the rendering.

The numbers following, with the exception of the two from Wagner, were also new in this city. They are favorites now, and the sight of their titles on a programme in the future will arouse happy recollection and pleasant anticipation. While the feature of the second number—aria, "O Lord, aid thou me in my weakness," from "Sampson and Delila," Saint-Saen,—was the singing, the accompaniment by the full orchestra probably excited fully as much admiration. The personal appearance of the singer proved as attractive as did her singing. The selection gave her opportunity for splendid work in the lower register, her tones being full and clear without being forced.

The third selection, also from Saint-Saen's works, was the most general favorite. It was the symphonic poem, "The Spinning Wheel of Omphale," a wonderfully descriptive work. The selection was given very brilliantly and with great delicacy and expression. Those who were familiar with the story could follow the progress of the Lydian Queen Omphale in her triumphant victory, with all her weakness, over Hercules with his terrible strength.

The "Last Movement," by Tschaikowsky, was particularly good in showing the technical work of the orchestra. Their precision had been noticeable before, but in this selection it was particularly prominent. The number was marked from its contrast in its power and impressiveness with the number just preceeding it.

The violin solo by Mr. Kneisel was very fine, showing great technique and excellent and pure tone.

The songs with Mr. Nikisch accompanying at the piano followed. In the three the singer had ample opportunity to exhibit her capabilities. The first, "Regrets," by Delibes, was pathetic, and brought tears to the eyes of some of the more sympathetic, even though they did not understand the words. "Bonne Nuit," by Massenet, was tender, while the third song, "A une Fiancee," by Ferrari, was arch. The clear ennunciation of the singer was especially praiseworthy. While the words were in a foreign language their meaning was most clearly conveyed by the singer even to those who would not have been able to read them.

The concert closed with those selections by Wagner that are everywhere such favor- tes, the prelude from "Lohengrim" and he overture from "Tannhæuser." The elections are known to all patrons of music, nd only the brass in the overture needs articular mention. This part was given ith a prompt and pure tone and at the ame time with a force that has seldom een equalled. In the prelude it was the ring work that was prominent.

Now that the success of last night's con- ert is fresh in everybody's mind a number f people prominent in musical circles in the ity are talking up subscriptions for two or more such concerts for next year.

---

ping from Herald
ashington D.C. e 2-14

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday evening the chief interest was naturally centred in the first appearance, since her return from abroad, of Miss Leonora Von Stosch, the reports of whose triumphs in New York and Boston had prepared her hearers for a rich treat. They were not disappointed. Miss Von Stosch has returned to the scene of her first studies, an artist already, and with the positive assurance that with continued study, she will become one of the very first in her line. The writer is unable to recall any female violinist except the great Camilla Urso, who uses the bowing arm with such poetic force—uniting a man's strength with a woman's tenderness—and as it is years since Urso has appeared at her best, Miss Von Stosch may be said to be without a rival among women of her profession. When the announcement was made of her engagement with Mr. Nikisch's orchestra, there was much disappointment expressed that she should not have first appeared with her old associates in the Georgetown Orchestra, but those who were present on Wednesday night clearly saw that the young artist was "in her set" on that occasion, and gladly withdrew their objections. The Wilhelmj Club paid a graceful compliment to their former associate, in sending Miss Von Stosch a beautiful basket containing a rose for each member. Her selection was Saint-Saen's Rondo Capriciosso, and it is a high tribute to her interpretation of this difficult work to say that she played it "like a man." Indeed, her fine physique enables her to impart a broadness of tone even in the passages requiring rapid execution, which is seldom given by female players. Responding to a most emphatic encore, the young artiste played a movement of one of Bach's sonatas, without accompaniment, giving an exhibition of techique which was entirely satisfying. Miss Von Stosch has a future before her which will beyond doubt bring her many ovations and much lucre, but in years to come she will look back upon last Wednesday's performance before her friends with feelings of pride which no subsequent success will ever dim.

* * *

HERALD, Fall River, Mass.

Date 2/17

MUSIC'S CHARMS.

Big Success of the Symphony Concert

AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC

An Audience That was Representative Gathers to Welcome and Applaud Boston's Famous Orchestra—A Marvelous Revelation of Good Work.

Fall River did itself proud in the support it gave America's greatest musical organization Tuesday night. A truly representative audience filled the academy of music and listened to the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, 60 musicians, Arthur Nikisch, conductor. The audience was a representative one for the reason the concert patrons were not confined to that class of people who attend such an affair because it is the proper thing to do, or to the coterie who are intensely and scientifically musical, and who have carefully studied the program beforehand to be certain that no false notes should pass undetected. There was a large number of people in the house who were there because, while they were not up to perfection in the technicalities of the program, the grand harmony of 60 instruments, directed by a master mind, gave them a great many pleasant sensations, and it did not matter much whether major or minor chords awoke those sensations. The painfully musical people were there, of course, and the passiveness with which they accepted the program led one to wonder if the music of the spheres or the songs of the heavenly hosts could break through their reserve and induce them to share in the applause by which the fickle multitude showed their appreciation of the performance. The aforementioned fickle multitude and the wearers of new opera bonnets formed the remainder of the unusually large concert audience and overflowed in goodly numbers into the gallery.

Nobody but the "heavies" among the musical public care for a scientific analysis of the program, and they have made one for themselves. To the ordinary concert patron the performance of the orchestra was wonderful. The perfect harmony, the lights and shadows, executed by 60 men as one hand upon a single instrument, were a marvelous revelation of what a small host of musical talents can do under the guidance of a genius. The program opened with the symphony, No. 1, in B flat, by Schumann, in five movements, and the larghetto probably gave the most general satisfaction. Mrs. Julia L. Wyman then came forward to sing the aria, "O Love, aid thou me in my weakness," from "Samson and Dalila," by Saint-Saens, with the orchestral accompaniment. Mrs. Wyman has a rare contralto voice, of unusual power and sweetness, and a naturalness that makes it equally delightful to look at her as to hear her. She sang the number in a manner that called out signs of approbation on all sides and a demand for a response to the encore. A bow and a sweet smile for everybody were the only reward for the continuous hand clapping.

The second orchestral number was the descriptive composition by Saint-Saens entitled "Le Ruet d' Omphale"—"The Spinning Wheel of Omphale." In a notice prefixed to the score the composer informs his hearers that the subject of his music is the alluring power of woman and the triumphant victory of weakness over strength. The "Spinning Wheel" is a mere artistic pretext to give the rhythm and form which are necessary for the music. "Those," says Saint-Saens, "who wish to go into detail will find in one passage a picture of Hercules groaning under the bonds which he is unable to break, and in another, Omphale laughing over his ineffectual efforts to get free." As has been the case wherever the orchestra has performed this number, it merited a first place in the appreciation of the audience. The poem was followed by a very Russian harmony, which the program announced to be a theme with variations from the suite, opus 55, by Tscnaikowsky.

Of the three songs which Mrs. Wyman sang—"Regrets," by Delibes; "Bonne Nuit," by Massenet, and "A une Fiancee," by Ferrari—the second was especially delightful, if any comparison be made between the three well rendered selections. Again the vulgar herd who pounded their hands red in the efforts to get just one more song were reminded by the sweet smile and dignified bow that they were not listening to a topical song, or that this wasn't a song and dance performance.

The prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser" by Wagner concluded the concert, and at no part of the program were the possibilities of the organization more clearly brought out than in the last selection that will always remain popular. The chorus of pilgrims as borne by the horns and the reeds in the introduction was wonderful in its harmony.

A word of commendation is deserved by the local manager, O. Elton Borden, for the treat which his enterprise, guaranteeing success to the orchestra's manager, afforded the music lovers of the city.

THE DAILY GLOBE

IS PUBLISHED BY

The Fall River Daily Globe Publishing Co.,

FEBRUARY 17, 1892.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Successful and Artistic Entertainment by the Great Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, 60 pieces, appeared at the Academy of Music last evening before a magnificent and appreciative audience of more than 1100 people. The programme, carried oht under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch was as follows:

1. Schumann Symphony No 1, in B flat
   Andante un poco maestoso. Allegro molto vivace—
   Larghetto—
   Scherzo—
   Allegro animato e grazio so.
2. Saint-Saens Aria.
   "O Love aid thou me in my weakness," from "Samson and Dalila."
3. Saint-Saens Symphonic Poem.
   "Le Rouet d 'Omphale."
4. Tschaikowsky Last Movement
   (Theme with Variations) from Suite, op. 55.
5. Songs with piano.
   Delibes "Regrets."
   Massenet "Bonne Nuit."
   Ferrari "A une Fiancee."
6. Wagner Prelude
   "Lohengrin."
7. Wagner Overture
   "Tannhæuser."

The first number brought out the grand harmonic power of the greatest musical organization America has ever seen. After the Larghetto movement the audience applauded and when the allegro was concluded the performers had their hearers at their mercy. It seemed as if the orchestra was more popularly balanced than in years gone by, and while many persons were present because of the "society" feeling, a glance about the hall at times gave conclusive evidence of many keen lovers of music in the city.

The second number was the first appearance of Mrs. Julia L. Wyman, contralto soloist. Her work was keenly appreciated and a double recall was exacted. The audience seemed to yearn for a beautiful English song but Mrs. Wyman only bowed. The third number was perhaps the most sweetly delicate piece of the evening. The violin work was superb.

The fourth number was the one that brought out the wonderful and varying powers of almost every instrument in the orchestra. The leading violinist and the flute player were particularly pleasing to the critics. In Mrs. Wyman's rendering of the sweet song "Bonne Nuit," she displayed her wonderful talents to the most popular advantage. The prelude to "Lohengrin" was rather more familiar to many in the audience and consequently was listened to with much interest.

But the great popular number of the evening was the overture from "Tanhæser" when every instrument was heard in grand tone and power. The whole programme was eminently pleasing, and a great number of hearers who listened to the orchestra for the first time, openly expressed their desire to hear it again.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEB. 21, 1892.

The fifth of the season's programmes by the Kneisel quartette was given at Union hall Monday evening, the works performed being Beethoven's quartette, G major, op. 18; Mendelssohn's sonata for piano and violoncello; and Schubert's quintette, C major, op. 163. Mme. Helen Hopekirk and Mr. Schroeder did excellent work in the piano and 'cello sonata, winning a ready recognition for their artistic interpretation. Mr. Kneisel and his associates had the assistance of Mr. Schulz as the second 'cello of the quintette, and showed their usual excellent work.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch are to give a recital Wednesday evening, Feb. 24, at Chickering hall. Master Alexander Fiedemann, the young violinist, is to appear with them.

An extra concert will be given by the Symphony orchestra on Wednesday evening, March 2, at Music hall, for the benefit of the members of the orchestra. A brilliant programme has been arranged, including the suite "Esclarmonde," Massanet; symphonic poem, "The Sea," Nicodé, etc. The soloists will be announced later, but a most enjoyable performance is assured.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

Y, FEBRUARY 20, 1892.

An extra concert will be given by the Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday evening, March 2d, at Music Hall, for the benefit of the members of the orchestra. A brilliant program has been arranged, including the suite "Esclarmonde," Massanet; symphonic poem, "The Sea," Nicodé, etc. The soloists will be announced later, but a most enjoyable performance is assured.

PRESS, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 2/17

A symphony composed by Louis A. Von Gaertner has been accepted by Nikisch and will presently be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1892.

The fifth concert in the Kneisel Quartet series was given in Music Hall, Monday evening, at which Beethoven's quartette in G, opus 18, Mendelssohn's sonata for 'cello and pianoforte, and Schubert's quintette, opus 163, were played. Mrs. Hopekirk was the pianist and Mr. Leo Schulz took the second 'cello in the quintette.

GLOBE, Fall River, Mass.

Date 2/17

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Successful and Artistic Entertainment by the Great Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, 60 pieces, appeared at the Academy of Music last evening before a magnificent and appreciative audience of more than 1100 people. The programme, carried out under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch was as follows:

1. Schumann Symphony No. 1, in B flat
   Andante un poco maestoso. Allegro molto vivace—
   Larghetto—
   Scherzo—
   Allegro animato e grazio so.
2. Saint-Saens Aria.
   "O Love aid thou me in my weakness," from "Samson and Dalila."
3. Saint-Saens Symphonic Poem.
   "Le Rouet d 'Omphale."
4. Tschaikowsky Last Movement
   (Theme with Variations) from Suite, op. 55.
5. Songs with piano.
   Delibes "Regrets."
   Massenet "Bonne Nuit."
   Ferrari "A une Fiancee."
6. Wagner Prelude
   "Lohengrin."
7. Wagner Overture
   "Tannhæuser."

The first number brought out the grand harmonic power of the greatest musical organization America has ever seen. After the Larghetto movement the audience applauded and when the allegro was concluded the performers had their hearers at their mercy. It seemed as if the orchestra was more popularly balanced than in years gone by, and while many persons were present because of the "society" feeling, a glance about the hall at times gave conclusive evidence of many keen lovers of music in the city.

The second number was the first appearance of Mrs. Julia L. Wyman, contralto soloist. Her work was keenly appreciated and a double recall was exacted. The audience seemed to yearn for a beautiful English song but Mrs. Wyman only bowed. The third number was perhaps the most sweetly delicate piece of the evening. The violin work was superb.

The fourth number was the one that brought out the wonderful and varying powers of almost every instrument in the orchestra. The leading violinist and the flute player were particularly pleasing to the critics. In Mrs. Wyman's rendering of the sweet song "Bonne Nuit," she displayed her wonderful talents to the most popular advantage. The prelude to "Lohengrin" was rather more familiar to many in the audience and consequently was listened to with much interest.

But the great popular number of the evening was the overture from "Tauhæser" when every instrument was heard in grand tone and power. The whole programme was eminently pleasing, and a great number of hearers who listened to the orchestra for the first time, openly expressed their desire to hear it again.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 20, 1892.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartette, whose series has been several times interrupted, gave a programme with the assistance of Mme. Hopekirk, who played with Mr. Schroeder a piano and 'cello sonata of Schubert in excellent style. Mr. Schroeder's part was but another illustration of his great superiority in ensemble work, while Mme. Hopekirk gave pleasant proof—as during last season—of her growing command over her former fitfulness, and accorded in all respect with him. The omitted programme in which Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler is to assist will be given early in March.

~~~ The Kneisel Quartette, Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, and Miss Gertrude Edmands were the artists who contributed the programme at the musicale to which Mr. and Mrs. Henry R. Reed of Jamaica Plain invited their friends on Thursday evening.

~~~ A concert of consequence is announced for Wednesday evening, March 6, when the Symphony Orchestra will give themselves a benefit in Music Hall. The programme will include Massenet's "Esclarmonde" suite and Nicodé's symphonic poem, "The Sea," and a soloist of eminence will assist. Seats may now be had at the box office.

~~~ The Symphony concert of this evening will bring back the pianist, Mr. W. H. Sherwood, to the platform from which he has been absent too long. His brilliant abilities and splendid technique cannot but have gained in value in these years, and the Raff concerto cannot but give them perfect scope. As a novelty three movements from a symphonic suite by Mr. Busoni will be played; the symphony will be Mozart in G-minor, and Wagner's Huldigung's March will end the concert.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 22, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

Our orchestra has returned from its Southern tour crowned with the laurels which the Washington, Baltimore and New York press always shower upon them. It is singular that the pæans of praise cannot always be re-echoed in Boston, but it is just possible that, as we are behind New York in operatic matters, we may be in advance of that city in orchestral work, and allow a higher criterion to rule. Be that as it may, the first impression made on Saturday, after two weeks of silence, was a poor one. The Mozart G minor symphony is a tender violet among symphonies, but the most gorgeous sunflower could not have made more display that its first movement did on this occasion. It was given with pomp and slowness, instead of with naiveté and simplicity; the geniality was changed into turgidity, and everything seemed to go in a "King Cambyses" vein that was altogether out of place. The second movement followed the first in its too ambitious path, but the third began to show improvement, and if one found but little contrast in the minuet, the trio at least was all grace and delicacy. The finale was still better, and the figure in imitations was well balanced and intelligible as it threaded its way from instrument to instrument, the contrabasses doing exceptionally excellent work.

Mr. Sherwood's high professional rank was never better illustrated than by his performance of the Raff C minor concerto. He seemed to entirely grasp the character of the composition, the best points of his instrument and the just value of the ensemble effects, and the orchestra seconded him in grand style, Mr. Nikisch appearing at his best in the conducting of the work. The concerto begins in the style established by Mendelssohn and Schumann, by allowing the piano to enter at once with thematic material. It is brimful of staccato and chord work, and the pianist in these passages and in octave runs seemed to have wrists of steel. Not less effective, however, was the legato work of the second movement, which was given with a degree of expression entirely commendable. The finale again turned to the bravura school and began with a solo display that seemed like a cadenza occurring in an unexpected place. The presentation of themes entirely unaccompanied, followed by others wholly orchestral, gave a peculiarly antiphonal effect to this movement that militated against that perfect union of forces which should obtain in a concerto. Only Beethoven and Brahms have thoroughly attained this intertwining, and Raff has followed Chopin and Rubinstein in making a concerto which at times seems like a piano solo with an orchestra obligingly filling in the waits between the themes. There was some fine trumpet work in the first movement, but it was a trifle too loud for the piano part which was balanced against it. The oboe work in the second movement deserves recognition, and the fioriture woven around the theme by the piano were exquisitely performed. The only faults to be found with the performance were that the bass passages were too light and seemed to lack sustaining power, while the composition as a whole leaned too much toward martial effects, being a sort of military fantasie in its finale, and decidedly lacking depth and subtlety. Mr. Sherwood was recalled with an enthusiasm that was but a just tribute to his merit as an artist.

And now there followed a composition in the old forms, but in the most modern style—three movements from a suite by our newly arrived pianist, Busoni. The suite might also be called a suite de spectres, so weird, uncanny and ghost-like are many of its effects. It began with a gigue that came much nearer to Berlioz than to Bach. All the percussion, from triangle to glockenspiel, were kept busy in this "Queen Mab" like number, and the speed was that of a Tarantelle. The Gavotte also was in the spirit of the new school, while observing the shape of the old. It began with an English horn theme which was very musette like in character, but the real Musette appeared in proper place as Trio, with plentiful horn-playing, and an appropriate drone bass. This movement was altogether charming in its delicate rusticity and its playful syncopations. If the first movement suggested an elf in revel rather than a hilarious gigue, this Gavotte portrayed shepherds and shepherdesses a la Watteau, on the sylvan scene, and the contrast was a delightful one. The final allegro fugato was not so inspired as the two preceding movements, although the musicianly knowledge of the young composer was evinced in every measure, and the scoring throughout was of wonderful efficacy.

The concert ended with Wagner's "Huldigungs March." Even Homer sometimes nodded, and it is not very heterodox to say that the world would not be very much the poorer if Wagner's marches were allowed to fall into obsolescence. They are frequently bombastic and overswollen. But if they passed away, how could our conductor get his fortisissisissimo effects? Such clatter could not be introduced into Beethoven, or Mozart, or Haydn, and even Liszt is only sporadically deafening! It is the highest compliment that can be paid to the orchestra to say that they played louder in this work than they have ever played before. Their whole attention was directed towards this end, and it is but justice to say that they achieved it; I do not think that any band on this Continent, or any other, could have played louder. The injunction of the psalmist to "play skilfully and with a loud noise" was carried out at least in its latter portion. I do not pretend to say that the tumult was out of place; perhaps the blame should rest on Wagner only, but since the extreme possibilities of uproar have been overcome let us now try to achieve a few good diminuendo efforts, and see what may be done in the direction of perfect ensemble.

LOUIS C. ELSON.
~~~

HERALD, Fall River, Mass.

Date 2/17

MUSIC'S CHARMS.

Big Success of the Symphony Concert

AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC

An Audience That was Representative Gathers to Welcome and Applaud Boston's Famous Orchestra—A Marvelous Revelation of Good Work.

Fall River did itself proud in the support it gave America's greatest musical organization Tuesday night. A truly representative audience filled the academy of music and listened to the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, 60 musicians, Arthur Nikisch, conductor. The audience was a representative one for the reason the concert patrons were not confined to that class of people who attend such an affair because it is the proper thing to do, or to the coterie who are intensely and scientifically musical, and who have carefully studied the program beforehand to be certain that no false notes should pass undetected. There was a large number of people in the house who were there because, while they were not up to perfection in the technicalities of the program, the grand harmony of 60 instruments, directed by a master mind, gave them a great many pleasant sensations, and it did not matter much whether major or minor chords awoke those sensations. The painfully musical people were there, of course, and the passiveness with which they accepted the program led one to wonder if the music of the spheres or the songs of the heavenly hosts could break through their reserve and induce them to share in the applause by which the fickle multitude showed their appreciation of the performance. The aforementioned fickle multitude and the wearers of new opera bonnets formed the remainder of the unusually large concert audience and overflowed in goodly numbers into the gallery.

Nobody but the "heavies" among the musical public care for a scientific analysis of the program, and they have made one for themselves. To the ordinary concert patron the performance of the orchestra was wonderful. The perfect harmony, the lights and shadows, executed by 60 men as one hand upon a single instrument, were a marvelous revelation of what a small host of musical talents can do under the guidance of a genius. The program opened with the symphony, No. 1, in B flat, by Schumann, in five movements, and the larghetto probably gave the most general satisfaction. Mrs. Julia L. Wyman then came forward to sing the aria, "O Love, aid thou me in my weakness," from "Samson and Dalila," by Saint-Saens, with the orchestral accompaniment. Mrs. Wyman has a rare contralto voice, of unusual power and sweetness, and a naturalness that makes it equally delightful to look at her as to hear her. She sang the number in a manner that called out signs of approbation on all sides and a demand for a response to the encore. A bow and a sweet smile for everybody were the only reward for the continuous hand clapping.

The second orchestral number was the descriptive composition by Saint-Saens entitled "Le Ruet d' Omphale"—"The Spinning Wheel of Omphale." In a notice prefixed to the score the composer informs his hearers that the subject of his music is the alluring power of woman and the triumphant victory of weakness over strength. The "Spinning Wheel" is a mere artistic pretext to give the rhythm and form which are necessary for the music. "Those," says Saint-Saens, "who wish to go into detail will find in one passage a picture of Hercules groaning under the bonds which he is unable to break, and in another, Omphale laughing over his ineffectual efforts to get free." As has been the case wherever the orchestra has performed this number, it merited a first place in the appreciation of the audience. The poem was followed by a very Russian harmony, which the program announced to be a theme with variations from the suite, opus 55, by Tscnaikowsky.

Of the three songs which Mrs. Wyman sang—"Regrets," by Delibes; "Bonne Nuit," by Massenet, and "A une Fiancee," by Ferrari—the second was especially delightful, if any comparison be made between the three well rendered selections. Again the vulgar herd who pounded their hands red in the efforts to get just one more song were reminded by the sweet smile and dignified bow that they were not listening to a topical song, or that this wasn't a song and dance performance.

The prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser" by Wagner concluded the concert, and at no part of the program were the possibilities of the organization more clearly brought out than in the last selection that will always remain popular. The chorus of pilgrims as borne by the horns and the reeds in the introduction was wonderful in its harmony.

A word of commendation is deserved by the local manager, O. Elton Borden, for the treat which his enterprise, guaranteeing success to the orchestra's manager, afforded the music lovers of the city.

THE DAILY GLOBE
IS PUBLISHED BY
The Fall River Daily Globe Publishing Co.,
FEBRUARY 17, 1892.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Successful and Artistic Entertainment by the Great Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, 60 pieces, appeared at the Academy of Music last evening before a magnificent and appreciative audience of more than 1100 people. The programme, carried out under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch was as follows:

1. Schumann Symphony No 1, in B flat
Andante un poco maestoso. Allegro molto vivace—
Larghetto—
Scherzo—
Allegro animato e grazioso.
2. Saint-Saens Aria.
"O Love aid thou me in my weakness," from "Samson and Dalila."
3. Saint-Saens Symphonic Poem.
"Le Rouet d 'Omphale."
4. Tschaikowsky Last Movement
(Theme with Variations) from Suite, op. 55.
5. Songs with piano.
Delibes "Regrets."
Massenet "Bonne Nuit."
Ferrari "A une Fiancee."
6. Wagner Prelude
"Lohengrin."
7. Wagner Overture
"Tannhæuser."

The first number brought out the grand harmonic power of the greatest musical organization America has ever seen. After the Larghetto movement the audience applauded and when the allegro was concluded the performers had their hearers at their mercy. It seemed as if the orchestra was more popularly balanced than in years gone by, and while many persons were present because of the "society" feeling, a glance about the hall at times gave conclusive evidence of many keen lovers of music in the city.

The second number was the first appearance of Mrs. Julia L. Wyman, contralto soloist. Her work was keenly appreciated and a double recall was exacted. The audience seemed to yearn for a beautiful English song but Mrs. Wyman only bowed. The third number was perhaps the most sweetly delicate piece of the evening. The violin work was superb.

The fourth number was the one that brought out the wonderful and varying powers of almost every instrument in the orchestra. The leading violinist and the flute player were particularly pleasing to the critics. In Mrs. Wyman's rendering of the sweet song "Bonne Nuit," she displayed her wonderful talents to the most popular advantage. The prelude to "Lohengrin" was rather more familiar to many in the audience and consequently was listened to with much interest.

But the great popular number of the evening was the overture from "Tauhæser" when every instrument was heard in grand tone and power. The whole programme was eminently pleasing, and a great number of hearers who listened to the orchestra for the first time, openly expressed their desire to hear it again.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEB. 21, 1892.

The fifth of the season's programmes by the Kneisel quartette was given at Union hall Monday evening, the works performed being Beethoven's quartette, G major, op. 18; Mendelssohn's sonata for piano and violoncello; and Schubert's quintette, C major, op. 163. Mme. Helen Hopekirk and Mr. Schroeder did excellent work in the piano and 'cello sonata, winning a ready recognition for their artistic interpretation. Mr. Kneisel and his associates had the assistance of Mr. Schulz as the second 'cello of the quintette, and showed their usual excellent work.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch are to give a recital Wednesday evening, Feb. 24, at Chickering hall. Master Alexander Fiedemann, the young violinist, is to appear with them.

An extra concert will be given by the Symphony orchestra on Wednesday evening, March 2, at Music hall, for the benefit of the members of the orchestra. A brilliant programme has been arranged, including the suite "Esclarmonde," Massanet; symphonic poem, "The Sea," Nicodé, etc. The soloists will be announced later, but a most enjoyable performance is assured.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.
Y, FEBRUARY 20, 1892.

An extra concert will be given by the Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday evening, March 2d, at Music Hall, for the benefit of the members of the orchestra. A brilliant program has been arranged, including the suite "Esciarmonde," Massanet; symphonic poem, "The Sea," Nicodé, etc. The soloists will be announced later, but a most enjoyable performance is assured.

PRESS, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 2/17

A symphony composed by Louis A. Von Gaertner has been accepted by Nikisch and will presently be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE COMMONWEALTH.
ESTABLISHED IN 1862.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1892.

The fifth concert in the Kneisel Quartet series was given in Music Hall, Monday evening, at which Beethoven's quartette in G, opus 18, Mendelssohn's sonata for 'cello and pianoforte, and Schubert's quintette, opus 163, were played. Mrs. Hopekirk was the pianist and Mr. Leo Schulz took the second 'cello in the quintette.

GLOBE, Fall River, Mass.

Date 2/17

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Successful and Artistic Entertainment by the Great Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, 60 pieces, appeared at the Academy of Music last evening before a magnificent and appreciative audience of more than 1100 people. The programme, carried out under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch was as follows:

1. Schumann Symphony No. 1, in B flat
Andante un poco maestoso. Allegro molto vivace—
Larghetto—
Scherzo—
Allegro animato e grazioso.
2. Saint-Saens Aria.
"O Love aid thou me in my weakness," from "Samson and Dalila."
3. Saint-Saens Symphonic Poem.
"Le Rouet d 'Omphale."
4. Tschaikowsky Last Movement
(Theme with Variations) from Suite, op. 55.
5. Songs with piano.
Delibes "Regrets."
Massenet "Bonne Nuit."
Ferrari "A une Fiancee."
6. Wagner Prelude
"Lohengrin."
7. Wagner Overture
"Tannhæuser."

The first number brought out the grand harmonic power of the greatest musical organization America has ever seen. After the Larghetto movement the audience applauded and when the allegro was concluded the performers had their hearers at their mercy. It seemed as if the orchestra was more popularly balanced than in years gone by, and while many persons were present because of the "society" feeling, a glance about the hall at times gave conclusive evidence of many keen lovers of music in the city.

The second number was the first appearance of Mrs. Julia L. Wyman, contralto soloist. Her work was keenly appreciated and a double recall was exacted. The audience seemed to yearn for a beautiful English song but Mrs. Wyman only bowed. The third number was perhaps the most sweetly delicate piece of the evening. The violin work was superb.

The fourth number was the one that brought out the wonderful and varying powers of almost every instrument in the orchestra. The leading violinist and the flute player were particularly pleasing to the critics. In Mrs. Wyman's rendering of the sweet song "Bonne Nuit," she displayed her wonderful talents to the most popular advantage. The prelude to "Lohengrin" was rather more familiar to many in the audience and consequently was listened to with much interest.

But the great popular number of the evening was the overture from "Tauhæser" when every instrument was heard in grand tone and power. The whole programme was eminently pleasing, and a great number of hearers who listened to the orchestra for the first time, openly expressed their desire to hear it again.

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 20, 1892.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartette, whose series has been several times interrupted, gave a programme with the assistance of Mme. Hopekirk, who played with Mr. Schroeder a piano and 'cello sonata of Schubert in excellent style. Mr. Schroeder's part was but another illustration of his great superiority in ensemble work, while Mme. Hopekirk gave pleasant proof—as during last season—of her growing command over her former fitfulness, and accorded in all respect with him. The omitted programme in which Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler is to assist will be given early in March.

~~~~ The Kneisel Quartette, Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, and Miss Gertrude Edmands were the artists who contributed the programme at the musicale to which Mr. and Mrs. Henry R. Reed of Jamaica Plain invited their friends on Thursday evening.

~~~~ A concert of consequence is announced for Wednesday evening, March 6, when the Symphony Orchestra will give themselves a benefit in Music Hall. The programme will include Massenet's "Esclarmonde" suite and Nicodé's symphonic poem, "The Sea," and a soloist of eminence will assist. Seats may now be had at the box office.

~~~~ The Symphony concert of this evening will bring back the pianist, Mr. W. H. Sherwood, to the platform from which he has been absent too long. His brilliant abilities and splendid technique cannot but have gained in value in these years, and the Raff concerto cannot but give them perfect scope. As a novelty three movements from a symphonic suite by Mr. Busoni will be played; the symphony will be Mozart in G-minor, and Wagner's Huldigung's March will end the concert.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 22, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

Our orchestra has returned from its Southern tour crowned with the laurels which the Washington, Baltimore and New York press always shower upon them. It is singular that the pæans of praise cannot always be re-echoed in Boston, but it is just possible that, as we are behind New York in operatic matters, we may be in advance of that city in orchestral work, and allow a higher criterion to rule. Be that as it may, the first impression made on Saturday, after two weeks of silence, was a poor one. The Mozart G minor symphony is a tender violet among symphonies, but the most gorgeous sunflower could not have made more display that its first movement did on this occasion. It was given with pomp and slowness, instead of with naiveté and simplicity; the geniality was changed into turgidity, and everything seemed to go in a "King Cambyses" vein that was altogether out of place. The second movement followed the first in its too ambitious path, but the third began to show improvement, and if one found but little contrast in the minuet, the trio at least was all grace and delicacy. The finale was still better, and the figure in imitations was well balanced and intelligible as it threaded its way from instrument to instrument, the contrabasses doing exceptionally excellent work.

Mr. Sherwood's high professional rank was never better illustrated than by his performance of the Raff C minor concerto. He seemed to entirely grasp the character of the composition, the best points of his instrument and the just value of the ensemble effects, and the orchestra seconded him in grand style, Mr. Nikisch appearing at his best in the conducting of the work. The concerto begins in the style established by Mendelssohn and Schumann, by allowing the piano to enter at once with thematic material. It is brimful of staccato and chord work, and the pianist in these passages and in octave runs seemed to have wrists of steel. Not less effective, however, was the legato work of the second movement, which was given with a degree of expression entirely commendable. The finale again turned to the bravura school and began with a solo display that seemed like a cadenza occurring in an unexpected place. The presentation of themes entirely unaccompanied, followed by others wholly orchestral, gave a peculiarly antiphonal effect to this movement that militated against that perfect union of forces which should obtain in a concerto. Only Beethoven and Brahms have thoroughly attained this intertwining, and Raff has followed Chopin and Rubinstein in making a concerto which at times seems like a piano solo with an orchestra obligingly filling in the waits between the themes. There was some fine trumpet work in the first movement, but it was a trifle too loud for the piano part which was balanced against it. The oboe work in the second movement deserves recognition, and the fioriture woven around the theme by the piano were exquisitely performed. The only faults to be found with the performance were that the bass passages were too light and seemed to lack sustaining power, while the composition as a whole leaned too much toward martial effects, being a sort of military fantasie in its finale, and decidedly lacking depth and subtlety. Mr. Sherwood was recalled with an enthusiasm that was but a just tribute to his merit as an artist.

And now there followed a composition in the old forms, but in the most modern style—three movements from a suite by our newly arrived pianist, Busoni. The suite might also be called a suite de spectres, so weird, uncanny and ghost-like are many of its effects. It began with a gigue that came much nearer to Berlioz than to Bach. All the percussion, from triangle to glockenspiel, were kept busy in this "Queen Mab" like number, and the speed was that of a Tarantelle. The Gavotte also was in the spirit of the new school, while observing the shape of the old. It began with an English horn theme which was very musette like in character, but the real Musette appeared in proper place as Trio, with plentiful horn-playing, and an appropriate drone bass. This movement was altogether charming in its delicate rusticity and its playful syncopations. If the first movement suggested an elf in revel rather than a hilarious gigue, this Gavotte portrayed shepherds and shepherdesses a la Watteau, on the sylvan scene, and the contrast was a delightful one. The final allegro fugato was not so inspired as the two preceding movements, although the musicianly knowledge of the young composer was evinced in every measure, and the scoring throughout was of wonderful efficacy.

The concert ended with Wagner's "Huldigungs Marsch." Even Homer sometimes nodded, and it is not very heterodox to say that the world would not be very much the poorer if Wagner's marches were allowed to fall into obsolescence. They are frequently bombastic and overswollen. But if they passed away, how could our conductor get his fortissississississimo effects? Such clatter could not be introduced into Beethoven, or Mozart, or Haydn, and even Liszt is only sporadically deafening! It is the highest compliment that can be paid to the orchestra to say that they played louder in this work than they have ever played before. Their whole attention was directed towards this end, and it is but justice to say that they achieved it; I do not think that any band on this Continent, or any other, could have played louder. The injunction of the psalmist to "play skilfully and with a loud noise" was carried out at least in its latter portion. I do not pretend to say that the tumult was out of place; perhaps the blame should rest on Wagner only, but since the extreme possibilities of uproar have been overcome let us now try to achieve a few good diminuendo efforts, and see what may be done in the direction of perfect ensemble.

LOUIS C. ELSON.
~~~~

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

Mozart's Music Arranged for Modern Use.

An Interesting Suite by Ferrucio Busoni.

The programme of the sixteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, Saturday evening, was as follows: Mozart's symphony in G minor, Raff's concerto for pianoforte in C minor, three movements from Busoni's symphonic suite op. 25 (first time), and Wagner's Huldigungs March. Mr. William H. Sherwood was the pianist.

⁂

The first movement of Mozart's famous G minor symphony is an allegro molto. The first subject is a simple melody, passionate and intense; its whole effect is in the sincerity of the appeal to the hearer. The composer was terribly in earnest, he wasted no time in preparing or introducing it; he struck directly at the heart of the hearer. But Mr. Nikisch was not satisfied Saturday evening with the music of Mozart, its simplicity was apparently abhorrent to his genius. He therefore adorned and embellished it to suit his taste. He turned the allegro of Mozart into an allegretto; he coquetted with each phrase; he so exaggerated the penultimate note of each phrase that it became a hiccough; and the whole sentence, which is a rapid flow of melody until the entrance of the first forte, was broken into spasmodic jets. Thus he thought to gain in expression; and he was so pleased with his own inventions that he displayed them at every opportunity. In the andante he was not content with the Mozartian serenity of the opening statement; he used italics and capitals; and so when he came to the first sforzando of the first violins the effect of Mozart was already discounted. The menuetto was taken at such a pace that it might have been an ultra-modern scherzo; the entire character of the movement was lost, although the conductor no doubt thought that the trio would gain by the treatment, and the strongly marked phrases of Mozart were almost a jumble. The exaggerations of Mr. Nikisch were without any musical excuse—they often prevented the proper exposition of the melos, and Wagner claimed, and justly, that the proper tempo is merely the finding out the movement which best suits the melody; they were often directly opposed to the spirit of Mozart and the intentions as explicitly expressed by him. From the standpoint of mechanism the performance, as a whole, was excellent, and these exaggerations of the conductor were, therefore, the more to be regretted.

⁂

It may be said that a conductor should be granted a certain liberty; that he should not be the slave of traditions; that his own individuality should have play. There is a vast difference, however, between liberty and licentiousness. When a conductor deliberately chooses a tempo which is contrary to that of the composer, when he reads and punctuates the sentences so that the meaning of the composer is distorted or made false, when in dealing with the masterpieces of such men as Mozart his most earnest endeavor is apparently to make all things new, when the hearers find a greater pleasure in discussing the caprices of the conductor than in the music itself, then the musical sincerity of that conductor may well be questioned.

⁂

Extracts from a Symphonic Suite by Mr. Ferruccio Busoni were played for the first time. It is said that in this Suite Mr. Busoni tried to "emancipate himself from the influence of the Italian style." "Italian style" is a vague term. It is here probably used as a reproach; for it is the fashion with many to say openly that music is peculiarly a German invention. We are apt to forget that in Italy the opera and the oratorio first saw the light; that the influence of Italian musical art and song is the leaven of the whole lump; that this influence was felt by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert and Wagner; that last year the one opera that was given most frequently in the Imperial Opera House of Berlin was the work of a young Italian, who did not expatriate himself in his music. The Italians that resolutely turn their backs on melody, which seems their birthright, and strive after German profundity, are apt to make a sad mess of it; for in their endeavors to write German music they out-German their models, and their music is too often pretentious, ugly and dull. When, on the contrary, Italians cling fast to that which is already their own, and clothe melody with the substance of Germany and the grace of France, they are still loyal to their country. Mr. Busoni studied chiefly in Germany, but his blood is Italian; and the temperament of the composer as revealed in the fragments of this work, written when he was about eighteen years of age, is Southern. The jig, evidently shaped after the old and approved models, has Southern fire. The unexpected and effective pauses, the sense of color that warms the contrapuntal devices, the unerring sense of rhythm—all these turn that which might have been merely a school-task into a thing of beauty. The gavotte opens with a delightfully quaint melody for the oboe, and throughout the movement charming effects are gained by the simplest of means—and yet this simplicity is so difficult, as Carissimi said years ago. The finale, an allegro fugato, is broadly built, and interesting to musician and layman. For the counterpoint of Mr. Busoni seems so natural, so inevitable, that the knowledge of the composer is almost overlooked on account of the grace of his expression. These movements are melodically and harmonically strong; the counterpoint is fluent and effective; the instrumentation is rich without ostentation, and again, it is often very ingenious without strainings after effect, without whimsicalities. Mr. Busoni knows the peculiarities and the speech of each instrument, and he also knows the value of occasional silence, so that when the trumpet or the clarionet enters into the conversation it is because it has something to say. Mr. Nikisch read these fragments with an evident appreciation of their value, and they were sympathetically treated by the orchestra. They were very favorably received by the audience, and the applause was hearty and long-continued.

⁂

Mr. William H. Sherwood gave in many respects a remarkably fine performance of the Raff concerto. His scales, arpeggio work, chord attack and use of pedals have long excited the admiration of musicians. His playing Saturday evening was broad and brilliant, bold and free in the first and last movement; and in the andante he played with marked elegance. The concerto made certain demands on him to which his response was more than adequate; it did not call for any expression of deep emotion. Mr. Sherwood was enthusiastically applauded and he was several times recalled.

⁂

Louis II. of Bavaria was an unfortunate monarch. He was undoubtedly insane, and his death was tragic; Catulle Mendes wrote a most unpleasant book about him; and Richard Wagner dedicated to him a "March of Homage" [illegible] played at his coronation. This march [illegible] pompous noise; there is one short phrase [illegible] the entrance of the riders in the [illegible] of the old fashioned circus; [illegible] the apotheosis of blatant

The sixth concert of the Cambridge series, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given in Sanders Theatre Thursday evening. Mrs. Julie L. Wyman is the soloist. She will sing numbers by Delibes, Godard, Massenet and Ferrari. The orchestral programme includes the overture "Der Freischutz," Weber; one movement from the suite "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Pilgrim's March from the symphony "Harold in Italy," Berlioz, and the symphony in (Italian) Mendelssohn.

The programme of the Symphony Orchestra rehearsal and concert of this week Friday and Saturday is as follows: Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture, Dvorak's Symphony No. 4 in G minor, and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

The extra concert by the Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of the members of the orchestra will be given Wednesday evening, March 2. The programme to be performed includes Massenet's "Esclarmonde" suite, and Nicodé's symphonic poem, "The Sea." A "distinguished soloist," to be announced later, but generally believed to be Mr. Paderewski, will appear. Tickets may be procured at the Music Hall.

The recital to have been given by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, with the assistance of Master Alexander Friedmann, has been postponed from the evening of Wednesday, February 24, to that of Thursday, March 10, in consequence of the continued indisposition of Mrs. Nikisch.

Boston Post

MOTTO:
With a Mission
—AND—
Without a Muzzle.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 22, 1892.

Symphony Concert.

The Symphony Orchestra scored a success in the rendition of Saturday night's programme, beginning with Mozart's symphony in G minor. Music Hall was well filled by an audience which pleasantly remembered Mr. William Sherwood's last appearance in Boston, and which could not possibly have been disappointed at the manner in which he gave Raff's concerto in C minor, with its beautiful orchestral accompaniment. It cannot be said that he has improved, for he had already established his position as a master of the pianoforte, with an absolute command of technical detail.

The novelty of the programme was Busoni's symphonic suite, three movements of which were given. It was written when the composer was but 18 years old, but shows a master hand in its treatment; it is full of harmony and unexpected grace of effect.

The three movements were gigue, gavotte and allegro fugato, the last somewhat more interesting than the other two, for it is broad in style and replete with brilliant orchestral effects.

Wagner's Huldigungs march was a fitting close to the programme. The next concert will be purely orchestral, composed of Mendelssohn's overture, "Ruy Blas"; Dvorak's symphony No. 4, in G minor, first time in America; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

VIVIAN.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 21, 1892.

Symphony Concert.

Last evening's Symphony concert gave a great deal of pleasure to one of the largest audiences of the season. A varied programme of enjoyable selections was offered by Director Nikisch, and admirable interpretation of all was given by his orchestra.

Mr. William H. Sherwood was the soloist, and he very naturally received an enthusiastic greeting from a host of admirers, who were delighted at the opportunity of hearing him again. Until a few years ago Mr. Sherwood was a resident of Boston, and was esteemed as one of the most talented and popular pianists of the city. He now resides in Chicago.

He played Raff's concerto in C minor yesterday, and gave the work a masterly and finished interpretation. At the conclusion of the number he was recalled four times by the enthusiastic and thoroughly delighted audience.

The novelty on the programme was the first hearing here of three movements from a symphonic suite Op. 25, by F. B. Busoni, a pianist and composer, who has during a residence of but a few months here gained the cordial regard of the Boston musical public.

Although the "Symphonic Suite" was written when the composer was 18 years old, it is a scholarly composition, full of agreeable melodies, and is treated in a thoroughly musicianly manner. The three movements played were Gigue, Gavotte and allegro fugato. The Gigue is vivaciously written and treats with many novel effects, a pleasing sprightly theme.

The Gavotte is rather severe in style, and its chief motive is sombre until near the close of the movement, when it becomes more cheerful. The allegro fugato is the most interesting of the three movements. It is broad in style and the several themes are developed in a masterly way.

Mozart's charming symphony in G minor proved a welcome offering and was finely played by the orchestra. Wagner's "Huldigungs March," also splendidly performed, brought the concert to a close.

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the programme will be as follows:

Overture, Ruy Blas................Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 4, in G minor..............Dvorak
(First time in America.)
Symphonic poem, Les Preludes..............Liszt

The sixth concert of the Cambridge series by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given at Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening. Mrs. Julie L. Wyman is the soloist.

Owing to the continued illness of Mrs. Nikisch, the concert announced for Wednesday evening, Feb. 24, by Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch has been postponed until Thursday evening, March 10.

—At the Kneisel concert Monday night, Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Higginson, Mrs. Agassiz, Mrs. Gardner, Mrs. Apthorp, Mr. Foote, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. B. L. Whelpley, Mr. G. W. Chadwick and Mr. Nathan Haskel Dole were in the large audience.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 52.

SUNDAY, Feb. 21, 1892.

AT A SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

One of the Most Noted Features of Boston Life.

Remarkable Way in Which These Concerts Have Grown Away from Their Original Purpose—Fashion Made Them Her Own—An Audience Analyzed—Listeners Who Nod.

Of all Boston institutions of the present day there is no doubt that the symphony concerts are the most famous.

Their renown has reached from Dan to Beersheba, and not a stranger ever comes within the gates who does not insist upon being taken to one, at least, to feast his eyes upon the delicious spectacle of the hub of the universe sitting rapt and reverent at its favorite shrine.

Music Hall on a Friday afternoon is the city in little, well worth a visit from the the social philosopher, apart from the music, which in itself will afford him a rare treat.

To begin with, it is amusing to reflect how thoroughly and perversely the concerts have grown away from the original purpose of their founder. Mr. Higginson's avowed object some 10 years ago, when he first began to consider the scheme, was to provide the best of classical music at a price which should bring it within the reach of all.

In the memory of man there has never been a time when good music was not to be heard in Boston, but not everybody could afford to listen to it, and there seemed to be no really sensible reason why a series of subscription concerts should not be possible here on the same plan as that so successful abroad at the Gewandhaus in Leipsic and at a hundred other places in Germany.

So it came about, Mr. Higginson agreeing to make up any deficit which this philanthropical idea might leave at the end of the season. The subscriptions for the series of 24 concerts were placed at a figure which put them practically in reach of every one. Single tickets could be bought for 25 and 50 cents, and it seemed as if a new era of bliss were opening out before music lovers.

But hardly two years had gone by before it began to be apparent that fashion had marked the Symphony concerts, and especially the rehearsals, for her own. Vast as the audiences were, they noticeable at the hastiest glance. The seats on the floor were occupied almost wholly by people whose names are rolled like sweet morsels under the Boston tongue. To secure these places, they paid large premiums on the regular price, which grew greater and greater with each succeeding year.

Took on a Back Bay Tone,

It was the thing to be seen at the rehearsal. There was a scramble for tickets. The auction sales in the fall came to be a competition between millionaires, and at the present moment it is not often that a good seat on the floor, in the midst of the elect, can be bought for less than $50 for the 24 concerts, which is not too dear, perhaps, for the satisfaction it gives, but certainly proves that the music, marvellous as it is, is not at a marked-down figure.

The same with the balconies. In the top, places not reserved are still to be had according to the original plan at the price of admission, 25 cents, but to secure one of them it is necessary to wait for an hour or so outside in an impatient, pushing crowd, to fight one's way up stairs tooth and nail, and finally to fall into a seat so breathless and cross and tired that not even Beethoven has charms enough to sooth the savage breast.

If the programme happen to be a popular one, the chances are against one getting a seat at all. You are far more likely to be obliged to stand during the entire afternoon. For once in a way this is worth while, but, persisted in, will ruin the sweetest disposition and cause curses, not loud, but deep, to be breathed against symphonies and all play therein.

However, nobody cares whether the 25-cent people are pleased or not. Beacon street and Commonwealth avenue are happy. Every Friday 2 o'clock finds them rustling into place, with all those noddings and greetings and whispered inquiries about Aunt Jane and Cousin Curtis which give to every select Boston symposium the air of a large family party.

To be in Boston without relations is very much like being

In Heaven Without Wings.

An outsider stumbling into this network of connections, feels himself a helpless intruder with blushes mounting to the roots of his hair and an involuntary desire to get up and explain the reason of his being there. Nowhere is this more noticeable than at the rehearsals, which have come to wear very much the air of a large afternoon reception with music, where, seeing an awning up at the door, a few waifs and strays from the street, of no social value or position, have wandered in.

Alas! poor woman from the wrong side of the avenue, you may have money enough to buy your ticket and to adorn yourself with the most gorgeous attire in town, but when you sit week after week surrounded by people who calmly ignore your very existence, talking over and around you as if you were an empty chair, about their most intimate personal concerns, how can you help your soul growing smaller and ending that 24 afternoons of torture crushed by a sense of your own insignificance?

But you, stranger, must not by any means think of going alone. Take somebody with you, if it is only the letter carrier, who knows who is who, and who can let you into all the secrets of society. Otherwise the audience will lose half its savor. For instance, why should you know or how should you guess that the portly lady in black, who always sleeps through the andante movements, has a pedigree longer than your arm, and belongs to a family which speaks of Columbus as a Cook's tourist? Is there any outward and visible sign to tell you which is the celebrated Mrs. Jack Gardner, the accomplished Mrs. Monty Sears, the gentle Mrs. Gray, or to point out the noble army of Lymans, and Salstonstalls, and Lowells, and Cabots, and Amorys, and Winthrops, who are the pillars of the commonwealth?

Dr. Holmes everybody recognizes from the photographs and engravings sown broadcast over the land. The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table rarely misses a concert. His familiar figure, straight and apparently strong as ever, appears Friday after Friday in its accustomed place [illegible] whimsical [illegible] for his dear [illegible]. People often stand stock still and watch him as he goes out with a tender affection and admiration.

There are Harvard professors by the dozen, musicians of all ages, degrees, nationalities and accomplishments, editors of magazines and newspapers, artists, with more brains than money, and to offset them the nouveaux riches with more money than brains, scribblers by the hundreds, for every soul in Boston has written, is writing or means to write a book. School teachers with a flock of damsels in tow, and all that vast indescribable miscellany of men and women who live the busy Boston life, full of intellectual enjoyment and philanthropic work.

A Host of Dilettanti

The faces of the women are generally refined, delicate and placid. They dress generally with the greatest simplicity, which may be either costly or inexpensive, and in a quiet taste affording the greatest contrast to an audience of similar quality in New York or Philadelphia or Chicago where gay colors take the feminine fancy and the house blooms like a fairy flower garden.

As for the men, they have the thin nervous features of New England, and the wiry figures, too. They are always in the proper cut of coat and trousers, with a careful attention to the prevailing tying of cravats, and they look like gentlemen, which is saying a great deal. To glance over that sea of human beings you cannot help fancying in each long line the traces of a direct descent from the Puritan settlers whose influence is still felt in this corner of the land.

While you are taking all this in, and feeling the subtle Boston atmosphere penetrating the inmost fibres of your being with a sort of lifting up, as it were, the orchestra is gradually occupying the chairs on the platform over which the bronze Beethoven keeps guard. Do realize that it is he, dear stranger, and don't be deluded, as many have been before, into thinking those mighty features belong to a local celebrity, such as Prof. J. K. Paine or Jonas Chickering.

There is a subdued scraping of strings and fluttering of music books. The audience looks into its neat little programme books to refresh its memory as to the afternoon's menu, and feels a thrill of pride that those programmes are so different from any others with their analyses of the various numbers, and the sketches of the musicians who have furnished the coming entertainments. Even the advertisements boast a certain literary merit and are furtively studied during the intricate passages of the concerts by the very young and the very old.

Presently in slips Nikisch himself, and a little bustle of applause greets

The Idol of the Hour.

The pretty girls nudge one another and smile ecstatic rapture. The Harvard boys silently notice that he wears light trousers and a frock coat. The great conductor mounts his perch, turns over the pages of the score, for he no longer keeps up the mighty feats he performed in days of yore in leading his orchestra without a note outside his memory. He raises that magical baton. A hush settles over the whole house, and, with the first wave of his hand, the enchantment begins. It may be Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn—perhaps the glorious overture to "Ruy Blas," given with a verve and precision that sets every pulse to thrilling. Then comes one of St. Saen's symphonic poems, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," played as no other orchestra in America ever has played it, or ever will, for only Nikisch can elicit those exquisite crescendoes diminuendoes. Then something else—what you will—always perfectly rendered, and then the intermission.

Buzzes of conversation rise all over the hall. People get up and shake themselves. There is a good deal of criticism whispered—some of the music, but more of the neighbors' bonnets and back hair. The girls exchange enraptured comments about that first violin, who is supposed to have half the susceptible hearts in town in his toils. He sits back in his chair languidly, apparently unconscious that several hundred pairs of eyes are focussed upon him admiringly, and bends such affectionate glances upon his fiddle that many a foolish young woman grows wildly jealous of that thing of wood and catgut. Why is it that first violins are always irresistible? Upon the curl of their mustaches a good deal of the success of an orchestra depends—yes, even in Boston.

At last the leader is back again. All the old maids assume the expression of absorbed rapture supposed to be especially suited to symphonies. Old Moneybags who comes because his wife wants to be fashionable and who hates any music above the "Annie Rooney" order, with difficulties suppresses a groan as he settles himself uncomfortably in his leathern chair. Mrs. Moneybags grasps her silver-cornered pocketbook tightly and sits up as straight as a ram-rod. Her tailer advises it strongly. Does she adore symphonies? She says so. The real music-lovers prepare for a rich treat, and an hour of happiness begins for them with the opening strains of the Eroica.

And you, stranger, must not be so absorbed by the noble rendering of that noble symphony that you forget to glance around you while it is going on. Choose a moment when the harmonies are too complex and intricate to be intelligible to common clay—the moment in which the student and the musician above all others delight, and look about.

Oh, for the sake of Boston and of culture, tell it not in Gath, nor breathe it in Askelon, how many of the first families are sound asleep! Not only old Moneybags, who, to do him justice, is not a bit of a hypocrite, and honestly declares that he means to get a wink or two if he can, but the gifted and great of the land are unconscious that like so many apples stuck on knitting needles.

Their Heads Are Nodding

What a howl of denial and indignation would go up if they were accused of dozing during a Beethoven symphony.

But there they are, row after row, napping beyond all manner of doubt. Naughty Maud Pinckney amuses herself every week by making a list of the people in her neighborhood who go to sleep. She says that at the end of the season she shall give it to a reporter to publish in a Sunday newspaper, and if she puts that dreadful threat into execution, it is safe to predict that the Back Bay will witness such scenes of excitement as never before in its career.

There is a far-away look in some faces that the enthusiastic believer in Boston might mistake for æsthetic transfiguration. But it is not æsthetic transfiguration—it is just what it appears to be, far away. The mothers of families, who wear it, are busy arranging the family meals for weeks ahead, planning whom they shall ask to stay with them next summer at Nahant or Pride's Crossing, and when, making over the children's clothes and wondering if by any possible manœuvring they can get Charley and Emily into the Friday afternoon dancing class. Something inexpressibly soothing lies in Beethoven's music, and by the time the slow movement ends these thrifty matrons have smoothed their paths in life for a long time to come, and straightened out a good many tangles that have somehow crept into their households.

To hint that there are other ladies who choose this ill-advised time for the planning of their spring and summer wardrobes would be [illegible] for anything. [illegible]

[illegible] could be persuaded to set down honestly what their thoughts were during a single number of a Symphony, let us say! O what shrieks of delight would be heard all over this wicked, flippant land of ours, and what a laugh at Boston humbuggery! I take it there would not be any too much about counterpoints and harmony in those records.

Coming Out After the Finale has awakened the sleepers and covered the retreat of the players and conductor with tremendous applause, there is plenty of amusing conversation to be overheard by those who keep their ears open; and still more as the crowd surges along through Hamilton place into the Back Bay cars. It certainly seems as if almost the entire audience goes home in those blue vehicles or in the smart broughams waiting along Tremont street.

The criticisms by really intelligent women would convulse Nikisch if he could hear them. Here there comes in more humbuggery. All sorts of stock expressions are tugged in right and left. They give a flavor to talk, and it is well to be able to find fault with the strings and the wood-wind, even if you don't know one from the other. Very few, very, very few have the courage to come out and declare with our friend, Moneybags what in the bottoms of their souls they are most likely saying. "Well," he announces, while the whole car looks properly horrified at these vulgar sentiments, "give me tunes; that's what I like. Who wants to sit all the afternoon, and listen to the same little air played over and over again, first on one side of the band, and then on the other, first fast, and then slow? I call it pretty poor fun. I wouldn't give a cent to hear a band that can't turn a tune! Why don't they bring in something jiggy now and then?"

The idea of mentioning tunes and something jiggy after a Symphony concert! It is a wonder the electricity doesn't come right down from the trolley wire and annihilate old Moneybags.

Humbug! All humbug!

But the Girls,

bless their hearts! It would never do to mention the rehearsals without a word for that lovely rosebud garden which makes the dim old hall bright. There never were anywhere in the world such pretty, sweet young things as these genuine Boston maidens, never such rosy cheeks, such white, even teeth, such bright eyes and such glossy curls as theirs.

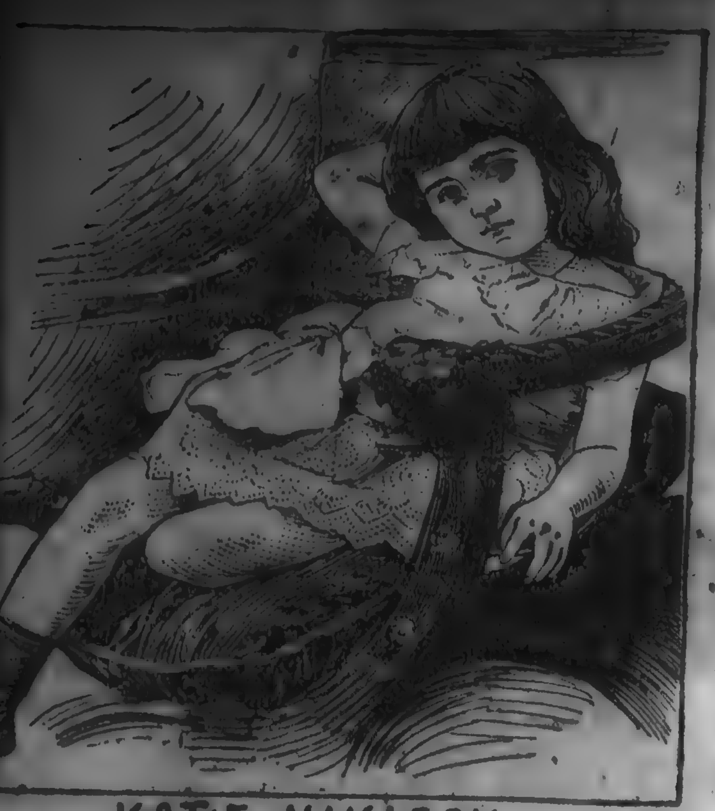
From Brookline, Longwood, Cambridge, from Roxbury, Dorchester, and even farther away, they come in laughing flocks to join those other bevies from the new-made land. Tremont street and Winter street suddenly become alive with youth and prettiness, and the air is full of merry chatter, often clever enough to surprise one.

They may be lacking in style—their New York cousin says so—but they have certainly no want of charm.

The sourest old cynic smiles in spite of himself as he looks at them, and feels his heart growing light again when they surround him on the way out, sweeping him along in a resistless current toward the great rendezvous at Huyler's, where they all repair to revive themselves after the concert with ice cream soda. The shop is crammed. The atmosphere is faint with the fragrance of violets, for every lassie wears a bunch of them. They are all talking and laughing at once. Chaos is come again, but such a fresh, cheery, blushing, smiling chaos that it seems quite delightful. To see your Symphony rehearsals properly ended this is the place. You will go home with a glow of rapture which you will attribute to the music, but the Boston witches will account for it all. While the concerts bring out such a beauty-show every Friday may their success never grow less!

M. E. W.

MONDAY, FEB. 22.



KATIE NIKISCH.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1892.

Music Hall: The Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mozart: Symphony in G minor.
Raff: Pianoforte Concerto in C minor, Op. 185.
Busoni: Three Movements from Symphonic Suite, Op. 25.
Wagner: Huldigungs-Marsch.
Mr. William H. Sherwood was the pianist.

The ever-beautiful G minor symphony was admirably played. Nothing of the poetic effect of the performance of the work under Mr. Nikisch during his first year here was lost, and much was gained in the way of symmetry of proportion and regularity of tempo. The exquisite opening phrase in the violins sounded just as romantic, at a normal tempo, as it did two years ago, when Mr. Nikisch took it too slow; and our excellent conductor is much to be thanked for his perfect tempo in the Andante. All that the performance left to be desired was, perhaps, a still finer delicacy and finish in the first and second movements, and a more nervous, definite accent in the accompanying eighth-notes in the violas at the beginning of the first. The viola passage sounded too much like a whispering tremolo; as it stands in the score, it is evidently meant to say something.

The movements from Mr. Busoni's suite are full of life and charm, and are excellently written for the orchestra. One had rather the composer had not used the word fugato in his heading to the last movement; it arouses expectations which the movement fulfils rather stingily. There is enough fugato in it to swear to before a jury, but not enough to be worth mentioning. Not that this impugns the musical value of the movement in the least, but that, when you are told that you are going to hear a fugato, you like to hear something that is a fugato all through. Still the fresh, lively charm of the music is its own defence.

Never before have we heard the Huldigungs-Marsch sound so gloriously as it did last Saturday evening. Here Mr. Nikisch really gave us a new revelation. We had always thought the Huldigungs-Marsch a good and worthy thing enough, decidedly inferior to the Kaiser-Marsch, but just as decidedly superior to that $5000 composition which rejoices in the compendious title of "Grosser Festmarsch zur Eröffnung der hundertjährigen Gedenkfeier der Unabhängigkeits-Erklärung der vereinigten Staaten von Nordamerika." In fact, we had looked upon the Huldigungs-Marsch as a work in which Wagner had joined Homer in nodding a little. But, as Mr. Nikisch takes it, it is simply superb! It took the audience off its feet. If that is what the Huldigungs-Marsch sounds like, then long live the Huldigungs-Marsch! We would almost hazard the wish that, as Mr. Nikisch has made such a triumphant success in this case, he would try his hand at the—well, we really cannot go through all those polysyllables again, but must simply say—"Centennial March." Perhaps he might succeed in making something out of the wonderful triplet, now that a certain college song has passed into oblivion.

Mr. Sherwood was cordially received, and, what is still better, applauded to the echo after finishing the Raff concerto. The composition itself has never seemed to us to be worth very much. To be sure, it cannot rightly be ranked with works of respectable mediocrity; it is both too good and too bad for that. It shows Raff's cleverness, his inventiveness, and brilliancy; but also his want of self-criticism, his tawdriness and lack of true nobility. It cannot be a work to live very long, and there seems to be no sound reason for keeping it above ground. But Mr. Sherwood's playing of it was superb at every point; he played it with a brilliancy, a dash, an incisiveness of accent, and a sustained power that were simply electric. And all through he showed a self-possession—by which we mean a thorough possession of, and mastery over, his own resources—that prevented his ever going too far, or falling short of perfect clearness and coherence. It was a grand piece of pianoforte playing.

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture to "Ruy Blas;" Dvorak, symphony No. 4, in G minor; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Les Préludes."

TIMES, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 2/21

The next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be doubled in interest because of the fact that the pianist Eugen d'Albert will be the soloist. Ehrlich in a recent article in the Berliner Tageblatt calls him "the foremost of pianists and the greatest interpreter of Beethoven next to Joachim."

[132]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 21.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was: Symphony, G-minor, Mozart; Concerto for pianoforte, op. 185, Raff; three movements of a Symphonic Suite, Busoni (first time); Huldigung's March, Wagner. The Mozart symphony Mr. Nikisch undertook to "improve" after his now familiar fashion, and, as a consequence, this masterpiece that came perfect from its composer's hands, was disfigured by unauthorized and impertinent variations of tempo suggestive of the sickly sentimental devices peculiar to the conventional prima donna. Whenever a great composer is thus, as it were, bedaubed with rouge and decked out with fancy furbelows, it is urged that something must be left to the conductor and his impression of the work performed; but something also must be left to the master's clearly expressed meaning of his own music. If a conductor's impression leads him to set himself in complete opposition to the composer's directions, something may be left to the critical listener, who is certainly entitled to affirm that he prefers Mozart to Nikisch. The opening phrase of the first movement of the symphony was taken at a slow pace, despite the fact that the composer had indicated that the tempo was to be allegro molto. It will not be claimed, we presume, that what a composer has written to be played allegro molto, a conductor has the right to play allegretto moderato. There is no greater reason for playing the opening phrase at a slow pace than there is for playing the whole movement in the same manner. The life and spirit of the movement were neutralized by this treatment, which was repeated whenever the phrase reappeared. Great musical classics are not to be subjected to such "improving" especially when it does not rise to any higher intellectual plane than twaddling sentiment. When Mozart says allegro molto, allegro molto let it be, Mr. Nikisch! If Mozart is a blunderer he is responsible for it; and if he is to be set right, it must be by another Mozart. The probabilities are, however, that Mozart was right and that Mr. Nikisch is wrong. There has been enough and to spare of this trifling with great works of the old composers. The G-minor symphony was recognized as a perfect masterpiece, long, very long before Mr. Nikisch tried to better it by impressing his individuality upon it, and nothing will be added to its chaste and simple beauty by his decking it with a peacock feather here and there. A novelty and a remarkably interesting feature of the programme were found in a gigue, a gavotte and an allegro fugato from a Symphonic Suite by Mr. F. Busoni. The gigue is exceedingly brilliant, though it perhaps suggests a tarantella rather than a gigue. The theme is bright and pleasing, and its orchestration is ingenious, original and effective, especially in the treatment of the wood wind. It is musicianly in every essential, and the same may be said of the other movements. The gavotte is delightful in its subject, and its grace and delicacy are fascinating. The trio is especially fresh, rich in tone color, and charming in effect. The finale displays the composer's knowledge and his thorough skill in the use of it, and the fugato is developed in a masterly manner. The instrumentation is exceptionally thoughtful and discreet. Every note tells. It is gratifying to know that we have in Mr. Busoni not only a fine pianist, but a composer of such admirable powers as this music proves him to be. The soloist of the evening was Mr. W. H. Sherwood, who played Raff's Concerto for pianoforte, in C-minor, op. 185. His performance may be heartily praised for its brilliancy, clearness, and the splendid technique that was brought to bear on it. The perfection of the playing was absolute. The touch was fine and true, the spirit was admirable, the style was broad, thoughtful and thoroughly artistic. For some reason or other, however, it left the listener unmoved except by admiration for the artist's technical skill; and, despite the fire with which it was played, the sentiment of the whole seemed cold and formal. It was warmly and deservedly applauded, at the close of each movement, and the player was recalled three times with great enthusiasm. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; Symphony No. 4, Dvorak (first time); and "Les Preludes," Liszt.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartet gave their fifth concert in Union Hall, assisted by Mrs. Helen Hopekirk. The programme was: Quartet in G, op. 18, No. 2, Beethoven; Sonata for piano and 'cello, Mendelssohn; Quintet, in E, op. 163, Schubert. The work of the performers was admirable throughout. Indeed, the Quartet this season have reached a higher point of finish and larger grasp of style than they have attained to before. The Schubert Quintet was given with noteworthy beauty. In the Mendelssohn Sonata Mr. Alvin Schroeder's 'cello playing was again delightful to listen to, not only for the purity of its intonation, its graceful technique and its fluent ease, but for the warmth and artistic discretion that marked it. Mrs. Hopekirk was heard to special advantage in the piano part of this work, to which she brought excellent taste and judgment as well as a keen appreciation of the underlying sentiment of the music.

—— Among the brilliant audience at the Kneisel Quartet concert last Monday night were noticed Mrs John L. Gardner, Mrs. Louis Agassiz, Mrs. John Ritchie, Col. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mr. Arthur Foote.

The sixth concert of the Cambridge series, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening. Mrs. Julie L. Wyman is the soloist. She will sing numbers by Delibes, Godard, Massenet and Ferrari. The orchestral programme includes the Overture "Der Frieschutz," Weber; one movement from the Suite "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Pilgrim's March from the Symphony "Harold in Italy," Berlotz, and the Symphony in A (Italian), Mendelssohn.

An extra concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Wednesday evening, for the benefit of the members of the orchestra. The programme to be performed includes Massenet's "Esclarmonde" suite, and Nicodé's symphonic poem, "The Sea." A "distinguished soloist," to be announced later, but generally believed to be Mr. Paderewski, will appear. Tickets may be procured at the Music Hall.

Mr. Paderewski will give his last piano recitals in Boston, previous to his return to Europe, on the afternoons of Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Saturday of this week. A change of programme will be made at each recital. Tickets are for sale at Music Hall.

The recital to have been given by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, with the assistance of Master Alexander Friedmann, has been postponed from the evening of Wednesday, Feb. 24, to that of Thursday, March 10, in consequence of the continued indisposition of Mrs. Nickisch.

—— The Kneisel Quartet is to give its annual fashionable series of concerts in Cambridge during Lent.

—— Mme. Nordica made her London reappearance last week at Mr. Henschel's orchestral concert, singing selections from the last act of "Tristan and Isolde."

JOURNAL, Chicago, Ill.

Date 2/20

The Boston symphony concerts have become, in a way, sacred ceremonials, at which even those not born with a musical ear must assist in becoming fashion. One Friday afternoon the two little daughters of a certain family returned from the Music Hall "in a state of mind." One of them was evidently scornful, and the other depressed.

"What's the matter?" asked some one. "Wasn't the concert fine?"

"The concert was all right," said Ethel, superbly; "I don't complain of the concert!"

"Then what did go wrong? Something, I'm sure."

"The amount of the matter is," said the young lady, looking haughtily at her drooping sister, "that Mildred has disgraced herself. She sneezed in the middle of the symphony!"

Boston Daily Traveller

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1892.

The Sixteenth Symphony Concert.

The programme of the 16th symphony concert at the Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows: "Symphony" in G minor by Mozart; concerto for piano in C minor by Raff, played by Mr. William H. Sherwood; three movements from a symphonic suite by Busoni and the Hhldigung's March of Wagner. The novelty on the programme was the Busoni piece. The three movements, gigue, gavotte and allegro fugato, although antique in name and form, were characteristically modern in treatment. Musical knowledge was everywhere evident, the treatment was skilful, the themes original and the orchestral scoring admirable throughout. It is a spontaneous and effective work, and reflects great credit upon the composer. The orchestra see-sawed the first movement at times; otherwise than that, barring the inherent coarseness that prevails at all times in the playing of the orchestra, it went with precision and effect.

Mr. W. H. Sherwood's playing of the Raff Concerto was characterized by the elegance, brilliancy, freedom and virility that mark the efforts of this eminent pianist, whose return to our concert halls, after a long absence, is an event for congratulation. The list of players counts many, yet are they few, f real artistic value is considered. It was gratifying to observe the enthusiastic applause that followed Mr. Sherwood's performance. He was recalled several times. The accompaniment was overloud and coarse at times; it would have been a happy disappointment had it been otherwise.

The performance of the G minor symphony of Mozart was another specimen of the tawdriness and vulgar sentiment that are identical with Mr. Nikisch's efforts with the classics. As the superiority of Mr. Gericke was reflected in his musicianlike and discreet interpretations of the old masters, so also is the inferiority of Mr. Nikisch exhibited in his attempt to improve upon these models.

The opening movement was begun at as unreasonably slow pace and in a coarse, loud manner for a movement marked "Allegro Molto" and piano. As the movement went on the tempo was increased or diminished to suit the caprice of the conductor in his evident effort to better Mozart, resembling the fluctuating rhythm of a circus band keeping time to the canterings of the calico horse that carries the rider on his back in the performances of his lofty tumblings. The reprehensible "pumping" of every phrase, regardless of its character, so dear to the heart of Mr. Nikisch, if one is to judge by its iteration and reiteration upon every occasion, was displayed in all its sickly sentimentality.

The andante followed in the same vein of coarseness and exaggeration that characterized the first movement, without a touch of the serenity and delicacy that is demanded in contrast to the vigor of the forte passages. Both the menuetto and the finale were rasped off in the band's most degenerate style, regardless of the expression indicated by the composer, and it only needed the trombones, tuba and the athletics of the tympani player to have made it audible possibly on Long wharf. In order that our readers may not think that the writer is dealing harshly with this performance, we append the critical review of Mr. Woolf and Mr. Hale, the two eminent musical critics of Boston.

It will be seen that they are unsparing in their denunciation of such an exhibition. The Huldigung's March gave Mr. Nikisch the opportunity to let slip the dogs of war and revel in the roar and rumble of all the noise that could be evoked from the violent efforts of his lusty crew. It was an offering of pomposity and blatancy that might well usher in the morn of the day that we celebrate in honor of the birth of the Father of His Country. "Clang the bells! Let the cannon roar!"

WARREN DAVENPORT.

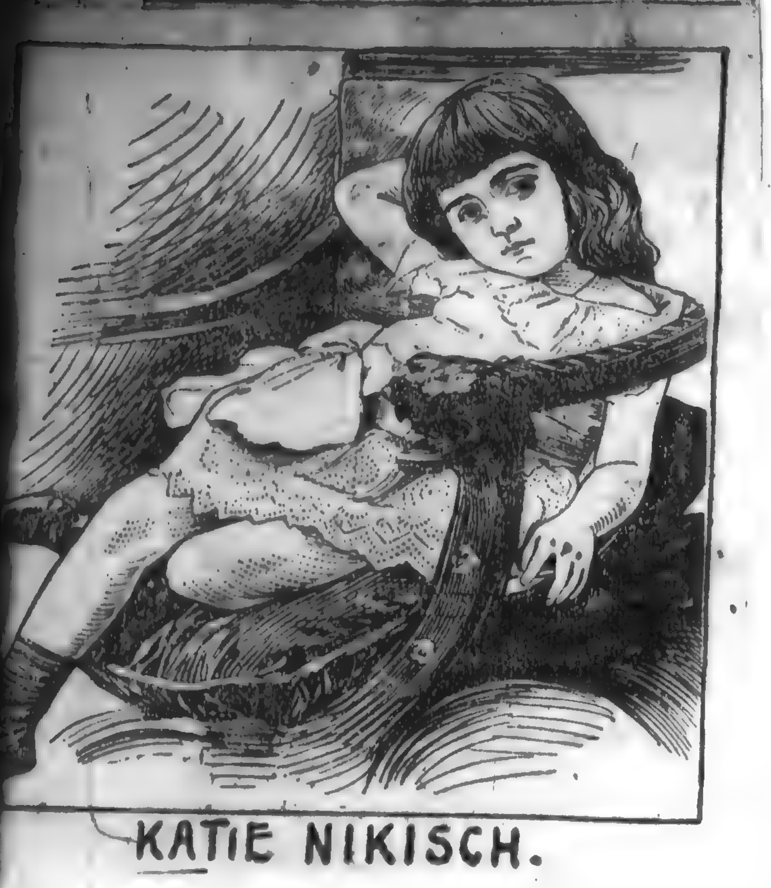
Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1892.

The sixth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Sanders Theatre, will be given tomorrow night. The programme includes the overture to "Der Freischütz," Weber; a movement from Grieg's Suite "Peer Gynt;" the Pilgrim's March from the symphony "Harold in Italy," Berlioz, and the Symphony in A major (Italian), Mendelssohn. Mrs. Julie L. Wyman will sing with orchestra the song "Myrto," by Delibes, and the Berceuse from "Jocelyn," by Godard, and songs with pianoforte by Delibes, Massenet and Ferrari.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, FEB. 22.



KATIE NIKISCH.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1892.

Music Hall: The Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mozart: Symphony in G minor.
Raff: Pianoforte Concerto in C minor, Op. 185.
Busoni: Three Movements from Symphonic Suite, Op. 25.
Wagner: Huldigungs-Marsch.
Mr. William H. Sherwood was the pianist.

The ever-beautiful G minor symphony was admirably played. Nothing of the poetic effect of the performance of the work under Mr. Nikisch during his first year here was lost, and much was gained in the way of symmetry of proportion and regularity of tempo. The exquisite opening phrase in the violins sounded just as romantic, at a normal tempo, as it did two years ago, when Mr. Nikisch took it too slow; and our excellent conductor is much to be thanked for his perfect tempo in the Andante. All that the performance left to be desired was, perhaps, a still finer delicacy and finish in the first and second movements, and a more nervous, definite accent in the accompanying eighth-notes in the violas at the beginning of the first. The viola passage sounded too much like a whispering tremolo; as it stands in the score, it is evidently meant to say something.

The movements from Mr. Busoni's suite are full of life and charm, and are excellently written for the orchestra. One had rather the composer had not used the word fugato in his heading to the last movement; it arouses expectations which the movement fulfils rather stingily. There is enough fugato in it to swear to before a jury, but not enough to be worth mentioning. Not that this impugns the musical value of the movement in the least, but that, when you are told that you are going to hear a fugato, you like to hear something that is a fugato all through. Still the fresh, lively charm of the music is its own defence.

Never before have we heard the Huldigungs-Marsch sound so gloriously as it did last Saturday evening. Here Mr. Nikisch really gave us a new revelation. We had always thought the Huldigungs-Marsch a good and worthy thing enough, decidedly inferior to the Kaiser-Marsch, but just as decidedly superior to that $5000 composition which rejoices in the compendious title of "Grosser Festmarsch zur Eröffnung der hundertjährigen Gedenkfeier der Unabhängigkeits-Erklärung der vereinigten Staaten von Nordamerika." In fact, we had looked upon the Huldigungs-Marsch as a work in which Wagner had joined Homer in nodding a little. But, as Mr. Nikisch takes it, it is simply superb! It took the audience off its feet. If that is what the Huldigungs-Marsch sounds like, then long live the Huldigungs-Marsch! We would almost hazard the wish that, as Mr. Nikisch has made such a triumphant success in this case, he would try his hand at the—well, we really cannot go through all those polysyllables again, but must simply say—"Centennial March." Perhaps he might succeed in making something out of the wonderful triplet, now that a certain college song has passed into oblivion.

Mr. Sherwood was cordially received, and, what is still better, applauded to the echo after finishing the Raff concerto. The composition itself has never seemed to us to be worth very much. To be sure, it cannot rightly be ranked with works of respectable mediocrity; it is both too good and too bad for that. It shows Raff's cleverness, his inventiveness, and brilliancy; but also his want of self-criticism, his tawdriness and lack of true nobility. It cannot be a work to live very long, and there seems to be no sound reason for keeping it above ground. But Mr. Sherwood's playing of it was superb at every point; he played it with a brilliancy, a dash, an incisiveness of accent, and a sustained power that were simply electric. And all through he showed a self-possession—by which we mean a thorough possession of, and mastery over, his own resources—that prevented his ever going too far, or falling short of perfect clearness and coherence. It was a grand piece of pianoforte playing.

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture to "Ruy Blas;" Dvorak, symphony No. 4, in G minor; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Les Préludes."

TIMES, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 2/21

The next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be doubled in interest because of the fact that the pianist Eugen d'Albert will be the soloist. Ehrlich in a recent article in the Berliner Tageblatt calls him "the foremost of pianists and the greatest interpreter of Beethoven next to Joachim."

[132]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 21.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was: Symphony, G-minor, Mozart; Concerto for pianoforte, op. 185, Raff; three movements of a Symphonic Suite, Busoni (first time); Huldigung's March, Wagner. The Mozart symphony Mr. Nikisch undertook to "improve" after his now familiar fashion, and, as a consequence, this masterpiece that came perfect from its composer's hands, was disfigured by unauthorized and impertinent variations of tempo suggestive of the sickly sentimental devices peculiar to the conventional prima donna. Whenever a great composer is thus, as it were, bedaubed with rouge and decked out with fancy furbelows, it is urged that something must be left to the conductor and his impression of the work performed; but something also must be left to the master's clearly expressed meaning of his own music. If a conductor's impression leads him to set himself in complete opposition to the composer's directions, something may be left to the critical listener, who is certainly entitled to affirm that he prefers Mozart to Nikisch. The opening phrase of the first movement of the symphony was taken at a slow pace, despite the fact that the composer had indicated that the tempo was to be allegro molto. It will not be claimed, we presume, that what a composer has written to be played allegro molto, a conductor has the right to play allegretto moderato. There is no greater reason for playing the opening phrase at a slow pace than there is for playing the whole movement in the same manner. The life and spirit of the movement were neutralized by this treatment, which was repeated whenever the phrase reappeared. Great musical classics are not to be subjected to such "improving" especially when it does not rise to any higher intellectual plane than twaddling sentiment. When Mozart says allegro molto, allegro molto let it be, Mr. Nikisch! If Mozart is a blunderer he is responsible for it; and if he is to be set right, it must be by another Mozart. The probabilities are, however, that Mozart was right and that Mr. Nikisch is wrong. There has been enough and to spare of this trifling with great works of the old composers. The G-minor symphony was recognized as a perfect masterpiece, long, very long before Mr. Nikisch tried to better it by impressing his individuality upon it, and nothing will be added to its chaste and simple beauty by his decking it with a peacock feather here and there. A novelty and a remarkably interesting feature of the programme were found in a gigue, a gavotte and an allegro fugato from a Symphonic Suite by Mr. F. Busoni. The gigue is exceedingly brilliant, though it perhaps suggests a tarantella rather than a gigue. The theme is bright and pleasing, and its orchestration is ingenious, original and effective, especially in the treatment of the wood wind. It is musicianly in every essential, and the same may be said of the other movements. The gavotte is delightful in its subject, and its grace and delicacy are fascinating. The trio is especially fresh, rich in tone color, and charming in effect. The finale displays the composer's knowledge and his thorough skill in the use of it, and the fugato is developed in a masterly manner. The instrumentation is exceptionally thoughtful and discreet. Every note tells. It is gratifying to know that we have in Mr. Busoni not only a fine pianist, but a composer of such admirable powers as this music proves him to be. The soloist of the evening was Mr. W. H. Sherwood, who played Raff's Concerto for pianoforte, in C-minor, op. 185. His performance may be heartily praised for its brilliancy, clearness, and the splendid technique that was brought to bear on it. The perfection of the playing was absolute. The touch was fine and true, the spirit was admirable, the style was broad, thoughtful and thoroughly artistic. For some reason or other, however, it left the listener unmoved except by admiration for the artist's technical skill; and, despite the fire with which it was played, the sentiment of the whole seemed cold and formal. It was warmly and deservedly applauded, at the close of each movement, and the player was recalled three times with great enthusiasm. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; Symphony No. 4, Dvorak (first time); and "Les Preludes," Liszt.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartet gave their fifth concert in Union Hall, assisted by Mrs. Helen Hopekirk. The programme was: Quartet in G, op. 18, No. 2, Beethoven; Sonata for piano and 'cello, Mendelssohn; Quintet, in E, op. 163, Schubert. The work of the performers was admirable throughout. Indeed, the Quartet this season have reached a higher point of finish and larger grasp of style than they have attained to before. The Schubert Quintet was given with noteworthy beauty. In the Mendelssohn Sonata Mr. Alvin Schroeder's 'cello playing was again delightful to listen to, not only for the purity of its intonation, its graceful technique and its fluent ease, but for the warmth and artistic discretion that marked it. Mrs. Hopekirk was heard to special advantage in the piano part of this work, to which she brought excellent taste and judgment as well as a keen appreciation of the underlying sentiment of the music.

—— Among the brilliant audience at the Kneisel Quartet concert last Monday night were noticed Mrs John L. Gardner, Mrs. Louis Agassiz, Mrs. John Ritchie, Col. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mr. Arthur Foote.

The sixth concert of the Cambridge series, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening. Mrs. Julie L. Wyman is the soloist. She will sing numbers by Delibes, Godard, Massenet and Ferrari. The orchestral programme includes the Overture "Der Frieschutz," Weber; one movement from the Suite "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Pilgrim's March from the Symphony "Harold in Italy," Berlotz, and the Symphony in A (Italian), Mendelssohn.

An extra concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Wednesday evening, for the benefit of the members of the orchestra. The programme to be performed includes Massenet's "Esclarmonde" suite, and Nicodé's symphonic poem, "The Sea." A "distinguished soloist," to be announced later, but generally believed to be Mr. Paderewski, will appear. Tickets may be procured at the Music Halt.

Mr. Paderewski will give his last piano recitals in Boston, previous to his return to Europe, on the afternoons of Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Saturday of this week. A change of programme will be made at each recital. Tickets are for sale at Music Hall.

The recital to have been given by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, with the assistance of Master Alexander Friedmann, has been postponed from the evening of Wednesday, Feb. 24, to that of Thursday, March 10, in consequence of the continued indisposition of Mrs. Nickisch.

—— The Kneisel Quartet is to give its annual fashionable series of concerts in Cambridge during Lent.

—— Mme. Nordica made her London reappearance last week at Mr. Henschel's orchestral concert, singing selections from the last act of "Tristan and Isolde."

JOURNAL, Chicago, Ill.

Date 2/20

The Boston symphony concerts have become, in a way, sacred ceremonials, at which even those not born with a musical ear must assist in becoming fashion. One Friday afternoon the two little daughters of a certain family returned from the Music Hall "in a state of mind." One of them was evidently scornful, and the other depressed.

"What's the matter?" asked some one. "Wasn't the concert fine?"

"The concert was all right," said Ethel, superbly; "I don't complain of the concert!"

"Then what did go wrong? Something, I'm sure."

"The amount of the matter is," said the young lady, looking haughtily at her drooping sister, "that Mildred has disgraced herself. She sneezed in the middle of the symphony!"

* * *

Boston Daily Traveller

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1892.

The Sixteenth Symphony Concert.

The programme of the 16th symphony concert at the Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows: "Symphony" in G minor by Mozart; concerto for piano in C minor by Raff, played by Mr. William H. Sherwood; three movements from a symphonic suite by Busoni and the Hhldigung's March of Wagner. The novelty on the programme was the Busoni piece. The three movements, gigue, gavotte and allegro fugato, although antique in name and form, were characteristically modern in treatment. Musical knowledge was everywhere evident, the treatment was skilful, the themes original and the orchestral scoring admirable throughout. It is a spontaneous and effective work, and reflects great credit upon the composer. The orchestra see-sawed the first movement at times; otherwise than that, barring the inherent coarseness that prevails at all times in the playing of the orchestra, it went with precision and effect.

Mr. W. H. Sherwood's playing of the Raff Concerto was characterized by the elegance, brilliancy, freedom and virility that mark the efforts of this eminent pianist, whose return to our concert halls, after a long absence, is an event for congratulation. The list of players counts many, yet are they few, f real artistic value is considered. It was gratifying to observe the enthusiastic applause that followed Mr. Sherwood's performance. He was recalled several times. The accompaniment was overloud and coarse at times; it would have been a happy disappointment had it been otherwise.

The performance of the G minor symphony of Mozart was another specimen of the tawdriness and vulgar sentiment that are identical with Mr. Nikisch's efforts with the classics. As the superiority of Mr. Gericke was reflected in his musicianlike and discreet interpretations of the old masters, so also is the inferiority of Mr. Nikisch exhibited in his attempt to improve upon these models.

The opening movement was begun at as unreasonably slow pace and in a coarse, loud manner for a movement marked "Allegro Molto" and piano. As the movement went on the tempo was increased or diminished to suit the caprice of the conductor in his evident effort to better Mozart, resembling the fluctuating rhythm of a circus band keeping time to the canterings of the calico horse that carries the rider on his back in the performances of his lofty tumblings. The reprehensible "pumping" of every phrase, regardless of its character, so dear to the heart of Mr. Nikisch, if one is to judge by its iteration and reiteration upon every occasion, was displayed in all its sickly sentimentality.

The andante followed in the same vein of coarseness and exaggeration that characterized the first movement, without a touch of the serenity and delicacy that is demanded in contrast to the vigor of the forte passages. Both the menuetto and the finale were rasped off in the band's most degenerate style, regardless of the expression indicated by the composer, and it only needed the trombones, tuba and the athletics of the tympani player to have made it audible possibly on Long wharf. In order that our readers may not think that the writer is dealing harshly with this performance, we append the critical review of Mr. Woolf and Mr. Hale, the two eminent musical critics of Boston.

It will be seen that they are unsparing in their denunciation of such an exhibition. The Huldigung's March gave Mr. Nikisch the opportunity to let slip the dogs of war and revel in the roar and rumble of all the noise that could be evoked from the violent efforts of his lusty crew. It was an offering of pomposity and blatancy that might well usher in the morn of the day that we celebrate in honor of the birth of the Father of His Country. "Clang the bells! Let the cannon roar!"

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1892.

The sixth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Sanders Theatre, will be given tomorrow night. The programme includes the overture to "Der Freischütz," Weber; a movement from Grieg's Suite "Peer Gynt;" the Pilgrim's March from the symphony "Harold in Italy," Berlioz, and the Symphony in A major (Italian), Mendelssohn. Mrs. Julie L. Wyman will sing with orchestra the song "Myrto," by Delibes, and the Berceuse from "Jocelyn," by Godard, and songs with pianoforte by Delibes, Massenet and Ferrari.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

ELEVENTH SEASON,—1891--92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 25, AT 7.45.

PROGRAMME.

WEBER.	OVERTURE. "Freischuetz."
	SONGS with ORCHESTRA
a) DELIBES.	"MYRTO."
b) GODARD.	BERCEUSE from "Jocelyn." (First time.)
GRIEG.	"AASE'S DEATH," from SUITE, "Peer Gynt."
BERLIOZ.	"PILGRIM'S MARCH," (Second Movement,) from Symphony "Harold in Italy." (Viola Solo, MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.)
	SONGS with PIANO.
DELIBES.	"REGRETS."
MASSENET.	"BONNE NUIT."
FERRARI.	"A UNE FIANCEE."
MENDELSSOHN.	SYMPHONY, in A. (Italian). Allegro vivace.—Andante con moto.— Con moto moderato.—Saltarello.

SOLOIST:

MRS. JULIE L. WYMAN.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEB. 21, 1892.

The fifth of the season's programmes by the Kneisel quartette was given at Union hall Monday evening, the works performed being Beethoven's quartette, G major, op. 18; Mendelssohn's sonata for piano and violoncello; and Schubert's quintette, C major, op. 163. Mme. Helen Hopekirk and Mr. Schroeder did excellent work in the piano and 'cello sonata, winning a ready recognition for their artistic interpretation. Mr. Kneisel and his associates had the assistance of Mr. Schulz as the second 'cello of the quintette, and showed their usual excellent work.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

Y, FEBRUARY 27, 1892.

A grand program of orchestral pieces and a concerto, with Paderewski as soloist, will make the benefit concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra a great event on Wednesday evening, March 2. Two of the orchestral numbers are Massenet's suite, "Esclarmonde," and Nicode's Symphonic poem, "The Sea," both of them new to Boston audiences. Tickets are now on sale.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch will give their postponed recital at Chickering Hall on Thursday, March 10th, and will also introduce the young violinist, Master Fiedermann. Tickets at Music Hall.

THE NEWS.

SATURDAY, FEB. 20, 1892.

Boston's Great Orchestra as an Educator.

We venture to say that but few actually realize that, according to the best and highest musical authorities in the land, we, Massachusetts people, have in our capital city the best musical organization in the country, if not in the whole world, and we also find, upon a careful perusal of the comments made by leading representative musicians in all departments, that this great musical body, the "Boston Symphony Orchestra," is under the skilful direction and training of one of the world's greatest conductors, in the person of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. And in the concert master, Mr. Franz Kneisel, we have one of the foremost violinists of the age. From a musical standpoint, this grand organization is, in its nature educational. This is no delusive statement, but a substantial fact, admitted as such by thousands of young musical students, from both far and near. Inasmuch as those seeking a thorough musical education, can for a small sum of money, and do, each and every Friday afternoon, during the season, enjoy the great privilege that the opportunity offers, namely, that of listening to and carefully studying the sublime works of the world's greatest masters, those of the dead and of the living, the ancient and the modern, the same being perfectly rendered by a body of 85 carefully selected musicians, all most thoroughly drilled and the force marshalled by a conductor, who is a thoroughly educated gentleman and artsit.

If a concert made up of selections from the works of great masters and rendered by a force as above described, is not an educator, I am at a loss to know what is, and if there are such as could not profit in some way by its hearing let them forever discard music, and all pertaining to the art.

To study music with a thorough teacher, and to practice faithfully two or three hours daily, is certainly commendable in any young aspirant for musical honors. But, in order to acquire a thorough musical education more yet is needed, namely, style, expression, finish, the rounding of the edges, as it were, and above all musical thought. To sum it all up, one must get to the very soul of music, in order to be very proficient in the art. As a very able writer has recently said:

"Of all the arts, music is practised most and thought about least." And futhermore adds: "I do not recall that anybody has ever tried to ground the popular ignorance about this art, of which, by right of birth, everybody is a critic."

In closing I would say to those who wish to feel music, to be impressed with thoughts of musical grandeur, to understand music as well as to play it, listen to, and study grand orchestra work. The best if you can.

W. A. F.

What is said of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PRESS COMMENTS.

N. Y. Sun. November 4, 1891. "The palm of supremacy over all kindred organizations on this side of the water."

N. Y. Recorder, Nov. 4, 1891. "Nothing like it in New York, neither in quality nor in ensemble."

N. Y. Evening Post, Nov. 4, 1891. "As a Schumann conductor, Mr. Nikisch has no superior, perhaps no equal."

Philadelphia Record, Nov. 4, 1891. "The most proficient band of musicians ever organized in this country."

Brooklyn Eagle, Nov. 7, 1891. "The rival of any force of the kind in the world."

For the information of many who are interested I will herein give the number of men and the instruments employed in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

First violins	16
Second violins	14
Violas	12
Violoncellos	8
Basses	8
Flutes	3
Oboes	2
English horn	1
Clarinets	2
Bass clarinet	1
Bassoons	3
Horns	5
Trumpets	3
Trombones	3
Tuba	1
Harp	1
Tympani	1
Drums	1
Cymbals, triangle, etc.	1
Librarian	1
Total,	87

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 27, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

It is hardly possible to deny that the tours of the Symphony Orchestra, while they certainly increase its reputation and put money into their treasury, which must now show a solid balance to the good, are not to the artistic advantage of the band. The fulsome praises of people who have heard no other orchestral playing of distinction and the deliberate manipulation of the truth by some critics whose knowledge is more than their sincerity, have an effect upon the director against which the just and sensible criticism of Boston judges, far less desirous to find fault than anxious that this orchestra shall be perfect, cannot prevail. An eminent musical writer of New York said to us that Mr. Nikisch's directing was not always satisfactory by any means, and added that "if he does not do better next time, we shall really have to say something about it." But as there are prominent critics in New York who have allowed their peculiar interest in German opera to lead them into trivial or injurious comment upon the present Metropolitan season, so there are those who have an antipathy to Mr. Damrosch and his philharmonic orchestra, and make the concerts of the Seidl and the Boston bands the upper and nether millstones between which his enterprises are to be crushed. There is therefore given to Mr. Nikisch's work praise which he does not deserve and blame which he does deserve is withheld.

The sixteenth concert demonstrated this, when Mozart's G-minor symphony was delivered in opposition to tradition, practical sense interior evidence and the plain directions of all previous time. Technically the performance was fine, for the band obeyed their conductor implicitly. But for the unreasonable individualism of the reading there is no possible excuse.

Three movements—a gigue, a gavotte and an allegro fugato—from a symphonic suite begun by Mr. Basoni, when he was but a youth less than twenty years old, constituted the novelty of the evening, and a delightful novelty they were. The encyclopædic compiler of the programme-book, who seems to be a Wagnerian acharné, remarks enigmatically and contradictorily that Mr. Basoni wrote this when he was trying to "emancipate himself from the influences of the Italian style" and that this is proved by his "opulent contrapuntal work." The compiler has apparently forgotten that some of the chief forms of musical composition originated in Italy and that the early masters of counterpoint—than whom none have been greater—were Italians and taught the world. Be this as it may, Mr. Busoni's writing is no less opulent in beautiful and various melody and in fresh fanciful devices of orchestration than in genuine polyphony and free, graceful and powerful counterpoint. A touch of mystery is felt here and there or a bit of humor shines out; the scoring is full, but not heavy or cloudy, and the leading themes and obbligati are agreeable in themselves and well set for the single instruments. Mr. Nikisch read and the orchestra played with sympathy and effectiveness.

The last number was that blatant commonplace, Wagner's "Huldigungs Marsch," which perhaps the United States Marine Band might play more vociferously and furiously, and which only needed a magic-lantern scene of a grand circus entry to make its din and vulgarity complete.

The soloist of the concert was Mr. W. H. Sherwood, whose playing had even more of the ardent force of mind and hand, the perfect intellectual grasp, the absolutely responsive technique and the emotional enthusiasm which have always characterized him. He was en rapport with his chosen work at every point and in every phase, and his vehement recalls were well won. He had taken Raff's concerto in C-minor, opus 185, which is so generous in melody, so brilliant in figuration, so favorable to both soloist and orchestra, and whose military spirit so often recalls the moods, if not the exact expressions of the "Lenore" symphony. Here again Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra were irreproachable.

It is not exactly in the concert-critic's province, perhaps, but we should like to say a word in honor of the Mason & Hamlin piano, heard for the first time in Music Hall, as a welcome addition to the list of worthy concert-grands. Put forward modestly and almost tentatively, it showed excellent staying qualities, was sweet, clear, even and strong; a little cool in the upper registers, but still agreeable; sufficient in the ensembles and easily modulated for solo passages. Taking this as their coup d' essai, it is probable that the grands of this long established house must obtain and hold a fine position among concert instruments.

Tonight's programme is: Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture and Liszt's "Preludes," with between them the first hearing in America of Dvorák's fourth symphony.

THE ORCHESTRA'S CONCERT.

One Wednesday evening next the benefit concert for the Symphony men will take place in Music Hall, and to the pleasure to be expected from the novelties we announced last week will be added the charm of Mr. Paderewski's appearance and the interest attaching to his first performance here of a Schumann concerto. This is the first time that any testimonial has been offered to the orchestra as a body other than that of passing applause and merited praise. If the house be filled as it should be each member should have a substantial sum to put in his pocketbook; and, better than this, an ample audience will be like a personal assurance that the pains, the steady work and the good spirit of these seventy men are appreciated and directly encouraged.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

ELEVENTH SEASON,—1891--92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 25, AT 7.45

PROGRAMME.

WEBER.	OVERTURE. "Freischuetz."
	SONGS with ORCHESTRA
a) DELIBES.	"MYRTO."
b) GODARD.	BERCEUSE from "Jocelyn." (First time.)
GRIEG.	"AASE'S DEATH," from SUITE, "Peer Gynt."
BERLIOZ.	"PILGRIM'S MARCH." Second Movement, from Symphony "Harold in Italy." (Viola Solo, MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.)
	SONGS with PIANO.
DELIBES.	"REGRETS."
MASSENET.	"BONNE NUIT."
FERRARI.	"A UNE FIANCEE."
MENDELSSOHN	SYMPHONY, in A. (Italian.) [illegible]

SOLOIST:

MRS JULIE L WYMAN

[illegible]

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEB. 21, 1892.

The fifth of the season's programmes by the Kneisel quartette was given at Union hall Monday evening, the works performed being Beethoven's quartette, G major, op. 18; Mendelssohn's sonata for piano and violoncello; and Schubert's quintette, C major, op. 163. Mme. Helen Hopekirk and Mr. Schroeder did excellent work in the piano and 'cello sonata, winning a ready recognition for their artistic interpretation. Mr. Kneisel and his associates had the assistance of Mr. Schulz as the second 'cello of the quintette, and showed their usual excellent work.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

Y, FEBRUARY 27, 1892.

A grand program of orchestral pieces and a concerto, with Paderewski as soloist, will make the benefit concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra a great event on Wednesday evening, March 2. Two of the orchestral numbers are Massenet's suite, "Esclarmonde," and Nicode's Symphonic poem, "The Sea," both of them new to Boston audiences. Tickets are now on sale.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch will give their postponed recital at Chickering Hall on Thursday, March 10th, and will also introduce the young violinist, Master Fiedermann. Tickets at Music Hall.

THE NEWS.

SATURDAY, FEB. 20, 1892.

Boston's Great Orchestra as an Educator.

We venture to say that but few actually realize that, according to the best and highest musical authorities in the land, we, Massachuetts people, have in our capital city the best musical organization in the country, if not in the whole world, and we also find, upon a careful perusal of the comments made by leading representative musicians in all departments, that this great musical body, the "Boston Symphony Orchestra," is under the skilful direction and training of one of the world's greatest conductors, in the person of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. And in the concert master, Mr. Franz Kneisel, we have one of the foremost violinists of the age. From a musical standpoint, this grand organization is, in its nature educational. This is no delusive statement, but a substantial fact, admitted as such by thousands of young musical students, from both far and near. Inasmuch as those seeking a thorough musical education, can for a small sum of money, and do, each and every Friday afternoon, during the season, enjoy the great privilege that the opportunity offers, namely, that of listening to and carefully studying the sublime works of the world's greatest masters, those of the dead and of the living, the ancient and the modern, the same being perfectly rendered by a body of 85 carefully selected musicians, all most thoroughly drilled and the force marshalled by a conductor, who is a thoroughly educated gentleman and artsit.

If a concert made up of selections from the works of great masters and rendered by a force as above described, is not an educator, I am at a loss to know what is, and if there are such as could not profit in some way by its hearing let them forever discard music, and all pertaining to the art.

To study music with a thorough teacher, and to practice faithfully two or three hours daily, is certainly commendable in any young aspirant for musical honors. But, in order to acquire a thorough musical education more yet is needed, namely, style, expression, finish, the rounding of the edges, as it were, and above all musical thought. To sum it all up, one must get to the very soul of music, in order to be very proficient in the art. As a very able writer has recently said:

"Of all the arts, music is practised most and thought about least." And futhermore adds: "I do not recall that anybody has ever tried to ground the popular ignorance about this art, of which, by right of birth, everybody is a critic."

In closing I would say to those who wish to feel music, to be impressed with thoughts of musical grandeur, to understand music as well as to play it, listen to, and study grand orchestra work. The best if you can.

W. A. F.

What is said of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PRESS COMMENTS.

N. Y. Sun. November 4, 1891. "The palm of supremacy over all kindred organizations on this side of the water."

N. Y. Recorder, Nov. 4, 1891. "Nothing like it in New York, neither in quality nor in ensemble."

N. Y. Evening Post, Nov. 4, 1891. "As a Schumann conductor, Mr. Nikisch has no superior, perhaps no equal."

Philadelphia Record, Nov. 4, 1891. "The most proficient band of musicians ever organized in this country."

Brooklyn Eagle, Nov. 7, 1891. "The rival of any force of the kind in the world."

For the information of many who are interested I will herein give the number of men and the instruments employed in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

First violins	16
Second violins	14
Violas	12
Violoncellos	8
Basses	8
Flutes	3
Oboes	2
English horn	1
Clarinets	2
Bass clarinet	1
Bassoons	3
Horns	5
Trumpets	3
Trombones	3
Tuba	1
Harp	1
Tympani	1
Drums	1
Cymbals, triangle, etc.	1
Librarian	1
Total,	87

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 27, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

It is hardly possible to deny that the tours of the Symphony Orchestra, while they certainly increase its reputation and put money into their treasury, which must now show a solid balance to the good, are not to the artistic advantage of the band. The fulsome praises of people who have heard no other orchestral playing of distinction and the deliberate manipulation of the truth by some critics whose knowledge is more than their sincerity, have an effect upon the director against which the just and sensible criticism of Boston judges, far less desirous to find fault than anxious that this orchestra shall be perfect, cannot prevail. An eminent musical writer of New York said to us that Mr. Nikisch's directing was not always satisfactory by any means, and added that "if he does not do better next time, we shall really have to say something about it." But as there are prominent critics in New York who have allowed their peculiar interest in German opera to lead them into trivial or injurious comment upon the present Metropolitan season, so there are those who have an antipathy to Mr. Damrosch and his philharmonic orchestra, and make the concerts of the Seidl and the Boston bands the upper and nether millstones between which his enterprises are to be crushed. There is therefore given to Mr. Nikisch's work praise which he does not deserve and blame which he does deserve is withheld.

The sixteenth concert demonstrated this, when Mozart's G-minor symphony was delivered in opposition to tradition, practical sense interior evidence and the plain directions of all previous time. Technically the performance was fine, for the band obeyed their conductor implicitly. But for the unreasonable individualism of the reading there is no possible excuse.

Three movements—a gigue, a gavotte and an allegro fugato—from a symphonic suite begun by Mr. Basoni, when he was but a youth less than twenty years old, constituted the novelty of the evening, and a delightful novelty they were. The encyclopædic compiler of the programme-book, who seems to be a Wagnerian acharné, remarks enigmatically and contradictorily that Mr. Basoni wrote this when he was trying to "emancipate himself from the influences of the Italian style" and that this is proved by his "opulent contrapuntal work." The compiler has apparently forgotten that some of the chief forms of musical composition originated in Italy and that the early masters of counterpoint—than whom none have been greater—were Italians and taught the world. Be this as it may, Mr. Busoni's writing is no less opulent in beautiful and various melody and in fresh fanciful devices of orchestration than in genuine polyphony and free, graceful and powerful counterpoint. A touch of mystery is felt here and there or a bit of humor shines out; the scoring is full, but not heavy or cloudy, and the leading themes and obbligati are agreeable in themselves and well set for the single instruments. Mr. Nikisch read and the orchestra played with sympathy and effectiveness.

The last number was that blatant commonplace, Wagner's "Huldigungs Marsch," which perhaps the United States Marine Band might play more vociferously and furiously, and which only needed a magic-lantern scene of a grand circus entry to make its din and vulgarity complete.

The soloist of the concert was Mr. W. H. Sherwood, whose playing had even more of the ardent force of mind and hand, the perfect intellectual grasp, the absolutely responsive technique and the emotional enthusiasm which have always characterized him. He was en rapport with his chosen work at every point and in every phase, and his vehement recalls were well won. He had taken Raff's concerto in C-minor, opus 185, which is so generous in melody, so brilliant in figuration, so favorable to both soloist and orchestra, and whose military spirit so often recalls the moods, if not the exact expressions of the "Lenore" symphony. Here again Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra were irreproachable.

It is not exactly in the concert-critic's province, perhaps, but we should like to say a word in honor of the Mason & Hamlin piano, heard for the first time in Music Hall, as a welcome addition to the list of worthy concert-grands. Put forward modestly and almost tentatively, it showed excellent staying qualities, was sweet, clear, even and strong; a little cool in the upper registers, but still agreeable; sufficient in the ensembles and easily modulated for solo passages. Taking this as their coup d' essai, it is probable that the grands of this long established house must obtain and hold a fine position among concert instruments.

Tonight's programme is: Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture and Liszt's "Preludes," with between them the first hearing in America of Dvorák's fourth symphony.

THE ORCHESTRA'S CONCERT.

One Wednesday evening next the benefit concert for the Symphony men will take place in Music Hall, and to the pleasure to be expected from the novelties we announced last week will be added the charm of Mr. Paderewski's appearance and the interest attaching to his first performance here of a Schumann concerto. This is the first time that any testimonial has been offered to the orchestra as a body other than that of passing applause and merited praise. If the house be filled as it should be each member should have a substantial sum to put in his pocketbook; and, better than this, an ample audience will be like a personal assurance that the pains, the steady work and the good spirit of these seventy men are appreciated and directly encouraged.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1892.

BOSTON NEWS.

BOSTON OFFICE of THE MUSICAL COURIER,
157 Tremont street, February 20, 1892.

THE past week has been a particularly notable one musically. Damrosch, with his New York Symphony Orchestra in Tremont Temple, and the Kneisel Quartet in Union Hall, "opened the ball" on Monday evening, followed during the week by Mrs. Hopekirk, Mr. William Heinrich, the Apollo Club, the Molé Chamber Music Club, Mr. Max Heinrich, De Pachmann, the Boston Philharmonic Orchestra, an Operatic Festival Matinée (with a four hours' program), and last in chronological order but first in all other respects the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program, a most interesting one, was as follows:

Symphony in G minor, Mozart; concerto for piano in C minor, Raff; three movements from symphonic suite, op. 25, Busoni, and "Huldigung's" March, Wagner. The soloist was Mr. William H. Sherwood.

The particularly interesting feature of this concert was the reappearance of Mr. Sherwood, for so many years a resident of Boston.

His entrance upon the stage of Music Hall was a signal for a most emphatic demonstration of welcome from the immense audience.

Mr. Sherwood's performance of the Raff concerto was a most refined one. Beauties heretofore unnoticed in the composition were brought out in the clearest and most fascinating manner. Especially commendable was his work in the finale, at the close of which he was recalled again and again.

It may not be out of place here to speak of the instrument used by Mr. Sherwood, for upon it depends to a large degree the perfect tout ensemble of such a performance.

The piano was a Mason & Hamlin concert grand, and the most astonishing thing about it is the fact that it is the second concert piano ever turned out by the company. Its tone was full, round and even, and throughout its entire scale it possesses a richness and certain singing quality unexcelled. Such an instrument is an indispensable adjunct to any performance of a piano concerto, and upon this occasion Mr. Sherwood is to be congratulated upon having at his command a piano that meets every requirement.

The orchestra was not below its standard of excellence. There was one novelty on the program, the "Three Movements from a Symphonic Suite," by Mr. F. Busoni, a recent acquisition to the faculty of the N. E. Conservatory of Music. The three movements were in the forms of a gigue, gavotte and allegro fugato, and it would be difficult to say which one was the most original, delightful or the best written. The orchestration was peculiarly novel in its effects, coming, here and there, very close to the humorous. The composition was received with considerable enthusiasm.

* * * *

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartet gave their fifth concert in Union Hall, assisted by Mrs. Helen Hopekirk. The program was: Quartet in G, op. 18, No. 2, Beethoven; sonata for piano and 'cello, Mendelssohn; quintet, in E, op. 163, Schubert.

If possible, each successive appearance of this organization seems more enjoyable than the previous one. At the beginning it gave us apparently everything looked for in quartet playing—pure intonation, faultless phrasing, absolute unanimity—in fact, all we were ever taught to expect in a perfect reproduction of a perfect creation.

The performance of the Beethoven sonata for piano and 'cello, by Mrs. Hopekirk and Mr. Schroeder, was in every way a most delightful one.

The sixth concert will be given on Monday evening, March 7. The postponed fourth concert, with Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, soloist, will be announced later.

* * * *

THE COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1892.

The feature of the sixteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a symphonic suite— or, more properly, extracts from a composition of that class—by Ferruccio Busoni, which was played for the first time. Mr. Busoni is an Italian who has studied in Germany; and it was stated that in this suite he endeavored to "emancipate himself from the influence of the Italian style." It is very doubtful that the fine distinction between 'styles' which this phrase implies was noticeable by any of the hearers; and it is enough to say that the work, or such fragments as were given on this occasion, is at once melodious and strong. It proved a very gratifying selection. The symphony given at this concert was that famous one of Mozart in G minor. The performance lacked something of the spirit of the composer, as we have come to understand it. There was an exaggeration and an absence of repose which indicated Nikisch rather than Mozart. Mr. William H. Sherman played the pianoforte part of Raff's concerto (C minor) in a way to excite admiration; and the concert closed with Wagner's coronation march of Ludwig II. of Bavaria. The performance of the concert to-day is: Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' overture, Dvorak's Symphony No. 4 in G minor, and Liszt's 'Les Preludes.'

MUSICAL RECORD.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY, 1892.

Some Boston Music.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. — The program of the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth concerts was the following: —

Wagner: "Eine Faust Overture;" Chopin: Concerto No. 2, in F-Minor, Op. 21; Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat ("Eroica"), Op. 55. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach (Amy Marcy Cheney) was the soloist.

The Wagner number was admirably performed, but its obscure meaning remains as much in the dark as ever. Probably the composer knew what he intended to convey in this work, but no repetition of hearings can make it pleasing to those who are fond of clearness and directness in musical composition.

Mrs. Beach's playing of the Chopin concerto was graceful and pleasing. She has above all an intellectual grasp and an artistic sense which gives enjoyment to all who listen to her playing. She especially brings out the emotional phase of the composition.

The "Eroica" Symphony was grandly given. There were, to be sure, a few departures from the conventional tempi; but Mr. Nikisch is evidently determined to read all the works he gives according to his own ideas. It is in such works as this that the noble orchestra — which Paderewski pronounces the finest in the world — is heard to best advantage, and its playing is an unalloyed delight to every genuine music-lover privileged to hear it.

THE New York Musical Courier says of the concert of the Kneisel Quartet of Boston in that city: "Altogether, the organization gave us some quartet playing which for refinement, absolute unity of ensemble and musical qualities, both of reading and performance, has not been equalled, let alone surpassed, here for many, many years." This is high but discriminating praise for artists of whom Boston is proud.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 29, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventeenth concert given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mendelssohn: Overture to "Ruy Blas."
Dvořák: Symphony No. 4, in G major.
Borodin: "Eine Steppenskizze aus Mittel-Asien."
Liszt: Symphonic Poem. "Les Préludes."

If Mendlessohn had a hearty detestation of Victor Hugo's play of "Ruy Blas," so much so as to prefer to call his overture the "Overture to the Charitable Association"—having been induced to write it in a single night for a performance in aid of a charity—what would his feelings have been last Saturday evening at finding the overture serve as introduction to such a list of Czech, Russian and Magyar music as was on the programme? He would, likely enough, have thought: "Serve me right for writing it at all!"

Of Dvořák's new symphony we can, with the best will in the world, find nothing good to say. No one can damn a work after a single hearing; but we mistake much if this one will not be found to have damned itself. To perform it, as a composition in an important form by a composer of Dvořák's prestige, was eminently proper; we doubt, however, if Mr. Nikisch or any member of the orchestra will care to look at it again. One is tempted to say, as a French critic once said of a certain requiem, "Brought out at its own funeral!"

Borodin's sketch—a movement from a symphonic poem, entitled "Middle Asia"—gives one a graphically terrible idea of what a Russian steppe must be like. We had always thought that the dreary monotony of those vast tracts of barren country was coupled with something of grandeur; but Borodin has undeceived us, and, as a Russian, he surely ought to know. As far as we could gather from the music any definite idea, we should say that the steppes must be used a good deal for pasturing cattle; for we believe that melancholy and scantily accompanied tunes on wooden wind instruments are usually understood to bear some reference to the shepherd's or cowherd's craft. Whether the long sustained high note in the violins is meant to imply desolation in general, or mosquitoes in particular, we could not determine. But, after the Dvořák symphony, this piece of Borodin's came rather soothingly than otherwise. Liszt's "Les Préludes" sounded positively classical by comparison.

The orchestra played capitally throughout the concert, giving "The Preludes" with especial fire and brilliancy.

The next programme is: Tschaikowski, symphonic poem, "Hamlet;" Max Bruch, violin concerto No. 3, in D minor; Schumann, symphony No. 4, in D minor (first performance here of the original version). Mme. Camilla Urso will be the violinist.

Wednesday night, Music Hall, Boston Symphony Orchestra, benefit of members, Mr. Paderewski assisting.

[134]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1892.

BOSTON NEWS.

BOSTON OFFICE of THE MUSICAL COURIER,
157 Tremont street, February 20, 1892.

THE past week has been a particularly notable one musically. Damrosch, with his New York Symphony Orchestra in Tremont Temple, and the Kneisel Quartet in Union Hall, "opened the ball" on Monday evening, followed during the week by Mrs. Hopekirk, Mr. William Heinrich, the Apollo Club, the Molé Chamber Music Club, Mr. Max Heinrich, De Pachmann, the Boston Philharmonic Orchestra, an Operatic Festival Matinée (with a four hours' program), and last in chronological order but first in all other respects the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program, a most interesting one, was as follows:

Symphony in G minor, Mozart; concerto for piano in C minor, Raff; three movements from symphonic suite, op. 25, Busoni, and "Huldigung's" March, Wagner. The soloist was Mr. William H. Sherwood.

The particularly interesting feature of this concert was the reappearance of Mr. Sherwood, for so many years a resident of Boston.

His entrance upon the stage of Music Hall was a signal for a most emphatic demonstration of welcome from the immense audience.

Mr. Sherwood's performance of the Raff concerto was a most refined one. Beauties heretofore unnoticed in the composition were brought out in the clearest and most fascinating manner. Especially commendable was his work in the finale, at the close of which he was recalled again and again.

It may not be out of place here to speak of the instrument used by Mr. Sherwood, for upon it depends to a large degree the perfect tout ensemble of such a performance.

The piano was a Mason & Hamlin concert grand, and the most astonishing thing about it is the fact that it is the second concert piano ever turned out by the company. Its tone was full, round and even, and throughout its entire scale it possesses a richness and certain singing quality unexcelled. Such an instrument is an indispensable adjunct to any performance of a piano concerto, and upon this occasion Mr. Sherwood is to be congratulated upon having at his command a piano that meets every requirement.

The orchestra was not below its standard of excellence. There was one novelty on the program, the "Three Movements from a Symphonic Suite," by Mr. F. Busoni, a recent acquisition to the faculty of the N. E. Conservatory of Music. The three movements were in the forms of a gigue, gavotte and allegro fugato, and it would be difficult to say which one was the most original, delightful or the best written. The orchestration was peculiarly novel in its effects, coming, here and there, very close to the humorous. The composition was received with considerable enthusiasm.

* * * *

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartet gave their fifth concert in Union Hall, assisted by Mrs. Helen Hopekirk. The program was: Quartet in G, op. 18, No. 2, Beethoven; sonata for piano and 'cello, Mendelssohn; quintet, in E, op. 163, Schubert.

If possible, each successive appearance of this organization seems more enjoyable than the previous one. At the beginning it gave us apparently everything looked for in quartet playing—pure intonation, faultless phrasing, absolute unanimity—in fact, all we were ever taught to expect in a perfect reproduction of a perfect creation.

The performance of the Beethoven sonata for piano and 'cello, by Mrs. Hopekirk and Mr. Schroeder, was in every way a most delightful one.

The sixth concert will be given on Monday evening, March 7. The postponed fourth concert, with Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, soloist, will be announced later.

* * * *

THE COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1892.

The feature of the sixteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a symphonic suite— or, more properly, extracts from a composition of that class—by Ferruccio Busoni, which was played for the first time. Mr. Busoni is an Italian who has studied in Germany; and it was stated that in this suite he endeavored to "emancipate himself from the influence of the Italian style." It is very doubtful that the fine distinction between 'styles' which this phrase implies was noticeable by any of the hearers; and it is enough to say that the work, or such fragments as were given on this occasion, is at once melodious and strong. It proved a very gratifying selection. The symphony given at this concert was that famous one of Mozart in G minor. The performance lacked something of the spirit of the composer, as we have come to understand it. There was an exaggeration and an absence of repose which indicated Nikisch rather than Mozart. Mr. William H. Sherman played the pianoforte part of Raff's concerto (C minor) in a way to excite admiration; and the concert closed with Wagner's coronation march of Ludwig II. of Bavaria. The performance of the concert to-day is: Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' overture, Dvorak's Symphony No. 4 in G minor, and Liszt's 'Les Preludes.'

MUSICAL RECORD.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY, 1892.

Some Boston Music.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. — The program of the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth concerts was the following: —

Wagner: "Eine Faust Overture;" Chopin: Concerto No. 2, in F-Minor, Op. 21; Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat ("Eroica"), Op. 55. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach (Amy Marcy Cheney) was the soloist.

The Wagner number was admirably performed, but its obscure meaning remains as much in the dark as ever. Probably the composer knew what he intended to convey in this work, but no repetition of hearings can make it pleasing to those who are fond of clearness and directness in musical composition.

Mrs. Beach's playing of the Chopin concerto was graceful and pleasing. She has above all an intellectual grasp and an artistic sense which gives enjoyment to all who listen to her playing. She especially brings out the emotional phase of the composition.

The "Eroica" Symphony was grandly given. There were, to be sure, a few départures from the conventional tempi; but Mr. Nikisch is evidently determined to read all the works he gives according to his own ideas. It is in such works as this that the noble orchestra — which Paderewski pronounces the finest in the world — is heard to best advantage, and its playing is an unalloyed delight to every genuine music-lover privileged to hear it.

THE New York Musical Courier says of the concert of the Kneisel Quartet of Boston in that city: "Altogether, the organization gave us some quartet playing which for refinement, absolute unity of ensemble and musical qualities, both of reading and performance, has not been equalled, let alone surpassed, here for many, many years." This is high but discriminating praise for artists of whom Boston is proud.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 29, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventeenth concert given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mendelssohn: Overture to "Ruy Blas."
Dvorák: Symphony No. 4, in G major.
Borodin: "Eine Steppenskizze aus Mittel-Asien."
Liszt: Symphonic Poem. "Les Préludes."

If Mendlessohn had a hearty detestation of Victor Hugo's play of "Ruy Blas," so much so as to prefer to call his overture the "Overture to the Charitable Association"—having been induced to write it in a single night for a performance in aid of a charity—what would his feelings have been last Saturday evening at finding the overture serve as introduction to such a list of Czech, Russian and Magyar music as was on the programme? He would, likely enough, have thought: "Serve me right for writing it at all!"

Of Dvorák's new symphony we can, with the best will in the world, find nothing good to say. No one can damn a work after a single hearing; but we mistake much if this one will not be found to have damned itself. To perform it, as a composition in an important form by a composer of Dvorák's prestige, was eminently proper; we doubt, however, if Mr. Nikisch or any member of the orchestra will care to look at it again. One is tempted to say, as a French critic once said of a certain requiem, "Brought out at its own funeral!"

Borodin's sketch—a movement from a symphonic poem, entitled "Middle Asia"—gives one a graphically terrible idea of what a Russian steppe must be like. We had always thought that the dreary monotony of those vast tracts of barren country was coupled with something of grandeur; but Borodin has undeceived us, and, as a Russian, he surely ought to know. As far as we could gather from the music any definite idea, we should say that the steppes must be used a good deal for pasturing cattle; for we believe that melancholy and scantily accompanied tunes on wooden wind instruments are usually understood to bear some reference to the shepherd's or cowherd's craft. Whether the long sustained high note in the violins is meant to imply desolation in general, or mosquitoes in particular, we could not determine. But, after the Dvorák symphony, this piece of Borodin's came rather soothingly than otherwise. Liszt's "Les Préludes" sounded positively classical by comparison.

The orchestra played capitally throughout the concert, giving "The Preludes" with especial fire and brilliancy.

The next programme is: Tschaikowski, symphonic poem, "Hamlet;" Max Bruch, violin concerto No. 3, in D minor; Schumann, symphony No. 4, in D minor (first performance here of the original version). Mme. Camilla Urso will be the violinist.

Wednesday night, Music Hall, Boston Symphony Orchestra, benefit of members, Mr. Paderewski assisting.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 28.

The Symphony Concert.

They programme played at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening, was: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; Symphony No. 4. in G, Dvorak (first time); "A Prairie Sketch in Central Asia," A. Borodin (first time); and "Les Preludes," by Lizst. Of all this, the Mendelssohn overture was, by far, the best music; and it is not one of its composer's finest works in its kind. The Dvorak Symphony ranges all the way from pretentious to dry and trivial. The opening movement is conventional and uninteresting; the adagio says nothing new, and the meaning of much that it says is unintelligible. The third movement is bright and daintily pretty generally, and was the first portion of the work that stirred the audience from the perfunctory applause that had hitherto attended the symphony. The finale has a sharply defined theme with a well-marked rhythm, and is tuneful and pleasing, but of no especial distinction. In fact the world is full of such symphonies as these which are less rigid but no better than Kapellmeister music, and not so good as much music of that class. The Borodin selection is a charming bit of tone color, original in effect and full of character. It was admirably played, as were also the overture and symphony. The Liszt selection was given with great fire and tremendous noisiness, the drum player revelling in the opportunities afforded him. The work sounded more cheap and vulgar than ever. Its day has passed, and it should be permitted to go to the eternal rest that it deserves, and to which so much worthier music has gone. The programme for the next concert is: Symphonic poem, "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky; Concerto, for violin, No 3, D-minor, Bruch; Symphony No. 4, D-minor, Schumann, according to the original version, for the first time here. The soloist is to be Mme. Camilla Urso.

MUSIC MAD.

The storm of music that has poured over Boston during the past few weeks has almost flooded it, and there is every prospect that it will rage to the end of the season. It has already begun to wear on the nerves of many lovers of the art, but there are enthusiasts who, undismayed by all that they are called on to hear, revel in the tone deluge and valiantly face it. Twelve concerts in one week, as was recently the case, would seem sufficient to fill to satiety the most hungry of music lovers; but the excess, instead of allaying, seemed to stimulate the appetite for more. Now and then three or four concerts a day have appealed to the musical public, and not in vain. There has been so much of pianoforte music that it would not be unnatural to imagine that the public ear had grown weary of the tones of the unsympathetic instrument. It has proved, however, far otherwise. At De Pachmann's three concerts the audiences were larger at each, the hall being packed at the last. Paderewski has given nine recitals, and at each succeeding recital the attendance increased until at length was seen that hitherto unprecedented circumstance, Music Hall packed to listen to performances given by one artist. It is true that these two players are among the greatest of the world's pianists; but so are Rubinstein and Von Bulow, and so is D'Albert, but they never played here to such large audiences, which would seem to indicate that we have either grown more appreciative or more sensitive regarding the proper thing to do when celebrities visit us. Two or three eminent pianists from abroad are yet to appear here; and it remains to be seen if the hunger for piano recitals will continue.

It is evident, however, that this is to be essentially a piano season, for chamber concerts have not been as numerous as they have been in past seasons, but vocal recitals have already reached and overtopped the record, and there are, as yet uncounted, more to come. Of these only few have attracted large audiences, and as few can have paid expenses. However, they have served to keep the names of their givers before the public, which was, perhaps, all that was expected from the larger proportion of them. The Symphony concerts, of course, are a regular and an expected feature of our season's music, but the wonder of it is that, after feasting for five days and nights of the week on music, people should have sufficient musical stomach left to partake of and to digest the heavy symphony plum pudding that is provided for dessert at the close of the week. Still, the symphony concerts are a matter of local pride; they have given us an art distinction elsewhere; and of all the proper things in things musical, they are the proper things par excellence. Then, too, they have a special interest in many ways. People discuss them with more or less fervor, and at present the discussion is concerned largely with the momentous question whether the orchestra is at present as finely trained as it has been in the past; whether or no it still deserves to rank among the perfect orchestras of the world.

This state of affairs makes the symphony concerts the nucleus of the musical season. Opinion is divided, and consequently a mild excitement is maintained. There are those who believe that the orchestra has steadily deteriorated since it passed from the charge of Mr. Gericke. There are some who believe that it has lost nothing under Mr. Nikisch's direction. There are none who argue that the latter has improved its efficiency. Then again, there are some who fancy that Mr. Gericke was wholly absorbed in the music he directed, and kept his own personality in the background as much as possible while Mr. Nikisch is notable for pursuing a diametrically opposite course. These, also, have an ardent yearning for the return of Mr. Gericke to the position he formerly held here at the head of this orchestra; and after all, it would not be a bad thing for the orchestra, by any means; and the chances are that he would be welcomed back with tremendous enthusiasm. This and other considerations in kind surround the Symphony concerts with a peculiar interest. In the meanwhile the question is, how much more music Boston is to have this season.

The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to have a benefit concert on Wednesday evening next, March 2, at Music Hall, and it will be one of unusual attractiveness. Two works on the programme are Massenet's suite "Esclarmonde," and Nicode's symphonic poem, "The Sea," which will be heard then for the first time. An added interest will be appearance of Paderewski, who, to show his appreciation of the orchestra, has offered them his services, and will play Schumann's A-minor Concerto and Liszt's Hungarian Fantasie. This concert will give an opportunity for Bostonians to show their appreciation of a body of musicians who have done much to give them pleasure and to extend the fame of Boston as a musical centre. Tickets can be secured at Music Hall.

The sixth Kneisel Quartet concert will take place on Monday, March 7th, at Union Hall. Mme. Amalie Joachim is to be the vocal soloist.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch will give their song recital at Chickering Hall, Thursday, March 10. Master Alexander Fiedemann will appear.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEB. 28, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

SIXTEENTH CONCERT.

The programme of the sixteenth Symphony concert in Music hall, Saturday evening, Feb. 20, was:

Mozart. Symphony, in G minor.
Allegro molto.—Andante.—Minuet.—Allegro assai.
Raff. Concerto for pianoforte, in C minor, op. 185.
Allegro.—Andante,quasi larghetto.—Finale, allegro.
Busoni. Symphonic suite, op. 25. (Three movements)
Gigue.—Gavotte.—Allegro fugato. (First time.)
Wagner.—Huldigung's March.
Soloist: Mr. William H. Sherwood.

The symphony in G minor, which is musically interesting, by many thought to be Mozart's liebling, was read splendidly so far as the notes were concerned; but Mr. Nikisch imparted altogether too much modern thunder and lightning into it for a truthful representation of this poetic master. It has already been stated that, while Mozart, Haydn and Schubert's music is susceptible of Wagnerian coloring, such coloring takes away all the beauty, leaving scarcely any charm or reminder of what it was intended to be, what it would be without this transfiguration.

It may be true that Mr. Nikisch does not wish to be called old-fashioned,but may he not make a mistake in modernizing these heavenly inspired and gifted masters? He may think from his standpoint that the public desire sensational noise, but if he will bend his ear to the four corners of Music hall and attentively listen to what is said about his free modernizations, he will realize his error.

The allegro molto was too loud all the way through, but, as stated, well played. The andante was completely enveloped in brilliant effects, losing all its poetic beauty and identity. Why, and where, is the tradition for it? The minuet fared better, and, perhaps, the allegro assai was less impassioned than some other portions of the work. If Mozart had been present, he would have been greatly surprised at the vigorous treatment his symphony received at the hands of Mr. Nikisch, and without doubt, would have expostulated.

Considerable interest was manifested to hear Mr. Sherwood play again, for he is an American pianist who stands deservedly high; not alone in Boston, but throughout the country, as he is known far and near. Mr. Sherwood possesses a fine technique, acquired by faithful, diligent study with some of the best masters of Europe, and behind this lies a musical temperament which enables him to play with expression and fidelity to the master he interprets. For some reason there seemed to be a want of understanding between the soloist and the orchestra for they were not always together. Indeed, at one time it was a matter of doubt who would come out on top, the pianist or brass player, but it must be conceded the trumpeter was triumphant, although Mr. Sherwood gave him a good pull. Mr. Sherwood is one of the very best American pianists and perhaps, as a public performer, stands at the head. There is no occasion to speak in detail. Mr. Sherwood was heartily encored, and appeared several times on the stage to acknowledge the compliment.

Mr. Busoni's three movements from a symphony suite displayed his musical talent in a pleasant light. The music is more fantastic than deep, but is of such a joyous, light airy nature as to furnish interest and enjoyment to all. Better things may be expected of this young composer.

The concert closed with Wagner's "Huldigung's March." We presume Mr. Nikisch was happy during its performance, for it is a piece in which the brass and drums have full sway.

JAMES M. TRACY.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch will give their postponed recital at Chickering hall on Thursday, March 10, introducing the young violinist, Master Fiedermann.

[illegible]

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 59.

SUNDAY, FEB. 28, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The patrons of the symphony concerts had a most enjoyable programme performed for their entertainment at Music Hall last evening, and the absence of a soloist was lost sight of in the hearing of the brilliant novelties brought forward by Conductor Arthur Nikisch on this occasion.

Dvorak's fourth symphony made the leading feature of the programme, and the work was given its first American performance. Nothing in this class of composition has proved more pleasing than this symphony was to its hearers of last evening, its wealth of tuneful themes, the beauty of their development and treatment and the marked originality of the several movements all going to make the work a decided departure from the usual symphonic writings of modern composers.

In the opening allegro the nationality of the composer is made distinctly apparent by the strong Slavonic characteristics of the themes, and the odd, almost fantastic manner of their treatment, but there is not a dull moment in it all, and the breezy, independent fashion in which the movement is written is fairly captivating, even upon a first hearing.

The adagio, making the second movement, is a bit of a curiosity in its form, and its strong contrasts give it a charm which was instantly recognized by the audience. Its principal theme, a sombre march: the lovely episode, which is first stated by the flute and oboe, and the masterly ending of the movement, all making it a very notable portion of this most remarkable contribution from the Slavonic composer.

The third movement, allegretto gracioso, which does duty as the scherzo, is a veritable gem of orchestral writing; and the fanciful way in which the bright, tuneful ideas have been treated show the composer in quite a novel light, his work in this movement having a dainty grace and beauty that cannot be too highly commended.

Whatever freedom from conventionalities is shown in the first three movements is entirely eclipsed in the finale, allegro "Ma Non Troppo," for here the composer has not only thrown off all restraint, but amply justified himself by establishing new forms that charm at once by their originality and effectiveness. The leading theme has the simplicity of a folk song, but in its development it is treated with variations which are as quaint as they are enjoyable.

Mr. Nikisch gave his best efforts to the performance of the new work, and his reading brought out its beauties in strong relief.

Another novelty consisted of a contribution from the writings of the Russian composor Borodin, called, in plain English, "A Prairie Scene in Central Asia." No better idea of the style of the composition can be given than that supplied by Borodin, which reads as follows: "In the silence of the sandy steppes of Central Asia there is heard the first refrain of a Russian folk song, also the melancholy notes of the songs of the Orient, followed by the hoof beats of the approaching horses and camels. A caravan crossing the great desert, and escorted by Russian soldiers, pursues its long journey without fear, confidently relying on its military guard. The procession steadily advances. The voices of the Russians and of the natives blend in the same harmony; their songs are heard for a long time, and are finally lost in the distance."

The tone pictures of the composition show the masterly skill of the writer, and as a bit of "programme music" it is most enjoyable. It was admirably played and was heartily applauded.

Mr. Nikisch gave a splendid performance of the "Ruy Blas" overture to introduce the programme, and ended it with a strikingly effective reading of the Liszt "Les Preludes."

Next Saturday evening the soloist will be Mme. Camilla Urso, and the programme Tschaikowsky's Symphonic poem, "Hamlet"; Bruch's concerto for violin No. 3, in D minor, and Shumann's symphony No. 4, in D minor.

FOR THE ORCHESTRA'S BENEFIT.

Next Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in a concert arranged for the benefit of its members, and for this occasion the following programme has been arranged:

Overture, "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner
Concerto for pianoforte in A minor	Schumann
Mr. Paderewski.
Suite from "Esclarmonde"	Massenet
(First time.)
Soli for violoncello:
a. "Sarabande"	Bach
b. "Moment Musicale"	Schubert
c. "At the Fountain"	Davidoff
Mr. Schroeder.
Andantino and scherzo from symphony in F minor, No. 4	Tschaikowsky
Hungarian fantasie for pianoforte and orchestra	Liszt
Mr. Paderewski.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch will give their postponed recital at Chickering Hall on Thursday, March 10, and will also introduce the young violinist, Master Friedermann.

The concert announced to be given by Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch and Master Fiedemann at Chickering Hall, next Wednesday night, is postponed until the evening of March 10.

The sixth concert of the Kneisel quartet series will take place Monday evening, March 7, at 8 o'clock. Mme. Amalie Joachim will be the soloist. The opening number of the programme will be a quartet in E minor, by Ottaka Novacek, a viola player in the Symphony orchestra, who possesses undoubted talent as both musician and composer. The other orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's variations from quartet, A major, op. 18, and quartet, E flat, op. 74. Mme. Joachim's selections will be announced later.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 29, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

It is a pleasant task to acknowledge the amount of novelty which is given to the symphony programmes this season. One may not always like the new works, but it is none the less valuable to have the opportunity of hearing different schools and of knowing what the very latest additions to the repertoire are like. On Saturday the novelties were Slavonic, and it must be added that they were caviare to the general public, for the first and last numbers of the programme were the most appreciated features of the concert.

The opening number was Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture, which received a fiery and dramatic reading well suited to its character. The pomp and blare of the brasses was quite in place here, and the spirited interpretation was evidently relished by the audience. In the string passages there was something left to be desired in ensemble; the chief fault with our excellent string orchestra is that the first violins are allowed to dominate everything; their dash and enthusiasm are never restrained, and as a consequence one rarely hears the seconds or the violas, and as we possess an unusually large body of violas, one of the finest possible effects is lost. The first movement of the recently played G minor symphony by Mozart was an example of this, for it possesses a beautiful viola figure which was inaudible, and in the same manner the string portions of this overture seemed to be first violins, cellos and contrabasses, and nothing else; a little repression of the first violins, and corresponding encouragement of the seconds and the violas will make a wonderful change in many performances.

Dvorak's new symphony was a disappointment at its first hearing. It is not so much a symphony as a fantasie on Slavonic folk music. It is a hopeful sign in the instrumental music of the present that the composers are beginning to draw from the characteristic repertoire of folk-song and national dance, for from this broad field our classical music will derive a new virility, and many new effects of scale form, of weird and effective mode, will be acquired. Let the reader play for himself upon the piano these notes. C, D, E flat, F sharp, G, A flat, B, and C, and he will have a scale which can produce many a strange yet pleasing effect, the scale of the Hungarian folk music; in like manner, C, D, flat, E, F, G, A flat, B, and C, used harmonically or melodically, induct us into an almost untried field of composition, an Oriental mode; and a half-dozen other modes might be mentioned, were it not for the risk of becoming pedantic, that have influenced folk-music much, and classical music not at all. But the employment of such scales for theme-construction as, for example, in Brahm's slow movement of his last symphony, in E minor, does not preclude musicianly development, and this is just what one did not find in any movement of this work by Dvorak. It seemed a pasticcio of folk-music, each theme leading to a tame and commonplace ending, not far removed from the Italian cadence as exemplified by Verdi in those young days when he deserved his patronymic. The second movement, however, was a curiosity, not as the programme book said, because of its continuance in one key, but because of the strange intermezzo in which an interval of a third, sometimes major, sometimes minor, was repeated over and over, making one of the quaintest imaginable effects. This was by all odds the most interesting movement of the work, and its bizarrerie was attractive in the highest degree. The third movement was more of the same sort, and its strange final cadence, a veritable orchestral sigh, was finely given. The finale was more military, but suggested rather a Tartar horde going out to battle, than anything European. It dealt in every kind of semi-civilized scale. To sum up, then, the work errs in not having a clear development of its thoughts and in giving an overdose of the quaint and the weird, but it is interesting, viewed as a fantasie, and an orchestral study. It was generally well played, and certainly lost nothing of its effect in Mr. Nikisch's hands. The horn played badly, the trumpet overblew, and the flute work was excellent, while of course the phalanx of first violins carried everything before them in their impetuous charge.

A Russian picture by Borodin added to the savagery which seemed rampant in the programme. It was charmingly played and the woodwind instruments had abundant opportunities to display themselves, and used them well. The shading was excellent, but the work came to palates that had already been surfeited with odd progressions.

Liszt's best symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," was given with becoming breadth. Its chief theme is reminiscent, and that, too, in a very unexpected manner. An eminent Bostonian once exclaimed, after hearing the finale of Beethoven's ninth symphony for the first time, "That's only a glorified 'Yankee Doodle;'" in a similar manner the unregenerate can find in Liszt's work an apotheosis of "We won't go home till morning." But the climax is grand, and the breadth of the interpretation was undeniable, for here our conductor's intensity and enthusiasm found proper vent.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 28.

The Symphony Concert.

They programme played at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening, was: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; Symphony No. 4. in G, Dvorak (first time); "A Prairie Sketch in Central Asia," A. Borodin (first time); and "Les Preludes," by Liszt. Of all this, the Mendelssohn overture was, by far, the best music; and it is not one of its composer's finest works in its kind. The Dvorak Symphony ranges all the way from pretentious to dry and trivial. The opening movement is conventional and uninteresting; the adagio says nothing new, and the meaning of much that it says is unintelligible. The third movement is bright and daintily pretty generally, and was the first portion of the work that stirred the audience from the perfunctory applause that had hitherto attended the symphony. The finale has a sharply defined theme with a well-marked rhythm, and is tuneful and pleasing, but of no especial distinction. In fact the world is full of such symphonies as these which are less rigid but no better than Kapellmeister music, and not so good as much music of that class. The Borodin selection is a charming bit of tone color, original in effect and full of character. It was admirably played, as were also the overture and symphony. The Liszt selection was given with great fire and tremendous noisiness, the drum player revelling in the opportunities afforded him. The work sounded more cheap and vulgar than ever. Its day has passed, and it should be permitted to go to the eternal rest that it deserves, and to which so much worthier music has gone. The programme for the next concert is: Symphonic poem, "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky; Concerto, for violin, No 3, D-minor, Bruch; Symphony No. 4, D-minor, Schumann, according to the original version, for the first time here. The soloist is to be Mme. Camilla Urso.

MUSIC MAD.

The storm of music that has poured over Boston during the past few weeks has almost flooded it, and there is every prospect that it will rage to the end of the season. It has already begun to wear on the nerves of many lovers of the art, but there are enthusiasts who, undismayed by all that they are called on to hear, revel in the tone deluge and valiantly face it. Twelve concerts in one week, as was recently the case, would seem sufficient to fill to satiety the most hungry of music lovers; but the excess, instead of allaying, seemed to stimulate the appetite for more. Now and then three or four concerts a day have appealed to the musical public, and not in vain. There has been so much of pianoforte music that it would not be unnatural to imagine that the public ear had grown weary of the tones of the unsympathetic instrument. It has proved, however, far otherwise. At De Pachmann's three concerts the audiences were larger at each, the hall being packed at the last. Paderewski has given nine recitals, and at each succeeding recital the attendance increased until at length was seen that hitherto unprecedented circumstance, Music Hall packed to listen to performances given by one artist. It is true that these two players are among the greatest of the world's pianists; but so are Rubinstein and Von Bulow, and so is D'Albert, but they never played here to such large audiences, which would seem to indicate that we have either grown more appreciative or more sensitive regarding the proper thing to do when celebrities visit us. Two or three eminent pianists from abroad are yet to appear here; and it remains to be seen if the hunger for piano recitals will continue.

It is evident, however, that this is to be essentially a piano season, for chamber concerts have not been as numerous as they have been in past seasons, but vocal recitals have already reached and overtopped the record, and there are, as yet uncounted, more to come. Of these only few have attracted large audiences, and as few can have paid expenses. However, they have served to keep the names of their givers before the public, which was, perhaps, all that was expected from the larger proportion of them. The Symphony concerts, of course, are a regular and an expected feature of our season's music, but the wonder of it is that, after feasting for five days and nights of the week on music, people should have sufficient musical stomach left to partake of and to digest the heavy symphony plum pudding that is provided for dessert at the close of the week. Still, the symphony concerts are a matter of local pride; they have given us an art distinction elsewhere; and of all the proper things in things musical, they are the proper things par excellence. Then, too, they have a special interest in many ways. People discuss them with more or less fervor, and at present the discussion is concerned largely with the momentous question whether the orchestra is at present as finely trained as it has been in the past; whether or no it still deserves to rank among the perfect orchestras of the world.

This state of affairs makes the symphony concerts the nucleus of the musical season. Opinion is divided, and consequently a mild excitement is maintained. There are those who believe that the orchestra has steadily deteriorated since it passed from the charge of Mr. Gericke. There are some who believe that it has lost nothing under Mr. Nikisch's direction. There are none who argue that the latter has improved its efficiency. Then again, there are some who fancy that Mr. Gericke was wholly absorbed in the music he directed, and kept his own personality in the background as much as possible while Mr. Nikisch is notable for pursuing a diametrically opposite coure. These, also, have an ardent yearning for the return of Mr. Gericke to the position he formerly held here at the head of this orchestra; and after all, it would not be a bad thing for the orchestra, by any means; and the chances are that he would be welcomed back with tremendous enthusiasm. This and other considerations in kind surround the Symphony concerts with a peculiar interest. In the meanwhile the question is, how much more music Boston is to have this season.

The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to have a benefit concert on Wednesday evening next, March 2, at Music Hall, and it will be one of unusual attractiveness. Two works on the programme are Massenet's suite "Esclarmonde," and Nicode's symphonic poem, "The Sea," which will be heard then for the first time. An added interest will be appearance of Paderewski, who, to show his appreciation of the orchestra, has offered them his services, and will play Schumann's A-minor Concerto and Liszt's Hungarian Fantasie. This concert will give an opportunity for Bostonians to show their appreciation of a body of musicians who have done much to give them pleasure and to extend the fame of Boston as a musical centre. Tickets can be secured at Music Hall.

The sixth Kneisel Quartet concert will take place on Monday, March 7th, at Union Hall. Mme. Amalie Joachim is to be the vocal soloist.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch will give their song recital at Chickering Hall, Thursday, March 10. Master Alexander Fiedemann will appear.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEB. 28, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

SIXTEENTH CONCERT.

The programme of the sixteenth Symphony concert in Music hall, Saturday evening, Feb. 20, was:

Mozart, Symphony, in G minor.
Allegro molto.—Andante.—Minuet.—Allegro assai.
Raff. Concerto for pianoforte, in C minor, op. 185.
Allegro.—Andante, quasi larghetto.—Finale, allegro.
Busoni. Symphonic suite, op. 25. (Three movements)
Gigue.—Gavotte.—Allegro fugato. (First time.)
Wagner.—Huldigung's March.
Soloist: Mr. William H. Sherwood.

The symphony in G minor, which is musically interesting, by many thought to be Mozart's liebling, was read splendidly so far as the notes were concerned; but Mr. Nikisch imparted altogether too much modern thunder and lightning into it for a truthful representation of this poetic master. It has already been stated that, while Mozart, Haydn and Schubert's music is susceptible of Wagnerian coloring, such coloring takes away all the beauty, leaving scarcely any charm or reminder of what it was intended to be, what it would be without this transfiguration.

It may be true that Mr. Nikisch does not wish to be called old-fashioned, but may he not make a mistake in modernizing these heavenly inspired and gifted masters? He may think from his standpoint that the public desire sensational noise, but if he will bend his ear to the four corners of Music hall and attentively listen to what is said about his free modernizations, he will realize his error.

The allegro molto was too loud all the way through, but, as stated, well played. The andante was completely enveloped in brilliant effects, losing all its poetic beauty and identity. Why, and where, is the tradition for it? The minuet fared better, and, perhaps, the allegro assai was less impassioned than some other portions of the work. If Mozart had been present, he would have been greatly surprised at the vigorous treatment his symphony received at the hands of Mr. Nikisch, and without doubt, would have expostulated.

Considerable interest was manifested to hear Mr. Sherwood play again, for he is an American pianist who stands deservedly high; not alone in Boston, but throughout the country, as he is known far and near. Mr. Sherwood possesses a fine technique, acquired by faithful, diligent study with some of the best masters of Europe, and behind this lies a musical temperament which enables him to play with expression and fidelity to the master he interprets. For some reason there seemed to be a want of understanding between the soloist and the orchestra for they were not always together. Indeed, at one time it was a matter of doubt who would come out on top, the pianist or brass player, but it must be conceded the trumpeter was triumphant, although Mr. Sherwood gave him a good pull. Mr. Sherwood is one of the very best American pianists and perhaps, as a public performer, stands at the head. There is no occasion to speak in detail, Mr. Sherwood was heartily encored, and appeared several times on the stage to acknowledge the compliment.

Mr. Busoni's three movements from a symphony suite displayed his musical talent in a pleasant light. The music is more fantastic than deep, but is of such a joyous, light airy nature as to furnish interest and enjoyment to all. Better things may be expected of this young composer.

The concert closed with Wagner's "Huldigung's March." We presume Mr. Nikisch was happy during its performance, for it is a piece in which the brass and drums have full sway.

JAMES M. TRACY.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch will give their postponed recital at Chickering hall on Thursday, March 10, introducing the young violinist, Master Fiedermann.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 59.

SUNDAY, FEB. 28, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The patrons of the symphony concerts had a most enjoyable programme performed for their entertainment at Music Hall last evening, and the absence of a soloist was lost sight of in the hearing of the brilliant novelties brought forward by Conductor Arthur Nikisch on this occasion.

Dvorak's fourth symphony made the leading feature of the programme, and the work was given its first American performance. Nothing in this class of composition has proved more pleasing than this symphony was to its hearers of last evening, its wealth of tuneful themes, the beauty of their development and treatment and the marked originality of the several movements all going to make the work a decided departure from the usual symphonic writings of modern composers.

In the opening allegro the nationality of the composer is made distinctly apparent by the strong Slavonic characteristics of the themes, and the odd, almost fantastic manner of their treatment, but there is not a dull moment in it all, and the breezy, independent fashion in which the movement is written is fairly captivating, even upon a first hearing.

The adagio, making the second movement, is a bit of a curiosity in its form, and its strong contrasts give it a charm which was instantly recognized by the audience. Its principal theme, a sombre march: the lovely episode, which is first stated by the flute and oboe, and the masterly ending of the movement, all making it a very notable portion of this most remarkable contribution from the Slavonic composer.

The third movement, allegretto gracioso, which does duty as the scherzo, is a veritable gem of orchestral writing; and the fanciful way in which the bright, tuneful ideas have been treated show the composer in quite a novel light, his work in this movement having a dainty grace and beauty that cannot be too highly commended.

Whatever freedom from conventionalities is shown in the first three movements is entirely eclipsed in the finale, allegro "Ma Non Troppo," for here the composer has not only thrown off all restraint, but amply justified himself by establishing new forms that charm at once by their originality and effectiveness. The leading theme has the simplicity of a folk song, but in its development it is treated with variations which are as quaint as they are enjoyable.

Mr. Nikisch gave his best efforts to the performance of the new work, and his reading brought out its beauties in strong relief.

Another novelty consisted of a contribution from the writings of the Russian composor Borodin, called, in plain English, "A Prairie Scene in Central Asia." No better idea of the style of the composition can be given than that supplied by Borodin, which reads as follows: "In the silence of the sandy steppes of Central Asia there is heard the first refrain of a Russian folk song, also the melancholy notes of the songs of the Orient, followed by the hoof beats of the approaching horses and camels. A caravan crossing the great desert, and escorted by Russian soldiers, pursues its long journey without fear, confidently relying on its military guard. The procession steadily advances. The voices of the Russians and of the natives blend in the same harmony; their songs are heard for a long time, and are finally lost in the distance."

The tone pictures of the composition show the masterly skill of the writer, and as a bit of "programme music" it is most enjoyable. It was admirably played and was heartily applauded.

Mr. Nikisch gave a splendid performance of the "Ruy Blas" overture to introduce the programme, and ended it with a strikingly effective reading of the Liszt "Les Preludes."

Next Saturday evening the soloist will be Mme. Camilla Urso, and the programme Tschaikowsky's Symphonic poem, "Hamlet"; Bruch's concerto for violin No. 3, in D minor, and Shumann's symphony No. 4, in D minor.

FOR THE ORCHESTRA'S BENEFIT.

Next Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in a concert arranged for the benefit of its members, and for this occasion the following programme has been arranged:

Overture. "Tannhaeuser" . . . . Wagner
Concerto for pianoforte in A minor . . . . . Schumann
Mr. Paderewski.
Suite from "Esclarmonde" . . . . Massenet
(First time.)
Soli for violoncello:
a. "Sarabande" . . . . Bach
b. "Moment Musicale" . . . . Schubert
c. "At the Fountain" . . . . Davidoff
Mr. Schroeder.
Andantino and scherzo from symphony in F minor, No. 4 . . . . Tschaikowsky
Hungarian fantasie for pianoforte and orchestra . . . . Liszt
Mr. Paderewski.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch will give their postponed recital at Chickering Hall on Thursday, March 10, and will also introduce the young violinist, Master Friedermann.

The concert announced to be given by Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch and Master Fiedemann at Chickering Hall, next Wednesday night, is postponed until the evening of March 10.

The sixth concert of the Kneisel quartet series will take place Monday evening, March 7, at 8 o'clock. Mme. Amalie Joachim will be the soloist. The opening number of the programme will be a quartet in E minor, by Ottaka Novacek, a viola player in the Symphony orchestra, who possesses undoubted talent as both musician and composer. The other orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's variations from quartet, A major, op. 18, and quartet, E flat, op. 74. Mme. Joachim's selections will be announced later.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 29, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

It is a pleasant task to acknowledge the amount of novelty which is given to the symphony programmes this season. One may not always like the new works, but it is none the less valuable to have the opportunity of hearing different schools and of knowing what the very latest additions to the repertoire are like. On Saturday the novelties were Slavonic, and it must be added that they were caviare to the general public, for the first and last numbers of the programme were the most appreciated features of the concert.

The opening number was Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture, which received a fiery and dramatic reading well suited to its character. The pomp and blare of the brasses was quite in place here, and the spirited interpretation was evidently relished by the audience. In the string passages there was something left to be desired in ensemble; the chief fault with our excellent string orchestra is that the first violins are allowed to dominate everything; their dash and enthusiasm are never restrained, and as a consequence one rarely hears the seconds or the violas, and as we possess an unusually large body of violas, one of the finest possible effects is lost. The first movement of the recently played G minor symphony by Mozart was an example of this, for it possesses a beautiful viola figure which was inaudible, and in the same manner the string portions of this overture seemed to be first violins, cellos and contrabasses, and nothing else; a little repression of the first violins, and corresponding encouragement of the seconds and the violas will make a wonderful change in many performances.

Dvorak's new symphony was a disappointment at its first hearing. It is not so much a symphony as a fantasie on Slavonic folk music. It is a hopeful sign in the instrumental music of the present that the composers are beginning to draw from the characteristic repertoire of folk-song and national dance, for from this broad field our classical music will derive a new virility, and many new effects of scale form, of weird and effective mode, will be acquired. Let the reader play for himself upon the piano these notes. C, D, E flat, F sharp, G, A flat, B, and C, and he will have a scale which can produce many a strange yet pleasing effect, the scale of the Hungarian folk music; in like manner C, D, flat, E, F, G, A flat, B, and C, used harmonically or melodically, induct us into an almost untried field of composition, an Oriental mode; and a half-dozen other modes might be mentioned, were it not for the risk of becoming pedantic, that have influenced folk-music much, and classical music not at all. But the employment of such scales for theme-construction as, for example, in Brahm's slow movement of his last symphony, in E minor, does not preclude musicianly development, and this is just what one did not find in any movement of this work by Dvorak. It seemed a pasticcio of folk-music, each theme leading to a tame and commonplace ending, not far removed from the Italian cadence as exemplified by Verdi in those young days when he deserved his patronymic. The second movement, however, was a curiosity, not as the programme book said, because of its continuance in one key, but because of the strange intermezzo in which an interval of a third, sometimes major, sometimes minor, was repeated over and over, making one of the quaintest imaginable effects. This was by all odds the most interesting movement of the work, and its bizarrerie was attractive in the highest degree. The third movement was more of the same sort, and its strange final cadence, a veritable orchestral sigh, was finely given. The finale was more military, but suggested rather a Tartar horde going out to battle, than anything European. It dealt in every kind of semi-civilized scale. To sum up, then, the work errs in not having a clear development of its thoughts and in giving an overdose of the quaint and the weird, but it is interesting, viewed as a fantasie, and an orchestral study. It was generally well played, and certainly lost nothing of its effect in Mr. Nikisch's hands. The horn played badly, the trumpet overblew, and the flute work was excellent, while of course the phalanx of first violins carried everything before them in their impetuous charge.

A Russian picture by Borodin added to the savagery which seemed rampant in the programme. It was charmingly played and the woodwind instruments had abundant opportunities to display themselves, and used them well. The shading was excellent, but the work came to palates that had already been surfeited with odd progressions.

Liszt's best symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," was given with becoming breadth. Its chief theme is reminiscent, and that, too, in a very unexpected manner. An eminent Bostonian once exclaimed, after hearing the finale of Beethoven's ninth symphony for the first time, "That's only a glorified 'Yankee Doodle;'" in a similar manner the unregenerate can find in Liszt's work an apotheosis of "We won't go home till morning." But the climax is grand, and the breadth of the interpretation was undeniable, for here our conductor's intensity and enthusiasm found proper vent.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 29, 1892.

The Two Novelties of the Symphony Concert.

The programme of the seventeenth Symphony Concert was as follows: Mendelssohn's overture, "Ruy Blas;" Dvorak's Symphony No. 4 in G major (first time in America); "A prairie scene in Central Asia," by Borodin (first time at these concerts); and Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes."

⁂

Borodin is a composer not utterly unknown in Boston. His first symphony was played under the direction of Mr. Nikisch in January, 1890, and it then provoked much comment. As a musician he was an amateur, an amateur of rare natural gifts and earnest purpose. He was born in St. Petersburg in 1834, and he died in 1886. He studied medicine and chemistry, was an army physician, and finally became a professor at the Imperial Academy of Medicine and Surgery. And he was honored by his Government in various ways. When he was a young man he fell in with Balakireff, who was the centre of the group of the composers of the new Russian school: Cui, Moussorgsky, Rimski-Korsakoff and others. He wrote two symphonies, the "Scene" played last week, some chamber music, including two string quartettes, and a few songs and pianoforte pieces. He left unfinished an opera, "Le Prince Igor;" an opera ballet, "Miada," and a symphony in A minor.

⁂

We are apt to associate the compositions of the modern Russian school with alcohol and dynamite. We have been warned against revolutionary principles, and we have been told that Russian musical Nihilism included even the rejection of the modern system of tonality. But certainly this "Scene from Central Asia" is neither amorphous nor Nihilistic. On the contrary, it is charming in its form, clearly written, full of an originality that attracts and does not repel. Its melancholy is not lugubrious; its apparent simplicity is never inane or infantile. The themes are characteristic; they are skillfully brought together, and, as Cui has well remarked in speaking of Borodin as a symphonic writer, "he crosses his melodic phrases with remarkable dexterity and with an irreproachable harmonic purity." The instrumentation is masterly. It is so discreet; it is also so full of color. The effects are gained by simple means, but each note, each instrument tells. And when the effect is gained, the composer is satisfied; he does not repeat it and repeat it, as though the hearer were a reluctant juryman. Although it is programme-music, it is eminently sane; Borodin leaves the hearer to his imagination, telling him first his own ideas concerning the music: he does not, however, put a cross under a measure, and say "This is a camel," or "This is the hoof-beat of a horse." If the "descriptive comments" were removed, the music itself would give delight; for as absolute music it is beautiful. It is to be hoped that in due time Mr. Nikisch will give us an opportunity of hearing some of the compositions of Rimski-Korsakoff, Balakireff and Glazounoff.

⁂

Dvorak's Symphony No. 4 in G was first played in Prague Feb. 2, 1890, under the direction of the composer and from the manuscript. It is, upon the whole, a disappointing work. It is true that there are a few pleasing themes, and the instrumentation is at times ingenious. But we have a right to demand something more than prettiness and clever instrumentation, when Dvorak offers to the world a symphony. The pedagogue might say with some justice to the composer, "I asked for a symphony and you gave me a suite." The amateur might also say, "Yes, that is a good tune in the finale, but it seems to me that I have heard it before; and as for the whole work it is not unlike a potpourri in which Bohemian folk-songs are contrasted with Bohemian dances. The second movement, I frankly admit, is unintelligible to me." Now it is possible, indeed probable, that neither of these two judgments is final, but there is truth in each. The first movement is curiously constructed, and as though Dvorak were hurried in the making of it; the adagio is perhaps "deep," and it is undeniably dull; the third movement is thoroughly delightful from beginning to end; and the bustle of the finale is dangerously near vulgarity. As a whole, the symphony will not add to the fame of the composer.

⁂

The "Ruy Blas" overture was well played, with the exception of an occasional lack of precision in the attack of the brass; and the symphony and the "Sketch" were finely played in spite of the horn-wabbling in the former. But is it not about time that Liszt's "Preludes" should be refused admission to our symphony concert hall, or at least admitted only once in ten years, and then as a shocking example? Its gilt is tarnished, its lace is tattered, its plume is broken. Time has turned its ornaments into derision; the stuff of its indispensable clothing is shoddy and through the gaping holes is seen a meagre, wretchedly nourished body.

⁂

The sixth concert of the Kneisel Quartette series will take place Monday evening, March 7. Mme. Amalie Joachim will be the soloist. The opening number of the programme will be a quartette in E minor, by Ottaka Novacek, a viola player in the Symphony Orchestra. The other numbers will be Beethoven's variations from quartette, A major, op. 18, and quartette, E flat, op. 74.

The concert announced to be given by Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch and Master Fiedemann in Chickering Hall next Wednesday night is postponed until the evening of March 10.

The programme for the eighteenth public rehearsal next Friday afternoon, and concert next Saturday night, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, is: Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Hamlet," first time; Bruch, third concerto for violin, the first time; Mrs. Camilla Urso, solo violin; Schumann, fourth symphony, first time, with the original version.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 28, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

Dvorak's latest symphony, and "A prairie scene in Central Asia," by Borodin, were the principal features of the seventeenth Symphony rehearsal and concert. The symphony is Dvorak's fourth, and was completed last year. Richter produced it at his concerts in Vienna and London, where it is said to have been warmly received. The word symphony arouses great expectations in the mind of the musician. It is difficult to get rid of the idea that a work bearing that name must be as elaborate in form and as weighty in matter as are the typical works of Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms. From this point of view this new symphony in G minor is disappointing. Neither in matter nor scope does it seem important enough to deserve so high sounding a title. As a whole it appears to be an attempt to lend new interest to the symphonic form by the avoidance of extended development, and by the introduction of rhythms and a general style of treatment that are associated with the orchestral suite. The work also shows a decided falling off on the part of Dvorak as a composer, when his D minor symphony is recalled. Nevertheless, it is in many respects very interesting; and not the least of its merits is that it is of reasonable length. The first theme of the opening allegro con brio given out by the 'cellos and horns makes an impressive beginning and suggests many possibilities of treatment. A lively episodic passage in the major and the second theme in the minor are well contrasted and all three are ingeniously if somewhat sparsely and conventionally developed, while the orchestral coloring is warm and varied. The adagio has a more pronounced vein of originality. Its two strongly opposing themes are treated with much skill and consistency, and the instrumental effects, which are largely confined to the wind, are well calculated to emphasize the intent of the movement. The allegretto grazioso, with its fascinating and unexpected rhythmical effects, suggestive of a valse melancholie, its charming modulations and odd orchestration is very attractive. The finale, which opens with a fanfare, is in strength and interest about on a level with the first movement. The symphony was effectively read and played, the two middle movements winning hearty applause.

The Borodin orchestral "scene" is intended to describe the passage of a caravan across the desert. It is programme music of a very realistic kind. The melancholy Russian folk-song is the key-note of this picture of monotony and desolation; and the orchestral devices employed to suggest the approach of the caravan, the tramp of the horses, the presence of the military escort, are those of a master of the modern orchestra. The scene was well played, and was thoroughly appreciated. The opening and closing numbers were Mendelssohn's overture to "Ruy Blas," and Liszt's "Les Preludes," both of which familiar works were performed in an exceedingly brilliant manner.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch give a recital at Chickering Hall on Thursday, March 10. Master Alexander Fiedermann, the young violinist, will make his Boston debut at this recital. Seats on sale at Music Hall.

De Pachmann's recital at Chickering Hall, Saturday, March 5, will be his last appearance in Boston this season. The programme is a "request," and contains many favorite numbers by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Chopin, Henselt and Liszt. Tickets at Music Hall.

The sixth concert by the Kneisel Quartet will be given in Music Hall March 7. Mme. Amalie Joachim is to be the soloist.

The extra concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given Wednesday, March 2, is for the benefit of the members of the orchestra, a body of gentlemen who are deserving for their faithfulness and skillfulness. In recognition of their merits, Paderewski, has offered his services on this occasion, and will play Schumann's A minor concerto with the orchestra and Liszt's Hungarian fantasie for a solo number. Two of the orchestral numbers are to be heard here for the first time, they are the suite "Esclarmonde," by Massenet, and a symphonic poem, "The Sea," by Nicode. It will be a concert of rare attractiveness. Seats can be secured at Music Hall.

SUNDAY, FEB. 28, 1892.

SEVENTEENTH SYMPHONY.

Mendelssohn, Dvorak, Borodin and Liszt on the Programme.

Music Hall was crowded Friday afternoon at the 17th rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra. There was not much enthusiasm on the part of the audience, but the performance, as a whole, was good, and the performance of the several numbers on the programme was marked by considerable technical care. The audience at last night's concert was equally as large and was much more cordial in expressing approval of Mr. Nikisch's offerings.

The programme embraces the names of Mendelssohn, Dvorak, Borodin and Liszt, and the selections were at once classical and popular.

The "Ruy Blas" overture by Mendelssohn, and "Les Preludes" by Liszt, were without question the successful numbers. The "Ruy Blas" overture was well received and finely played by the orchestra.

The Dvorak symphony No. 4, in G major, was new, and, therefore, did not evoke as much applause as the notable work preceding it, with its grand opening chords, its magnificent allegro, and its passionate cantabelle, all so well known.

Yet the Dvorak symphony was a grand effort, and each movement was characterized by marked care.

The fortissimo cresendo, in the first movement, was a splendid bit of musical effect, so, also, was the coda in G major in the third movement. The finale was given grandly from the faufare of trumpets to the pianissimo by the cellos, and the symphony, as a whole, was warmly applauded.

The Borodin number, "A Prairie Scene in Central Asia," with its sensational effects, was well received.

The success of the concert was the Lizst number "Les Preludes." Both orchestra and audience warmed to this selection, and at the close it was greeted with merited applause.

The piece is full of weird poetry, musical effect, changing rapidly from grave to gay, and charming the ear at every step. The allegro animato violins and trumpets is a fitting finale to this powerful work, and the audience evinced its pleasure by generous applause. There was no lack of attention to "Les Preludes."

The programme for the 18th rehearsal and concert will be as follows:

Symphonic poem, Hamlet.......... Tschaikowsky
First time.
Concerto for violin, No. 3, in D minor...... Bruch
Soloist, Mme. Camilla Urso. First time.
Symphony No. 4, in D minor.......... Schumann
First performance in Boston of the original version.

Extra Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give an extra concert on Wednesday, March 2, at Music Hall—a benefit for the members of this famous organization, whose meritorious work has given unalloyed pleasure to thousands and made this city famous wherever music is appreciated. They deserve well, and their services for art are worthy of the warmest recognition as well as praise.

Paderewski's appearance at this concert is a voluntary offering in compliment to the superiority of the orchestra's work and an expression of his appreciation of the manner in which it accompanied one of his own compositions.

Among the pieces in this really brilliant programme are the "Suite Esclarmonde," by Massenet, and a symphonic poem, "The Sea," by Nicode, for the orchestra, and Schumann's A minor concerto and Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasie," which will be played by Paderewski.

MOTTO:
With a Mission
AND
Without a Muzzle.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 29, 1892.

Seventeenth Symphony.

The audiences at Music Hall during the last five or six concerts have been strangely cold and unresponsive, and not even the unusual excellence of Saturday night's programme and its rendition were sufficient to create any marked degree of enthusiasm. Two of the numbers were old-time favorites — Mendelssohn's overture "Ruy Blas," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"—but the novelties offered to the apparently sated audience were Dvorak's symphony, No. 4, in G major, and "A Prairie Scene in Central Asia," by A. Borodin.

The symphony is the latest composition of that character by Dvorak, and was finished only last year. The first movement begins with a distinctly melancholy theme in G minor, for the 'cellos and horns, which soon develops into a bright motif in G major, in which the flute predominates; a tremendous crescendo by the full orchestra ends the movement. It is a grand movement, and was given with fine effect.

The violins had an opportunity for fine work in the dainty motif of the third movement, with an accompaniment by the flute and clarinet. The finale, opening with the fanfare of the trumpets, attaining a brilliant climax, descending to a pianissimo by the 'cellos and ending with a brilliant coda, was grandly given.

The work by the Russian composer, A. Borodin, is somewhat varied in character, depicting a scene on the sandy steppes of Central Asia, where is heard, amid the silence, the first refrain of a Russian folk song and the sad songs of the Orient, followed by the sound of approaching horses and camels, accompanied by Russian soldiers, fearlessly singing as they pursue their way. The piece is full of sensational effects, arranged in a masterly manner, and required a more than ordinary attention to detail on the part of both conductor and orchestra to make it enjoyable.

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will present Mme. Camilla Urso, the violinist, as the soloist. She will give Bruch's concerto for violin, No. 3, in D minor.

VIVIAN.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 29, 1892.

The Seventeenth Symphony Concert

The programme of the 17th Symphony Concert was: Overture, "Ruy Blas," by Mendelsshon; Symphony No. 4, Dvorak; "A Prairie Scene in Central Asia," by Borodin, and "Les Preludes," by Listz. Dvorak's No. 4 Symphony was played for the first time in America, and, although interesting in so much as it was a novelty, for which we thank Mr. Nikisch, still it was a disappointing work. It is more in the character of a fantasie, having a number of agreeable themes and a clever working-out of orchestral devices. This the listener might expect from so able and practist a hand as Dvorak's. The Allegretto Grazioso, it must be said, is a charming movement. As a symphonic model, clear in development, however, this work will not reflect credit upon its eminent author.

The other novelty, Borodin piece, is a characteristic work, original both in the themes and its delicate orchestral coloring. Its form is clear and everything is simply but beautifully wrought out. It was finely played by the orchestra, the delicacy of the shading being well preserved. The "Ruy Blas" overture was given a spirited performance, although the brass would get in its furious blasts at times, and the much-abused "Les Preludes" of Liszt, with its "won't-go-home-till-morning" tune, was given the benefit of the full draft of the orchestral furnace.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 29, 1892.

The Two Novelties of the Symphony Concert.

The programme of the seventeenth Symphony Concert was as follows: Mendelssohn's overture, "Ruy Blas;" Dvorak's Symphony No. 4 in G major (first time in America); "A prairie scene in Central Asia," by Borodin (first time at these concerts); and Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes."

⁂

Borodin is a composer not utterly unknown in Boston. His first symphony was played under the direction of Mr. Nikisch in January, 1890, and it then provoked much comment. As a musician he was an amateur, an amateur of rare natural gifts and earnest purpose. He was born in St. Petersburg in 1834, and he died in 1886. He studied medicine and chemistry, was an army physician, and finally became a professor at the Imperial Academy of Medicine and Surgery. And he was honored by his Government in various ways. When he was a young man he fell in with Balakireff, who was the centre of the group of the composers of the new Russian school: Cui, Moussorgsky, Rimski-Korsakoff and others. He wrote two symphonies, the "Scene" played last week, some chamber music, including two string quartettes, and a few songs and pianoforte pieces. He left unfinished an opera, "Le Prince Igor;" an opera ballet, "Mlada," and a symphony in A minor.

⁂

We are apt to associate the compositions of the modern Russian school with alcohol and dynamite. We have been warned against revolutionary principles, and we have been told that Russian musical Nihilism included even the rejection of the modern system of tonality. But certainly this "Scene from Central Asia" is neither amorphous nor Nihilistic. On the contrary, it is charming in its form, clearly written, full of an originality that attracts and does not repel. Its melancholy is not lugubrious; its apparent simplicity is never inane or infantile. The themes are characteristic; they are skillfully brought together, and, as Cui has well remarked in speaking of Borodin as a symphonic writer, "he crosses his melodic phrases with remarkable dexterity and with an irreproachable harmonic purity." The instrumentation is masterly. It is so discreet; it is also so full of color. The effects are gained by simple means, but each note, each instrument tells. And when the effect is gained, the composer is satisfied; he does not repeat it and repeat it, as though the hearer were a reluctant juryman. Although it is programme-music, it is eminently sane; Borodin leaves the hearer to his imagination, telling him first his own ideas concerning the music: he does not, however, put a cross under a measure, and say "This is a camel," or "This is the hoof-beat of a horse." If the "descriptive comments" were removed, the music itself would give delight; for as absolute music it is beautiful. It is to be hoped that in due time Mr. Nikisch will give us an opportunity of hearing some of the compositions of Rimski-Korsakoff, Balakireff and Glazounoff.

⁂

Dvorak's Symphony No. 4 in G was first played in Prague Feb. 2, 1890, under the direction of the composer and from the manuscript. It is, upon the whole, a disappointing work. It is true that there are a few pleasing themes, and the instrumentation is at times ingenious. But we have a right to demand something more than prettiness and clever instrumentation, when Dvorak offers to the world a symphony. The pedagogue might say with some justice to the composer, "I asked for a symphony and you gave me a suite." The amateur might also say, "Yes, that is a good tune in the finale, but it seems to me that I have heard it before; and as for the whole work it is not unlike a potpourri in which Bohemian folk-songs are contrasted with Bohemian dances. The second movement, I frankly admit, is unintelligible to me." Now it is possible, indeed probable, that neither of these two judgments is final, but there is truth in each. The first movement is curiously constructed, and as though Dvorak were hurried in the making of it; the adagio is perhaps "deep," and it is undeniably dull; the third movement is thoroughly delightful from beginning to end; and the bustle of the finale is dangerously near vulgarity. As a whole, the symphony will not add to the fame of the composer.

⁂

The "Ruy Blas" overture was well played, with the exception of an occasional lack of precision in the attack of the brass; and the symphony and the "Sketch" were finely played in spite of the horn-wabbling in the former. But is it not about time that Liszt's "Preludes" should be refused admission to our symphony concert hall, or at least admitted only once in ten years, and then as a shocking example? Its gilt is tarnished, its lace is tattered, its plume is broken. Time has turned its ornaments into derision; the stuff of its indispensable clothing is shoddy and through the gaping holes is seen a meagre, wretchedly nourished body.

⁂

The sixth concert of the Kneisel Quartette series will take place Monday evening, March 7. Mme. Amalie Joachim will be the soloist. The opening number of the programme will be a quartette in E minor, by Ottaka Novacek, a viola player in the Symphony Orchestra. The other numbers will be Beethoven's variations from quartette, A major, op. 18, and quartette, E flat, op. 74.

The concert announced to be given by Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch and Master Fiedemann in Chickering Hall next Wednesday night is postponed until the evening of March 10.

The programme for the eighteenth public rehearsal next Friday afternoon, and concert next Saturday night, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, is: Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Hamlet," first time: Bruch, third concerto for violin, the first time; Mrs. Camilla Urso, solo, violin; Schumann, fourth symphony, first time, with the original version.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 28, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

Dvorak's latest symphony, and "A prairie scene in Central Asia," by Borodin, were the principal features of the seventeenth Symphony rehearsal and concert. The symphony is Dvorak's fourth, and was completed last year. Richter produced it at his concerts in Vienna and London, where it is said to have been warmly received. The word symphony arouses great expectations in the mind of the musician. It is difficult to get rid of the idea that a work bearing that name must be as elaborate in form and as weighty in matter as are the typical works of Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms. From this point of view this new symphony in G minor is disappointing. Neither in matter nor scope does it seem important enough to deserve so high sounding a title. As a whole it appears to be an attempt to lend new interest to the symphonic form by the avoidance of extended development, and by the introduction of rhythms and a general style of treatment that are associated with the orchestral suite. The work also shows a decided falling off on the part of Dvorak as a composer, when his D minor symphony is recalled. Nevertheless, it is in many respects very interesting; and not the least of its merits is that it is of reasonable length. The first theme of the opening allegro con brio given out by the 'cellos and horns makes an impressive beginning and suggests many possibilities of treatment. A lively episodic passage in the major and the second theme in the minor are well contrasted and all three are ingeniously if somewhat sparsely and conventionally developed, while the orchestral coloring is warm and varied. The adagio has a more pronounced vein of originality. Its two strongly opposing themes are treated with much skill and consistency, and the instrumental effects, which are largely confined to the wind, are well calculated to emphasize the intent of the movement. The allegretto grazioso, with its fascinating and unexpected rhythmical effects, suggestive of a valse melancholic, its charming modulations and odd orchestration is very attractive. The finale, which opens with a fanfare, is in strength and interest about on a level with the first movement. The symphony was effectively read and played, the two middle movements winning hearty applause.

The Borodin orchestral "scene" is intended to describe the passage of a caravan across the desert. It is programme music of a very realistic kind. The melancholy Russian folk-song is the key-note of this picture of monotony and desolation; and the orchestral devices employed to suggest the approach of the caravan, the tramp of the horses, the presence of the military escort, are those of a master of the modern orchestra. The scene was well played, and was thoroughly appreciated. The opening and closing numbers were Mendelssohn's overture to "Ruy Blas," and Liszt's "Les Preludes," both of which familiar works were performed in an exceedingly brilliant manner.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch give a recital at Chickering Hall on Thursday, March 10. Master Alexander Fiedermann, the young violinist, will make his Boston debut at this recital. Seats on sale at Music Hall.

De Pachmann's recital at Chickering Hall, Saturday, March 5, will be his last appearance in Boston this season. The programme is a "request," and contains many favorite numbers by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Chopin, Henselt and Liszt. Tickets at Music Hall.

The sixth concert by the Kneisel Quartet will be given in Music Hall March 7. Mme. Amalie Joachim is to be the soloist.

The extra concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given Wednesday, March 2, is for the benefit of the members of the orchestra, a body of gentlemen who are deserving for their faithfulness and skillfulness. In recognition of their merits, Paderewski, has offered his services on this occasion, and will play Schumann's A minor concerto with the orchestra and Liszt's Hungarian fantasie for a solo number. Two of the orchestral numbers are to be heard here for the first time, they are the suite "Esclarmonde," by Massenet, and a symphonic poem, "The Sea," by Nicode. It will be a concert of rare attractiveness. Seats can be secured at Music Hall.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 28, 1892.

SEVENTEENTH SYMPHONY.

Mendelssohn, Dvorak, Borodin and Liszt on the Programme.

Music Hall was crowded Friday afternoon at the 17th rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra. There was not much enthusiasm on the part of the audience, but the performance, as a whole, was good, and the performance of the several numbers on the programme was marked by considerable technical care. The audience at last night's concert was equally as large and was much more cordial in expressing approval of Mr. Nikisch's offerings.

The programme embraces the names of Mendelssohn, Dvorak, Borodin and Liszt, and the selections were at once classical and popular.

The "Ruy Blas" overture by Mendelssohn, and "Les Preludes" by Liszt, were without question the successful numbers. The "Ruy Blas" overture was well received and finely played by the orchestra.

The Dvorak symphony No. 4, in G major, was new, and, therefore, did not evoke as much applause as the notable work preceding it, with its grand opening chords, its magnificent allegro, and its passionate cantabelle, all so well known.

Yet the Dvorak symphony was a grand effort, and each movement was characterized by marked care.

The fortissimo cresendo, in the first movement, was a splendid bit of musical effect, so, also, was the coda in G major in the third movement. The finale was given grandly from the faufare of trumpets to the pianissimo by the cellos, and the symphony, as a whole, was warmly applauded.

The Borodin number, "A Prairie Scene in Central Asia," with its sensational effects, was well received.

The success of the concert was the Lizst number "Les Preludes." Both orchestra and audience warmed to this selection, and at the close it was greeted with merited applause.

The piece is full of weird poetry, musical effect, changing rapidly from grave to gay, and charming the ear at every step. The allegro animato violins and trumpets is a fitting finale to this powerful work, and the audience evinced its pleasure by generous applause. There was no lack of attention to "Les Preludes."

The programme for the 18th rehearsal and concert will be as follows:

Symphonic poem, Hamlet.......... Tschaikowsky
First time.
Concerto for violin, No. 3, in D minor...... Bruch
Soloist, Mme. Camilla Urso. First time.
Symphony No. 4, in D minor.......... Schumann
First performance in Boston of the original version.

Extra Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give an extra concert on Wednesday, March 2, at Music Hall—a benefit for the members of this famous organization, whose meritorious work has given unalloyed pleasure to thousands and made this city famous wherever music is appreciated. They deserve well, and their services for art are worthy of the warmest recognition as well as praise.

Paderewski's appearance at this concert is a voluntary offering in compliment to the superiority of the orchestra's work and an expression of his appreciation of the manner in which it accompanied one of his own compositions.

Among the pieces in this really brilliant programme are the "Suite Esclarmonde," by Massenet, and a symphonic poem, "The Sea," by Nicode, for the orchestra, and Schumann's A minor concerto and Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasie," which will be played by Paderewski.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 29, 1892.

The Seventeenth Symphony Concert.

The programme of the 17th Symphony Concert was: Overture, "Ruy Blas," by Mendelsshon; Symphony No. 4, Dvorak; "A Prairie Scene in Central Asia," by Borodin, and "Les Preludes," by Listz. Dvorak's No. 4 Symphony was played for the first time in America, and, although interesting in so much as it was a novelty, for which we thank Mr. Nikisch, still it was a disappointing work. It is more in the character of a fantasie, having a number of agreeable themes and a clever working-out of orchestral devices. This the listener might expect from so able and practist a hand as Dvorak's. The Allegretto Grazioso, it must be said, is a charming movement. As a symphonic model, clear in development, however, this work will not reflect credit upon its eminent author.

The other novelty, Borodin piece, is a characteristic work, original both in the themes and its delicate orchestral coloring. Its form is clear and everything is simply but beautifully wrought out. It was finely played by the orchestra, the delicacy of the shading being well preserved. The "Ruy Blas" overture was given a spirited performance, although the brass would get in its furious blasts at times, and the much-abused "Les Preludes" of Liszt with its "won't-go-home-till-morning" tune, was given the benefit of the full draft of the orchestral furnace.

Boston Post

MOTTO:
With a Mission
—AND—
Without a Muzzle.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 29, 1892.

Seventeenth Symphony.

The audiences at Music Hall during the last five or six concerts have been strangely cold and unresponsive, and not even the unusual excellence of Saturday night's programme and its rendition were sufficient to create any marked degree of enthusiasm. Two of the numbers were old-time favorites — Mendelssohn's overture "Ruy Blas," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"—but the novelties offered to the apparently sated audience were Dvorak's symphony, No. 4, in G major, and "A Prairie Scene in Central Asia," by A. Borodin.

The symphony is the latest composition of that character by Dvorak, and was finished only last year. The first movement begins with a distinctly melancholy theme in G minor, for the 'cellos and horns, which soon develops into a bright motif in G major, in which the flute predominates; a tremendous crescendo by the full orchestra ends the movement. It is a grand movement, and was given with fine effect.

The violins had an opportunity for fine work in the dainty motif of the third movement, with an accompaniment by the flute and clarinet. The finale, opening with the fanfare of the trumpets, attaining a brilliant climax, descending to a pianissimo by the 'cellos and ending with a brilliant coda, was grandly given.

The work by the Russian composer, A. Borodin, is somewhat varied in character, depicting a scene on the sandy steppes of Central Asia, where is heard, amid the silence, the first refrain of a Russian folk song and the sad songs of the Orient, followed by the sound of approaching horses and camels, accompanied by Russian soldiers, fearlessly singing as they pursue their way. The piece is full of sensational effects, arranged in a masterly manner, and required a more than ordinary attention to detail on the part of both conductor and orchestra to make it enjoyable.

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will present Mme. Camilla Urso, the violinist, as the soloist. She will give Bruch's concerto for violin, No. 3, in D minor.

VIVIAN.

American Art Journal.

SUPPLEMENT.

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 27, 1892.

SIXTEENTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT—SHERWOOD'S WELCOME AND BUSONI'S SUITE.

The week of February 15–20 is memorable for its illustrations of Young America in music. Resident names were to be seen on many programs, both as performers and composers. At the Symphony Concerts it was refreshing and encouraging to witness the first production of a work by one who has cast his lot among us. I refer to Ferrucio Benvenuto (welcome, indeed!) Busoni, of the New England Conservatory, a gentleman not yet twenty-six years old, having been born at Empoli, near Florence, in 1866; though as he belongs to a musical family, he came before the public as early as 1873, and began composing in his eighth year.

The Symphonic suite, op. 25, played at this concert, was written in 1884, when Busoni was only eighteen. Of its five movements, the Prelude and Intermezzo were omitted, Mr. Nikisch directing the other three. It is a composition full of quaint beauty. If not strikingly original, you cannot think whence come the melodic echoes and the unexpected terminations are wholly the composer's own. The orchestration is both rich and graphic. Here is the analysis, published with Mr. Busoni's approval:

The Gigue is a vivacious contrapuntal dance, moving in triplets, and inspired by the similarly designated masterpieces of Bach and Händel, yet expanded into broader form, lifted into orchestral significance, and worked out in more modern fashion. The sprightly theme in A-minor, first announced by the viola and then imitated by the violins, is in both instances interrupted by dissonant chords from the wood-wind. After the same rhythmic theme has been taken up by the flute, and in like manner imitated by the other wind instruments, the movement proceeds uninterruptedly in light, graceful, vivacious interweaving of harmonies. Toward the end this appears to flag a little, but takes new energy, and, buoyed up by a softly beginning but continually increasing organ point, rises to a brilliant finale.

Gavotte.—The principal motive, melancholy in character and in D-minor, is breathed forth by the oboe, with a simple accompaniment of the strings, and is taken up by the flute, oboe and violins at the end of the first part, and brought to a conclusion. A pastoral trio—a quiet fanfare of horns, alternately interrupted by oboes, clarinets and flutes—introduces the major key, and at the same time a more cheerful sentiment, into the movement, which, after a repetition of the first part, dies away gently in the basses.

Allegro fugato.—This movement, laid out on the broadest lines of all the five, begins with an energetic theme in unison, given out by the strings, supported by staccato chords, enunciated by the brass; but this theme further on develops into a second motive (first uttered by the oboes) which is worked out in a short interlude, but which, with the appearance of the first theme, is temporarily dropped. Meanwhile this passage, in a lively crescendo, the strings in unison against the brass, mounts to a fine climax, and brings the first part (C major) to a conclusion. The second theme finds its full significance only in the second part, where it finally joins with the first in artistic contrapuntal union. The second part, likewise, loses itself in a wondering question put by the wood-wind, to which, assuredly, as an answer, the working out of the idea, with the inversion of the theme (motive in contrary motion) begins and leads back in continual crescendo to the first unison passage of the strings, and brings the piece to a conclusion. In this movement alone trombones are employed; while in the entire suite three trumpets (instead of the customary two) are in constant use, and, moreover, piccolos, English horn, bass clarinet, triangle, and cymbals are occasionally brought into requisition.

W. H. Sherwood was heartily welcomed, not having been heard in his old home since last winter. His performance of Raff's G-minor Concerto, op. 185, was masterly, especially in the complicated final movement, and he received no less than five recalls. This concerto was first heard in Boston at a Symphony Concert eight years ago, with Faelten at the piano.

The other numbers at this present concert were the Huldigung March, which Wagner wrote for a military band in 1864; and Mozart's great G-minor Symphony, Mr. Nikisch taking the Minuet at a very rapid pace. This work was first played in Boston over forty years ago, when the Musical Fund Society was giving concerts which did much to bring about our present era of musical development, though the Society failed in its immediate purpose, much to the regret of many music-lovers, including your correspondent, who chanced to be one of its associate members.

Clipping from Brooklyn N.Y.

Date [illegible]

A Musical Stir.

Repose is one of the final charms of art. The Seidl society should cultivate repose. The restless sensitiveness which is exhibited by somebody in its behalf is an injustice to itself. Anxiety as to what other organizations or individuals are doing or are about to do implies a lack of confidence in its own standing and success for which there is no warrant whatever. Why should the society feel doubtful as to what it has accomplished? Apart from its incidental philanthropic work, it has done a good deal for music in this city. It has given impulse and permanence to the orchestra at the beach. It has provided excellent concerts at the Academy of Music. It has taken special local charge of the Wagner cult and has been true to the trust. At the same time it has given a hospitable hearing to other composers. It gave the first extended performance of "Parsifal" in this country two years ago, thereby illustrating skill and liberality in management. It has furnished opportunities for and strengthened the position of that admirable conductor, Mr. Anton Seidl. There is certainly no reason why he should not be content with his place in musical affairs. If he had any doubt of the general regard—as he probably had not—it must have been removed by his fine reception a week ago at the Metropolitan opera house. There is really no cause for nervousness on the part of the Seidl society. If it were not suffering from something like prostration of this sort it could scarcely have been imposed upon by the absurd rumors of the last few days. Knowledge of antecedent facts and a very little reflection on them should have quieted all alarm. In the first place it is said that the Philharmonic directors are moving heaven and earth to promote the interests of Mr. Arthur Nikisch next season. Now it is well known that the Philharmonic society practically abandoned the field last year. While the directors thought so well of Mr. Nikisch and the Boston orchestra that they readily gave the concerts their good will and the indorsement of the Philharmonic name, they wholly surrendered active control. The concerts are solely the private venture of the managers of the conductor and his band. If the Philharmonic directors have done anything whatever to help along the Nikisch enterprise, beyond the nominal countenance already mentioned, the Nikisch enterprise is entirely unaware of it. The directors have observed an absolute impartiality between the two sets of concerts and have heroically abstained from extending any help whatever to their successor. The old subscribers might not have complained if some timely and perhaps useful hints had been offered to the new men by those who had so long controlled the Philharmonic society, but there is no sign of such suggestions. It was therefore altogether improbable that the directors would concern themselves about the organization of the Nikisch future. But if they should do so the notion, in the second place, that they would turn it over to the Brooklyn institute of arts and sciences, is too nonsensical for serious consideration. Whatever the institute has to do with music must be from the scientific, abstract point of view. It may provide lectures and classes in the history, nature, schools, principles and other general features of the art, but the management of orchestral concerts is wholly outside of its purpose and jurisdiction. It might as well be insisted that because it has a literary department it should maintain a book publishing house, or because it supplies lectures on dramatic authors it should conduct a theater, or because papers on Roman amusements and customs are read before its members it should run a circus. The Philharmonic directors, while interested in music and other interests of cultivation, have been intelligent men of business and it is not to be supposed that they would entertain so preposterous a scheme as is attributed to them. In the third place, while Mr. Nikisch and his associates are entirely able to take care of their own affairs, so are Mr Seidl and those connected with him. The Boston orchestra concerts have been so well received that, until the recent talk, nobody supposed that there was any doubt that Mr. Nikisch would renew his visits next season. The popular favor which Mr. Seidl has secured is beyond question and if he has not yet secured the opera field in New York he is pretty sure of his Brooklyn harvest. It would be a good thing for the rumor makers and meddlers to let both societies, the Seidl and the Philharmonic, both conductors and both sets of concerts, alone. Either side has contributed to the enjoyment of music lovers. There is room for each. The absurdities of the gossips are fittingly crowned by the statement, revived from time to time, that that well known and busy man of letters, Colonel Thomas W. Higginson, is the backer and owner of the Boston orchestra. The attempt to raise a local issue in the case is ill advised. It has not as much justification even as a trades union protest against the employ[illegible] establish a factory wherein should be manufactured the finest velvet in the world, the article undoubtedly would be sold in our shops. In the meantime, it is idle to protest against the importation of velvet from Lyons. When a permanent orchestra equal to the Boston band—by the common consent of experts the best on the continent—is formed in this city it will have a hearing and the preference here. Just now it is not well to discourage its coming. The late musical stir will soon be forgotten and we shall all be able to unite in the acclaim: Success to the Philharmonic and Seidl societies. Hail Arthur and Anton. May the Institute of arts and sciences live forever.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, MARCH 1, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give an extra concert at the Music Hall, tomorrow night, the proceeds of which will be divided among the members of the band. Mr. Paderewski will be heard, his appearance being a voluntary testimony on his part to his appreciation of the high merits of the orchestra. He will play Schumann's concerto and a Hungarian fantasy by Liszt. The orchestral works promised are these: Overture to "Tannhäuser," Wagner; suite from "Esclarmonde," Massenet; andantino and scherzo from the fourth symphony, Tschaikowsky. Mrs. Wyman will sing a group of songs, and Mr. Schroeder will play a group of solos for violoncello.

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2, 1892.

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERT.

In Music Hall to-night the Symphony Orchestra will appear in an extra concert which is for the benefit of its members. Mr. Paderewski appears twice during the evening. Mrs. Julie L. Wyman is to sing, and there will be two orchestral numbers entirely new to this public. The following is the programme: Overture, "Tannhaeuser," Wagner; concerto for pianoforte in A minor, Schumann; suite from "Esclarmonde," Massenet (first time); soli for violoncello, a. Sarabande, Bach; b. Moment musicale, Schubert; c. At the Fountain, Davidoff, Mr. Schroeder; Andantino and Scherzo, from the symphony in F minor, No. 4, Tschaikowsky; songs with piano, a. "Regrets," Delibes; b. "Bonne Nuit," Massenet; c. "A une Fiancee," Ferrari; Hungarian Fantasie for pianoforte and orchestra, Liszt.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, MAR. 2, 1892.

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

To-night, for the first time in its history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to have a benefit concert, and it will be a benefit to every listener. Mme. Julia L. Wyman has volunteered her services, and so has Paderewski. Each will appear in choice selections from their varied repertory, and two compositions, new to Bostonians, will be played by the orchestra.

Boston Post

MOTTO:

With a Mission

—AND—

Without a Muzzle.

THURSDAY MORNING, MAR. 3, 1892.

The benefit concert given in Music Hall last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra surpassed in brilliancy any similar entertainment of the season. The hall was completely filled with women in gay attire and well-dressed men, and even the stage partook of the general air of festivity, for the small platform and stand belonging to Mr. Nikisch were artistically trimmed with festoons of green, with a bunch of flowers attached to the stand by a broad pink ribbon. A similar bunch of flowers, also tied with pink, was laid upon the piano. On the upper corners of all the other music racks were small posies tied with red ribbon, making charming bits of color among the black coats of the musicians, who fairly outdid themselves all through the evening.

The programme was of unusual length for a symphony concert, and of unusual excellence, containing Wagner's overture, "Tannhaeuser"; Schumann's concerto for pianoforte in A minor; Massenet's Suite from "Esclarmonde"; Bach's "Larabande," Schubert's "Moment Musical," Davidoff's "At the Fountain," for 'cello; the andantino and scherzo from the symphony in F minor, No. 4; Delibes' "Regrets," Massenet's "Bonne Nuit," Ferran's "A une Fiancee," for contralto; Liszt's Hungarian Fantasie for pianforte and orchestra.

Mrs. Julie L. Wyman and Mr. Alwin Schroeder were heartily received and well applauded for the admirable rendition of their solos, but the wildest enthusiasm was bestowed upon Paderewski, who received a more substantial token of appreciation in the form of a silver laurel wreath of exquisite workmanship, accompanied by a silver plate bearing the inscription: "From the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with gratitude and regards. March 2, 1892." Mr. Nikisch was also remembered by the members with a handsome French clock.

At the close of the performance, enthusiasm reached the point of cheers and bravos, and both Paderewski and Mr. Nikisch were recalled many times.

Music Notices.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, MAR. 3, 1892.

The Extra Symphony Concert.

The musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have had a benefit. Just why they should be the recipients of beneficence is not altogether clear, but the programme which they gave in Music Hall last night was long enough to atone for the fact that they had not had an eleemosynary occasion before. But every part of it was so interesting that one may not find fault with the fact that it extended a full hour beyond the customary limits. The programme began with the "Tannhæuser" overture, which was brilliantly given, although it has had had even better performances in this city.

Then came Paderewski, who certainly was responsible for a large part of the great attendance, and played the A minor concerto by Schumann in a glorious manner, and one can also, in this case, extend the adjective to orchestra and conductor, for the ensemble was excellent. This concerto is is one of the masterpieces of its form, and may readily rank with even the best of Beethoven's concertos, the G major and the "Emperor." Is it necessary, at this late day, to say that Paderewski received an ovation? Rather let me state that he never deserved it more, for he proved himself in this work the true poet of the piano, and once more all his great technique was subjugated to the interpretation of the composer's intention, individuality was kept entirely in the background, and this must be a rather difficult task for a so much beworshipped individual. Only at the end could hypercriticism demand a trifle more of sustained power and less of vehemence.

After the work a very quiet presentation took place on the stage, and Mr. Kneisel, on behalf, presumably, of the orchestra, handed the artist a silver laurel wreath. The encore fiend took advantage of this to demand more, a demand which should never have been acceded to, for, after so great a performance, even another Schumann work came as an anticlimax.

The orchestral suite from Massenet's "Esclarmonde" is only a pasticcio, made up from instrumental numbers of the opera, and not half so attractive as Bizet's "Suite Arlesienne," which arose in almost a similar manner. It is altogether a motley affair; the "Magic Isle" presented some good work on the woodwind, of the "horns of elf land" type, the "pastorale" had plenty of English horn pipings, and the "chase" was as weird and uncanny as could be desired, but the "Hyménée," particularly to those who know its position in the opera, was the extreme of erotic music, and its sensuous measures can scarcely please thinking musicians. The suite was well played.

Mr. Alwyn Schroeder's solos on the cello were beautifully played, the flexibility displayed in Davidoff's "At the Fountain" being an evidence of the great virtuosity of the performer. In popular concerts virtuosity is its own reward, and the player received hearty recalls.

Two specimens of Russian melancholia, in the shape of two movements from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, followed, and contained some fine English horn and flute work. Mrs. Julie L. Wyman is the best singer of French chansons that we have among us at present, and her three numbers were altogether delightful, especially the tender "Bonne Nuit," which evoked a tumult of applause. But the keystone of the arch was placed by Paderewski with a performance of Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasie," that was more than fiery—it was an entire conflagration! The orchestra seconded this nobly, and Mr. Nikisch seemed quite in his element in the caprice and dash of the performance. Then came a whirlwind of applause which finally tapered down into the stolid clappings of those intent upon an encore. Mr. Paderewski skilfully balked this by shaking hands most effusively with the conductor, and at each recall, and there was a most persistent clapping, which brought forth Mr. Nikisch and the pair bowed as if they were musical Siamese twins. Mr. Nikisch has not received so much applause at any previous concert in Boston.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2, 1892.

In the extra concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall tonight, the proceeds of which will be divided among the members of the band, Mr. Paderewski will be heard, his appearance being a voluntary contribution in testimony to his appreciation of the high merits of the orchestra. He will play Schumann's concerto and an Hungarian fantasy by Liszt. The orchestral works promised are these: Overture to "Tannhäuser," Wagner; suite from "Esclarmonde," Massenet; andantino and scherzo from the fourth symphony, Tschaikowski. Mrs. Wyman will sing a group of songs, and Mr. Schroeder will play a group of solos for violoncello.

[137]

American Art Journal.

SUPPLEMENT.

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 27, 1892.

SIXTEENTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT—SHERWOOD'S WELCOME AND BUSONI'S SUITE.

The week of February 15–20 is memorable for its illustrations of Young America in music. Resident names were to be seen on many programs, both as performers and composers. At the Symphony Concerts it was refreshing and encouraging to witness the first production of a work by one who has cast his lot among us. I refer to Ferrucio Benvenuto (welcome, indeed !) Busoni, of the New England Conservatory, a gentleman not yet twenty-six years old, having been born at Empoli, near Florence, in 1866; though as he belongs to a musical family, he came before the public as early as 1873, and began composing in his eighth year.

The Symphonic suite, op. 25, played at this concert, was written in 1884, when Busoni was only eighteen. Of its five movements, the Prelude and Intermezzo were omitted, Mr. Nikisch directing the other three. It is a composition full of quaint beauty. If not strikingly original, you cannot think whence come the melodic echoes and the unexpected terminations are wholly the composer's own. The orchestration is both rich and graphic. Here is the analysis, published with Mr. Busoni's approval :

The Gigue is a vivacious contrapuntal dance, moving in triplets, and inspired by the similarly designated masterpieces of Bach and Händel, yet expanded into broader form, lifted into orchestral significance, and worked out in more modern fashion. The sprightly theme in A-minor, first announced by the viola and then imitated by the violins, is in both instances interrupted by dissonant chords from the wood-wind. After the same rhythmic theme has been taken up by the flute, and in like manner imitated by the other wind instruments, the movement proceeds uninterruptedly in light, graceful, vivacious interweaving of harmonies. Toward the end this appears to flag a little, but takes new energy, and, buoyed up by a softly beginning but continually increasing organ point, rises to a brilliant finale.

Gavotte.—The principal motive, melancholy in character and in D-minor, is breathed forth by the oboe, with a simple accompaniment of the strings, and is taken up by the flute, oboe and violins at the end of the first part, and brought to a conclusion. A pastoral trio—a quiet fanfare of horns, alternately interrupted by oboes, clarinets and flutes—introduces the major key, and at the same time a more cheerful sentiment, into the movement, which, after a repetition of the first part, dies away gently in the basses.

Allegro fugato.—This movement, laid out on the broadest lines of all the five, begins with an energetic theme in unison, given out by the strings, supported by staccato chords, enunciated by the brass ; but this theme further on develops into a second motive (first uttered by the oboes) which is worked out in a short interlude, but which, with the appearance of the first theme, is temporarily dropped. Meanwhile this passage, in a lively crescendo, the strings in unison against the brass, mounts to a fine climax, and brings the first part (C major) to a conclusion. The second theme finds its full significance only in the second part, where it finally joins with the first in artistic contrapuntal union. The second part, likewise, loses itself in a wondering question put by the wood-wind, to which, assuredly, as an answer, the working out of the idea, with the inversion of the theme (motive in contrary motion) begins and leads back in continual crescendo to the first unison passage of the strings, and brings the piece to a conclusion. In this movement alone trombones are employed ; while in the entire suite three trumpets (instead of the customary two) are in constant use, and, moreover, piccolos, English horn, bass clarinet, triangle, and cymbals are occasionally brought into requisition.

W. H. Sherwood was heartily welcomed, not having been heard in his old home since last winter. His performance of Raff's G-minor Concerto, op. 185, was masterly, especially in the complicated final movement, and he received no less than five recalls. This concerto was first heard in Boston at a Symphony Concert eight years ago, with Faelten at the piano.

The other numbers at this present concert were the Huldigung March, which Wagner wrote for a military band in 1864; and Mozart's great G-minor Symphony, Mr. Nikisch taking the Minuet at a very rapid pace. This work was first played in Boston over forty years ago, when the Musical Fund Society was giving concerts which did much to bring about our present era of musical development, though the Society failed in its immediate purpose, much to the regret of many music-lovers, including your correspondent, who chanced to be one of its associate members.

Clipping from Eagle
Brooklyn N.Y.

Date 2-26

A Musical Stir.

Repose is one of the final charms of art. The Seidl society should cultivate repose. The restless sensitiveness which is exhibited by somebody in its behalf is an injustice to itself. Anxiety as to what other organizations or individuals are doing or are about to do implies a lack of confidence in its own standing and success for which there is no warrant whatever. Why should the society feel doubtful as to what it has accomplished? Apart from its incidental philanthropic work, it has done a good deal for music in this city. It has given impulse and permanence to the orchestra at the beach. It has provided excellent concerts at the Academy of Music. It has taken special local charge of the Wagner cult and has been true to the trust. At the same time it has given a hospitable hearing to other composers. It gave the first extended performance of "Parsifal" in this country two years ago, thereby illustrating skill and liberality in management. It has furnished opportunities for and strengthened the position of that admirable conductor, Mr. Anton Seidl. There is certainly no reason why he should not be content with his place in musical affairs. If he had any doubt of the general regard—as he probably had not—it must have been removed by his fine reception a week ago at the Metropolitan opera house. There is really no cause for nervousness on the part of the Seidl society. If it were not suffering from something like prostration of this sort it could scarcely have been imposed upon by the absurd rumors of the last few days. Knowledge of antecedent facts and a very little reflection on them should have quieted all alarm. In the first place it is said that the Philharmonic directors are moving heaven and earth to promote the interests of Mr. Arthur Nikisch next season. Now it is well known that the Philharmonic society practically abandoned the field last year. While the directors thought so well of Mr. Nikisch and the Boston orchestra that they readily gave the concerts their good will and the indorsement of the Philharmonic name, they wholly surrendered active control. The concerts are solely the private venture of the managers of the conductor and his band. If the Philharmonic directors have done anything whatever to help along the Nikisch enterprise, beyond the nominal countenance already mentioned, the Nikisch enterprise is entirely unaware of it. The directors have observed an absolute impartiality between the two sets of concerts and have heroically abstained from extending any help whatever to their successor. The old subscribers might not have complained if some timely and perhaps useful hints had been offered to the new men by those who had so long controlled the Philharmonic society, but there is no sign of such suggestions. It was therefore altogether improbable that the directors would concern themselves about the organization of the Nikisch future. But if they should do so the notion, in the second place, that they would turn it over to the Brooklyn institute of arts and sciences, is too nonsensical for serious consideration. Whatever the institute has to do with music must be from the scientific, abstract point of view. It may provide lectures and classes in the history, nature, schools, principles and other general features of the art, but the management of orchestral concerts is wholly outside of its purpose and jurisdiction. It might as well be insisted that because it has a literary department it should maintain a book publishing house, or because it supplies lectures on dramatic authors it should conduct a theater, or because papers on Roman amusements and customs are read before its members it should run a circus. The Philharmonic directors, while interested in music and other interests of cultivation, have been intelligent men of business and it is not to be supposed that they would entertain so preposterous a scheme as is attributed to them. In the third place, while Mr. Nikisch and his associates are entirely able to take care of their own affairs, so are Mr Seidl and those connected with him. The Boston orchestra concerts have been so well received that, until the recent talk, nobody supposed that there was any doubt that Mr. Nikisch would renew his visits next season. The popular favor which Mr. Seidl has secured is beyond question and if he has not yet secured the opera field in New York he is pretty sure of his Brooklyn harvest. It would be a good thing for the rumor makers and meddlers to let both societies, the Seidl and the Philharmonic, both conductors and both sets of concerts, alone. Either side has contributed to the enjoyment of music lovers. There is room for each. The absurdities of the gossips are fittingly crowned by the statement, revived from time to time, that that well known and busy man of letters, Colonel Thomas W. Higginson, is the backer and owner of the Boston orchestra. The attempt to raise a local issue in the case is ill advised. It has not as much justification even as a trades union protest against the employment of outside bricklayers and carpenters. If, presently, a Brooklyn manufacturer should establish a factory wherein should be manufactured the finest velvet in the world, the article undoubtedly would be sold in our shops. In the meantime, it is idle to protest against the importation of velvet from Lyons. When a permanent orchestra equal to the Boston band—by the common consent of experts the best on the continent—is formed in this city it will have a hearing and the preference here. Just now it is not well to discourage its coming. The late musical stir will soon be forgotten and we shall all be able to unite in the acclaim: Success to the Philharmonic and Seidl societies. Hail Arthur and Anton. May the Institute of arts and sciences live forever.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, MARCH 1, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give an extra concert at the Music Hall, tomorrow night, the proceeds of which will be divided among the members of the band. Mr. Paderewski will be heard, his appearance being a voluntary testimony on his part to his appreciation of the high merits of the orchestra. He will play Schumann's concerto and a Hungarian fantasy by Liszt. The orchestral works promised are these: Overture to "Tannhäuser," Wagner; suite from "Esclarmonde," Massenet; andantino and scherzo from the fourth symphony, Tschaikowsky. Mrs. Wyman will sing a group of songs, and Mr. Schroeder will play a group of solos for violoncello.

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2, 1892.

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERT.

In Music Hall to-night the Symphony Orchestra will appear in an extra concert which is for the benefit of its members. Mr. Paderewski appears twice during the evening. Mrs. Julie L. Wyman is to sing, and there will be two orchestral numbers entirely new to this public. The following is the programme: Overture, "Tannhaeuser," Wagner; concerto for pianoforte in A minor, Schumann; suite from "Esclarmonde," Massenet (first time); soli for violoncello, a, Sarabande, Bach; b, Moment musicale, Schubert; c, At the Fountain, Davidoff, Mr. Schroeder; Andantino and Scherzo, from the symphony in F minor, No. 4, Tschaikowsky; songs with piano, a, "Regrets," Delibes; b, "Bonne Nuit," Massenet; c, "A une Fiancee," Ferrari; Hungarian Fantasie for pianoforte and orchestra, Liszt.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, MAR. 2, 1892.

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

To-night, for the first time in its history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to have a benefit concert, and it will be a benefit to every listener. Mme. Julia L. Wyman has volunteered her services, and so has Paderewski. Each will appear in choice selections from their varied repertory, and two compositions, new to Bostonians, will be played by the orchestra.

Boston Post

MOTTO:
With a Mission
—AND—
Without a Muzzle.

THURSDAY MORNING, MAR. 3, 1892.

The benefit concert given in Music Hall last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra surpassed in brilliancy any similar entertainment of the season. The hall was completely filled with women in gay attire and well-dressed men, and even the stage partook of the general air of festivity, for the small platform and stand belonging to Mr. Nikisch were artistically trimmed with festoons of green, with a bunch of flowers attached to the stand by a broad pink ribbon. A similar bunch of flowers, also tied with pink, was laid upon the piano. On the upper corners of all the other music racks were small posies tied with red ribbon, making charming bits of color among the black coats of the musicians, who fairly outdid themselves all through the evening.

The programme was of unusual length for a symphony concert, and of unusual excellence, containing Wagner's overture, "Tannhaeuser"; Schumann's concerto for pianoforte in A minor; Massenet's Suite from "Esclarmonde"; Bach's "Larabande," Schubert's "Moment Musical," Davidoff's "At the Fountain," for 'cello; the andantino and scherzo from the symphony in F minor, No. 4; Delibes' "Regrets," Massenet's "Bonne Nuit," Ferran's "A une Fiancee," for contralto; Liszt's Hungarian Fantasie for pianforte and orchestra.

Mrs. Julie L. Wyman and Mr. Alwin Schroeder were heartily received and well applauded for the admirable rendition of their solos, but the wildest enthusiasm was bestowed upon Paderewski, who received a more substantial token of appreciation in the form of a silver laurel wreath of exquisite workmanship, accompanied by a silver plate bearing the inscription: "From the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with gratitude and regards. March 2, 1892." Mr. Nikisch was also remembered by the members with a handsome French clock.

At the close of the performance, enthusiasm reached the point of cheers and bravos, and both Paderewski and Mr. Nikisch were recalled many times.

Music Notices.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, MAR. 3, 1892.

The Extra Symphony Concert.

The musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have had a benefit. Just why they should be the recipients of beneficence is not altogether clear, but the programme which they gave in Music Hall last night was long enough to atone for the fact that they had not had an eleemosynary occasion before. But every part of it was so interesting that one may not find fault with the fact that it extended a full hour beyond the customary limits. The programme began with the "Tannhæuser" overture, which was brilliantly given, although it has had had even better performances in this city.

Then came Paderewski, who certainly was responsible for a large part of the great attendance, and played the A minor concerto by Schumann in a glorious manner, and one can also, in this case, extend the adjective to orchestra and conductor, for the ensemble was excellent. This concerto is is one of the masterpieces of its form, and may readily rank with even the best of Beethoven's concertos, the G major and the "Emperor." Is it necessary, at this late day, to say that Paderewski received an ovation? Rather let me state that he never deserved it more, for he proved himself in this work the true poet of the piano, and once more all his great technique was subjugated to the interpretation of the composer's intention, individuality was kept entirely in the background, and this must be a rather difficult task for a so much beworshipped individual. Only at the end could hypercriticism demand a trifle more of sustained power and less of vehemence.

After the work a very quiet presentation took place on the stage, and Mr. Kneisel, on behalf, presumably, of the orchestra, handed the artist a silver laurel wreath. The encore fiend took advantage of this to demand more, a demand which should never have been acceded to, for, after so great a performance, even another Schumann work came as an anticlimax.

The orchestral suite from Massenet's "Esclarmonde" is only a pasticcio, made up from instrumental numbers of the opera, and not half so attractive as Bizet's "Suite Arlesienne," which arose in almost a similar manner. It is altogether a motley affair; the "Magic Isle" presented some good work on the woodwind, of the "horns of elf land" type, the "pastorale" had plenty of English horn pipings, and the "chase" was as weird and uncanny as could be desired, but the "Hyménée," particularly to those who know its position in the opera, was the extreme of erotic music, and its sensuous measures can scarcely please thinking musicians. The suite was well played.

Mr. Alwyn Schroeder's solos on the cello were beautifully played, the flexibility displayed in Davidoff's "At the Fountain" being an evidence of the great virtuosity of the performer. In popular concerts virtuosity is its own reward, and the player received hearty recalls.

Two specimens of Russian melancholia, in the shape of two movements from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, followed, and contained some fine English horn and flute work. Mrs. Julie L. Wyman is the best singer of French chansons that we have among us at present, and her three numbers were altogether delightful, especially the tender "Bonne Nuit," which evoked a tumult of applause. But the keystone of the arch was placed by Paderewski with a performance of Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasie," that was more than fiery—it was an entire conflagration! The orchestra seconded this nobly, and Mr. Nikisch seemed quite in his element in the caprice and dash of the performance. Then came a whirlwind of applause which finally tapered down into the stolid clappings of those intent upon an encore. Mr. Paderewski skilfully balked this by shaking hands most effusively with the conductor, and at each recall, and there was a most persistent clapping, which brought forth Mr. Nikisch and the pair bowed as if they were musical Siamese twins. Mr. Nikisch has not received so much applause at any previous concert in Boston.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2, 1892.

In the extra concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall tonight, the proceeds of which will be divided among the members of the band, Mr. Paderewski will be heard, his appearance being a voluntary contribution in testimony to his appreciation of the high merits of the orchestra. He will play Schumann's concerto and an Hungarian fantasy by Liszt. The orchestral works promised are these: Overture to "Tannhäuser," Wagner; suite from "Esclarmonde," Massenet; andantino and scherzo from the fourth symphony, Tschaikowski. Mrs. Wyman will sing a group of songs, and Mr. Schroeder will play a group of solos for violoncello.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, MARCH 3, 1892.

AN EXTRA CONCERT

It Was of Benefit to the Orchestra and the Audience.

A concert was given last evening in Music Hall for the benefit of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, was assisted by Mrs. Julie L. Wyman and Messrs. Paderewski and Schroeder. The three generously offered their services on this occasion. The desks of the leader and the members of the orchestra were ornamented with flowers. There was a very large audience. The programme was as follows: Overture, "Tannhaeuser;" Schumann's pianoforte concerto, A minor; Massenet's suite from "Esclarmonde;" three 'cello numbers: Sarabonde, by Bach; moment musical, by Schubert, and Davidoff's "At the Fountain;" the andantino and the scherzo from Tschaikowsky's symphony, F minor, No. 4; three songs, with pianoforte accompaniment: "Regrets," Delibes; "Bonne Nuit," Massenet, and "A Une Fiancee," Ferrari; Liszt's Hungarian Fantasie for pianoforte and orchestra.

The orchestra was evidently inspired by the occasion; for the performance of the "Tannhaeuser" overture was eminently worthy of the reputation of the organization, and one long to be remembered. The suite by Massenet was played for the first time in Boston. It was arranged by the composer from numbers of the opera, "Esclarmonde," in which Miss Sibyl Sanderson made her debut in Paris and created at the same time the part of the heroine. The arrangement was first played at a Lamoureux concert. While it is in a measure unfair to judge music that was intended for the stage by the concert version, stripped as it is of the accompaniments of scenery, action and all theatrical illusions, it is still possible to say of the concert music, that it is effective or dull, crudely made or cunningly designed. Now the first number of this suite, "Evocation," an appeal by the heroine to the spirits of air, water and fire, seems to be a collection of commonplaces pompously announced with liberal quotations from Wagner. The second, "L' Ile Magique," is, in the opera, used to accompany the movements of a ballet, and there are carefully sought-out effects of color and rhythm rather than any originality of theme. The third, "Hymenee," is played after the curtain has fallen upon the long embrace of the lovers, and it is the most genuine and the most spontaneous music in the suite. The pastorale is the same old pastorale that we have heard in French music so many times, and the fantastic hunting scene belongs to the theatre, and it should be kept there. The instrumentation of "Esclarmonde" was censured at the time of its production and Massenet was accused of introducing two new instruments, Miss Sanderson's voice and the sarrusophone contra bass; this latter instrument was used in Paris in the place of the contra bassoon, although the composer wrote the part for the more familiar instrument.

Mr. Paderewski gave a masterly performance of the concerto. The first movement was taken a little faster than is the custom, but clearness was not sacrificed thereby. He was enthusiastically recalled, and Mr. Kneisel, in behalf of the orchestra, gave him a silvern laurel wreath. There was another enthusiastic scene, and Mr. Paderewski played Schumann's "Des Abends." The Hungarian fantasie was given with true Hungarian spirit, and the pianist was recalled again and again. He modestly divided the popular tribute by leading Mr. Nikisch with him before the audience. Mrs. Wyman and Mr. Schroeder added greatly to the pleasure of the evening by the display of their art.

PHILIP HALE.

DAILY, York, Penn.

Date 3/2

Burmeister.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of seventy five pieces, according to Paderewski, the greatest living pianist, is the finest combination of musicians in the world. Such an aggregation would allow only pianists of the first rank to play with them. We had the pleasure of hearing the orchestra in Baltimore two weeks ago, and found that Prof. Burmeister was the pianist of the occasion. He is an artist with a technique and brilliancy of execution seldom equalled; and we commend him to musical loving people of York, who will be given an opportunity to hear him for themselves on Friday evening.

The first row on the gallery yet remains unsold for the recital and those who are desirous of having them can be accommodated by calling at the dry goods stores of J. T. Kopp and Co. An entertainment of this kind make these seats very desirable, ~~and they~~ can be had at fifty cents each.

Subscribers, who have not had their tickets reserved as yet, can do so at the above mentioned place. Concert, Friday evening March 4, at 8:15 sharp.

EAGLE, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Date 2/28

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

The great attraction of the year will be the appearance of the far-famed Boston Symphony orchestra in Hartman Hall the ~~first week of May~~. Last year they played in University hall, Ann Arbor, to an audience of 5,000, and this year they have secured the extra attraction of Eugen d'Albert, the greatest pianist in the world. Alongside d'Albert Paderewski sinks into insignificance. It is being agitated among some ardent music lovers that the orchestra play a programme composed largely of selections chosen by popular vote of the people of Grand Rapids. This subject will be considered in due time by those who have the matter in charge.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 63.

THURSDAY, MARCH 3, 1892.

Benefit Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave, at Music Hall last evening, the first benefit concert in the history of this organization, and the public responded in the most liberal manner.

It would have been a pleasure to have had the large audience called together to listen to the orchestra alone, so that the tribute paid to its members would have been an unqualified one, and a demonstration of the taste of the public for the music of the organization, aside from any interest in the soloists who assisted.

Doubtless, however, a practical hand had charge of the affair, and the value of soloists in addition to the orchestra was conceded by availing of the services of Paderewski, the pianist, Mr. Alvin Schroeder, 'cello, and Mrs. Wyman, the contralto singer, both of whom are understood to have volunteered for last evening as an evidence of their appreciation of the Boston orchestra.

The programme was such a list of selections as the regular patrons of this season's concerts by the orchestra hear all too seldom, and its enjoyment was universal among those present, if applause can be accepted as evidence on this point.

The orchestra introduced the evening's entertaining numbers by a magnificent performance of the "Tannhauser" overture, adding as its novelty for the occasion Massenet's "Esclarmonde" suite, and giving also the andantino and scherzo from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony. The modern French school of composition finds a very happy illustration in Massenet's pretty suite, and the beautiful tone coloring of its movements was brought out very finely by the performance given the work.

Mr. Paderewski contributed as his first selection the concerto by Schumann in A minor, and ended the programme with a performance of the Hungarian fantasie for pianoforte and orchestra by Liszt, in which his virtuosity fairly dazzled those who heard him.

A half-dozen recalls followed the Schumann concerto, and finally the pianist added another Schumann selection in response to the demands of the audience.

Mrs. Wyman's share in the programme consisted of the songs, a, "Regrets," Delibes; b, "Bonne Nuit," Massenet; c, "A une Fiancee," Ferrari, and a more pleasing choice of numbers could hardly have been made by this great artist. Her singing is at all times a revelation of the beauties of any composition she selects, and the art of vocalization finds in her a perfect interpreter.

Mr. Schroeder, the leader of the 'cello division of the string players, gave a fine exhibition of his skill and taste as a solo player in a "Sarabande," by Bach; the "Moment Musicale," Schubert, and "At the Fountain," by Davidoff.

The concert was in every way a credit to the orchestra, its conductor, and the assisting artists, and it is to be hoped that similar programmes may be possible for future concerts in the regular series.

Two presentations were added to the events of the evening announced on the programme. The first consisted of an elegant laurel wreath in silver, given by the orchestra to Mr. Paderewski as a token of the "admiration and gratitude" of the members. The second, an elegant gilt mantel clock in the old French style, presented by the members of the orchestra to Mr. Nikisch also as a token of the "admiration and gratitude" of the members to their conductor. A kind friend also decorated the conductor's stand and all the orchestra desks with flowers in honor of the occasion.

NEWS, Providence, R. I.

Date 3/1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From the standpoint of the lover of the deeper music that appeals alike to the intellect and the emotions—such as that of Beethoven or Wagner—last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be only partially satisfying, but for the broadly cultivated musician, who wishes to hear all the varieties of style, and for the musical diletante who loves music for music's sake alone, the program could not have been bettered. It is a great source of credit to Mr. Nikisch that he almost always devotes a portion of his evening to some new work, thus keeping his hearers abreast of the musical development of the period, and at the same tims showing by his reading of the scores that the field for musical composition has not all been tilled by the old masters; that there are still an infinite number of paths in which real genius can yet for ages continue to create materpieces that will always command the sincere admiration of music-lovers. The program follows:

Overture—"Le Roi d'Ys	Lalo
Symphony in G major, No. 4	Dvorak
First movement from the Concerto for Violin in D major	Paganini
Mr. Kneisel.
Aase's Death, from the Suite "Peer Gynt"	Grieg
Pilgrims March, from the Symphony "Harold in Italy"	Berliaz
Cavatina, from "Faust"	Gounod
Mr. Campanari.

The tonal effects of Le Roi d'Ys, for emotional and sustained qualities were exquisitely setforth by the orchestra but the passages of Aase's Death were marvelously rendered. The shading of sixty musical instruments in the production of a pianissimo tone that scarcely exceeds a whisper in quantity but whose quality is perfection, cannot be described in words, it must be heard. The low and plaintive tones of deep sorrow have never been touched by a truer artist than Grieg in this melody from Peer Gynt.

Space only prohibited a more extended comment on the solo work. Campanari's voice was as usual, grandly sympathetic, and moved the audience as only that most wonderful of all instruments, the musical human voice, can. Dvorak's symphony is is a series of surprises that appeals rather to the imagination than the emotions, and is a number rather to be added to the program for its newness and strangeness than for its permanent value.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, MARCH 3.

SOLOISTS AND PADEREWSKI.

Extra Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the Benefit of its Members.

Music Hall was crowded, floor and galleries, last night, at the extra concert by the Symphony orchestra.

It was a benefit concert in the fullest sense, and it was also a Paderewski ovation. Long before the hour of commencing every seat was occupied and standing room was at a premium.

It was a representative musical audience moreover, familiar with the orchestra and it's work, and ready to enjoy the pleasure of the evening, and it was an audience composed of the elite of Boston, gathered to do honor to a noble body of artists of which the Hub is justly proud.

The orchestra, too, was at its best, and a brilliant programme was presented. Wagner, Schumann, Massenet, Tschaikowsky and Liszt were the names offered. Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Alwin Schroeder and M. Paderewski were the soloists.

Conductor Nikisch was greeted warmly as he took baton in hand to lead the Tannhauser overture, and Wagner's "Music of the Future" had a fine rendering, and at the close applause came from all parts of the hall.

Paderewski's friends must have been numerous, for the moment the great pianist was caught sight of the wildest applause broke forth. A bouquet of beautiful roses lay on the piano, and as as Paderewski took them in his hand the audience and orchestra loudly cheered him.

In an instant all was hushed as the opening notes of Schumann's concerto in A minor were heard. Each movement was finely given, the allegro affettuoso, the intermezzo, andantino grazioso, and the allegro vivace.

It was a rare bit of playing, both on the part of the orchestra and pianist. The applause which greeted the pianist was spontaneous and genuine, and somewhat discomposed the artist who awkwardly bowed his acknowledgments.

Then the orchestra presented Paderewski with a silver wreath in a velvet case, Mr. S. S. Kneisel making the presentation. But Paderewski was recalled again and again, and to calm the storm he played a Chopin selection.

The suite from "Esclarmonde," Massenet, followed, and the work of the orchestra was finely done.

Three dainty selections, "Sarabande," Bach; "Moment Musical," Schubert; and "At the Fountain," Davidoff, for the violoncello, were given by Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

The Schubert number was loudly applauded, as was also the orchestra selection by Tschaikowsky, andantino and scherzo, F minor, symphony No. 4.

Mrs. Julie L. Wyman won the audience by her exquisite songs, accompanied by Herr Nikisch on the piano—the vocal morsels being by Delibes, Massenet and Ferrari. Mrs. Wyman was especially delightful when rendering "Bonne Nuit" by Massenet.

This grand concert, opening with the Wagner overture, closed with Liszt's famous "Hungarian Fantasie," for pianoforte and orchestra.

Again the Paderewski furor reigned, and when the pianist came on after playing to shake hands with M. Nikisch the vast audience rose en masse and cheered.

Boston Daily Traveller

THURSDAY, MARCH 3, 1892.

At the Music Hall Last Night.

Mr. Paderewski appeared at the Music Hall last evening for the benefit of the members of the Symphony Orchestra. The house was full, a fact that was undoubtedly due to the presence of this wonderful pianist more than to any desire on the part of the public to benefit the members of the orchestra. Mr. Paderewski played the Schumann Concerto in A minor, the greatest of all works of its class, if we except the E flat and G major concertos of Beethoven, which stand upon the same high plane of classic composition. Paderewski's rendering of the concerto was by far the best specimen of serious work that he has done in the whole course of his appearances here.

It ranked with his performance of his own concerta as regards a high artistic effort, and called forth the most enthusiastic applause of the large audience. Upon re-appearing he was presented with a silver laurel wreath by Mr. Kneisel, as a token of regard, we presume, from the orchestra. He responded to further demands of the audience by playing the "Evening" of Schumann. At the end of the programme Paderewki gave a performance of the Hungarian Fantasie of Liszt, with orchestral accompaniment, with all the fire and fancy that could possibly be demanded by the most insatiable admirer of Liszt.

At the end Mr. Paderewski was recalled again and again, and brought forth Mr. Nikisch to share the applause, rather a novel experience upon the part of the latter, for he does not seem to command the amount of exuberent attention that might be expected would come to one in so exalted a position as he occupies in our musical affairs. The orchestra played the accompaniment to the concerto in a most creditable manner, as highly creditable as it more often is discreditable in its efforts for so fine a body of players.

Mr. Schroder played some 'cello solos, and Mrs. Wyman sang some songs in French to a distinctly and entire American audience. At a Lamareaux concert in Paris it would have been the proper thing to do; at a concert in Boston it is a piece of reprehensible affectation for an American singer to use a foreign tongue.

The only opportunity left for hearing the wonderful Paderewski before he returns to Europe will be at his final piano recital on the afternoon of March 22, at the Music Hall. The occasion will probably be an ovation.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2, 1892.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening played the following program: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; Symphony No. 4, in G, Dvorak (first time); "A Prairie Sketch in Central Asia," A. Borodin (first time), and "Les Préludes," by Liszt.

Of the novelties presented the "Prairie Sketch in Central Asia" afforded the greater pleasure, although the symphony of Dvorak must be said to have been a most interesting number. The third movement (allegretto grazioso) called forth instant and the first hearty recognition from the audience.

From this composer we have been led to expect much better things than the work performed this evening.

Neither in treatment nor originality does it compare with his D minor symphony.

Technically, the performance was everything to be desired, every number upon the program being given the best best possible interpretation by Director Nikisch and the orchestra.

The program for the next concert, March 5, is: Symphonic poem, "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky; concerto for violin, No. 3, D minor, Bruch; symphony, No. 4, D minor, Schumann, according to the original version, for the first time here. The soloist is to be Mrs. Camilla Urso.

* * * *

At the extra concert by and for the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the evening of March 2, Paderewski, as was anticipated, will appear for the first time here with orchestra.

He will play Schumann's concerto in A minor, also Liszt's Hungarian Fantaisie. A program of rare interest is promised, and the occasion will be one long remembered.

* * * *

The Kneisel Quartet will give its sixth concert Monday evening, March 7, and following is the program:

Quartet in E minor	Ottokar Novácek
(First time in America.)
Songs
Mrs. Joachim.
Variations from quartet, A major, op. 18	Beethoven
Songs
Mrs. Joachim.
Quartet, E flat, op. 74	Beethoven
Soloist, Amalie Joachim.

Mr. De Pachmann will perform a "request program" on the afternoon of Saturday, March 5, in Chickering Hall. Chopin will be the composer chiefly drawn upon, although Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Henselt and Liszt will be represented by several of their best known compositions.

* * * *

The recital by Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, which was postponed from February 24, because of the continued illness of Mrs. Nikisch, will be given Thursday evening, March 10, in Chickering Hall. Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch will, upon this occasion, introduce to a Boston audience the phenomenal young violinist, Master Alexander Fiedemann. A most interesting program, containing many novelties, has already been published.

* * * *

Boston Post

MOTTO:
With a Mission
AND
Without a Muzzle.

SATURDAY MORNING, MAR. 5, 1892.

Tonight's Symphony programme will consist of Tschaikowsky's symphonic poem, "Hamlet"; Bruch's concerto for violin, No. 3, in D minor, Op. 51, and Schumann's symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120. Mme. Camilla Urso will be the soloist.

Monday night at 8 o'clock the Kneisel Quartet will give the sixth concert of this delightful series in Union Hall. Considerable interest is felt in the soloist, Mme. Amalie Joachim, who will be heard here later in a series of recitals. The programme will be thoroughly artistic, consisting of Ottakar Noracek's quartet in E minor; seven songs—Beethoven's "Mignon," Mozart's "Das Veilchen," Haydn's "Standchen," "Geistlicher Dialog" (The Advent of our Saviour), by Jos. Rud. Able; "Sagt, wo sind die Veilchen hin," by J. Ab. I. Schulz; Mendelssohn's "Venetianisches Gondellied" and Schubert's "Haideraskin"; Beethoven's variations from quartet, A major, Op. 18, and quartet in E flat, Op. 74.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

403 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

RDAY, MARCH 5, 1892.

RECITAL BY MR. AND MRS. NIKISCH.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch's song recital will be given on Thursday, March 10, at Chickering Hall, when they will introduce Master Alexander Fiedemann, who has shown in private a marked genius on the violin. These recitals are among the most charming musical affair of the season. Tickets on sale at Music Hall.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a concert for the benefit of its members last Wednesday evening, assisted by Mrs. Wyman, and Messrs. Paderewski and Schroeder.

The program for the sixth concert by the Kneisel Quartet at Union Hall to be played Monday evening is a most interesting one. It is pleasing to record that the work of this admirable body of musicians is becoming fully appreciated outside of Boston and that its concerts have recived as flattering attention as any that have emanated from musical Boston.

[138]

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, MARCH 3, 1892.

AN EXTRA CONCERT

It Was of Benefit to the Orchestra and the Audience.

A concert was given last evening in Music Hall for the benefit of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, was assisted by Mrs. Julie L. Wyman and Messrs. Paderewski and Schroeder. The three generously offered their services on this occasion. The desks of the leader and the members of the orchestra were ornamented with flowers. There was a very large audience. The programme was as follows: Overture, "Tannhaeuser;" Schumann's pianoforte concerto, A minor; Massenet's suite from "Esclarmonde;" three 'cello numbers: Sarabonde, by Bach; moment musical, by Schubert, and Davidoff's "At the Fountain;" the andantino and the scherzo from Tschaikowsky's symphony, F minor, No. 4; three songs, with pianoforte accompaniment: "Regrets," Delibes; "Bonne Nuit," Massenet, and "A Une Fiancee," Ferrari; Liszt's Hungarian Fantasie for pianoforte and orchestra.

The orchestra was evidently inspired by the occasion; for the performance of the "Tannhaeuser" overture was eminently worthy of the reputation of the organization, and one long to be remembered. The suite by Massenet was played for the first time in Boston. It was arranged by the composer from numbers of the opera, "Esclarmonde," in which Miss Sibyl Sanderson made her debut in Paris and created at the same time the part of the heroine. The arrangement was first played at a Lamoureux concert. While it is in a measure unfair to judge music that was intended for the stage by the concert version, stripped as it is of the accompaniments of scenery, action and all theatrical illusions, it is still possible to say of the concert music, that it is effective or dull, crudely made or cunningly designed. Now the first number of this suite, "Evocation," an appeal by the heroine to the spirits of air, water and fire, seems to be a collection of commonplaces pompously announced with liberal quotations from Wagner. The second, "L' Ile Magique," is, in the opera, used to accompany the movements of a ballet, and there are carefully sought-out effects of color and rhythm rather than any originality of theme. The third, "Hymenee," is played after the curtain has fallen upon the long embrace of the lovers, and it is the most genuine and the most spontaneous music in the suite. The pastorale is the same old pastorale that we have heard in French music so many times, and the fantastic hunting scene belongs to the theatre, and it should be kept there. The instrumentation of "Esclarmonde" was censured at the time of its production and Massenet was accused of introducing two new instruments, Miss Sanderson's voice and the sarrusophone contra bass; this latter instrument was used in Paris in the place of the contra bassoon, although the composer wrote the part for the more familiar instrument.

Mr. Paderewski gave a masterly performance of the concerto. The first movement was taken a little faster than is the custom, but clearness was not sacrificed thereby. He was enthusiastically recalled, and Mr. Kneisel, in behalf of the orchestra, gave him a silvern laurel wreath. There was another enthusiastic scene, and Mr. Paderewski played Schumann's "Des Abends." The Hungarian fantasie was given with true Hungarian spirit, and the pianist was recalled again and again. He modestly divided the popular tribute by leading Mr. Nikisch with him before the audience. Mrs. Wyman and Mr. Schroeder added greatly to the pleasure of the evening by the display of their art.

PHILIP HALE.

DAILY, York, Penn.

Date......... 3/2

Burmeister.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of seventy five pieces, according to Paderewski, the greatest living pianist, is the finest combination of musicians in the world. Such an aggregation would allow only pianists of the first rank to play with them. We had the pleasure of hearing the orchestra in Baltimore two weeks ago, and found that Prof. Burmeister was the pianist of the occasion. He is an artist with a technique and brilliancy of execution seldom equalled; and we commend him to musical loving people of York, who will be given an opportunity to hear him for themselves on Friday evening.

The first row on the gallery yet remain unsold for the recital and those who are desirous of having them can be accommodated by calling at the dry goods stores of J. T. Kopp and Co. An entertainment of this kind make these seats very desirable, and they can be had at fifty cents each.

Subscribers, who have not had their tickets reserved as yet, can do so at the above mentioned place. Concert, Friday evening March 4, at 8:15 sharp.

EAGLE, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Date 2/28

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

The great attraction of the year will be the appearance of the far-famed Boston Symphony orchestra in Hartman Hall the first week of May. Last year they played in University hall, Ann Arbor, to an audience of 5,000, and this year they have secured the extra attraction of Eugen d'Albert, the greatest pianist in the world. Alongside d'Albert Paderewski sinks into insignificance. It is being agitated among some ardent music lovers that the orchestra play a programme composed largely of selections chosen by popular vote of the people of Grand Rapids. This subject will be considered in due time by those who have the matter in charge.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 63.

THURSDAY, MARCH 3, 1892.

Benefit Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave, at Music Hall last evening, the first benefit concert in the history of this organization, and the public responded in the most liberal manner.

It would have been a pleasure to have had the large audience called together to listen to the orchestra alone, so that the tribute paid to its members would have been an unqualified one, and a demonstration of the taste of the public for the music of the organization, aside from any interest in the soloists who assisted.

Doubtless, however, a practical hand had charge of the affair, and the value of soloists in addition to the orchestra was conceded by availing of the services of Paderewski, the pianist, Mr. Alvin Schroeder, 'cello, and Mrs. Wyman, the contralto singer, both of whom are understood to have volunteered for last evening as an evidence of their appreciation of the Boston orchestra.

The programme was such a list of selections as the regular patrons of this season's concerts by the orchestra hear all too seldom, and its enjoyment was universal among those present, if applause can be accepted as evidence on this point.

The orchestra introduced the evening's entertaining numbers by a magnificent performance of the "Tannhauser" overture, adding as its novelty for the occasion Massenet's "Esclarmonde" suite, and giving also the andantino and scherzo from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony. The modern French school of composition finds a very happy illustration in Massenet's pretty suite, and the beautiful tone coloring of its movements was brought out very finely by the performance given the work.

Mr. Paderewski contributed as his first selection the concerto by Schumann in A minor, and ended the programme with a performance of the Hungarian fantasie for pianoforte and orchestra by Liszt, in which his virtuosity fairly dazzled those who heard him.

A half-dozen recalls followed the Schumann concerto, and finally the pianist added another Schumann selection in response to the demands of the audience.

Mrs. Wyman's share in the programme consisted of the songs, a, "Regrets," Delibes; b, "Bonne Nuit," Massenet; c, "A une Fiancee," Ferrari, and a more pleasing choice of numbers could hardly have been made by this great artist. Her singing is at all times a revelation of the beauties of any composition she selects, and the art of vocalization finds in her a perfect interpreter.

Mr. Schroeder, the leader of the 'cello division of the string players, gave a fine exhibition of his skill and taste as a solo player in a "Sarabande," by Bach; the "Moment Musicale," Schubert, and "At the Fountain," by Davidoff.

The concert was in every way a credit to the orchestra, its conductor, and the assisting artists, and it is to be hoped that similar programmes may be possible for future concerts in the regular series.

Two presentations were added to the events of the evening announced on the programme. The first consisted of an elegant laurel wreath in silver, given by the orchestra to Mr. Paderewski as a token of the "admiration and gratitude" of the members. The second, an elegant gilt mantel clock in the old French style, presented by the members of the orchestra to Mr. Nikisch also as a token of the "admiration and gratitude" of the members to their conductor. A kind friend also decorated the conductor's stand and all the orchestra desks with flowers in honor of the occasion.

NEWS, Providence, R. I.

Date 3/1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From the standpoint of the lover of the deeper music that appeals alike to the intellect and the emotions—such as that of Beethoven or Wagner—last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be only partially satisfying, but for the broadly cultivated musician, who wishes to hear all the varieties of style, and for the musical diletante who loves music for music's sake alone, the program could not have been bettered. It is a great source of credit to Mr. Nikisch that he almost always devotes a portion of his evening to some new work, thus keeping his hearers abreast of the musical development of the period, and at the same tims showing by his reading of the scores that the field for musical composition has not all been tilled by the old masters; that there are still an infinite number of paths in which real genius can yet for ages continue to create materpieces that will always command the sincere admiration of music-lovers. The program follows:

Overture—"Le Roi d'Ys....................Lalo
Symphony in G major, No. 4............Dvorak
First movement from the Concerto for Violin in D major...............Paganini
Mr. Kneisel.
Aase's Death, from the Suite "Peer Gynt"
....Grieg
Pilgrims March, from the Symphony "Harold in Italy"........................Berlioz
Cavatina, from "Faust"...............Gounod
Mr. Campanari.

The tonal effects of Le Roi d'Ys, for emotional and sustained qualities were exquisitely setforth by the orchestra but the passages of Aase's Death were marvelously rendered. The shading of sixty musical instruments in the production of a pianissimo tone that scarcely exceeds a whisper in quantity but whose quality is perfection, cannot be described in words, it must be heard. The low and plaintive tones of deep sorrow have never been touched by a truer artist than Grieg in this melody from Peer Gynt.

Space only prohibited a more extended comment on the solo work. Campanari's voice was as usual, grandly sympathetic, and moved the audience as only that most wonderful of all instruments, the musical human voice, can. Dvorak's symphony is is a series of surprises that appeals rather to the imagination than the emotions, and is a number rather to be added to the program for its newness and strangeness than for its permanent value.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, MARCH 3.

SOLOISTS AND PADEREWSKI.

Extra Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the Benefit of its Members.

Music Hall was crowded, floor and galleries, last night, at the extra concert by the Symphony orchestra.

It was a benefit concert in the fullest sense, and it was also a Paderewski ovation. Long before the hour of commencing every seat was occupied and standing room was at a premium.

It was a representative musical audience moreover, familiar with the orchestra and its work, and ready to enjoy the pleasure of the evening, and it was an audience composed of the elite of Boston, gathered to do honor to a noble body of artists of which the Hub is justly proud.

The orchestra, too, was at its best, and a brilliant programme was presented. Wagner, Schumann, Massenet, Tschaikowsky and Liszt were the names offered. Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Alwin Schroeder and M. Paderewski were the soloists.

Conductor Nikisch was greeted warmly as he took baton in hand to lead the Tannhauser overture, and Wagner's "Music of the Future" had a fine rendering, and at the close applause came from all parts of the hall.

Paderewski's friends must have been numerous, for the moment the great pianist was caught sight of the wildest applause broke forth. A bouquet of beautiful roses lay on the piano, and as as Paderewski took them in his hand the audience and orchestra loudly cheered him.

In an instant all was hushed as the opening notes of Schumann's concerto in A minor were heard. Each movement was finely given, the allegro affettuoso, the intermezzo, andantino grazioso, and the allegro vivace.

It was a rare bit of playing, both on the part of the orchestra and pianist. The applause which greeted the pianist was spontaneous and genuine, and somewhat discomposed the artist who awkwardly bowed his acknowledgments.

Then the orchestra presented Paderewski with a silver wreath in a velvet case, Mr. S. S. Kneisel making the presentation. But Paderewski was recalled again and again, and to calm the storm he played a Chopin selection.

The suite from "Esclarmonde," Massenet, followed, and the work of the orchestra was finely done.

Three dainty selections, "Sarabande," Bach; "Moment Musical," Schubert; and "At the Fountain," Davidoff, for the violoncello, were given by Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

The Schubert number was loudly applauded, as was also the orchestra selection by Tschaikowsky, andantino and scherzo, F minor, symphony No. 4.

Mrs. Julie L. Wyman won the audience by her exquisite songs, accompanied by Herr Nikisch on the piano—the vocal morsels being by Delibes, Massenet and Ferrari. Mrs. Wyman was especially delightful when rendering "Bonne Nuit" by Massenet.

This grand concert, opening with the Wagner overture, closed with Liszt's famous "Hungarian Fantasie," for pianoforte and orchestra.

Again the Paderewski furor reigned, and when the pianist came on after playing to shake hands with M. Nikisch the vast audience rose en masse and cheered.

Boston Daily Traveller

THURSDAY, MARCH 3, 1892.

At the Music Hall Last Night.

Mr. Paderewski appeared at the Music Hall last evening for the benefit of the members of the Symphony Orchestra. The house was full, a fact that was undoubtedly due to the presence of this wonderful pianist more than to any desire on the part of the public to benefit the members of the orchestra. Mr. Paderewski played the Schumann Concerto in A minor, the greatest of all works of its class, if we except the E flat and G major concertos of Beethoven, which stand upon the same high plane of classic composition. Paderewski's rendering of the concerto was by far the best specimen of serious work that he has done in the whole course of his appearances here.

It ranked with his performance of his own concerta as regards a high artistic effort, and called forth the most enthusiastic applause of the large audience. Upon re-appearing he was presented with a silver laurel wreath by Mr. Kneisel, as a token of regard, we presume, from the orchestra. He responded to further demands of the audience by playing the "Evening" of Schumann. At the end of the programme Paderewki gave a performance of the Hungarian Fantasie of Liszt, with orchestral accompaniment, with all the fire and fancy that could possibly be demanded by the most insatiable admirer of Liszt.

At the end Mr. Paderewski was recalled again and again, and brought forth Mr. Nikisch to share the applause, rather a novel experience upon the part of the latter, for he does not seem to command the amount of exuberent attention that might be expected would come to one in so exalted a position as he occupies in our musical affairs. The orchestra played the accompaniment to the concerto in a most creditable manner, as highly creditable as it more often is discreditable in its efforts for so fine a body of players.

Mr. Schroder played some 'cello solos, and Mrs. Wyman sang some songs in French to a distinctly and entire American audience. At a Lamareaux concert in Paris it would have been the proper thing to do; at a concert in Boston it is a piece of reprehensible affectation for an American singer to use a foreign tongue.

The only opportunity left for hearing the wonderful Paderewski before he returns to Europe will be at his final piano recital on the afternoon of March 22, at the Music Hall. The occasion will probably be an ovation.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2, 1892.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening played the following program: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; Symphony No. 4, in G, Dvorak (first time); "A Prairie Sketch in Central Asia," A. Borodin (first time), and "Les Préludes," by Liszt.

Of the novelties presented the "Prairie Sketch in Central Asia" afforded the greater pleasure, although the symphony of Dvorak must be said to have been a most interesting number. The third movement (allegretto grazioso) called forth instant and the first hearty recognition from the audience.

From this composer we have been led to expect much better things than the work performed this evening.

Neither in treatment nor originality does it compare with his D minor symphony.

Technically, the performance was everything to be desired, every number upon the program being given the best best possible interpretation by Director Nikisch and the orchestra.

The program for the next concert, March 5, is: Symphonic poem, "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky; concerto for violin, No. 3, D minor, Bruch; symphony, No. 4, D minor, Schumann, according to the original version, for the first time here. The soloist is to be Mrs. Camilla Urso.

* * * *

At the extra concert by and for the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the evening of March 2, Paderewski, as was anticipated, will appear for the first time here with orchestra.

He will play Schumann's concerto in A minor, also Liszt's Hungarian Fantaisie. A program of rare interest is promised, and the occasion will be one long remembered.

* * * *

The Kneisel Quartet will give its sixth concert Monday evening, March 7, and following is the program:

Quartet in E minor..........................Ottokar Novàcek
(First time in America.)
Songs...
Mrs. Joachim.
Variations from quartet, A major, op. 18..................Beethoven
Songs...
Mrs. Joachim.
Quartet, E flat, op. 74.....................................Beethoven
Soloist, Amalie Joachim.

* * * *

Mr. De Pachmann will perform a "request program" on the afternoon of Saturday, March 5, in Chickering Hall. Chopin will be the composer chiefly drawn upon, although Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Henselt and Liszt will be represented by several of their best known compositions.

* * * *

The recital by Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, which was postponed from February 24, because of the continued illness of Mrs. Nikisch, will be given Thursday evening, March 10, in Chickering Hall. Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch will, upon this occasion, introduce to a Boston audience the phenomenal young violinist, Master Alexander Fiedemann. A most interesting program, containing many novelties, has already been published.

* * * *

Boston Post

MOTTO:

With a Mission

—AND—

Without a Muzzle.

SATURDAY MORNING, MAR. 5, 1892.

Tonight's Symphony programme will consist of Tschaikowsky's symphonic poem, "Hamlet"; Bruch's concerto for violin, No. 3, in D minor, Op. 51, and Schumann's symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120. Mme. Camilla Urso will be the soloist.

Monday night at 8 o'clock the Kneisel Quartet will give the sixth concert of this delightful series in Union Hall. Considerable interest is felt in the soloist, Mme. Amalie Joachim, who will be heard here later in a series of recitals. The programme will be thoroughly artistic, consisting of Ottakar Noracek's quartet in E minor; seven songs—Beethoven's "Mignon," Mozart's "Das Veilchen," Haydn's "Standchen," "Geistlicher Dialog" (The Advent of our Saviour), by Jos. Rud. Ahle; "Sagt, wo sind die Veilchen hin," by J. Ab. I. Schulz; Mendelssohn's "Venetianische; Gondellied" and Schubert's "Haideraskin"; Beethoven's variations from quartet, A major, Op. 18, and quartet in E flat, Op. 74.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

403 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

RDAY, MARCH 5, 1892.

RECITAL BY MR. AND MRS. NIKISCH.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch's song recital will be given on Thursday, March 10, at Chickering Hall, when they will introduce Master Alexander Fiedemann, who has shown in private a marked genius on the violin. These recitals are among the most charming musical affair of the season. Tickets on sale at Music Hall.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a concert for the benefit of its members last Wednesday evening, assisted by Mrs. Wyman, and Messrs. Paderewski and Schroeder.

The program for the sixth concert by the Kneisel Quartet at Union Hall to be played Monday evening is a most interesting one. It is pleasing to record that the work of this admirable body of musicians is becoming fully appreciated outside of Boston and that its concerts have recived as flattering attention as any that have emanated from musical Boston.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 5, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The critical mind cannot manage to get itself into a state of genial approval before Dvoràk's fourth symphony, which was heard for the first time in America, at the seventeenth Symphony concert. And yet there is a great deal to enjoy, as well as some cause for surprise, in it, if one will take it without too much analysis. Its themes are certainly very tune-y, and they are sometimes thrown together in a manner too light and inconsequent for symphonic dignity; but there are beauty, piquancy, distinct melodic form and sometimes a soft lingering feeling in them, which gratify the ear with fresh sensations. The scoring has much originality of color, as in the second movement, adagio, which has a pervading string quality, occasionally contrasted with an unexpected comment of the heavier instruments. Perhaps if the composer had called it by some less ambitious name—and yet suite seems a title as much too small—it might have been better received by the judgment, because it does contain thoughts, devices and effects of tone which are worth hearing and considering. Another novelty went with this—a "Sketch of the Steppes of Middle Asia," by the Russian Borodin. Picturesque, suggestive, short, to the point, and unquestionably the expression of original impressions, one could not help noticing how curiously parallel it ran to much of the Frenchman David's "Desert" music. There was the same shimmering of the atmosphere suggested by faint, quivering monotones of the violins, the same strange Oriental scales and a similar beat of passing feet. Yet this sketch represented independent thought and was colored from its author's own palette. It was most interesting and remunerative to the listener and general and appreciative applause followed it. The first number on the programme was Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture, and the last, Liszt's "Preludes," which it is quite time to relegate to silence for a decade or so. Mr. Nikisch was in close accord with his music and conducted admirably well, even though he could not make the brasses blow together in the overture nor keep the horns from making an awful mess of a certain short passage in the symphony.

The concert of this evening will be made attractive by the appearance of Mme. Camilla Urso, who is to give the first performance here of Bruch's third violin concerto. Tschaikowsky's sympathetic poem, "Hamlet," will be heard for the first time and so will the original version of Schumann's fourth symphony.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The sixth concert of the Kneisel Quartette takes place Monday evening at Union Hall, with Mme. Amalie Joachim as solo vocalist. These concerts are among the delightful musical features of the city and are also becoming a great attraction in other cities. The programme is as follows:

Ottokar Novàcek....................Quartette in E minor
(First Time in America.)

Songs.
a Beethoven...........................Mignon
b Mozart...........................Das Veilchen
c Haydn...........................Ständchen
Mme Joachim

Beethoven...Variations from Quartette, A major, op. 18

Songs.
a Jos. Rud. Ahle (1662) Geistlicher (The Advent of our Saviour)
b J. Ab. I. Schulz (1782) Sagt, wo sind die Veilchen hin
c Mendelssohn.......Venetianisches Gondellied
d Schubert........ ....Haideraskin
Mme. Joachim

Beethoven.............. ....Quartette, E-flat, op. 74

THE NIKISCH RECITAL.

The expected recital by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, which had to be postponed because Mrs. Nikisch was too ill to sing, has been finally set for Thursday evening next in Chickering Hall. The programme consists chiefly of groups of songs which she will sing to those beautiful pianoforte accompaniments for which Mr. Nikisch has been so deservedly admired and praised. Some of these songs have been already recorded among Mrs. Nikisch's successes, while others have not yet been heard in public from her lips. There will also be some violin music by a youth who has lately come from Europe, and who has been said by the critical in New York to possess a distinguished talent and an already matured style.

The next Kneisel concert, appointed for Monday evening, in Union Hall, is to have its fine instrumental programme diversified by lieder sung by Mme. Joachim.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 66.

SUNDAY, MARCH 6, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Nikisch appears to have an ample supply of novelties for the latter part of his season of concerts with the Boston Symphony orchestra, and last evening his programme contained two more works which were given a first hearing.

The symphonic poem "Hamlet," by Tschaikowsky, introduced the evening's selections, and the admirable performance given it displayed its characteristics to excellent advantage.

To the imaginative mind each composition appeals with a force that cannot be appreciated by those who seek for enjoyment in the music itself without the associations which the composer has in mind in his writing. The official description of the work states that the introduction expresses the deep grief of the young prince because of his father's death, and that a passage by the muted horns represents the striking of the midnight hour. There follows a symphonic allegro typical of Hamlet's heroic intent and indecision, and a second broad and beautiful motif depicts the character of Ophelia. These two subjects are marked out at considerable length, and the work comes to a sombre and tragic end.

There is no reason to doubt that this is an accurate statement of the idea that Tschaikowsky intended to convey in his tone pictures, but his intentions are open to misinterpretation if the imagination does not follow his lead.

The poem, however, is an admirable orchestral study and the virtuosity of the band was well shown in its performance.

The second novelty consisted of the violin concerto No. 3, by Max Bruch, in which Mme. Camilla Urso was the soloist. The concerto gained instant favor abroad last season, and was played by Dr. Joachim and other leading violinists in leading European cities.

It has many characteristics which make it attractive to soloists looking for opportunities to display their virtuosity, but it will hardly have the popular favor of audiences to the same extent as the earlier works of this class put forward by Herr Bruch.

The opening movement, an allegro ernigico, shows the skill of the musician rather than the genius of the composer, and is effective as an illustration of the mastery of the composer in musical construction.

The chief claim of the concerto to popular favor, is found in the graceful and melodious adagio in which the composer has given evidence of being in his most fanciful mood, and he has embellished his tuneful ideas in a very pleasing fashion.

The remarkable difficulty of the final movement undoubtedly makes it a fascinating study to such a player as Mme. Urso, but to the music lover the merits are not of the sort to make it altogether enjoyable.

The work of the composer throughout the concerto is clear and easily appreciated at a first hearing, and its value was made distinctly apparent by the masterly interpretation given it by Mme. Urso, whose popularity with the public was shown by a hearty greeting and an enthusiastic approval of her playing at the close of her performance.

It was intended to have the so-called "original" version of Schumann's fourth symphony for the final number on the programme, but, as this version of the work has, oddly enough, only just been published, with certain editing by Herr Brahms and Herr Wullner, there was some delay in sending the parts. The second edition of the symphony, which has been used generally since it has been a standard work, was, therefore, substituted on the evening's programme, and the new old version assigned for a hearing at the next concert.

Mr. Nikisch gave the familiar symphony a splendid reading, leaving no chance to object to its lack of fire and virility, as the more brilliant passages were played with fine freedom and dash.

Next week the soloist is to be Herr Eugen d'Albert, pianist, who makes his reappearance in this country on this occasion, and plays the fifth concerto by Beethoven in E flat. The "Leonore" overture No. 2 will introduce the programme, and the new old version of the Schumann fourth symphony will end it.

The recital announced, and many times postponed, by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, is now fixed for Thursday evening next at Chickering Hall when Mrs. Nikisch will sing to her husband's piano accompaniment, songs by Goldmark, Schuman, August Bungert, Richard Heuberger, Robert Franz, R. de Koven, Tschaikowsky, Richard Strauss and Jensen. Master Alexander Friedmann, violinist, is to assist.

Master Alexander Friedmann the seventeen years old violinist, whom Mr. Nikisch will introduce to Boston at the song recital by himself and wife next Thursday in Chickering Hall, is a protege of Prof. Brodsky, concertmeister of the New York Symphony orchestra. The professor while travelling in Russia two years ago found the boy in a small village living in poverty, and his interest was aroused to such an extent that he undertook his education, sending him first to Leipsic and then bringing him to New York, where he has since been training him, and of whom he expects great results.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Herschel are now en route from London, to take part in an extended tour, under Mr. C. A. Ellis' management. Four vocal recitals will be given at the Meionaon by these popular artists, the dates for which are March 29 and 31, and April 5 and 7.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 6, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

Tschaikowsky's latest symphonic poem, "Hamlet" was the opening number of the eighteenth symphony rehearsal and concert and was performed for the first time in this city. A new work by the eminent Russian is a notable event nowadays. The one in question, though not so strikingly effective as his "Romeo and Juliet," is in nowise disappointing at a first hearing. On the contrary, one's impression is that it would grow steadily on further acquaintance.

The broad and gloomy opening measures with an unusual and wierdly suggestive passage for muted horns, are well designed to command attention. The first theme of the allegro is bold and characterful, and its second, though more quiet and melodic, has no elements of weakness. This second theme is subjected to rich and extended treatment until a surprise comes in the shape of a sudden interruption by an episode of martial character. A repetition of these effects ends in a splendidly worked up climax, after which the movement relapses into gloom and comes to a quiet close. As a whole, "Hamlet" is a remarkably coherent work, there being few indications of the episodic form which prevails in most works of the symphonic poem order. It was read in a very expressive and dramatic manner by Mr. Nikisch, and the playing of the orchestra was well up to their standard.

Mme. Camilla Urso, the soloist, had every reason to feel pleased with her reception. It is just four years ago since she was last heard in these concerts. The unrestrained applause that greeted her as she appeared on the platform proved that she had suffered no diminution of popularity in this long interval. And surely, no musical performer before the American public more fully deserves its highest esteem. Mme. Urso has ever been an artist of the highest aims, and to her aims she has always been loyal. For more years than it perhaps would be polite to mention, she has been largely instrumental in familiarizing music-lovers in every part of the country with works of the great composers; and her influence in raising the standard of music can hardly be overestimated. Of her playing in Max Bruch's third and latest concerto for violin and orchestra, scarcely more need be said than that it was fully worthy of her reputation. The same beautiful tone and phrasing, the same technical command, the same artistic apprehension that have always characterized her work were apparent in this performance. The concerto itself is interesting and attractive, although not equal to its composer's second in strength or beauty of thematic material.

Bruch's easy and charming flow of melody is present in a considerable degree and there is no lack of skill displayed in the construction and instrumentation of the three movements, the orchestral coloring being warm and varied. The first and second movements are the best, the finale, though brilliant, showing a decided falling-off in definiteness of purpose. Prolonged applause followed its closing chords and Mme. Urso was recalled several times.

A performance of Schumann's D minor symphony with the original instrumentation, had been announced for this week, but postponement was unavoidable, owing to the non-arrival of the parts; and the work, as it is known, was played instead. General interest has been excited in the musical world by Breitkopf and Hartel's publication of this symphony as it was first scored by Schumann; and its performance is once more promised for next week. Mr. Nikisch's reading of this favorite work of his was fully equal to those of previous seasons, and was heartily applauded.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A concert was given in Music Hall, last Wednesday evening, for the benefit of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. An admirably arranged programme was performed by the orchestra, Mrs. Julie P. Wyman, Mr. Alwin Schroeder and Mr. Paderewski giving their services. To musician and layman alike, the occasion was one of the most enjoyable of the season. The very large gathering was representative of musical Boston, and everybody in the hall was imbued with a spirit of enthusiasm. And, though no floral tributes found their way from audience to platform, yet flowers were not wanting to add to the cheerfulness of the scene, for the stands of conductor and players were prettily decorated. The magnificently played "Tannhauser" overture gave immediate assurance that no pains had been spared at rehearsal. But careful rehearsing does not always produce the best results in performance. At the supreme moment much, very much, depends on the moods of the performers. In this instance it was evident that every one on the platform was inspired. Virility, breadth and fullness of tone are a matter of course when this orchestra plays. But it must be said that the degree of artistic excellence it displayed in all its departments in this performance has not been frequently attained of late. Long-continued applause followed. The other orchestral numbers were a suite from Massenet's opera, "Esclarmonde," and the two movements from Tschaikowski's fourth symphony, which were played not long ago. The suite was given for the first time, and consists of four movements, or at least four were performed.

The music is thoroughly theatric in style. There is much gorgeousness of instrumentation and effect, but no part of it, except the third movement, created a strong impression at this single hearing. The symphony movements were beautifully played and warmly received. Mrs. Wyman's contribution to the programme was a group of three French songs, "Regrets," by Delibes; "Bonne Nuit," by Massenet; and "A une Fiancee," by Ferrari, all of which displayed her beautiful voice and artistic style of singing to advantage, and won deserved recalls. In three numbers by Bach, Schubert and Davidoff, Mr. Schroeder fairly outdid himself in beauty of tone and technical finish, and was no less heartily applauded. Naturally, Paderewski was the center of attraction. In the Schumann concerto, he gave one more proof of his greatness as pianist and musician. His conception and execution of it were replete with those characteristics which are now familiar to Boston's army of music lovers. The work of both soloist and orchestra was wholly in harmony with the spirit of Schumann's exquisite music; and one could only lament that this rare performance had not taken place in a smaller hall, where nothing of its most delicate beauties would have been lost. After the concerto, amidst great applause, Paderewski was presented by Mr. Kneisel on behalf of the orchestra with a large silver laurel wreath, and finally in response to repeated recalls, played Schumann's "Des Abends." His remaining number, the last on the programme, was Liszt's Hungarian Fantasie, which he played in an electrifying manner. The entire audience rose and gave vent to its enthusiasm. Again and again he bowed his acknowledgments in company with Mr. Nikisch, but, true to his artistic instincts, refused to spoil this impressive climax of the concert by playing again.

On Thursday evening next, at Chickering Hall. Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch will give a song recital and introduce Master Alexander Fiedemann, the young violinist. This youth was found in an obscure Russian village a few years since, by Professor Brodsky, and has been educated under his patronage at Leipsic and New York. The professor is quite enthusiastic concerning his protege, and his opinion is echoed by those who have heard him. The programme will include selections from Goldmark, Schumann, August Bungert, Richard Heuberger, Robert Franz, Vieuxtemps, Brahms, Spohr, Miska Hauser, R. de Koven, Tschaikowsky, Richard Strauss, Jensen.

The Kneisel Quartet will give its sixth concert to-morrow, Monday evening, at Union Hall, with the assistance of Mme. Amalie Joachim, noted as an exponent of German Lieder. The programme is as follows: Ottokar Novacek, "Quartet in E minor"; songs, Mme. Joachim; (a) Beethoven, "Mignon," (b) Mozart, "Das Veilchen," (c) Haydn, "Standchen"; Beethoven, variations from quartet, A major, Opus 18; four songs, Mme. Joachim; Beethoven, Quartet, E flat, Opus 74.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 6.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: Symphonic Poem, "Hamlet," Tscaikowsky (first time); Concerto for violin No. 3, in D minor, Op. 58, Bruch (first time); Symphony No. 4, D-minor, Op. 120, Schumann. The soloist was Mme. Camilla Urso. Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" is a fiery work; but there is little in it that attracts or interests on a first hearing, and even the peculiar charm with which this composer generally invests his orchestration is lacking. The effect of the whole is heavy, not to say dreary, and there are portions of it that are arrant commonplace padding, the character of which is but poorly disguised by the pompous instrumentation. Early in the work midnight is sounded on the horn, and a blast of brass announces the ghost of Hamlet's father. From this point the "poem" becomes almost distractingly fragmentary and noisy. There is a brief glimpse of melody to typify Ophelia. Beyond this nothing is clear. There is a tremendous effort to be impressive, but it ends in becoming fantastic; and to make it at all comprehensible, the listener should be provided with a full description of the composer's intention. As music pure and simple, it is quite unmeaning. It was played with great fire and precision, but it made no very favorable impression. The Bruch concerto is not as pleasing as is either of its predecessors. The solo part is skilfully written and the orchestration is richly colored throughout; but the work is dry, of wearisome length, and too persistently sombre. Even its brilliancy is never exhilarating, and there is little in the concerto that appeals to the emotions by its melodiousness, its grace, or its warmth. It was beautifully played by Mme. Urso, whose perfect technique, purity of taste, chastity of style, large and round tone and artistic phrasing renewed all of their familiar charm and met with an enthusiastic recognition. Her performance was delightful from beginning to end, and if interest could have been imparted to the work it would have been by her masterly interpretation of it. She was applauded with immense heartiness and twice recalled. The programme for next week is: Overture, "Leonore," No. 2, Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat, Beethoven; and Symphony No. 4, D-minor, Schumann, according to the original version, which will, on this occasion, be heard for the first time in Boston. The soloist is to be Mr. Eugen d'Albert.

On Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra had a benefit in Music Hall, Mr. Paderewski and Mrs. Julie L. Wyman volunteering. It is not customary to criticize an occasion of this description, but its most striking features may be noticed briefly. There was a large audience, which it is only fair to presume was attracted chiefly by Paderewski, who was received with tremendous enthusiasm and gave a splendid performance of Schumann's concerto and an exciting rendering of Liszt's Hungarian Fantaisie. At the end of the first-named work Mr. Kneisel presented to the artist a silver laurel wreath, whereat the applause became tumultuous, and an encore imperative. At the end of the Liszt fantaisie the plaudits were still more stormy, and the demon of encore raged furiously for more; but he was destined to remain unappeased this time, for Mr. Paderewski shook Mr. Nikisch by the hand, which induced a still greater frenzy of applause, and then Mr. Nikisch bowed, and Mr. Paderewski bowed, and then they both bowed together, until the audience was satiated with the bowing. The orchestra was at its best; but the lion of the occasion was Paderewski, whose Boston apotheosis was fully accomplished, while his halo was so vast that he had sufficient to spare to make a smaller one for Mr. Nikisch.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann, will give their deferred concert in Chickering Hall on Thursday evening. The programme will consist of songs to be sung by Mrs. Nikisch, and accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Nikisch; and violin solos by Master Fiedemann, who is said to be a young artist of remarkable powers, with a fine technique, a large tone, and a style surprisingly mature. Tickets may be had at Music Hall.

To-morrow evening the Kneisel Quartet will give their sixth concert in Union Hall. The occasion is of special interest, inasmuch as Mad. Amalie Joachim will assist as soloist, and will make her first appearance in this country. The programme is: Quartet in E-minor, Ottakar Novacek (first time here); Variations from Quartet [in A, op 18, Beethoven; and Quartet in E flat, op. 74, Beethoven. Mad Joachim will sing two groups of songs, one of them consisting of "Mignon," Beethoven; "The Violet," Mozart, and "Ständchen, Haydn; the other of songs by Ahlé, Schulz, Mendelssohn and Schubert.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 5, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The critical mind cannot manage to get itself into a state of genial approval before Dvoràk's fourth symphony, which was heard for the first time in America, at the seventeenth Symphony concert. And yet there is a great deal to enjoy, as well as some cause for surprise, in it, if one will take it without too much analysis. Its themes are certainly very tune-y, and they are sometimes thrown together in a manner too light and inconsequent for symphonic dignity; but there are beauty, piquancy, distinct melodic form and sometimes a soft lingering feeling in them, which gratify the ear with fresh sensations. The scoring has much originality of color, as in the second movement, adagio, which has a pervading string quality, occasionally contrasted with an unexpected comment of the heavier instruments. Perhaps if the composer had called it by some less ambitious name—and yet suite seems a title as much too small—it might have been better received by the judgment, because it does contain thoughts, devices and effects of tone which are worth hearing and considering. Another novelty went with this—a "Sketch of the Steppes of Middle Asia," by the Russian Borodin. Picturesque, suggestive, short, to the point, and unquestionably the expression of original impressions, one could not help noticing how curiously parallel it ran to much of the Frenchman David's "Desert" music. There was the same shimmering of the atmosphere suggested by faint, quivering monotones of the violins, the same strange Oriental scales and a similar beat of passing feet. Yet this sketch represented independent thought and was colored from its author's own palette. It was most interesting and remunerative to the listener and general and appreciative applause followed it. The first number on the programme was Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture, and the last, Liszt's "Preludes," which it is quite time to relegate to silence for a decade or so. Mr. Nikisch was in close accord with his music and conducted admirably well, even though he could not make the brasses blow together in the overture nor keep the horns from making an awful mess of a certain short passage in the symphony.

The concert of this evening will be made attractive by the appearance of Mme. Camilla Urso, who is to give the first performance here of Bruch's third violin concerto. Tschaikowsky's sympathetic poem, "Hamlet," will be heard for the first time and so will the original version of Schumann's fourth symphony.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The sixth concert of the Kneisel Quartette takes place Monday evening at Union Hall, with Mme. Amalie Joachim as solo vocalist. These concerts are among the delightful musical features of the city and are also becoming a great attraction in other cities. The programme is as follows:

Ottokar Novàcek… ……………Quartette in E minor
(First Time in America.)
Songs.
  a Beethoven……………………………Mignon
  b Mozart…………………………Das Veilchen
  c Haydn…………………………Ständchen
Mme Joachim
Beethoven…Variations from Quartette, A major, op. 18
Songs.
  a Jos. Rud. Ahle (1662) Geistlicher (The Advent of our Saviour)
  b J. Ab. I. Schulz (1782) Sagt, wo sind die Veilchen hin
  c Mendelssohn…….Venetianisches Gondellied
  d Schubert……… ………… …..Haideraskin
Mme. Joachim
Beethoven………… ……..Quartette, E-flat, op. 74

THE NIKISCH RECITAL.

The expected recital by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, which had to be postponed because Mrs. Nikisch was too ill to sing, has been finally set for Thursday evening next in Chickering Hall. The programme consists chiefly of groups of songs which she will sing to those beautiful pianoforte accompaniments for which Mr. Nikisch has been so deservedly admired and praised. Some of these songs have been already recorded among Mrs. Nikisch's successes, while others have not yet been heard in public from her lips. There will also be some violin music by a youth who has lately come from Europe, and who has been said by the critical in New York to possess a distinguished talent and an already matured style.

~~~ The next Kneisel concert, appointed for Monday evening, in Union Hall, is to have its fine instrumental programme diversified by lieder sung by Mme. Joachim.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 66.

SUNDAY, MARCH 6, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Nikisch appears to have an ample supply of novelties for the latter part of his season of concerts with the Boston Symphony orchestra, and last evening his programme contained two more works which were given a first hearing.

The symphonic poem "Hamlet," by Tschaikowsky, introduced the evening's selections, and the admirable performance given it displayed its characteristics to excellent advantage.

To the imaginative mind each composition appeals with a force that cannot be appreciated by those who seek for enjoyment in the music itself without the associations which the composer has in mind in his writing. The official description of the work states that the introduction expresses the deep grief of the young prince because of his father's death, and that a passage by the muted horns represents the striking of the midnight hour. There follows a symphonic allegro typical of Hamlet's heroic intent and indecision, and a second broad and beautiful motif depicts the character of Ophelia. These two subjects are marked out at considerable length, and the work comes to a sombre and tragic end.

There is no reason to doubt that this is an accurate statement of the idea that Tschaikowsky intended to convey in his tone pictures, but his intentions are open to misinterpretation if the imagination does not follow his lead.

The poem, however, is an admirable orchestral study and the virtuosity of the band was well shown in its performance.

The second novelty consisted of the violin concerto No. 3, by Max Bruch, in which Mme. Camilla Urso was the soloist. The concerto gained instant favor abroad last season, and was played by Dr. Joachim and other leading violinists in leading European cities.

It has many characteristics which make it attractive to soloists looking for opportunities to display their virtuosity, but it will hardly have the popular favor of audiences to the same extent as the earlier works of this class put forward by Herr Bruch.

The opening movement, an allegro ernigico, shows the skill of the musician rather than the genius of the composer, and is effective as an illustration of the mastery of the composer in musical construction.

The chief claim of the concerto to popular favor, is found in the graceful and melodious adagio in which the composer has given evidence of being in his most fanciful mood, and he has embellished his tuneful ideas in a very pleasing fashion.

The remarkable difficulty of the final movement undoubtedly makes it a fascinating study to such a player as Mme. Urso, but to the music lover the merits are not of the sort to make it altogether enjoyable.

The work of the composer throughout the concerto is clear and easily appreciated at a first hearing, and its value was made distinctly apparent by the masterly interpretation given it by Mme. Urso, whose popularity with the public was shown by a hearty greeting and an enthusiastic approval of her playing at the close of her performance.

It was intended to have the so-called "original" version of Schumann's fourth symphony for the final number on the programme, but, as this version of the work has, oddly enough, only just been published, with certain editing by Herr Brahms and Herr Wullner, there was some delay in sending the parts. The second edition of the symphony, which has been used generally since it has been a standard work, was, therefore, substituted on the evening's programme, and the new old version assigned for a hearing at the next concert.

Mr. Nikisch gave the familiar symphony a splendid reading, leaving no chance to object to its lack of fire and virility, as the more brilliant passages were played with fine freedom and dash.

Next week the soloist is to be Herr Eugen d'Albert, pianist, who makes his reappearance in this country on this occasion, and plays the fifth concerto by Beethoven in E flat. The "Leonore" overture No. 2 will introduce the programme, and the new old version of the Schumann fourth symphony will end it.

The recital announced, and many times postponed, by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, is now fixed for Thursday evening next at Chickering Hall when Mrs. Nikisch will sing to her husband's piano accompaniment, songs by Goldmark, Schuman, August Bungert, Richard Heuberger, Robert Franz, R. de Koven, Tschaikowsky, Richard Strauss and Jensen. Master Alexander Friedmann, violinist, is to assist.

Master Alexander Friedmann the seventeen years old violinist, whom Mr. Nikisch will introduce to Boston at the song recital by himself and wife next Thursday in Chickering Hall, is a protege of Prof. Brodsky, concertmeister of the New York Symphony orchestra. The professor while travelling in Russia two years ago found the boy in a small village living in poverty, and his interest was aroused to such an extent that he undertook his education, sending him first to Leipsic and then bringing him to New York, where he has since been training him, and of whom he expects great results.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel are now en route from London, to take part in an extended tour, under Mr. C. A. Ellis' management. Four vocal recitals will be given at the Meionaon by these popular artists, the dates for which are March 29 and 31, and April 5 and 7.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 6, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

Tschaikowsky's latest symphonic poem, "Hamlet" was the opening number of the eighteenth symphony rehearsal and concert and was performed for the first time in this city. A new work by the eminent Russian is a notable event nowadays. The one in question, though not so strikingly effective as his "Romeo and Juliet," is in nowise disappointing at a first hearing. On the contrary, one's impression is that it would grow steadily on further acquaintance.

The broad and gloomy opening measures with an unusual and wierdly suggestive passage for muted horns, are well designed to command attention. The first theme of the allegro is bold and characterful, and its second, though more quiet and melodic, has no elements of weakness. This second theme is subjected to rich and extended treatment until a surprise comes in the shape of a sudden interruption by an episode of martial character. A repetition of these effects ends in a splendidly worked up climax, after which the movement relapses into gloom and comes to a quiet close. As a whole, "Hamlet" is a remarkably coherent work, there being few indications of the episodic form which prevails in most works of the symphonic poem order. It was read in a very expressive and dramatic manner by Mr. Nikisch, and the playing of the orchestra was well up to their standard.

Mme. Camilla Urso, the soloist, had every reason to feel pleased with her reception. It is just four years ago since she was last heard in these concerts. The unrestrained applause that greeted her as she appeared on the platform proved that she had suffered no diminution of popularity in this long interval. And surely, no musical performer before the American public more fully deserves its highest esteem. Mme. Urso has ever been an artist of the highest aims, and to her aims she has always been loyal. For more years than it perhaps would be polite to mention, she has been largely instrumental in familiarizing music-lovers in every part of the country with works of the great composers; and her influence in raising the standard of music can hardly be overestimated. Of her playing in Max Bruch's third and latest concerto for violin and orchestra, scarcely more need be said than that it was fully worthy of her reputation. The same beautiful tone and phrasing, the same technical command, the same artistic apprehension that have always characterized her work were apparent in this performance. The concerto itself is interesting and attractive, although not equal to its composer's second in strength or beauty of thematic material.

Bruch's easy and charming flow of melody is present in a considerable degree and there is no lack of skill displayed in the construction and instrumentation of the three movements, the orchestral coloring being warm and varied. The first and second movements are the best, the finale, though brilliant, showing a decided falling-off in definiteness of purpose. Prolonged applause followed its closing chords and Mme. Urso was recalled several times.

A performance of Schumann's D minor symphony with the original instrumentation, had been announced for this week, but postponement was unavoidable, owing to the non-arrival of the parts; and the work, as it is known, was played instead. General interest has been excited in the musical world by Breitkopf and Hartel's publication of this symphony as it was first scored by Schumann; and its performance is once more promised for next week. Mr. Nikisch's reading of this favorite work of his was fully equal to those of previous seasons, and was heartily applauded.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A concert was given in Music Hall, last Wednesday evening, for the benefit of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. An admirably arranged programme was performed by the orchestra, Mrs. Julie P. Wyman, Mr. Alwin Schroeder and Mr. Paderewski giving their services. To musician and layman alike, the occasion was one of the most enjoyable of the season. The very large gathering was representative of musical Boston, and everybody in the hall was imbued with a spirit of enthusiasm. And, though no floral tributes found their way from audience to platform, yet flowers were not wanting to add to the cheerfulness of the scene, for the stands of conductor and players were prettily decorated. The magnificently played "Tannhauser" overture gave immediate assurance that no pains had been spared at rehearsal. But careful rehearsing does not always produce the best results in performance. At the supreme moment much, very much, depends on the moods of the performers. In this instance it was evident that every one on the platform was inspired. Virility, breadth and fullness of tone are a matter of course when this orchestra plays. But it must be said that the degree of artistic excellence it displayed in all its departments in this performance has not been frequently attained of late. Long-continued applause followed. The other orchestral numbers were a suite from Massenet's opera, "Esclarmonde," and the two movements from Tschaikowski's fourth symphony, which were played not long ago. The suite was given for the first time, and consists of four movements, or at least four were performed.

The music is thoroughly theatric in style. There is much gorgeousness of instrumentation and effect, but no part of it, except the third movement, created a strong impression at this single hearing. The symphony movements were beautifully played and warmly received. Mrs. Wyman's contribution to the programme was a group of three French songs, "Regrets," by Delibes; "Bonne Nuit," by Massenet; and "A une Fiancee," by Ferrari, all of which displayed her beautiful voice and artistic style of singing to advantage, and won deserved recalls. In three numbers by Bach, Schubert and Davidoff, Mr. Schroeder fairly outdid himself in beauty of tone and technical finish, and was no less heartily applauded. Naturally, Paderewski was the center of attraction. In the Schumann concerto, he gave one more proof of his greatness as pianist and musician. His conception and execution of it were replete with those characteristics which are now familiar to Boston's army of music lovers. The work of both soloist and orchestra was wholly in harmony with the spirit of Schumann's exquisite music; and one could only lament that this rare performance had not taken place in a smaller hall, where nothing of its most delicate beauties would have been lost. After the concerto, amidst great applause, Paderewski was presented by Mr. Kneisel on behalf of the orchestra with a large silver laurel wreath, and finally in response to repeated recalls, played Schumann's "Des Abends." His remaining number, the last on the programme, was Liszt's Hungarian Fantasie, which he played in an electrifying manner. The entire audience rose and gave vent to its enthusiasm. Again and again he bowed his acknowledgments in company with Mr. Nikisch, but, true to his artistic instincts, refused to spoil this impressive climax of the concert by playing again.

On Thursday evening next, at Chickering Hall. Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch will give a song recital and introduce Master Alexander Fiedemann, the young violinist. This youth was found in an obscure Russian village a few years since, by Professor Brodsky, and has been educated under his patronage at Leipsic and New York. The professor is quite enthusiastic concerning his protege, and his opinion is echoed by those who have heard him. The programme will include selections from Goldmark, Schumann, August Bungert, Richard Heuberger, Robert Franz, Vieux temps, Brahms, Spohr, Miska Hauser, R. de Koven, Tschaikowsky, Richard Strauss, Jensen.

The Kneisel Quartet will give its sixth concert tomorrow, Monday evening, at Union Hall, with the assistance of Mme. Amalie Joachim, noted as an exponent of German Lieder. The programme is as follows: Ottokar Novacek, "Quartet in E minor"; songs, Mme. Joachim; (a) Beethoven, "Mignon," (b) Mozart, "Das Veilchen," (c) Haydn, "Standchen"; Beethoven, variations from quartet, A major, Opus 18; four songs, Mme. Joachim; Beethoven, Quartet, E flat, Opus 74.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 6.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: Symphonic Poem, "Hamlet," Tscaikowsky (first time); Concerto for violin No. 3, in D minor, Op 58, Bruch (first time); Symphony No. 4, D-minor, Op. 120, Schumann. The soloist was Mme. Camilla Urso. Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" is a fiery work; but there is little in it that attracts or interests on a first hearing, and even the peculiar charm with which this composer generally invests his orchestration is lacking. The effect of the whole is heavy, not to say dreary, and there are portions of it that are arrant commonplace padding, the character of which is but poorly disguised by the pompous instrumentation. Early in the work midnight is sounded on the horn, and a blast of brass announces the ghost of Hamlet's father. From this point the "poem" becomes almost distractingly fragmentary and noisy. There is a brief glimpse of melody to typify Ophelia. Beyond this nothing is clear. There is a tremendous effort to be impressive, but it ends in becoming fantastic; and to make it at all comprehensible, the listener should be provided with a full description of the composer's intention. As music pure and simple, it is quite unmeaning. It was played with great fire and precision, but it made no very favorable impression. The Bruch concerto is not as pleasing as is either of its predecessors. The solo part is skilfully written and the orchestration is richly colored throughout; but the work is dry, of wearisome length, and too persistently sombre. Even its brilliancy is never exhilarating, and there is little in the concerto that appeals to the emotions by its melodiousness, its grace, or its warmth. It was beautifully played by Mme. Urso, whose perfect technique, purity of taste, chastity of style, large and round tone and artistic phrasing renewed all of their familiar charm and met with an enthusiastic recognition. Her performance was delightful from beginning to end, and if interest could have been imparted to the work it would have been by her masterly interpretation of it. She was applauded with immense heartiness and twice recalled. The programme for next week is: Overture, "Leonore," No. 2, Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat, Beethoven; and Symphony No. 4, D-minor, Schumann, according to the original version, which will, on this occasion, be heard for the first time in Boston. The soloist is to be Mr. Eugen d'Albert.

On Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra had a benefit in Music Hall, Mr. Paderewski and Mrs. Julie L. Wyman volunteering. It is not customary to criticize an occasion of this description, but its most striking features may be noticed briefly. There was a large audience, which it is only fair to presume was attracted chiefly by Paderewski, who was received with tremendous enthusiasm and gave a splendid performance of Schumann's concerto and an exciting rendering of Liszt's Hungarian Fantaisie. At the end of the first-named work Mr. Kneisel presented to the artist a silver laurel wreath, whereat the applause became tumultuous, and an encore imperative. At the end of the Liszt fantaisie the plaudits were still more stormy, and the demon of encore raged furiously for more; but he was destined to remain unappeased this time, for Mr. Paderewski shook Mr. Nikisch by the hand, which induced a still greater frenzy of applause, and then Mr. Nikisch bowed, and Mr. Paderewski bowed, and then they both bowed together, until the audience was satiated with the bowing. The orchestra was at its best; but the lion of the occasion was Paderewski, whose Boston apotheosis was fully accomplished, while his halo was so vast that he had sufficient to spare to make a smaller one for Mr. Nikisch.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann, will give their deferred concert in Chickering Hall on Thursday evening. The programme will consist of songs to be sung by Mrs. Nikisch, and accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Nikisch; and violin solos by Master Fiedemann, who is said to be a young artist of remarkable powers, with a fine technique, a large tone, and a style surprisingly mature. Tickets may be had at Music Hall.

To-morrow evening the Kneisel Quartet will give their sixth concert in Union Hall. The occasion is of special interest, inasmuch as Mad. Amalie Joachim will assist as soloist, and will make her first appearance in this country. The programme is: Quartet in E-minor, Ottakar Novacek (first time here); Variations from Quartet in A, op 18, Beethoven; and Quartet in E flat, op. 74, Beethoven. Mad Joachim will sing two groups of songs, one of them consisting of "Mignon," Beethoven; "The Violet," Mozart, and "Ständchen, Haydn; the other of songs by Ahlé, Schulz, Mendelssohn and Schubert.
~~~

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 6, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

SEVENTEENTH CONCERT.

The seventeenth Symphony concert was given in Music hall Saturday evening, Feb. 27. The programme:

Mendelssohn, Overture, "Ruy Blas."
Dvorak, Symphony No 4, in G major.
Allegro con brio—Adagio—Allegretto grazioso.
Finale; Allegro ma non troppo.
(First time in America.)
A. Borodin, "Eine Steppenskizze aus Mittel-Aisen" (A Praise Scene in Central Asia.)
(First time.)
Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

When Liszt's "Ruin of Athens" was first played by von Bülow and the King's orchestra at a Court concert in Berlin, it was received with disfavor by some of the royal family, notably the elder princess, who, when the orchestra reached the climax where the big six foot drum and extra cymbals make a tremendous percussion, jumped excitedly to her feet, exclaiming: "Horrible! Horrible!" Von Bülow rose from the piano, stepped to the front of the stage, and addressed the audience in these words: "If there are any present who do not like my father's music let them leave at once. They can have their ticket money refunded them at the box office!" The princess gathered her wraps about her and stalked proudly, but madly, out of the hall. The piece was then re-commenced and played through without further disturbance. The next day von Bülow resigned his position as court pianist, creating at the time much comment.

Now what would have happened at the Symphony Saturday night if that princess had been present? The clash, the roar, and the din of musical instruments far exceeded that heard at the court concert. We believe no greater noise, created by musical instruments, was ever before heard in Music hall. Now, we are fond of good brass band music, provided it is produced at a sufficient distance to preclude being stunned or overpowered by its effect. It must be confessed the orchestra succeeded in reaching the utmost limit of its brazen power. Each and every player vied with every other to see who could make the most noise: it was a trial of purely physical strength and endurance.

The result was too terrific, too demoniac, to contemplate. What influences had been at work on Herr Nikisch the previous week to cause him to bring forth so much noise from his orchestra is, no doubt, a secret.

The overture was well played, though at times there was nice discrimination lacking in soft and loud. It was, as a whole, very brilliantly given, albeit there were sensational nuances injected into the score.

The interest of the evening mainly centered on the new Symphony No. 4, in G major, by Dvorak. First, because it is one of the most advanced, most extreme, of the modern composers whose works are very popular and eagerly sought by all those tinctured with the modern craze for something strange, stunningly sensational. Second, because he has been engaged by Mrs. Thurber of New York to become director of her National conservatory of music. The music of the Symphony certainly is modern and strange enough to meet the demands of the most ultra extremists. There is genius and scholarship displayed in the construction of its various parts. Some musical, pretty themes are introduced which are apparently interestingly worked out, but they were so weighted down and covered up by the tremendous noise of the orchestra as to make it well nigh impossible to follow them in their intricate windings to a satisfactory conclusion. Perhaps mere noise constitutes music; but if it does, people greatly differ. Whether or no Mr. Dvorak intended such a noisy result is a matter for him to decide. The adagio is the quintessence of eccentricity, commencing in a melancholy, dirgefuul manner, though not long continued, for it soon assumes a brazen, demonstrative hue, finally closing in almost furious abruptness, leaving one to wonder whether the world has not come to an abrupt end. The allegretto is very pretty, furnishing the pleasantest imaginative tone picture of the symphony. This movement was beautifully well played, furnishing no cause for complaint on the score of inadequate performance. The finale proved a demonstrative piece of noise and fury, a repetition in this respect of the first movement. The symphony has many qualities to admire, possesses an intensifying charm to the lover of the wild, romantic music, notwithstanding the overpowering loudness with which it was played. The work as a whole made a deep and favorable impression on the minds of the musical people present, which no doubt a second hearing would improve and intensify.

"The Prairie Scene in Central Asia" furnished an extreme contrast to what had gone before, affording ample opportunity for the mind and nerves to recuperate from the overstraining effect of what they had previously passed through, preparing them for the final struggle to come. During the playing of this piece one easily imagines how, in the great silent sandy desert, the approach of horses' hoofs can be distinctly heard, no matter how deeply they may be buried in the soft sand (as the text states), provided one's ears are near enough; but leaving this imaginative part out, how much more readily can be heard the wild, tumultuous voices of the soldiers as they sing and march along. We listened attentively to hear the caravan and the advancing soldiers, which, if not real to life, was quite near enough to give our imagination a little activity in sketching capacity.

As many times as we have heard Liszt's "Les Preludes," we never before thought it was designed for an out-door brass band! It has the reputation of being Liszt's best orchestral piece, is the most frequently given of all this master's works; but, if judged by this Saturday evening's performance, it would be condemned to the lower regions for all time to come. We cannot believe, however, that it is often given in such a rude, rough manner, and hope never to hear it again so given, for the sake of the happy recollections we have of it.

THE "EXTRA" SYMPHONY.

An extra concert by the Symphony orchestra for the benefit of the members of the orchestra, was given last Wednesday evening, March 2. The soloists were Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Alwin Schroeder and Mr. Paderewski, who generously offered their services. The programme:

Wagner...............Overture, "Tannhaeuser"
Schumann. Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor Allegro affettuoso.
Intermezzo; Andantino grazioso.
Allegro vivace.
Massenet...........Suite from "Esclarmonde"
I. Evocation (Andante maestoso).
II. L'Ile Magique (Andante moderato assai).
III. Hyménée (Andante cantabile).
IV. Dans la Forêt.
a Pastorale (Andantino sans Lenteur). b Chasse (Allegro).
(First time.
Soli for Violoncello.
a. Bach.............................. Sarabande
b. Schubert...................Moment Musical
c. Davidoff....................At the Fountain Tschaikowsky....Andantino and Scherzo from the Symphony in F minor, No. 4
Songs with Piano.
a. Delibes.................................. Regrets
b. Massenet........................ Bonne Nuit
c. Ferrari.............................A une Fiancée Liszt...Hungarian Fantasie for Pianoforte and Orchestra.

This extra concert really calls for an extended notice, so far as matter and performance are concerned, for both were far above the average. The programme contained a great variety of interesting pieces, the orchestra evidently made great endeavors to do its best, while the solo talent furnished was of the best quality and plenty of it. It was in every respect an unusual programme. The orchestra gave a fine performance of the Tannhauser overture, though the main portion of it was tamed down to an unusual degree, for Mr. Nikisch. The last episode of the overture was superbly rendered.

The Massenet suite, while more Frenchly modern than musical, is, to say the least, a queer conglomeration of all the resources of the orchestra, including some extra ones brought in. A few pleasant melodies are scattered through the different movements, mostly played by flutes, but it remains for the last, or closing, number to picture out a complete riot of all the good and bad in music, mostly bad. There is no music in it: it descends to a mere whirlwind of noise. However, it furnished a first rate novelty, and as such becomes interesting.

The andante and scherzo of Tschaikowski's was beautifully played, affording much pleasure to the large audience present.

Mr. Paderewski commenced the concerto in somewhat of an indifferent manner, but soon regained himself, giving a notable interpretation of Schumann's masterpiece. A good deal of liberty was taken in the allegro, the whole movement being given in a more subdued quality of tone than is often heard here, and the tempi were considerably stronger. The andante was made bewitchingly lovely, singing in soft, subdued tones from beginning to end in an unsurpassed, dreamy manner. The orchestra shared with Mr. Paderewski in the honor of helping make this movement seductively beautiful. The allegro vivace, so difficult in rythmic and technical qualities, was apparently overcome with that ease and repose which have become so characteristic of all Paderewski's work. There is no ostentatious display or style, as many term it, of arms, hands or body about Mr. Paderewski's playing. His style does not come from any "fad," but from the heart to the brain and fingers, which is as it should be. At the close of the concerto, Paderewski was vociferously bravoed and applauded. The Hungarian Rhapsodie was also played with astonishingly brilliant effects. Paderewski was the recipient of a beautiful laurel wreath of silver from the members of the orchestra. He hardly knew what to do with it, but finally succeeded in getting it off the stage in safety.

Mr. Schroeder of the orchestra, played three pieces on the 'cello in a most charming, artistic way. He was loudly praised and applauded.

Mrs. Julie Wyman has been so often spoken of as a superior singer that there is nothing to be said, except in praise of the fine manner in which she sang her three songs. They were of a very musical nature and can be classed thus: pretty, beautiful, brilliant. Only one fault can be found with Mrs. Wyman's singing, and that a common one with most singers—too much tremolo effect. Without this defect, for such it is, Mrs. Wyman would be a perfect singer.

Too much praise cannot be awarded to Mr. Nikisch for his most admirable accompaniments, both to Mrs. Wyman's songs and to Mr. Schroeder's solos.

JAMES M. TRACY.

THE NIKISCH RECITAL.

The postponed recital of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, will take place next Thursday evening, March 10, at Chickering hall. The programme will consist chiefly of groups of songs which Mrs. Nikisch will sing to those beautiful pianoforte accompaniments for which Mr. Nikisch is so deservedly admired. Some of the songs have been already recorded among Mrs. Nikisch's successes, while others have not yet been heard in public from her lips. At this recital Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch will introduce Master Alexander Fiedemann, who has shown in private a marked genius on the violin. Tickets are on sale at Music hall.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The programme for the sixth concert by the Kneisel quartette at Union hall to be played tomorrow evening is a most interesting one, as follows:

Ottokar Novàcek..........Quartette in E minor
(First time in America.)
Songs.
a Beethoven ....Mignon
b Mozart..........................Das Veilchen
c Haydn.................. .... Ständchen
Mme. Joachim.
Beethoven ....
Variations from Quartette, A major, op.18
Songs.
a Jos. Rud. Ahle (1662) Geistlicher (The Advent of our Saviour.)
b J. Ab. I. Schulz (1782) Sagt, wo sind die Veilchen hin.
c Mendelssohn.. Venetianisches Gondellied
d Schubert...................... Haideraskin
Mme. Joachim.
Beethoven..............Quartette, E flat, op. 74

Mme. Joachim will be the soloist. This will be a very pleasing musical event. The quartette's work is too well known to need further mention.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch's song recital, postponed from Feb. 24, is to be given Thursday, March 10, at Chickering hall. They will introduce Master Friedermann, the youthful prodigy on the violin.

The programme at the eighteenth Symphony concert last night at Music hall was: Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Hamlet," first time; Bruch, third concerto for violin, first time; Mrs. Camilla Urso, solo violin; Schumann, fourth symphony, first time, with the original version.

Boston Post

MOTTO:
With a Mission
—AND—
Without a Muzzle.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 7, 1892.

The eighteenth Symphony concert programme, like those of the four or five preceding concerts, offered novelties of a high nature. Tschaikowsky's symphonic poem "Hamlet," and Bruch's concerto for violin in D minor, Op. 58, No. 3, with Mme. Camilla Urso as soloist.

Tschaikowsky is probably one of the most remarkable composers of the day, his compositions bearing the impress of the Slavonic temperament—fantastic in outline, bold in modulation, with strongly marked rhythms. The symphonic poem is a tone picture of the tragedy of Hamlet. A passage by the muted horns representing the striking of the midnight hour is followed by a symphonic allegro typical of Hamlet's heroic intent and indecision, and a broad and beautiful motif depicting the character of Ophelia. The end of the work is solemn and tragic.

The delicacy of shading and breadth of treatment which Mr. Nikisch demanded from the orchestra was carried even beyond the point of excellence usually attained by this organization. The Schumann symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120, was exquisitely done. From the bold measures of the first movement, given with imposing power, through the beautiful mazes of the romance—the gem of the whole work—the heavier and strongly marked scherzo to the brilliant finale, perfect balance of tone, true adjustment of light and shade, virility and purity of tone characterized the rendition.

The second novelty possessed additional interest to the audience, inasmuch as it again brought before them Mme. Urso, whose appearance March 2 and 3, 1888, was remembered with feelings of pleasure. Possibly four years have somewhat dimmed our recollections of the fine points of that other performance, but she seemed to have gained in strength of touch, in size of tone and breadth of treatment. Certainly the concerto throughout was played in a masterly manner, with a beauty of phrasing rarely heard. The beautiful adagio movement, with its rich sustained notes, gave Mme. Urso an opportunity to display her artistic taste and feeling.

Next week's concert will bring Eugen D'Albert and the Beethoven concerto for pianofort, No. 5, in E flat. The programme will also contain Beethoven's overture, "Lenore, No. 2," and Schumann's symphony, No. 4, in D minor, the first performance in Boston of the original version.

Tonight the Kneisel Quartet gives its sixth chamber concert in Union Hall, and in addition to an attractive programme of instrumental selections there will be several German leider sung by Mme. Amalie Joachim.

The several times postponed recital by Mr. and Mrs Nikisch will be given on Thursday evening at Chickering Hall. Master Alexander Fiedemann, the youthful violinist, will appear at this concert.

VIVIAN.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, MARCH 7, 1892.

The programme of the eighteenth Symphony concert was as follows: Symphonic poem, "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky (first time); Bruch's concerto for violin No. 3, D minor (first time); Schumann's Symphony No. 4, D minor. Mrs. Camilla Urso was the solo violinist.

⁂

Shakspeare's "Hamlet" has been the subject of much musical consideration. First of all, there is the stage music—incidental numbers, overtures, entr'actes and marches—music that is chiefly instrumental; for the songs of Ophelia are almost always sung to traditional airs. There is the music by Mangold, Miltitz, Hirschbach, Pierson, Holland, Holly, Vogler; and the noble funeral march with chorus by Berlioz may here be mentioned. There are the operas by Gasparini, Scarlatti, Caruso, Mercadante, Marczek, Buzzola, Stadfelt, Faccio, Hignard, Thomas. There are the overtures for concert use by Joachim, Gade, Bach, Macfarren, Bischoff, symphonic poems by Liszt and E. A. MacDowell, and a "Psychic sketch" for grand orchestra by H. W. Nichols. Nor is it probable that this list is complete.

⁂

Many of these composers, as well as their compositions, are covered with dust. Even the names of some of them are forgotten, save by the compilers of dictionaries. The only operatic Hamlet known to us is the gentlemanly baritone invented by Ambroise Thomas; and his other name is Faure or Lassalle. How was it in those operas given in Rome in the early years of the eighteenth century? Did the heartsick son meet the awful spectre on the platform of Elsinore in Gasparini's version, and did the Ophelia of Domenico Scarlatti trill in her madness and drown herself in a torrent of roulades? The opera of those days was a formal, rigid thing, not unlike our "grand operatic concert, with scenery, costumes and stage appointments." Hamlet was probably a male soprano; and it is not likely that even the Ghost was allowed to be a bass.

⁂

When it was announced that French makers of opera text had laid violent hands on Shakspeare's play there was an outcry from the English; and the Germans, who claim to have discovered Shakspeare as well as music, saw another proof of the immorality of the French character. And yet it is a story to fire the fury of a musician. In the future "Hamlet," the opera as yet unwritten, the hero will be a baritone; the King, Osric, the spies will be tenors. The Ghost will be a member of a Russian choir, the owner of a true contra-bass. Polonius will not be a buffo role; let that be reserved for the First Gravedigger. Ophelia must be an alto, for she and Juliet, Cordelia and Desdemona never were sopranos. The Queen is the soprano, and a light soprano. If the old accusation of want of action be brought against the tragedy and it be again condemned as unfit for operatic purposes, the reply is simple: The modern music drama rejects action; it insists on moods, and the supernatural, intrigue, love, madness, sudden death. Surely here are themes to excite music.

⁂

Now, Tschaikowsky in his Overture-Fantasie, or Symphonic Poem, has attempted to give a musical version of the play. He frankly says to the hearer, "This is the way I am affected by the tragedy, and I wish by music to convey to you my impressions." Let us waive the question, whether such a thing be possible; let us consider the attempt of the composer, and not regard the music as absolute music. But the only way of considering the attempt is to judge the performance. First of all it may be said that such a work cannot be grasped at one hearing; yet the composer fails utterly, if a work of such long breath does not make at once a more or less definite impression. What is Tschaikowsky's self-imposed task? To suggest different scenes and different moods: the melancholy of Hamlet; the errand of the Ghost; the revenge of the son, thwarted continually by native irresolution; the Ophelia incident; the gloomy end. The division of these scenes is strongly marked; the hearer is treated as though he chiefly used his eyes, and he is led by the musical showman to different peep-holes. There is an introduction full of despair. The horn announces the unearthly visitor, and the poor Ghost brings with him a gong. The story of the murder is told by instruments of brass. Hamlet confides his purpose to the strings and Ophelia appears in the midst of the wood-wind. There are conflicting scenes in which the lovers are more strongly characterized. The drums remind us that Hamlet was a soldier. A short and simple dead march is the end. As absolute music this composition is patchwork. The prevailing colors are sombre. The stuff of the patches varies in quality. The introduction, the Ghost scene and the close are the strongest features. The Ophelia theme cannot be justly regarded as characteristic in its melodic construction or instrumental dress, however interesting it may be. The Hamlet theme is passionate enough, but in the expression of the passion there is no hint of the beauty that must lurk even in musical raging and commotion. The instrumentation as a whole is affected and not effective, and melodically and harmonically the work seems inferior to other compositions of Tschaikowsky, not to be named, for instance with the "Romeo and Juliet." The straining of the composer is too often apparent, but the most impressive passage is the close, where the effect is gained by artistic simplicity. Now, whether the scenes appeal successfully to the hearer and translate faithfully the tragedy, this question can only be answered individually by the different hearers.

⁂

The third violin concerto of Bruch was first played by Joachim in 1891 at a concert under the direction of the composer in Ousseldorf, and it has been played in other towns by Joachim and by Sarasate. Bruch has little to say in the first movement, nevertheless he consumes much valuable time. The second movement is not without pleasing moments. Then comes the inevitable third movement, and when a composer faces this task he may well imitate Henry Fielding, who once drank confusion to the man who invented the fifth act of a play. Bruch girds up his loins and makes a brave start, but after the achievement of the first theme he goes to pieces, nor does he gain his second wind. The concerto as a whole is respectable, long and dull. Mrs. Camilla Urso was unfortunate at the beginning, for her playing was untuneful; she soon recovered herself and played admirably, with full tone, musician-like phrasing, nobility of taste and mastery of technical difficulties. She was loudly and deservedly applauded.

⁂

The Symphony Saturday evening was the D minor of Schumann. Next Saturday the early version of this work will be performed, i. e., Messrs. Brahm's and Wuellner's edition; for these learned gentlemen arranged the original version according to their taste, now preferring one reading, and now choosing another. Mr. Nikisch's ideas concerning the interpretation of the familiar version are well known. The performance Saturday evening was dramatic, or, rather, melo-dramatic. There was fire and there was swing; the brass roared lustily; the drummer never flinched from the assigned duty and there was considerable excitement.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 20, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE program with which our Boston visitors regaled our musical public on Tuesday night of last week, on the occasion of their third concert this season, was of an exclusively romantic order, and, although not so announced, contained an absolute novelty, at least as far as this country, and we believe also as far as Europe, is concerned.

This was Peter Tschaikowsky's concert fantasia for piano and orchestra, op. 56, in G major. The work has never, to our recollection at least, appeared on a concert program, and it redounds therefore to Mrs. Julia Rivé King's credit to have brought to public notice one of the most interesting works the gifted Russian ever wrote for the piano. Certainly the second theme of the first movement is one of the strongest Tschaikowsky ever invented, and the slow movement in G minor, a dialogue between piano and violoncello (the latter instrument exquisitely handled by Mr. Schroeder), is absolutely beautiful. The last movement has too much of the Cossack spirit in it to please non-Muscovite musical ears, but it is fresh and interesting nevertheless and requires a good performer. The one great fault in the work is the cadenza in the first movement, which is entirely too long drawn out and lacks in variety or novelty of pianistic devices. Moreover, it ought to have been played with more verve and abandon than Mrs. King by her very nature was able to bestow upon it. This, however, is the only adverse criticism we have to offer upon that amiable artist's performance, for in every other respect her playing was most enjoyable and did ample justice to a work which bristles with difficulties. Her technic and musical memory, crispness and clearness of touch, good round tone and careful phrasing and pedaling were alike admirable. It is also but fair to state that she achieved a pronounced success.

The orchestral accompaniment, which is likewise no child's play, was, barring a single mistake (the one bar too previous entrance of the horn), performed in most careful, discreet and commendable fashion.

Mr. Nikisch gave a somewhat novel reading of the venerable "Freischütz" overture by drawing out the opening adagio to a breadth that Weber would probably have put down as a largo if he had intended it played so slowly; but the coda was given with a spirit and precision that were perfectly electrifying.

Of E. A. MacDowell's graceful and dainty orchestral suite, op. 42, in A minor, we have repeatedly spoken in terms of high praise, and it can only be reiterated that with more frequent hearing, especially when so exquisitely performed, the miniature work gains upon the listener, who discovers new harmonic beauties that are apt to be overlooked, or rather overheard, in less carefully brought out reproductions.

The final number was perhaps a trifle too lengthy, but otherwise fitted exceedingly well into the scheme of the program. It was Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," dubbed a "symphony" by its composer, but in reality certainly more of the style and character of a suite. New York is thoroughly familiar with this interesting and richly endowed work of the Austrian composer, as it was one of the late Dr. Damrosch's favorites and he used to give it a most lovable reading. More tenderly, however, he never could have cared for it than did Mr. Nikisch, whose working out of the technical details and the brilliant colors of the orchestration showed a performance carried by study to the point of virtuosity.

The Bostonians, it goes without saying, were exceedingly well received and elicited heartiest applause from a fashionable audience that crowded Chickering Hall to its utmost, despite the counter attraction of Patti's first reappearance this season on the same evening.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

LITTLE need to attach the legend "Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch" under the portraits of this week's issue of THE MUSICAL COURIER. Nikisch is now a name to conjure with in America, as it formerly was in Europe. Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch are a spirituelle combination that one seldom encounters in the artistic world, and in the singular unanimity of their tastes and happy married life they naturally recall to one's mind the similar unions of the Schumanns and the Brownings. Devotion to the very highest artistic ideals, coupled with a high degree of musical culture, single the Nikisches out as rare specimens seldom met with in the art world of to-day, where pelf is more eagerly sought for than genuine striving for lofty achievement.

Arthur Nikisch commands the forces of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an orchestra, be it said, that has no parallel on this side of the Atlantic Ocean, and grave doubts may be entertained if it has many rivals in Europe. The technical precision of the band and the immense fire and energy it displays may be credited in great part to its leader, whose virile, magnetic beat, enormous musical knowledge and widely cultured sympathies are well known now to metropolitan music lovers. Mr. Nikisch, whose personality is both graceful and forceful, is at home in most schools, for he is eclectic in his tastes, but as an interpreter of Schumann he has no equal, and the warmth and luminous qualities of his readings of the latter and other modern masters place him in the highest ranks of living conductors.

His gifted and charming wife, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, was a pupil of Schneider in Cologne, and received the most solid training in song, oratorio and opera. She sang in grand opera in Germany until Mr. Nikisch met her, wooed and won her. She is the possessor of a beautiful mezzo-soprano voice, exquisitely cultivated, and in Lieder compositions by Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms, her strong forte, she displays musical insight and delightful taste.

That Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch are potent factors in the advancement of musical culture of this country goes without saying.

The Kneisel Quartet.

WHETHER it was through the circumstance of the vastly superior acoustic qualities of the chamber music hall in the new Carnegie Hall as against those of Sherry's, or the most interesting program presented, or whether their playing was really above anything they had formerly done, anyhow the fact remains that never before, at least as far back as the writer's memory reaches, was a better chamber music performance given in New York than the one of the Kneisel Quartet on Friday evening last. They were heard in a beautiful string quartet in E flat by Carl von Dittersdorf, the immediate predecessor of Mozart, on whose writings he must have had an undisputable influence, for every once in a while a theme of Dittersdorf or the treatment of it shows where he "anticipated" "Don Giovanni." It is, indeed, a noble and pure work, especially the exquisite slow movement in G, which, however, did not originally belong to the E flat quartet, but was inserted in its present place by Concertmeister Lauterbach of Dresden, to whom belongs the credit of having edited many fine chamber music works.

The B flat andante from Grieg's G minor quartet was the second number. It is as characteristic of Grieg's peculiar mood and his mannerisms of harmonization as anything that can be imagined, and throughout breathes that Northern musical atmosphere that we have learned to associate with the name of Grieg.

Schubert's divinely beautiful and divinely long quintet in C major was the pièce de résistance of the evening. It is a veritable symphony for five instruments, and the second theme in E flat of the first movement is as lovely as the now celebrated 'cello theme of the unfinished symphony. Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder were assisted in the performance of this quintet by Mr. Leo Schultz, who most favorably distinguished himself in his discreet handling of the second violoncello part. Altogether, as we said before, the Boston organization gave us some quartet playing which for refinement, absolute unity of ensemble and musical qualities, both of reading and performance, has not been equaled, let alone surpassed, here for many, many years.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch's Recital.—Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will give a recital at Chickering Hall this afternoon, 2:30, assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann, the talented young violinist and protégé of Adolph Brodsky. The program will be the following:

Songs..	"Die Quelle"	Goldmark
	"Der Nussbaum"	Schumann
	"Volkslied"	August Bungert
	"Ein Bettlerpaerchen"	Richard Heuberger
	"Indian Love Song"	Reginald de Koven
	"Provençalisches Lied"	Schumann
Violin sol.,	"Fantaisie Caprice"	Brahms
Songs..	"Geheimniss"	Brahms
	"Therese"
	"Staendchen"
	"Wiegenlied"
	"Des Liebsten Schwur"
	"Vergeblisches Staendchen"
Violin solos
Songs..	"Am Manzanares"	Jensen
	"Beim Tanze"	Tschaikowsky
	"Serenade"	Richard Strauss
	"Staendchen"	Jensen
	"Fruehlingsnacht"	Schumann

The Boston Symphony Orchestra fairly eclipsed its own record at the concert on the 13th and played a most interesting program. Mrs. Nikisch, the soloist, was well received and made a more favorable impression than last season.

Last year the "Boston" concerts were given in the academy, seating nearly 1,600, and the house was packed at every performance. This year at the Congregational Church, seating only 1,100, there have been many vacant seats at the two concerts so far given. This shows the influence that a regular place of amusement has on the size of an audience and what a blessing Metzerott Hall, when completed, will be to all musical endeavors.

The authorities of the Congregational Church have placed themselves in an unfavorable light before the Washington public by the energy they displayed in beating around their rules so as to allow the use of the church to the Boston orchestra and refusing the same to local organizations. The church was for many years the principal, and part of the time the only, place for giving concerts and lectures. As their property and running expenses were in large part paid for by local amusement goers their present action shows at least a lack of a proper sense of gratitude for past benefits.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore.—Nikisch and his superb organization were in Baltimore on January 14, and drew a very large audience. This was the program, Mrs. Nikisch being the soloist:

A "Faust" overture	Wagner
"Mignon"	Liszt
Overture, "Manfred"	Schumann
Songs, with piano—
"Amore e Luce"	Bungert
"Staendchen"	Richard Strauss
"Fruehlingsnacht"	Schumann
Symphony in A, No. 7	Beethoven

Stanley.—Mr. A. A. Stanley, professor of music in the University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor, has with that characteristic hustle for which he is noted secured Paderewski for a concert in University Hall, February 15. This is in addition to the regular series inaugurated by the Choral Union, which includes the Mockridge Concert Company, Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," with Dippel, Heinrich and Mrs. Bishop as soloists; the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a concert by the Choral Union of nearly 300 voices, Musin Concert Company and the Detroit Philharmonic Club. Professor Stanley is doing much to advance the musical interests of Ann Arbor, and has just succeeded in securing a guaranty fund from 100 of the best citizens for the establishment of a school of music, which with himself as director will be an assured success. He is already negotiating with some of the best known teachers, and the outlook is most encouraging. We believe Ann Arbor to be the only city of its size in America which is favored with the class of concerts and lectures which we are allowed each year to enjoy.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society.—The third public rehearsal and concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society took place last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively. The program consisted of Schumann's B flat symphony, Rubinstein's D minor piano concerto prelude, adagio and gavot for strings, Bach (arranged by Bachrich), and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The audience was large, and the orchestra as usual played beautifully. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist, and played brilliantly and most musically, and had many recalls. Arthur Nikisch conducted.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1818.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 7, 1892.

MORE NOVELTIES

IN SATURDAY'S SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAMME.

Shakespeare's "Hamlet" as Filtered Through the Mind of Tschaikowsky—Camilla Urso as the Soloist in Bruch's New Concerto for the Violin—The Pachmann Recital.

Again a programme of novelties. We are having as many novelties in the programmes of the present as we were wont to have in the days of Henschel. It may be confessed that, in Saturday's instance, the new works were not very interesting, but since they were compositions by acknowledged masters of modern music, it was but right that they should have a single hearing. A constant round of the standard masterpieces would mean stagnation; opportunities for comparison generally lead to musical growth. The concert began with a Shakespearian subject filtered through the mind of Tschaikowsky. It was called "Hamlet," but the "melancholy Dane" seemed to have borrowed a few traits of "Bombastes Furioso" and became a military swaggerer. The Fortinbras episode was made far too prominent, and marches and the shocks of battle were in the work until the auditor became half convinced that Hamlet entered upon the revenge of his father's wrongs at the head of a few battalions. The ghost was, however, quite recognizable; he entered after a stroke of the gong, just like his spectral cousin, King Ninus, in Rossini's "Semiramide." A muted horn made desperate attempts to sound like a midnight bell of a most baleful order, and the kettledrums were big with fate as they ushered in the opening theme. The work throughout was scored in the heaviest manner. A long phrase for English horn was charmingly played, but I dare not attempt to guess its Shakespearian meaning, although a slip or two in the woodwind may have illustrated the lines.

Hamlet—Will you play upon this pipe?
Guildenstern—My lord, I cannot.

But the general performance was excellent and so was the conductor's reading; this time the mountain came to Mahomet for the work suited Mr. Nikisck's enjoyment of powerful phrases.

Then came Bruch's new concerto for violin (in D minor), with Camilla Urso as soloist. It is 40 years since Camilla Urso appeared in Boston first as a child prodigy. In Dwight's Journal of Music of Oct. 9, 1852, we read: "Little Camilla Urso, the girl violinist, but 11 years old, announced a concert at Masonic Temple for last evening, just too late for notice in this paper. But we had the pleasure, and a choice one it was, of hearing her the other evening in a company of some 40 invited guests, in Mr. Chickering's saloon. Her playing is not only truly wonderful, but wonderfully true; true in style, expression, feeling, as it is true in intonation and all mechanical respects.

"Her appearance is most interesting; a face full of intellectual and sedate expression; a large forehead wearing the 'pale cast of thought,' etc. Pity only that such a fine life must be lived out so fast, and always in the blaze of too much sun for plants so young and tender."

The prediction has not been fulfilled in its sad prognostication, for the life that seemed destined to run a short but phenomenal course, has now developed into a sturdy musical nature of the worthiest sort. The playing of the artist was not of the astonishing kind, but broad, soulful and majestic, a playing like that of the lamented Wieniawski, that caused technique to be forgotten by the auditor.

But the work, although possessing some noble thoughts, particularly in the adagio, was a disappointment; it is too prolix. It is dwarfed by comparison with Bruch's own concerto in G minor (one of the world famous compositions in this form), and it seems but a dilution of the majesty and breadth of that masterpiece. It was composed in 1891, and was played by Joachim, to whom it is dedicated, at Dusseldorf, last summer, for the first time. It is warlike in many of its themes, as a great deal of the music of this modern Tyrtæus seems to be. The adagio has a touch of Wagner in its ecstatic ending in high positions on the strings, and long notes on the woodwind. The tutti passages of the first movement are more than mere transitions—they are lofty themes, and the stately rythm of the finale might represent a Greek war dance. But the inordinate length will militate against the success of the work as a concert number. The playing of Mme. Urso, however, won a great triumph, and recall followed recall at the termination of the task.

Schumann's D minor symphony ended the concert. The first movement was taken at a furious speed, which sometimes obscured the accompanying figures. The preponderance of the first violins, to which I have previously alluded, increased this fault. But the two last movements were finely given. The Scherzo is not humorous; none of Schumann's Scherzi are playful (he is the opposite of Mendelssohn in this respect), for what humor there was in the introspective master was as earnest as that of an Aristophanes. The performance seemed to bring out just this earnestness, and was very successful.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Kneisel Quartette concert tonight at Union Hall will be a delightful one for lovers of this beautiful class of music. Mme. Amalie Joachim will take part.

The song recital by Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, postponed on account of illness, will be given Thursday evening at Chickering Hall. Master Arthur Fiedemann, the young violinist, will assist.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 20, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE program with which our Boston visitors regaled our musical public on Tuesday night of last week, on the occasion of their third concert this season, was of an exclusively romantic order, and, although not so announced, contained an absolute novelty, at least as far as this country, and we believe also as far as Europe, is concerned.

This was Peter Tschaikowsky's concert fantasia for piano and orchestra, op. 56, in G major. The work has never, to our recollection at least, appeared on a concert program, and it redounds therefore to Mrs. Julia Rivé King's credit to have brought to public notice one of the most interesting works the gifted Russian ever wrote for the piano. Certainly the second theme of the first movement is one of the strongest Tschaikowsky ever invented, and the slow movement in G minor, a dialogue between piano and violoncello (the latter instrument exquisitely handled by Mr. Schroeder), is absolutely beautiful. The last movement has too much of the Cossack spirit in it to please non-Muscovite musical ears, but it is fresh and interesting nevertheless and requires a good performer. The one great fault in the work is the cadenza in the first movement, which is entirely too long drawn out and lacks in variety or novelty of pianistic devices. Moreover, it ought to have been played with more verve and abandon than Mrs. King by her very nature was able to bestow upon it. This, however, is the only adverse criticism we have to offer upon that amiable artist's performance, for in every other respect her playing was most enjoyable and did ample justice to a work which bristles with difficulties. Her technic and musical memory, crispness and clearness of touch, good round tone and careful phrasing and pedaling were alike admirable. It is also but fair to state that she achieved a pronounced success.

The orchestral accompaniment, which is likewise no child's play, was, barring a single mistake (the one bar too previous entrance of the horn), performed in most careful, discreet and commendable fashion.

Mr. Nikisch gave a somewhat novel reading of the venerable "Freischütz" overture by drawing out the opening adagio to a breadth that Weber would probably have put down as a largo if he had intended it played so slowly; but the coda was given with a spirit and precision that were perfectly electrifying.

Of E. A. MacDowell's graceful and dainty orchestral suite, op. 42, in A minor, we have repeatedly spoken in terms of high praise, and it can only be reiterated that with more frequent hearing, especially when so exquisitely performed, the miniature work gains upon the listener, who discovers new harmonic beauties that are apt to be overlooked, or rather overheard, in less carefully brought out reproductions.

The final number was perhaps a trifle too lengthy, but otherwise fitted exceedingly well into the scheme of the program. It was Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," dubbed a "symphony" by its composer, but in reality certainly more of the style and character of a suite. New York is thoroughly familiar with this interesting and richly endowed work of the Austrian composer, as it was one of the late Dr. Damrosch's favorites and he used to give it a most lovable reading. More tenderly, however, he never could have cared for it than did Mr. Nikisch, whose working out of the technical details and the brilliant colors of the orchestration showed a performance carried by study to the point of virtuosity.

The Bostonians, it goes without saying, were exceedingly well received and elicited heartiest applause from a fashionable audience that crowded Chickering Hall to its utmost, despite the counter attraction of Patti's first reappearance this season on the same evening.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

LITTLE need to attach the legend "Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch" under the portraits of this week's issue of THE MUSICAL COURIER. Nikisch is now a name to conjure with in America, as it formerly was in Europe. Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch are a spirituelle combination that one seldom encounters in the artistic world, and in the singular unanimity of their tastes and happy married life they naturally recall to one's mind the similar unions of the Schumanns and the Brownings. Devotion to the very highest artistic ideals, coupled with a high degree of musical culture, single the Nikisches out as rare specimens seldom met with in the art world of to-day, where pelf is more eagerly sought for than genuine striving for lofty achievement.

Arthur Nikisch commands the forces of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an orchestra, be it said, that has no parallel on this side of the Atlantic Ocean, and grave doubts may be entertained if it has many rivals in Europe. The technical precision of the band and the immense fire and energy it displays may be credited in great part to its leader, whose virile, magnetic beat, enormous musical knowledge and widely cultured sympathies are well known now to metropolitan music lovers. Mr. Nikisch, whose personality is both graceful and forceful, is at home in most schools, for he is eclectic in his tastes, but as an interpreter of Schumann he has no equal, and the warmth and luminous qualities of his readings of the latter and other modern masters place him in the highest ranks of living conductors.

His gifted and charming wife, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, was a pupil of Schneider in Cologne, and received the most solid training in song, oratorio and opera. She sang in grand opera in Germany until Mr. Nikisch met her, wooed and won her. She is the possessor of a beautiful mezzo-soprano voice, exquisitely cultivated, and in Lieder compositions by Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms, her strong forte, she displays musical insight and delightful taste.

That Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch are potent factors in the advancement of musical culture of this country goes without saying.

The Kneisel Quartet.

WHETHER it was through the circumstance of the vastly superior acoustic qualities of the chamber music hall in the new Carnegie Hall as against those of Sherry's, or the most interesting program presented, or whether their playing was really above anything they had formerly done, anyhow the fact remains that never before, at least as far back as the writer's memory reaches, was a better chamber music performance given in New York than the one of the Kneisel Quartet on Friday evening last. They were heard in a beautiful string quartet in E flat by Carl von Dittersdorf, the immediate predecessor of Mozart, on whose writings he must have had an undisputable influence, for every once in a while a theme of Dittersdorf or the treatment of it shows where he "anticipated" "Don Giovanni." It is, indeed, a noble and pure work, especially the exquisite slow movement in G, which, however, did not originally belong to the E flat quartet, but was inserted in its present place by Concertmeister Lauterbach of Dresden, to whom belongs the credit of having edited many fine chamber music works.

The B flat andante from Grieg's G minor quartet was the second number. It is as characteristic of Grieg's peculiar mood and his mannerisms of harmonization as anything that can be imagined, and throughout breathes that Northern musical atmosphere that we have learned to associate with the name of Grieg.

Schubert's divinely beautiful and divinely long quintet in C major was the pièce de résistance of the evening. It is a veritable symphony for five instruments, and the second theme in E flat of the first movement is as lovely as the now celebrated 'cello theme of the unfinished symphony. Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder were assisted in the performance of this quintet by Mr. Leo Schultz, who most favorably distinguished himself in his discreet handling of the second violoncello part. Altogether, as we said before, the Boston organization gave us some quartet playing which for refinement, absolute unity of ensemble and musical qualities, both of reading and performance, has not been equaled, let alone surpassed, here for many, many years.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch's Recital.—Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will give a recital at Chickering Hall this afternoon, 2:30, assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann, the talented young violinist and protégé of Adolph Brodsky. The program will be the following:

Songs..	"Die Quelle"	Goldmark
	"Der Nussbaum"	Schumann
	"Volkslied"	August Bungert
	"Ein Bettlerpaerchen"	Richard Heuberger
	"Indian Love Song"	Reginald de Koven
	"Provençalisches Lied"	Schumann
Violin solo,	"Fantaisie Caprice"	Brahms
Songs..	"Geheimniss"	Brahms
	"Therese"
	"Staendchen"
	"Wiegenlied"
	"Des Liebsten Schwur"
	"Vergeblisches Staendchen"
Violin solos...
Songs..	"Am Manzanares"	Jensen
	"Beim Tanze"	Tschaikowsky
	"Serenade"	Richard Strauss
	"Staendchen"	Jensen
	"Fruehlingsnacht"	Schumann

The Boston Symphony Orchestra fairly eclipsed its own record at the concert on the 13th and played a most interesting program. Mrs. Nikisch, the soloist, was well received and made a more favorable impression than last season.

Last year the "Boston" concerts were given in the academy, seating nearly 1,600, and the house was packed at every performance. This year at the Congregational Church, seating only 1,100, there have been many vacant seats at the two concerts so far given. This shows the influence that a regular place of amusement has on the size of an audience and what a blessing Metzerott Hall, when completed, will be to all musical endeavors.

The authorities of the Congregational Church have placed themselves in an unfavorable light before the Washington public by the energy they displayed in beating around their rules so as to allow the use of the church to the Boston orchestra and refusing the same to local organizations. The church was for many years the principal, and part of the time the only, place for giving concerts and lectures. As their property and running expenses were in large part paid for by local amusement goers their present action shows at least a lack of a proper sense of gratitude for past benefits.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore.—Nikisch and his superb organization were in Baltimore on January 14, and drew a very large audience. This was the program, Mrs. Nikisch being the soloist:

A "Faust" overture	Wagner
"Mignon"	Liszt
Overture, "Manfred"	Schumann
Songs, with piano—
"Amore e Luce"	Bungert
"Staendchen"	Richard Strauss
"Fruehlingsnacht"	Schumann
Symphony in A, No. 7	Beethoven

Stanley.—Mr. A. A. Stanley, professor of music in the University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor, has with that characteristic hustle for which he is noted secured Paderewski for a concert in University Hall, February 15. This is in addition to the regular series inaugurated by the Choral Union, which includes the Mockridge Concert Company, Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," with Dippel, Heinrich and Mrs. Bishop as soloists; the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a concert by the Choral Union of nearly 300 voices, Musin Concert Company and the Detroit Philharmonic Club. Professor Stanley is doing much to advance the musical interests of Ann Arbor, and has just succeeded in securing a guaranty fund from 100 of the best citizens for the establishment of a school of music, which with himself as director will be an assured success. He is already negotiating with some of the best known teachers, and the outlook is most encouraging. We believe Ann Arbor to be the only city of its size in America which is favored with the class of concerts and lectures which we are allowed each year to enjoy.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society.—The third public rehearsal and concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society took place last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively. The program consisted of Schumann's B flat symphony, Rubinstein's D minor piano concerto prelude, adagio and gavot for strings, Bach (arranged by Bachrich), and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The audience was large, and the orchestra as usual played beautifully. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist, and played brilliantly and most musically, and had many re- Nikisch conducted.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 7, 1892.

MORE NOVELTIES

IN SATURDAY'S SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAMME.

Shakespeare's "Hamlet" as Filtered Through the Mind of Tschaikowsky—Camilla Urso as the Soloist in Bruch's New Concerto for the Violin—The Pachmann Recital.

Again a programme of novelties. We are having as many novelties in the programmes of the present as we were wont to have in the days of Henschel. It may be confessed that, in Saturday's instance, the new works were not very interesting, but since they were compositions by acknowledged masters of modern music, it was but right that they should have a single hearing. A constant round of the standard masterpieces would mean stagnation; opportunities for comparison generally lead to musical growth. The concert began with a Shakespearian subject filtered through the mind of Tschaikowsky. It was called "Hamlet," but the "melancholy Dane" seemed to have borrowed a few traits of "Bombastes Furioso" and became a military swaggerer. The Fortinbras episode was made far too prominent, and marches and the shocks of battle were in the work until the auditor became half convinced that Hamlet entered upon the revenge of his father's wrongs at the head of a few battalions. The ghost was, however, quite recognizable; he entered after a stroke of the gong, just like his spectral cousin, King Ninus, in Rossini's "Semiramide." A muted horn made desperate attempts to sound like a midnight bell of a most baleful order, and the kettledrums were big with fate as they ushered in the opening theme. The work throughout was scored in the heaviest manner. A long phrase for English horn was charmingly played, but I dare not attempt to guess its Shakespearian meaning, although a slip or two in the woodwind may have illustrated the lines.

Hamlet—Will you play upon this pipe?
Guildenstern—My lord, I cannot.

But the general performance was excellent and so was the conductor's reading; this time the mountain came to Mahomet for the work suited Mr. Nikisck's enjoyment of powerful phrases.

Then came Bruch's new concerto for violin (in D minor), with Camilla Urso as soloist. It is 40 years since Camilla Urso appeared in Boston first as a child prodigy. In Dwight's Journal of Music of Oct. 9, 1852, we read: "Little Camilla Urso, the girl violinist, but 11 years old, announced a concert at Masonic Temple for last evening, just too late for notice in this paper. But we had the pleasure, and a choice one it was, of hearing her the other evening in a company of some 40 invited guests, in Mr. Chickering's saloon. Her playing is not only truly wonderful, but wonderfully true; true in style, expression, feeling, as it is true in intonation and all mechanical respects.

"Her appearance is most interesting; a face full of intellectual and sedate expression; a large forehead wearing the 'pale cast of thought,' etc. Pity only that such a fine life must be lived out so fast, and always in the blaze of too much sun for plants so young and tender."

The prediction has not been fulfilled in its sad prognostication, for the life that seemed destined to run a short but phenomenal course, has now developed into a sturdy musical nature of the worthiest sort. The playing of the artist was not of the astonishing kind, but broad, soulful and majestic, a playing like that of the lamented Wieniawski, that caused technique to be forgotten by the auditor.

But the work, although possessing some noble thoughts, particularly in the adagio, was a disappointment; it is too prolix. It is dwarfed by comparison with Bruch's own concerto in G minor (one of the world famous compositions in this form), and it seems but a dilution of the majesty and breadth of that masterpiece. It was composed in 1891, and was played by Joachim, to whom it is dedicated, at Dusseldorf, last summer, for the first time. It is warlike in many of its themes, as a great deal of the music of this modern Tyrtæus seems to be. The adagio has a touch of Wagner in its ecstatic ending in high positions on the strings, and long notes on the woodwind. The tutti passages of the first movement are more than mere transitions—they are lofty themes, and the stately rythm of the finale might represent a Greek war dance. But the inordinate length will militate against the success of the work as a concert number. The playing of Mme. Urso, however, won a great triumph, and recall followed recall at the termination of the task.

Schumann's D minor symphony ended the concert. The first movement was taken at a furious speed, which sometimes obscured the accompanying figures. The preponderance of the first violins, to which I have previously alluded, increased this fault. But the two last movements were finely given. The Scherzo is not humorous; none of Schumann's Scherzi are playful (he is the opposite of Mendelssohn in this respect), for what humor there was in the introspective master was as earnest as that of an Aristophanes. The performance seemed to bring out just this earnestness, and was very successful.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Kneisel Quartette concert tonight at Union Hall will be a delightful one for lovers of this beautiful class of music. Mme. Amalie Joachim will take part.

The song recital by Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, postponed on account of illness, will be given Thursday evening at Chickering Hall. Master Arthur Fiedemann, the young violinist, will assist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 6, 1892.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mme. Urso Plays a Violin Solo and the Orchestra is Heard with Pleasure.

Mme. Camilla Urso was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, and Music Hall was crowded beyond comfort by an audience eager to hear the talented violinist and to enjoy the good things offered by Director Nikisch's band.

The programme was made up of a symphonic poem, "Hamlet," by Tschaikowsky; Bruch's concerto for violin, No. 3, in D minor, and Schumann's splendid symphony in D minor.

The concerto had not before been heard in Boston, and it is a pleasure to record that the high expectations of the audience regarding the composition, awakened by the brilliant sucess of the composer's first concerto, were fully realized.

It is a magnificent work, full of interesting musical ideas, intelligently set forth, and rich in delightful melodies. Excellent opportunity is offered for display of virtuosity by the solo performer, and the instrumentation of the accompaniment is notably rich and effective.

That Mme. Urso would give an admirable interpration of the writing was, of course, confidently expected, so generally known is the ability of this talented artiste.

Her last appearance with the Symphony orchestra was in 1888, but she has often been heard here in concerts since then, and she has never failed to win the admiration of her most critical auditors.

There are are very few women violin players who compare with her either as an exponent of the mechanical possibilities of the instrument or of its resources for expression of musical sentiment.

She plays in a free, unaffected manner; surmounts with ease the most difficult passages; gives artistic expression to every theme, and to every note a delicious, pure and always accurate tone.

At both the afternoon rehearsal and evening concert she was repeatedly recalled by most enthusiastic applause.

Another "first offering" by Conductor Nikisch was the Tschaikowsky symphonic poem, "Hamlet." It is an excellent example of this composer's rare skill in creating effective tone pictures, and it is treated throughout in a thoroughly artistic and musicianly manner. A second hearing of the work will be welcome.

Schumann's symphony in D was the final offering, and very few of the auditors left their seats, or moved from their few inches of standing room until the end of the performance. Few symphonies are more gladly listened to than this masterpiece of Schumann's, and most grateful are the majority of the Boston Symphony concert patrons to Mr. Nikisch for his sympathetic, intelligent and altogether delightful interpretation of the work.

For next Friday afternoon's rehearsal and Saturday evening's concert the programme will be as follows:

Overture, Lenore, No. 2 .... Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat .. Beethoven
Symphony No. 4, in D minor .... Schumann
(First performance in Boston of the original version.)
Mr. Eugen d'Albert, soloist.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch's Song Recital.

At Chickering Hall next Thursday evening Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch are to appear in a song recital, and Master Fiedemann, the young violinist, is to play.

He is but 12 years old, but has already shown marked talent as a player, displaying powerful tone and surprising technique for one so young.

He is a protege of Prof. Brodsky, who found him in Russia and at once undertook his education.

The programme will be as follows:

Goldmark .... Die Quelle
Schumann .... Der Nussbaum
August Bungert .... Volkslied
Richard Heuberger .... Ein Bettlermarchen
Robert Franz .... Standchen
Schumann .... Provencalisches Lied
Vieuxtemps .... Fantasie Caprice for Violin
Brahms .... Geheimniss
Therese
Standchen
Wiegenlied
Des liebsten Schwur
Vergebliches Standchen

Soli for Violin.

Spohr .... Adagio from the Concerto No. 9
Miska Hauser .... Hungarian Rhapsody
R. de Koven .... Indian Love Song
Tschaikowsky .... Beim Tanze
Richard Strauss .... Serenade
Jensen .... Am Manzanares
Schumann .... Fruhlingsnacht

Kneisel Quartette.

The Kneisel quartette's chamber concert, tomorrow night at Union Hall, will have Mme. Amalia Joachim for soloist. The programme will be as follows:

Ottokar Novacek .... Quartette in E minor
(First time in America.)

Songs.

Mme. Joachim.

a Beethoven .... Mignon
b Mozart .... Das Veilchen
c Haydn .... Standchen
Beethoven, Variations from quartette, A major, Op. 18.

Songs.

Mme. Joachim.

a Jos. Rud. Ahle (1662), Geistlicher Dialogue (The advent of our Saviour.)
b J. Ab. I. Schulz (1782), Sagt, wo sind die Veilchen hin.
c Mendelssohn .... Venetianisches Gondellied
d Schubert .... Haideraskin
Beethoven .... Quartette, E flat, Op. 74

—The Symphony orchestra benefit concert Wednesday evening was an exceptionally interesting occasion, and rarely has such a brilliant audience assembled this season as that which completely filled Music Hall that night, in spite of the storm. The conductor's stand was prettily decorated with smilax and red roses, and in one corner of each of the music stands used by the orchestra was tied a bunch of white and red carnations, making a charming effect. These little souvenirs each man carried home with him. In the great audience were Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Higginson, Mrs. Agassiz, Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Curtis, Mrs. F. S. Watson, Mrs. E. W. Codman and daughter, Mrs. George Shattuck with Mrs. J. L. Gardner, Mr. and Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Mr. Edward Jackson, Mr. Josiah Bradlee and Miss Bradlee, Mrs. Fiske Warren and her sister, Miss Osgood, Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang, Mrs. Apthorp, Mr. and Mrs. Linzee Tilden, Mrs. E. N. Fenno, Mr. Frank Jackson, Dr. Sturgis Bigelow and party, the Misses Stackpole, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. and Mrs. John H. Bradford, Dr. and Mrs. W. P. Wesselhoeft, Mr and Mrs. Elliot Pratt, Dr. W. A. Dunn, Mr. W. P. Blake, Dr. and Mrs. C. J. Blake, Mr. Arthur Beebe, Mr. Frank Beebe, Mr. Arthur Austin, Miss Austin, Mr. Tracy Dana, Dr. and Mrs. Angell, Mr. R. H. Gorham and Mr. Arthur Gorham, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Zerrahn, Mr. Perabo, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Hecht, Mr. B. L. Whelpley and Mr. S. B. Whitney.

—The beautiful French gilt mantel clock given Mr. Nikisch on Wednesday night by the orchestra, was not publicly presented, as was the Paderewski laurel wreath, but was placed, after the concert, in the artist's room, where Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch's more intimate friends assembled to congratulate them and Mr. Paderewski, and to see both the clock and the silver wreath. The former was inscribed with the affection and gratitude of the Symphony orchestra, and was a genuine surprise to Mr. Nikisch.

—Mrs. Wyman, whose exquisite voice and style are gaining golden opinions for her all over the country, had an ovation Wednesday night at the Music Hall, and her singing of a group of French chansons was delicious. She looked unusually handsome in a chic Paris creation, the decollete bodice of pale blue with gold bands, and the skirt of black chiffon edged with blue and gold. A blue ribbon was tied in her dark hair. She wore no jewels. Mrs. Wyman is in New York today.

—At the Symphony concert a week ago Saturday night Mrs. Nikisch looked very distinguished and handsome, all in white, with a small white and scarlet bonnet. She understands the art of dressing perfectly and has decided chic.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, MARCH 7, 1892.

The Eighteenth Symphony Concert.

The numbers that made up the programme of the 18th Symphony concert on Saturday evening were "Hamlet," a symphonic poem, by Tschaikowsky; Concerto No. 3, Max Bruch, and Schumann's D-minor Symphony, No. 4. Mrs. Camilla Urso was the violinist. Both the Tschaikowsky and Bruch pieces were played for the first time in these concerts, and neither of them are in the best vein of their composer. The "Hamlet" is a pompous, commonplace piece of patchwork, but it gave Mr. Nikisch the opportunity to whip up the band to the dynamic indications of the composer who reaches in his score the extraordinary high-water mark of fffffs. Now, we have often wondered what mark would designate the noise and fury of the Symphony orchestra sometimes, and here came the revelation.

To be sure the band played just as loud when it was marked fff and ff and even f, but this didn't matter in disturbing the conclusion that fffffs was really the indication of the pressure per square inch of loudest noise that we have dealt out to us by the orchestra under the enthusiastic lead of Mr. Nikisch. The Concerto No. 3 of Bruch is a great falling off from the standard of his No. 1, which takes a place among the greatest works of its class. Mrs. Urso played it with all the well-known grace and skill that we are accustomed to from this eminent artist, although the intonation was not faultlessly perfect. This was more particularly the case in the first movement. The Schumann symphony which ended the concert was rendered in the stereotyped form that is now so familiar in all of Mr. Nikisch's work, a vigorous coarseness being one of the most prominent elements.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 7, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Tschaikowsky: Symphonic Poem, "Hamlet."
Max Bruch: Violin Concerto No. 3, in D minor, op. 58.
Schumann: Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120.
Mme. Camilla Urso was the violinist.

Composers, when writing an overture to, or symphonic poem on, a tragedy, have sometimes been known to select a short quotation from the tragedy itself to serve as a motto for their composition. Thus Wagner took Faust's "Entbehren sollst du, sollst entbehren!" as a motto for his "Eine Faust Overture;" in like manner Tschaikowsky might have taken Hamlet's

"Woo't weep? woo't fight? woo't fast? woo't tear thyself?
Woo't drink up Esil? eat a crocodile?
I'll do 't. * * * * *
* * * Nay, and thou'lt mouth,
I'll rant as well as thou."

as a motto for his symphonic poem, "Hamlet," When a man throws himself so frankly, so unreservedly, into violence of expression as Tschaikowsky has in this composition, we can not help liking him—if with certain restrictions. There is an immense amount of sound and fury in the work, and yet it does not, somehow, give the impression of signifying nothing; at the very least, it shows the composer to have red blood in his veins. It has been said that the present Russian school derives mainly from Schumann and Berlioz; but in this "Hamlet" the Berlisz influence shows itself as largely predominating. It is as wildly and frantically written as almost anything by the great Frenchman. One finds little musical invention in it: the thematic material is always, as it were, steeped in emotion, but seems rather sterile musically, and often commonplace; some of the recitative-like passages sound terribly like things of a similar sort that we all have heard years ago in violin concertos by Vieuxtemps and writers of that ilk. You look in vain for a phrase of the pithiness, force and distinction of the opening passage in Berlioz's "Roi Léar" overture, not to speak of the recitative for 'celli and double basses in Beethoven's ninth symphony. These portentous-sounding phrases all seem to smack a little of the stencil. Yet, if Tshcaikowsky has apparently little to say here that is either new or musically very valuable, he says what he has to say with such hearty good will, with such vigor of emphasis, that it compels your attention, and seems, for the moment, not unimpressive. Frantic as he is, he does not fall into the absolutely ludicrous, as Berlioz did in the tomb scene in his "Roméo et Juliette." If, in point of style, construction and general musical value, this "Hamlet" may be put on a par with much that has been written by contemporary French followers of Berlioz—always excepting those of Saint-Saëns's symphonic poems—it rises superior in virtue of a certain evident sincerity and depth of feeling. It does not seem entirely written for the gallery. We should rank it between the composer's "Romeo and Juliet" and his "Francesca da Rimini." It was superbly, wonderfully played.

About the performance of Schumann's D minor Symphony—the current, not the original version—we hardly know what to say. As far as the orchestra was concerned, it was a splendid piece of playing; on Mr. Nikisch's part, it was one of those "expressive renderings" against which every musical fibre in us protests instinctively—we must say this. The time is past for considering this sort of thing as a matter of musical principle; we are quite content to abandon this position. As the world is now going, in five years more this style of performance may be called classical, and in ten years, dry and old-foggyish,—who knows? It is in the air, in the spirit of the times. But, as a matter of personal musical feeling, of musical taste, we must regret that, after having had this sort of thing pushed well-nigh ad nauseam by pianists and other solo players, we can no longer hope to find a safe refuge from it in orchestral performances. The modern orchestra seems to be fast giving up what can properly be called concerted playing on the largest scale, and to be converting itself into a huge, complex instrument, on which the conductor performs solos, and "interprets" compositions to the public. The last chance of hearing a classic composition played simply as it stands seems gone, or fast going.

The worst of it all is that one fails to see where this style can logically stop. This spice of personal emotion, of purely individual musical feeling, is like other spices. Once begin with cayenne, and you will go on with more and more cayenne, until at last you get to drinking Worcestershire sauce and tabasco out of Madeira glasses. We have already got far beyond Wagner's "expressive style" of orchestral performance, with its almost infinitesimal and scarcely perceptible modification of tempo; we have got to modifications so intensified that they threaten to tear the phrase limb from limb, and annihilate all unity of impression in a movement. And what is to be done when all this begins to pall upon the jaded ear? Evidently nothing but over-bid once more what has been done already, and so on, until the cohesive power of the music gives out, and the composition flies off into fragments, as over-driven millstones do, by sheer centrifugal force. And, after all, how irksome and disturbing all this "interpretation" of stoutly constructed symphonic compositions is! It is like hearing Shakspeare read, with all the foot-notes. A work like Schumann's D minor symphony can interpret itself; Liszt wrote symphonic poems in which the essence of the music was to be read between the lines, and which consequently needed interpretation; but Schumann's constant endeavor in composing was to express himself. And, to our thinking, he succeeded tolerably well.

Max Bruch's new concerto made no very definite impression upon us, as a work. Not so Mme. Urso's playing of it. Her performance can not be spoken of in terms of too warm admiration. The wonderful warmth, purity and volume of her tone, her admirable style, both stout and graceful, dignified and impassioned, her fine totality of conception and coherent presentation, are all beyond praise. Here is an artist who, from the outset, has steadily grown in force, musical comprehension, and wealth of resource. Such playing leaves nothing to be desired.

The next programme is: Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 2; Beethoven, pianoforte concerto No. 5, in E-flat; Schumann, symphony No. 4, in D minor (first performance here of the original version.) Mr. Eugen D'Albert will be the pianist.

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

SEVENTH SEASON—1891-92.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF Madame AMALIE JOACHIM.

VI. CONCERT.

MONDAY, MARCH 7, AT 8 P.M.

PROGRAMME.

OTTOKAR NOVÀCEK.	QUARTET in E minor. Allegro.—Adagio.—Prestissimo.—Allegro molto agitato. (First time in America.)
	SONGS. MME. JOACHIM.
a) BEETHOVEN.	MIGNON.
b) MOZART.	DAS VEILCHEN.
c) HAYDN.	STANDCHEN.
BEETHOVEN.	VARIATIONS from QUARTET, A major, op. 18.
	SONGS. MME. JOACHIM.
a) JOS. RUD. AHLE (1662)	GEISTLICHER DIALOG (The Advent of our Saviour).
b) J. AB. I. SCHULZ (1782)	SAGT, WO SIND DIE VEILCHEN HIN.
c) MENDELSSOHN.	VENETIANISCHES GONDELLIED.
d) SCHUBERT.	HAIDERASKIN.
BEETHOVEN.	QUARTET in E flat, op. 74. Poco adagio; allegro.—Adagio ma non troppo.— Presto, Allegretto con variazioni.

The postponed Fourth Concert will be given Monday, April 4.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, MARCH 8, 1892.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT.

The Kneisel Quartette gave the sixth concert of a series last evening in Union Hall. The first number of the programme was a quartette in E minor by Ottokar Novacek, the first viola of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was played last evening for the first time in this country. When it was first heard in Leipzig, Jan. 10, 1891, at a chamber concert of the Brodsky Quartette, of which Mr. Novacek was then a member, it excited more than ordinary attention, and both the favorable and the adverse judgments were couched in extravagant language. It is not an ordinary work; it is not one that is easily understood, and it is probable that even after repeated hearings many passages would still be unintelligible. The frequent obscurity and the aggressive ugliness of certain portions are not accidental; they are evidently the expression of the purpose of the composer. The very opening is an exhibition of musical bad temper. Then there is a reduced version of [illegible] imitation of snorting and neighing horses; there are sounds that might be produced by the application of wet thumbs to tumblers; there is the tearing of cloth; there are progressions that stun the ear; there are suggestions of Wagner in the more tuneful measures; and there is an open defiance of the characteristics and limitations of the string quartette. Yet in the midst of cacophony there is a fierce intensity, there is a rigidity of purpose and there is a rude rebellion against conventionality and commonplace that almost [illegible] the sympathy of the hearer. There is much that is beautiful in the slow movement, but that which is beautiful is rudely jostled by [illegible] neighbor. The third movement appeals [illegible] strongly to popular taste; and here we [illegible] old friends. Berlioz and Mendelssohn [illegible] hands, while Saint-Saens stands by and [illegible] a strain of his "Danse Macabre." The [illegible] a prolonged shriek of varied intensity. [illegible] of the willful eccentricities, the wild extravagances, the crudity, the cacophony of [illegible] quartette, Mr. Novacek is undoubtedly, [illegible] judged by this very work, a man [illegible] genuine musical stuff. He should remember, however, that in order to make a strong impression on the mind of the hearer it is not absolutely necessary for the musician to clutch [illegible] by the throat, knock him down, or [illegible] prostrate body.

The quartette was heartily applauded, and the [illegible] movement was repeated. It was [illegible] with loving, brotherly care. The other [illegible] numbers were the variations from Beethoven's op. 18, No. 5, and the Beethoven [illegible] in E flat, op. 74. With a few trifling [illegible], as in the viola triplets in the second [illegible] in op. 74, the performance of these [illegible] was most admirable.

[illegible] Joachim made last evening her [illegible] in America. She sang Beethoven's "Mignon," Mozart's "The Violet," Haydn's "Serenade," Ahle's "The Advent of [illegible]," a song by Schulz (a favorite [illegible] in the last century), Mendelssohn's "Venetian Boat Song" and Schubert's "[illegible]." As Mrs. Joachim will give a [illegible] Hall this evening, it is [illegible] from any extended criticism [illegible] be out of place to [illegible] her performance was [illegible] conception of the [illegible] rather than by beauty [illegible] the display of perfect [illegible] enthusiastically ap- [illegible] call [illegible]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, MAR. 8, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Kneisel Quartette Concert.

The sixth concert in the Kneisel Quartette series attracted a large and appreciative audience to Union Hall last evening, the good attendance being due, in a measure, doubtless, to the interest taken in the initial performance in America of a quartette by Ottokar Novacek, first viola of the Symphony Orchestra, and also to the fact that Mme. Amalie Joachim, who comes to us with a great reputation from Europe, was to be the assisting artist, making her debut before a Boston audience. The programme was a purely classical one—unless exception be taken to the first number, the quartette already mentioned—and received an attentive hearing from first to last.

The main pabulum of the evening was of course the performance of the three given numbers by the quartette. Mais place aux dames. Mme. Joachim on entering the hall received a very cordial greeting, and any diffidence which she may have felt must have been dispelled immediately. Her first song, Beethoven's version of "Kennst du das Land," displayed at once an unusually large, sonorous, contralto voice, capable of great dramatic expression, in every way equal to the demands of German ballad singing. The other two numbers of the group, Mozart's "Das Veilchen" and a "Standchen" by Haydn, were both rendered with good taste, and completed the favorable impression which Mme. Joachim had made in the opening ballad. On a second appearance she was even more successful, giving a most impressive rendition of a so-called "Geistlicher Dialog" (the advent of our Saviour), composed in the 17th century. Among other songs, Schubert's "Sah ein Knab" was particularly well received. Mme. Joachim was recalled, and responded to the inevitable encore with a charming Wiegenlied by Brahms. Her reputation as a peculiarly gifted singer of the German "lied" is beyond question.

The quartet in E minor by Novacek could hardly have been presented to our public under more favorable circumstances. All four movements received the finished treatment to be expected from the Kneisel Quartet. The composition is a graceful one, good in form and music. The most striking movement, perhaps, is the third (prestissimo) in which the composer has caught the true spirit of the scherzo. The audience was evidently infected with it, as a repetition was demanded and granted. The adagio is very melodious, and reflects the character of the writer's national music. The conclusion of the quite brilliant finale elicited hearty and sustained applause.

The reading of Beethoven's Quartet in E flat, op. 74, left little if anything to be desired, it is almost needless to say.

The postponed fourth concert will be given Monday, April 4.

Clipping from Com. Advertiser,
~~STAR~~, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/7

At a concert given in Boston the other day for the benefit of Mr. Nikisch's famous Symphony Orchestra Mr. Paderewski was presented with a beautiful wreath of laurel in silver as a token of the admiration and gratitude of the members of the orchestra.

Boston Post

MOTTO:
With a Mission
—AND—
Without a Muzzle.

TUESDAY MORNING, MAR. 8, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The sixth concert of the Kneisel Quartet series was given last evening in Union Hall with a programme even more satisfying than that of any one of the series. The hall was filled to its utmost capacity and each number received hearty and well-merited applause. Peculiar interest was felt in the opening selection—Ottakar Noracek's quartet in E minor, consisting of four movements—not wholly from the fact that it was heard for the first time in America, but partially for the reason that the composer is a musician of high standing here in Boston, whose work must have possessed unusual merit to find favor with Franz Kneisel. The allegro possessed both fascination and oddity, in strong contrast to the adagio, which was pathetic and sweet. The tempo of the prestissimo was tremendous, and the difficulties with which it abounds were surmounted with the utmost ease by the artists comprising the quartet. The applause was so hearty and prolonged that the movement was graciously repeated. As a whole it is the most original work heard in Boston for some time, and its beauty was heightened by the exquisite finish, the perfect blending of tone and the delicacy of shading which characterize the playing of this quartet.

The wondrous beauties of the Beethoven quartet in E flat, Op. 74, were brought out in the same perfect manner, and formed a fitting close to the performance.

Mme. Amalie Joachim, concerning whose vocal powers rumor has spoken in high terms, made her first Boston appearance at this concert. She possesses a commanding presence and a voice to match. It might be called almost too powerful for a small hall, but her rendition of the seven songs, all German, was admirable in every way—her phrasing, enunciation and style were well-nigh perfect. The songs of the second group were perhaps the best, as the vocalist was then sure of her audience. Schubert's "Haideraskin" has seldom been given here as Mme. Joachim sang it, and the audience was quick to recognize that fact by a recall, graciously responded to by the singer.

The postponed fourth concert will be given Monday, April 4.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 68.

TUESDAY, MARCH 8, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

At the sixth of the season's concerts by the Kneisel quartet, Franz Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; L. Svecenski, viola, and Alwin Schroeder, violoncello, in Union Hall last evening, the programme was one of unusual interest.

For its leading novelty, it had Ottokar Novacek's quartet in E minor, which was given its first American performance on this occasion.

The composer, who is a member of the Symphony orchestra, has succeeded in giving a quartet, which appeals with especial success to the musical student, its construction being an excellent example of the algebraical forms which find so much favor today. It had an almost faultless performance, and the scherzo was redemanded with much enthusiasm.

The other numbers played by the quartet were the variations from Beethoven's quartet in A major, op. 18, and Beethoven's quartet in E flat, op. 74, both of which were heard to the best advantage.

The usually large audience of subscribers was largely increased from the interest attaching to the soloist of the evening, Frau Amalia Joachim, the German lieder singer, who made her debut in America. Frau Joachim contributed two groups of songs, the first including Beethoven's "Mignon," Mozart's "Das Veilchen" and Haydn's "Standchen," and the last Joseph Rud. Ahle's "Geistlicher Dialog," J. A. I. Schulz's "Sagt, wo sind die Veilchen hin," Mendelssohn's Venetianisches Gondellied" and Schubert's "Haideraskin."

The high standing of Frau Joachim as an interpreter of German songs across the water, gave cause for many pleasant anticipations concerning her appearance here, and these anticipations were more than realized in the singer's contributions to the evening's programme. She is the possessor of a voice that responds in the most faultless manner to the demands made upon it, and in its use the singer shows a degree of skill and musical taste that are possessed by few concert vocalists of the day. Her phrasing of the several songs was characterized by such rare intelligence and expression, her delivery of them was so artistic and the beauty of her method was so distinctly shown in all her vocal work that it was easy to understand the position she holds abroad as a representative lieder singer.

Frau Joachim had a very kindly reception, and was at once made to feel at home with her audience. She was enthusiastically applauded after each of her appearances.

Clipping from Times
New York, N. Y.
3/8

Date

—At Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon one of the most delightful entertainments of the season was given. It was a song recital by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, her husband acting as accompanist. Mrs. Nikisch possesses a lovely soprano voice of moderate power, and is passed mistress of the art of Lieder singing. Mr. Nikisch is one of the finest accompanists who ever sat down to the piano. Together they give an entertainment in which the art is well-nigh perfect.

RECORDER, New York, N. Y.

Date 3-8

Arthur Nikisch, the orchestra leader, came over from Boston yesterday and registered at the Hoffman.

Boston Daily Globe

TUESDAY, MARCH 8.

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The sixth concert of the Kneisel quartet was given at Union Hall last evening. Much interest was centred in the occasion, owing to the introduction of Mme. Amalie Joachim, hence the very large attendance. The entertainment opened with a quartet in E minor by Ottokar Novacek. It was the first performance in America of this most delightful of quartets—rich in harmonies and varieties of movement—a rare combination of weird energy, coupled with passages of exquisite sweetness. The prestissimo especially pleased the audience, which was delighted by an encore.

Mme. Joachim was introduced amidst a wild ovation, and favored her audience with three songs, (a) "Mignon," Beethoven; (b) "Das Veilchen," Mozart; (c) "Standchen," Haydn. Mme. Joachim has a voice of great power, remarkably well preserved.

The next number consisted of variations from Quartet, A major, op. 18, Beethoven, rendered with great delicacy and finish.

Mme. Joachim again appeared, taking as her selections: "Geistlicher Dialog," Joseph Rud Ahle (1662); "Sagt, wo sind die Veilchen hin," J. AB. I. Schulz (1782); "Venetianisches Gondellied," Mendelssohn, and "Haideraskin," Schubert. Mme. Joachim was recalled and delighted her audience with an encore.

The quartet in E flat, op. 74, by Beethoven, concluded one of the most pleasing concerts of the season.

The postponed fourth concert will be given Monday, April 4.

RECORDER, New York, N. Y.

Date 3-8

THE NIKISCH SONG RECITAL.

An Artistically Planned Programme Delightfully Rendered.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch gave a song recital at Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon—the twice postponed recital which did not eventuate until then on account of the severe attack of tonsilitis with which Mrs. Nikisch suffered. The scheme of the programme yesterday was most artistically planned and carried out. It comprised songs by Goldmark, Schumann, Bungert, Heuberger, Robert Franz, a Brahms group, Reginald de Koven, Tschaikowsky, Richard Strauss and Jenssen. These were all sung from memory by Mrs. Nikisch, who possesses a pure, penetrating soprano voice, extremely flexible and of an unusually sympathetic quality. She was most happy in interpreting the Brahms songs and gave a tender reading of De Koven's elegaic "Indian Love Song."

A thoroughly musical temperament has Mrs. Nikisch, and she was most ably accompanied by her husband, Arthur Nikisch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who plays the piano like a virtuoso, and has the rare gift of being able to accompany artistically. His touch in Franz's "Serenade" was beautiful. Master Alexander Fiedemann, the young violin protege of Adolph Brodsky, played numbers by Vieuxtemps, Spohr and Hauser. Chickering Hall was well filled, the audience being extremely enthusiastic and eager for encores.

Tribune, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/8

MR. AND MRS. NIKISCH'S RECITAL.

The rigors of the Boston climate have been responsible for the postponement several times of a song recital in New-York, projected in midwinter by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and her husband, the brilliant conductor of the Boston orchestra. There had been sufficient moderation of them, however, to permit the singer's appearance yesterday in Chickering Hall before an audience of notable refinement. There was much promise of enjoyment in the announcement; Mrs. Nikisch had chosen her programme, with one exception, from the songs of the modern German composers, from Schumann down, including, besides this master, Goldmark, Bungert, Richard Heuberger, Franz, Brahms, Tschaikowsky, Richard Strauss and Jensen. To these was added a song by Mr. R. de Koven, of this city. This is a territory in the realm of music that is too seldom exploited for the benefit of music-lovers, and then rarely with so wise and discriminating a choice. Mrs. Nikisch sings this class of music with rare sympathy and insight. Her voice and style are both capitally fitted to realize in abundant measure the subtle artistic value of such compositions; and, though there were some few traces of her recent illness occasionally in evidence yesterday, they were not sufficient seriously to mar the satisfaction derived from the performance, which was a delightful example of "Lieder" singing in its best estate. The piano accompaniments of Mr. Nikisch have more than once been recognized by the musically inclined of this city as exquisite examples of a much-abused art. The full understanding between singer and player yesterday made them of uncommon beauty and expressiveness, finely finished, as they were, and of the most perfect adjustment to the singer's intentions. Mrs. Nikisch was obliged to repeat the arch song by Brahms, "Vergebliches Staendchen." The special prominence given to this composer's work in the selection of six of his songs was an interesting feature of the programme, while special mention is due to unfamiliar songs of Heuberger and Strauss, both extremely fresh and original. Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch were assisted by Master Alexander Fiedeman, who played three selections for the violin, to which Mr. Nikisch likewise played the accompaniments.

Herald, New York, N. Y.

Date 3-8

A NIKISCH SONG RECITAL.

A song recital by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, which had been twice postponed, owing to the severe indisposition of Mrs. Nikisch, was finally given in Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon and proved to be well worth waiting for. Mrs Nikisch's voice is not a large one, but it is pure and true, and it is used with exquisite taste. A large audience of connoisseurs applauded her singing and the admirable accompaniments of Mr. Nikisch with great heartiness.

The programme contained songs of Schumann, Schubert, Jensen, Franz, Tschaikowsky and Brahms, the half dozen songs by the last named composer affording perhaps the keenest pleasure of the afternoon.

Master Alexander Fiedemann, the twelve year old violinist whom Herr Brodsky brought to this country, played very prettily the Vieuxtemps [illegible] Caprice and [illegible] Hauser's [illegible]

[143]

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

SEVENTH SEASON—1891-92.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF Madame AMALIE JOACHIM.

VI. CONCERT.

MONDAY, MARCH 7, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OTTOKAR NOVÀCEK.	QUARTET in E minor. Allegro.—Adagio.—Prestissimo.—Allegro molto agitato. (First time in America.)
	SONGS. MME. JOACHIM.
a) BEETHOVEN.	MIGNON.
b) MOZART.	DAS VEILCHEN.
c) HAYDN.	STANDCHEN.
BEETHOVEN.	VARIATIONS from QUARTET, A major, op. 18.
	SONGS. MME. JOACHIM.
a) JOS. RUD. AHLE (1662)	GEISTLICHER DIALOG (The Advent of our Saviour).
b) J. AB. I. SCHULZ (1782)	SAGT, WO SIND DIE VEILCHEN HIN.
c) MENDELSSOHN.	VENETIANISCHES GONDELLIED.
d) SCHUBERT.	HAIDERASKIN.
BEETHOVEN.	QUARTET in E flat, op. 74. Poco adagio; allegro.—Adagio ma non troppo.—Presto, Allegretto con variazioni.

The postponed Fourth Concert will be given Monday, April 4.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

Boston Journal.
TUESDAY, MARCH 8, 1892.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT.

The Kneisel Quartette gave the sixth concert of a series last evening in Union Hall. The first number of the programme was a quartette in E minor by Ottokar Novacek, the first viola of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was played last evening for the first time in this country. When it was first heard in Leipzig, Jan. 10, 1891, at a chamber concert of the Brodsky Quartette, of which Mr. Novacek was then a member, it excited more than ordinary attention, and both the favorable and the adverse judgments were couched in extravagant language. It is not an ordinary work; it is not one that is easily understood, and it is probable that even after repeated hearings many passages would still be unintelligible. The frequent obscurity and the aggressive ugliness of certain portions are not accidental; they are evidently the expression of the purpose of the composer. The very opening is an exhibition of musical bad temper. Then there is a reduced version of a familiar imitation of snorting and neighing horses; there are sounds that might be produced by the application of wet thumbs to tumblers; there is the tearing of cloth; there are progressions that stab the ear; there are suggestions of Wagner in the more tuneful measures; and there is an open defiance of the characteristics and limitations of the string quartette. Yet in the midst of cacophony there is a fierce intensity, there is a rigidity of purpose and there is a rude rebellion against conventionality and commonplace that almost conquer the sympathy of the hearer. There is much that is beautiful in the slow movement, but that which is beautiful is rudely jostled by an ugly neighbor. The third movement appeals more strongly to popular taste; and here we greet old friends. Berlioz and Mendelssohn shake hands, while Saint-Saens stands by and whistles a strain of his "Danse Macabre." The finale is a prolonged shriek of varied intensity. In spite of the willful eccentricities, the wild extravagances, the crudity, the cacophony of this quartette, Mr. Novacek is undoubtedly, and judged by this very work, a man of genuine musical stuff. He should remember, however, that in order to make a strong impression on the mind of the hearer it is not absolutely necessary for the musician to clutch his victim by the throat, knock him down, or stamp his prostrate body.

This quartette was heartily applauded, and the third movement was repeated. It was played with loving, brotherly care. The other instrumental numbers were the variations from Beethoven's op. 18, No. 5, and the Beethoven quartette in E flat, op. 74. With a few trifling exceptions, as in the viola triplets in the second variation in op. 74, the performance of these numbers was most admirable.

Mrs. Amalie Joachim made last evening her first appearance in America. She sang Beethoven's "Mignon," Mozart's "The Violet," Haydn's "Serenade," Ahle's "The Advent of Our Saviour," a song by Schulz (a favorite writer of operettas in the last century), Mendelssohn's "Venetian Boat Song" and Schubert's "Haideroeslein." As Mrs. Joachim will give a song recital in Steinert Hall this evening, it is better to now refrain from any extended criticism. Still it may not be out of place to say that last evening her performance was marked by an intelligent conception of the meaning of the composer rather than by beauty or purity of tone, or by the display of perfect mechanism. She was enthusiastically applauded and in response to an imperative call added a number to a programme that was in [illegible] [illegible] fourth concert of the Kneisel [illegible] Monday, April 4.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
TUESDAY MORNING, MAR. 8, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Kneisel Quartette Concert.

The sixth concert in the Kneisel Quartette series attracted a large and appreciative audience to Union Hall last evening, the good attendance being due, in a measure, doubtless, to the interest taken in the initial performance in America of a quartette by Ottokar Novacek, first viola of the Symphony Orchestra, and also to the fact that Mme. Amalie Joachim, who comes to us with a great reputation from Europe, was to be the assisting artist, making her debut before a Boston audience. The programme was a purely classical one—unless exception be taken to the first number, the quartette already mentioned—and received an attentive hearing from first to last.

The main pabulum of the evening was of course the performance of the three given numbers by the quartette. Mais place aux dames. Mme. Joachim on entering the hall received a very cordial greeting, and any diffidence which she may have felt must have been dispelled immediately. Her first song, Beethoven's version of "Kennst du das Land," displayed at once an unusually large, sonorous, contralto voice, capable of great dramatic expression, in every way equal to the demands of German ballad singing. The other two numbers of the group, Mozart's "Das Veilcher" and a "Standchen" by Haydn, were both rendered with good taste, and completed the favorable impression which Mme. Joachim had made in the opening ballad. On a second appearance she was even more successful, giving a most impressive rendition of a so-called "Geistlicher Dialog" (the advent of our Saviour). composed in the 17th century. Among other songs, Schubert's "Sah ein Knab" was particularly well received. Mme. Joachim was recalled, and responded to the inevitable encore with a charming Wiegenlied by Brahms. Her reputation as a peculiarly gifted singer of the German "lied" is beyond question.

The quartet in E minor by Novacek could hardly have been presented to our public under more favorable circumstances. All four movements received the finished treatment to be expected from the Kneisel Quartet. The composition is a graceful one, good in form and music. The most striking movement, perhaps, is the third (prestissimo) in which the composer has caught the true spirit of the scherzo. The audience was evidently infected with it, as a repetition was demanded and granted. The adagio is very melodious, and reflects the character of the writer's national music. The conclusion of the quite brilliant finale elicited hearty and sustained applause.

The reading of Beethoven's Quartet in E flat, op. 74, left little if anything to be desired, it is almost needless to say.

The postponed fourth concert will be given Monday, April 4.

Clipping from Com. Advertiser,
~~STAR~~, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/7

At a concert given in Boston the other day for the benefit of Mr. Nikisch's famous Symphony Orchestra Mr. Paderewski was presented with a beautiful wreath of laurel in silver as a token of the admiration and gratitude of the members of the orchestra.

Boston Post
MOTTO:
With a Mission
—AND—
Without a Muzzle.
TUESDAY MORNING, MAR. 8, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The sixth concert of the Kneisel Quartet series was given last evening in Union Hall with a programme even more satisfying than that of any one of the series. The hall was filled to its utmost capacity and each number received hearty and well-merited applause. Peculiar interest was felt in the opening selection—Ottakar Noracek's quartet in E minor, consisting of four movements—not wholly from the fact that it was heard for the first time in America, but partially for the reason that the composer is a musician of high standing here in Boston, whose work must have possessed unusual merit to find favor with Franz Kneisel. The allegro possessed both fascination and oddity, in strong contrast to the adagio, which was pathetic and sweet. The tempo of the prestissimo was tremendous, and the difficulties with which it abounds were surmounted with the utmost ease by the artists comprising the quartet. The applause was so hearty and prolonged that the movement was graciously repeated. As a whole it is the most original work heard in Boston for some time, and its beauty was heightened by the exquisite finish, the perfect blending of tone and the delicacy of shading which characterize the playing of this quartet.

The wondrous beauties of the Beethoven quartet in E flat, Op. 74, were brought out in the same perfect manner, and formed a fitting close to the performance.

Mme. Amalie Joachim, concerning whose vocal powers rumor has spoken in high terms, made her first Boston appearance at this concert. She possesses a commanding presence and a voice to match. It might be called almost too powerful for a small hall, but her rendition of the seven songs, all German, was admirable in every way—her phrasing, enunciation and style were well-nigh perfect. The songs of the second group were perhaps the best, as the vocalist was then sure of her audience. Schubert's "Haideraskin" has seldom been given here as Mme. Joachim sang it, and the audience was quick to recognize that fact by a recall, graciously responded to by the singer.

The postponed fourth concert will be given Monday, April 4.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 68.
TUESDAY, MARCH 8, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

At the sixth of the season's concerts by the Kneisel quartet, Franz Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; L. Svecenski, viola, and Alwin Schroeder, violoncello, in Union Hall last evening, the programme was one of unusual interest.

For its leading novelty, it had Ottokar Novacek's quartet in E minor, which was given its first American performance on this occasion.

The composer, who is a member of the Symphony orchestra, has succeeded in giving a quartet, which appeals with especial success to the musical student, its construction being an excellent example of the algebraical forms which find so much favor today. It had an almost faultless performance, and the scherzo was redemanded with much enthusiasm.

The other numbers played by the quartet were the variations from Beethoven's quartet in A major, op. 18, and Beethoven's quartet in E flat, op. 74, both of which were heard to the best advantage.

The usually large audience of subscribers was largely increased from the interest attaching to the soloist of the evening, Frau Amalia Joachim, the German lieder singer, who made her debut in America. Frau Joachim contributed two groups of songs, the first including Beethoven's "Mignon," Mozart's "Das Veilchen" and Haydn's "Standchen," and the last Joseph Rud. Ahle's "Geistlicher Dialog," J. A. I. Schulz's "Sagt, wo sind die Veilchen hin," Mendelssohn's Venetianisches Gondellied" and Schubert's "Haideraskin."

The high standing of Frau Joachim as an interpreter of German songs across the water, gave cause for many pleasant anticipations concerning her appearance here, and these anticipations were more than realized in the singer's contributions to the evening's programme. She is the possessor of a voice that responds in the most faultless manner to the demands made upon it, and in its use the singer shows a degree of skill and musical taste that are possessed by few concert vocalists of the day. Her phrasing of the several songs was characterized by such rare intelligence and expression, her delivery of them was so artistic and the beauty of her method was so distinctly shown in all her vocal work that it was easy to understand the position she holds abroad as a representative lieder singer.

Frau Joachim had a very kindly reception, and was at once made to feel at home with her audience. She was enthusiastically applauded after each of her appearances.

Clipping from Times
[illegible]

Date

—At Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon one of the most delightful entertainments of the season was given. It was a song recital by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, her husband acting as accompanist. Mrs. Nikisch possesses a lovely soprano voice of moderate power, and is passed mistress of the art of Lieder singing. Mr. Nikisch is one of the finest accompanists who ever sat down to the piano. Together they give an entertainment in which the art is well-nigh perfect.

RECORDER, New York, N. Y.

Date 3-8

Arthur Nikisch, the orchestra leader, came over from Boston yesterday and registered at the Hoffman.

Boston Daily Globe
TUESDAY, MARCH 8.

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The sixth concert of the Kneisel quartet was given at Union Hall last evening. Much interest was centred in the occasion, owing to the introduction of Mme. Amalie Joachim, hence the very large attendance. The entertainment opened with a quartet in E minor by Ottokar Novacek. It was the first performance in America of this most delightful of quartets—rich in harmonies and varieties of movement—a rare combination of weird energy, coupled with passages of exquisite sweetness. The prestissimo especially pleased the audience, which was delighted by an encore.

Mme. Joachim was introduced amidst a wild ovation, and favored her audience with three songs, (a) "Mignon," Beethoven; (b) "Das Veilchen," Mozart; (c) "Standchen," Haydn. Mme. Joachim has a voice of great power, remarkably well preserved.

The next number consisted of variations from Quartet, A major, op. 18, Beethoven, rendered with great delicacy and finish.

Mme. Joachim again appeared, taking as her selections: "Geistlicher Dialog," Joseph Rud Ahle (1662); "Sagt, wo sind die Veilchen hin," J. AB. I. Schulz (1782); "Venetianisches Gondelied," Mendelssohn, and "Haideraskin," Schubert. Mme. Joachim was recalled and delighted her audience with an encore.

The quartet in E flat, op. 74, by Beethoven, concluded one of the most pleasing concerts of the season.

The postponed fourth concert will be given Monday, April 4.

RECORDER, New York, N. Y.

Date 3-8

THE NIKISCH SONG RECITAL.

An Artistically Planned Programme Delightfully Rendered.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch gave a song recital at Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon—the twice postponed recital which did not eventuate until then on account of the severe attack of tonsilitis with which Mrs. Nikisch suffered. The scheme of the programme yesterday was most artistically planned and carried out. It comprised songs by Goldmark, Schumann, Bungert, Heuberger, Robert Franz, a Brahms group, Reginald de Koven, Tschaikowsky, Richard Strauss and Jenssen. These were all sung from memory by Mrs. Nikisch, who possesses a pure, penetrating soprano voice, extremely flexible and of an unusually sympathetic quality. She was most happy in interpreting the Brahms songs and gave a tender reading of De Koven's elegaic "Indian Love Song."

A thoroughly musical temperament has Mrs. Nikisch, and she was most ably accompanied by her husband, Arthur Nikisch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who plays the piano like a virtuoso, and has the rare gift of being able to accompany artistically. His touch in Franz's "Serenade" was beautiful. Master Alexander Fiedemann, the young violin protege of Adolph Brodsky, played numbers by Vieuxtemps, Spohr and Hauser. Chickering Hall was well filled, the audience being extremely enthusiastic and eager for encores.

Y.

Date 3/8

MR. AND MRS. NIKISCH'S RECITAL.

The rigors of the Boston climate have been responsible for the postponement several times of a song recital in New-York, projected in midwinter by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and her husband, the brilliant conductor of the Boston orchestra. There had been sufficient moderation of them, however, to permit the singer's appearance yesterday in Chickering Hall before an audience of notable refinement. There was much promise of enjoyment in the announcement; Mrs. Nikisch had chosen her programme, with one exception, from the songs of the modern German composers, from Schumann down, including, besides this master, Goldmark, Bungert, Richard Heuberger, Franz, Brahms, Tschaikowsky, Richard Strauss and Jensen. To these was added a song by Mr. R. de Koven, of this city. This is a territory in the realm of music that is too seldom exploited for the benefit of music-lovers, and then rarely with so wise and discriminating a choice. Mrs. Nikisch sings this class of music with rare sympathy and insight. Her voice and style are both capitally fitted to realize in abundant measure the subtle artistic value of such compositions; and, though there were some few traces of her recent illness occasionally in evidence yesterday, they were not sufficient seriously to mar the satisfaction derived from the performance, which was a delightful example of "Lieder" singing in its best estate. The piano accompaniments of Mr. Nikisch have more than once been recognized by the musically inclined of this city as exquisite examples of a much-abused art. The full understanding between singer and player yesterday made them of uncommon beauty and expressiveness, finely finished, as they were, and of the most perfect adjustment to the singer's intentions. Mrs. Nikisch was obliged to repeat the arch song by Brahms, "Vergebliches Staendchen." The special prominence given to this composer's work in the selection of six of his songs was an interesting feature of the programme, while special mention is due to unfamiliar songs of Heuberger and Strauss, both extremely fresh and original. Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch were assisted by Master Alexander Fiedeman, who played three selections for the violin, to which Mr. Nikisch likewise played the accompaniments.

Date 3-8

A NIKISCH SONG RECITAL.

A song recital by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, which had been twice postponed, owing to the severe indisposition of Mrs. Nikisch, was finally given in Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon and proved to be well worth waiting for. Mrs. Nikisch's voice is not a large one, but it is pure and true, and it is used with exquisite taste. A large audience of connoisseurs applauded her singing and the admirable accompaniments of Mr. Nikisch with great heartiness.

The programme contained songs of Schumann, Schubert, Jensen, Franz, Tschaikowsky and Brahms, the half dozen songs by the last named composer affording perhaps the keenest pleasure of the afternoon.

Master Alexander Fiedemann, the twelve-year-old violinist whom Herr Brodsky brought to this country, played very prettily the Vieuxtemps Fantaisie Caprice and Miska Hauser's Hungarian Rhapsody.

American Art Journal.
The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.
FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.
WM. M. THOMS, Editor.

The first and most important object the journalist should have in mind is to criticise productive and reproductive art with such discriminating care and honesty of purpose as to offer a safe guide to popular judgment rather than act as its echo, thus creating a demand for higher culture in artists.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 5, 1892.

17TH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

MENDELSSOHN'S Ruy Blas overture is always acceptable, with its windy suggestions of mystery; and one is sure to enjoy Liszt's Symphonic Poem the Preludes; but, in addition to these favorites Mr. Nikisch gave two novelties, one for the first time here, A Prairie Scene in Central Asia, by Borodin of St. Petersburg, who died not many years ago, and was one of Liszt's friends. It is a most enjoyable composition, and here is the description appended to the score:

In the silence of the sandy steppes of Central Asia there is heard the first refrain of a Russian folk-song, and also the melancholy notes of the songs of the Orient, followed by the hoof beats of the approaching horses and camels. A caravan, crossing the great desert, and escorted by Russian soldiers, pursues its long journey without fear, confidently relying on its military guard. The procession steadily advances. The voices of the Russians and of the natives blend in the same harmony. Their songs are heard for a long time, and are finally lost in the distance.

But the greater novelty was Dvorak's Fourth Symphony in G, finished last year, produced in Vienna and London, under Richter, and now heard for the first time in America. On simple direct themes Dvorak has built a structure of beautifully proportioned melody, and given us a symphony worthy of classification with the great works of the masters. Here is the official analysis:

The first movement, Allegro con brio, begins with a rather melancholy theme in G minor, played by the 'cellos and horns, which soon develops into a bright motif in G, given out by the flute, and, after a tremendous crescendo, brought forth by the full orchestra fortissimo. Contrary to the prevalent custom in symphonic works, of introducing an extended elaboration between the first and second principal themes, Dvorak, after a short independent passage of ten bars, glides into the second theme, in B-minor, followed by a third principal motif in B. Then the composer begins, without the usual repetition of the first part, to work out the melancholy introductory motif of the movement, which is developed to a strong climax. Then follows the first principal subject, given out pianissimo by the English horn; and after the repetition of the second theme in G, the movement comes to a brilliant close with full orchestra.

Adagio. There occurs a musical curiosity in this movement, in that the principal themes are invariably brought forward in the main keys of C-minor and C-major, only being interrupted by short modulations in another key.

Allegretto grazioso. A dainty motif assigned to the violins begins this movement, with an accompaniment of lofty figures by the flute and clarinet, in rapid sixteenth triplets. When the first theme appears the second time the situation is changed, the wood-wind taking the melody, and the violins playing a counter melody. In the place of the usual

---

EAGLE, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Date 3/6

The advent of the Boston Symphony orchestra is the theme of conversation among musical people of Grand Rapids. Although it will be two months before they play in Hartman's hall, expectations and questionings are rife as to what the programme will consist of, the cost of seats and when the sale will begin. Arrangements will be made with the railroads running into the city to give reduced rates to those wishing to attend the concert from the surrounding towns. It has been decided by the management to have the tickets $1.50 in the gallery and $1.00 in the body of the hall. Considering that it will cost $1,500 to bring them here, this is a very low price for the tickets, as in other towns where the halls are not so large, $2 and $2.50 is the price of tickets. The greatest pianist in the world, Eugen d'Albert, will be the soloist at this concert. It is almost three years since the last orchestral concert (that of Theodore Thomas) was heard in Grand Rapids, and people are in good trim for another.

[illegible]
TUESDAY, MARCH 8, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mme. Amalie Joachim, gave the last in its course of six chamber concerts in Union Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:

Ottokar Novácek: Quartet in E minor.
Songs with pianoforte—
Beethoven: Mignon, Op. 75, No. 1.
Mozart: Das Veilchen.
Hayden: Ständchen.
Beethoven: Variations from Quartet, Op. 18, No. 5.
Songs with pianoforte—
J. R. Ahle: Geistlicher Dialog.
J. A. P. Schulz: "Sagt, wo sind die Veilchen hin."
Mendelssohn: Venezianisches Gondellied.
Schubert: Haidenröschen.
Beethoven: Quartet in E-flat, Op. 74.

The quartet by Mr. Novacek—the young violist who has recently joined the Symphony Orchestra, and has played second viola with the Kneisels in the course of the present season—is a work that rather dazes one at the first hearing. It was brought out in Leipzig not long ago, and called forth very various comments from the critical press there. It certainly speaks well for it that the Kneisel Quartet has thought it worth while to play it here—and in no spirit of mere camaraderie, either; for some of the members of the quartet have been speaking of it lately in terms of unfeigned enthusiasm, and they evidently play it con amore. As for ourselves, a single hearing has given us nothing wherein to base a critical judgment; we dislike it thoroughly, but dislikes at first acquaintance are not necessarily lasting. It seems just the sort of composition to foil a critic's foresight. For aught we can tell, it may as well be the work of a new, original genius, or the miscarriage of a talent that will never ripen. It was superbly played, which is saying not a little for the performers, for its technical difficulty is enormous.

We were unspeakably delighted with the tempo at which the quartet took the variations from the fifth Lobkowitz Quartet; it went far towards healing an old sore, for we have long protested against the two common lackadaisical dragging out of this Andante cantabile. Last evening we noticed the following marginal note, in pencil, in our score, "Müller-Campanari Quartet, metronome 60, Feb. 12, 1883." We remember perfectly well our then rage at this tempo, for which the otherwise admirable 'cellist Müller was doubtless responsible. All thanks to the Kneisels for bringing it up to "metr. 80"; it sounded as if it had really been written by Beethoven. The performance of these variations was admirable throughout, and the rather "mystical" harmonies of the fourth variation sounded all the more impressive from the tempo being taken a trifle slower than that of the original theme, instead of faster, as was the case in the other performances we have referred to.

The great E-flat quartet, opus 74—known in Germany as the "Harfen-Quartett," and dedicated also to Prince Lobkowitz, although composed nine years later than the set of six that are commonly associated with his name—was wonderfully well played. The performance may be accounted as one of the finest achievements of the Kneisels.

Of Mme. Joachim's singing much can be said; but one would first say a word or two about two of the songs she sang, which have no little historic interest. The first of these is the "Geistlicher Dialog"—or Sacred Dialogue—by Ahle. Johann Rudolph Ahle was born at Mühlhausen, in Thuringia, on Dec. 24, 1625, and died there on July 8, 1673. He was educated at Göttingen and Erfurt, was appointed organist at the latter place, and afterwards director of a newly established music school there; on his return to Mühlhausen he was appointed organist at the Blasius-Kirche, and soon became councillor and even burgomaster of the town. He wrote and published a once famous treatise on singing, some instrumental works, and many secular and sacred songs and "dialogues." His rank among German song-writers of the seventeenth century was very high, and some of his melodies have still a place in Lutheran choral-books. The dialogue on the Advent, sung last evening, is an admirable example of his simple, heartfelt religious musical expression.

The name of Johann Abraham Peter Schulz is, perhaps, not very well known in America, although some of his music is; time was when his melody, "Müde bin ich, geh' zur Ruh'," was hummed by almost every cradle-side in New England, as it still is in Germany. Others of his times have worked their way into our hymnbooks, under more or less geographical, or topographical, titles. In Germany he is almost always known by his full name, unabbreviated—Christian name, two middle names and surname—and children's song-books are never without some of his melodies. He was born at Lüneburg on March 30, 1747, and died at Schwedt on June 10, 1800; he was a pupil of the great Kirnberger. Curiously enough for one whose posthumous fame was wholly that of a song writer, and most especially of a writer of Volkslieder, he was known during his lifetime as an opera composer and opera conductor; he travelled a good deal and held official positions in several capitals in Europe. But, of all he wrote, only his songs have survived; their simple melodic beauty has won them a permanent place in German hearts, and those that are best known have become folk-songs in the best sense of the term. With Friedrich Silcher, Albert Gottlieb Methfessel and Hans Georg Nägeli, his name will go down to posterity as that of one of the most charming folk-song writers of all time. The song of his sung by Mme. Joachim—who, besides standing as the acknowledged interpreter of Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn and Franz, makes a speciality of old songs in humbler forms—is an excellent example of his sincere, simple, heartfelt style.

Mme. Joachim has a glorious contralto voice, not in its first freshness, to be sure, but still rich, full and mellow. Of her singing last evening one need not speak too critically, for it was evident at the outset that she was not in perfect condition; she sang too often out of tune, a fault, however, which cured itself more and more as she went on. One felt that, had she sang a quarter of an hour longer, and got well warmed up to her work, every note would have been true as a die. But leaving, for the time, this point out of consideration, one could not but be struck by the fine intellectual and artistic mastery she showed. More than this, she is what the French call a "tempérament"; she sings from the heart out, and from a very warm, strong and womanly heart, too. We shall have ample opportunity in the course of the next few weeks of analyzing her surpassing talent at leisure. We will only say now that she sings—as the late Erminia Rudersdorff sang—as one who "knows all about it;" and this more: that to hear her would be an admirable lesson to more than one of our song singers, if only to remind them that Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn and Schubert wrote in something

---

CHICKERING HALL.

THURSDAY EVE'G, MARCH 10, 1892, AT 8.

RECITAL

BY

MR. & MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH,

ASSISTED BY

MASTER ALEXANDER FIEDEMANN, VIOLIN.

PROGRAMME.

1.	a) GOLDMARK,	Die Quelle
	b) SCHUMANN,	Der Nussbaum
	c) AUGUST BUNGERT,	Volkslied
	d) RICHARD HEUBERGER,	Ein Bettlerpärchen
	e) ROBERT FRANZ,	Ständchen
	f) SCHUMANN,	Provencalisches Lied
2.	VIEUXTEMPS,	Fantasie Caprice for Violin
3.	BRAHMS.	a) Geheimniss
		b) Therese
		c) Ständchen
		d) Wiegenlied
		e) Des liebsten Schwur.
		f) Vergebliches Ständchen

SOLI FOR VIOLIN.

4.	a) SPOHR.	Adagio from the Concerto No. 9
	b) MISKA HAUSER,	Hungarian Rhapsody
5.	a) R. DE KOVEN,	Indian Love Song
	b) TSCHAIKOWSKY,	Beim Tanze
	c) RICHARD STRAUSS,	Serenade
	d) JENSEN,	Am Manzanares
	e) SCHUMANN	Frühlingsnacht

Eve. Post NY
3/8

The Nikisch Song Recital.

No department of music of equal importance is so much neglected in New York as that of the Lied, or lyric song. It is true that lyric songs, like lyric poems, are better suited for home enjoyment than for a public place, but there are a large number which bear transplantation and which should be more frequently heard. There is to be more music of this variety during the closing months of the present season than ordinarily. Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch gave a recital at Chickering Hall yesterday which is to be soon followed by one or two by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, and later on several more by the famous Lieder singer, Frau Joachim, wife of the great violinist.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch yesterday had the assistance of Master Fiedemann, who played three selections in a mediocre fashion. Mrs. Nikisch seemed at first to suffer a little from nervousness, which, however, soon passed away, leaving the audience free to enjoy her voice, which is best in the upper register, and her style, which is in close sympathy with the utterances of the best lyric writers. With the exception of a song by Mr. R. De Koven, the Lieder given were of the German school. As usual on such occasions, Brahms was much more liberally represented than Franz, which is very much to be regretted, for Franz, as a song-writer, has a hundred times the genius of Brahms. One of the Brahms songs was encored: Mr. Nikisch played the accompaniments as he only can play them.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/8

MR. AND MRS. NIKISCH'S RECITAL.

The recital originally announced some time ago by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, but which was several times postponed by reason of Mrs. Nikisch's illness, was given at Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon. It proved to be a delightful entertainment. Mrs. Nikisch sang a number of songs by different composers—Schumann, Franz, Brahms, Goldmark, De Koven and others—disclosing a fine appreciation of the varying shades of expression requisite for their proper interpretation and a rare ability in carrying her intentions into effect. In voice and in style she is thoroughly acceptable and admirably equipped as a singer of German lieder. Mr. Nikisch's well-known excellence as an accompanist was again delightfully shown, and his presence at the pianoforte added to the effect of the vocal work, and also that of Master Alexander Fiedeman, the accomplished young violinist, who played several selections with Mr. Nikisch as accompanist.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.
OUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.
WM. M. THOMS, Editor.

The first and most important object the journalis should have in mind is to criticise productive and reproductive art with such discriminating care and honesty of purpose as to offer a safe guide to popular judgment rather than act as its echo, thus creating a demand for higher culture in artists.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 5, 1892.

17TH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

MENDELSSOHN'S Ruy Blas overture is always acceptable, with its windy suggestions of mystery; and one is sure to enjoy Liszt's Symphonic Poem the Preludes; but, in addition to these favorites Mr. Nikisch gave two novelties, one for the first time here, A Prairie Scene in Central Asia, by Borodin of St. Petersburg, who died not many years ago, and was one of Liszt's friends. It is a most enjoyable composition, and here is the description appended to the score:

> In the silence of the sandy steppes of Central Asia there is heard the first refrain of a Russian folk-song, and also the melancholy notes of the songs of the Orient, followed by the hoof beats of the approaching horses and camels. A caravan, crossing the great desert, and escorted by Russian soldiers, pursues its long journey without fear, confidently relying on its military guard. The procession steadily advances. The voices of the Russians and of the natives blend in the same harmony. Their songs are heard for a long time, and are finally lost in the distance.

But the greater novelty was Dvorak's Fourth Symphony in G, finished last year, produced in Vienna and London, under Richter, and now heard for the first time in America. On simple direct themes Dvorak has built a structure of beautifully proportioned melody, and given us a symphony worthy of classification with the great works of the masters. Here is the official analysis:

The first movement, Allegro con brio, begins with a rather melancholy theme in G minor, played by the 'cellos and horns, which soon develops into a bright motif in G, given out by the flute, and, after a tremendous crescendo, brought forth by the full orchestra fortissimo. Contrary to the prevalent custom in symphonic works, of introducing an extended elaboration between the first and second principal themes, Dvorak, after a short independent passage of ten bars, glides into the second theme, in B-minor, followed by a third principal motif in B. Then the composer begins, without the usual repetition of the first part, to work out the melancholy introductory motif of the movement, which is developed to a strong climax. Then follows the first principal subject, given out pianissimo by the English horn; and after the repetition of the second theme in G, the movement comes to a brilliant close with full orchestra.

Adagio. There occurs a musical curiosity in this movement, in that the principal themes are invariably brought forward in the main keys of C-minor and C-major, only being interrupted by short modulations in another key.

Allegretto grazioso. A dainty motif assigned to the violins begins this movement, with an accompaniment of lofty figures by the flute and clarinet, in rapid sixteenth triplets. When the first theme appears the second time the situation is changed, the wood-wind taking the melody, and the violins playing a counter melody. In the place of the usual

---

EAGLE, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Date 3/6

The advent of the Boston Symphony orchestra is the theme of conversation among musical people of Grand Rapids. Although it will be two months before they play in Hartman's hall, expectations and questionings are rife as to what the programme will consist of, the cost of seats and when the sale will begin. Arrangements will be made with the railroads running into the city to give reduced rates to those wishing to attend the concert from the surrounding towns. It has been decided by the management to have the tickets $1.50 in the gallery and $1.00 in the body of the hall. Considering that it will cost $1,500 to bring them here, this is a very low price for the tickets, as in other towns where the halls are not so large, $2 and $2.50 is the price of tickets. The greatest pianist in the world, Eugen d'Albert, will be the soloist at this concert. It is almost three years since the last orchestral concert (that of Theodore Thomas) was heard in Grand Rapids, and people are in good trim for another.

[illegible]

TUESDAY, MARCH 8, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mme. Amalie Joachim, gave the last in its course of six chamber concerts in Union Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:

Ottokar Novácek: Quartet in E minor.
Songs with pianoforte—
Beethoven: Mignon, Op. 75, No. 1.
Mozart: Das Veilchen.
Hayden: Ständchen.
Beethoven: Variations from Quartet, Op. 18, No. 5.
Songs with pianoforte—
J. R. Ahle: Geistlicher Dialog.
J. A. P. Schulz: "Sagt, wo sind die Veilchen hin."
Mendelssohn: Venezianisches Gondellied.
Schubert: Haidenröschen.
Beethoven: Quartet in E-flat, Op. 74.

The quartet by Mr. Novacek—the young violist who has recently joined the Symphony Orchestra, and has played second viola with the Kneisels in the course of the present season—is a work that rather dazes one at the first hearing. It was brought out in Leipzig not long ago, and called forth very various comments from the critical press there. It certainly speaks well for it that the Kneisel Quartet has thought it worth while to play it here—and in no spirit of mere camaraderie, either; for some of the members of the quartet have been speaking of it lately in terms of unfeigned enthusiasm, and they evidently play it con amore. As for ourselves, a single hearing has given us nothing wherein to base a critical judgment; we dislike it thoroughly, but dislikes at first acquaintance are not necessarily lasting. It seems just the sort of composition to foil a critic's foresight. For aught we can tell, it may as well be the work of a new, original genius, or the miscarriage of a talent that will never ripen. It was superbly played, which is saying not a little for the performers, for its technical difficulty is enormous.

We were unspeakably delighted with the tempo at which the quartet took the variations from the fifth Lobkowitz Quartet; it went far towards healing an old sore, for we have long protested against the two common lackadaisical dragging out of this Andante cantabile. Last evening we noticed the following marginal note, in pencil, in our score, "Müller-Campanari Quartet, metronome 60, Feb. 12, 1883." We remember perfectly well our then rage at this tempo, for which the otherwise admirable 'cellist Müller was doubtless responsible. All thanks to the Kneisels for bringing it up to "metr. 80"; it sounded as if it had really been written by Beethoven. The performance of these variations was admirable throughout, and the rather "mystical" harmonies of the fourth variation sounded all the more impressive from the tempo being taken a trifle slower than that of the original theme, instead of faster, as was the case in the other performance we have referred to.

The great E-flat quartet, opus 74—known in Germany as the "Harfen-Quartett," and dedicated also to Prince Lobkowitz, although composed nine years later than the set of six that are commonly associated with his name—was wonderfully well played. The performance may be accounted as one of the finest achievements of the Kneisels.

Of Mme. Joachim's singing much can be said; but one would first say a word or two about two of the songs she sang, which have no little historic interest. The first of these is the "Geistlicher Dialog"—or Sacred Dialogue—by Ahle. Johann Rudolph Ahle was born at Mühlhausen, in Thuringia, on Dec. 24, 1625, and died there on July 8, 1673. He was educated at Göttingen and Erfurt, was appointed organist at the latter place, and afterwards director of a newly established music school there; on his return to Mühlhausen he was appointed organist at the Blasius-Kirche, and soon became councillor and even burgomaster of the town. He wrote and published a once famous treatise on singing, some instrumental works, and many secular and sacred songs and "dialogues." His rank among German song-writers of the seventeenth century was very high, and some of his melodies have still a place in Lutheran choral-books. The dialogue on the Advent, sung last evening, is an admirable example of his simple, heartfelt religious musical expression.

The name of Johann Abraham Peter Schulz is, perhaps, not very well known in America, although some of his music is; time was when his melody, "Müde bin ich, geh' zur Ruh'," was hummed by almost every cradle-side in New England, as it still is in Germany. Others of his times have worked their way into our hymnbooks, under more or less geographical, or topographical, titles. In Germany he is almost always known by his full name, unabbreviated—Christian name, two middle names and surname—and children's song-books are never without some of his melodies. He was born at Lüneburg on March 30, 1747, and died at Schwedt on June 10, 1800; he was a pupil of the great Kirnberger. Curiously enough for one whose posthumous fame was wholly that of a song writer, and most especially of a writer of Volkslieder, he was known during his lifetime as an opera composer and opera conductor; he travelled a good deal and held official positions in several capitals in Europe. But, of all he wrote, only his songs have survived; their simple melodic beauty has won them a permanent place in German hearts, and those that are best known have become folk-songs in the best sense of the term. With Friedrich Silcher, Albert Gottlieb Methfessel and Hans Georg Nägeli, his name will go down to posterity as that of one of the most charming folk-song writers of all time. The song of his sung by Mme. Joachim—who, besides standing as the acknowledged interpreter of Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn and Franz, makes a specialty of old songs in humbler forms—is an excellent example of his sincere, simple, heartfelt style.

Mme. Joachim has a glorious contralto voice, not in its first freshness, to be sure, but still rich, full and mellow. Of her singing last evening one need not speak too critically, for it was evident at the outset that she was not in perfect condition; she sang too often out of tune, a fault, however, which cured itself more and more as she went on. One felt that, had she sang a quarter of an hour longer, and got well warmed up to her work, every note would have been true as a die. But leaving, for the time, this point out of consideration, one could not but be struck by the fine intellectual and artistic mastery she showed. More than this, she is what the French call a "tempérament"; she sings from the heart out, and from a very warm, strong and womanly heart, too. We shall have ample opportunity in the course of the next few weeks of analyzing her surpassing talent at leisure. We will only say now that she sings—as the late Erminia Rudersdorff sang—as one who "knows all about it;" and this more: that to hear her would be an admirable lesson to more than one of our song singers, if only to remind them that Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn and Schubert wrote in something far stronger than what Mrs. Browning called "ink diluted with tears," and that there is no need of throwing their songs into the stove, as "the only means of giving them some warmth."

CHICKERING HALL.

THURSDAY EVE'G, MARCH 10, 1892, AT 8.

RECITAL

BY

MR. & MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH,

ASSISTED BY

MASTER ALEXANDER FIEDEMANN, VIOLIN.

PROGRAMME.

1. a) GOLDMARK, ... Die Quelle
   b) SCHUMANN, ... Der Nussbaum
   c) AUGUST BUNGERT, ... Volkslied
   d) RICHARD HEUBERGER, ... Ein Bettlerpärchen
   e) ROBERT FRANZ, ... Ständchen
   f) SCHUMANN, ... Provencalisches Lied

2. VIEUXTEMPS, . . . Fantasie Caprice for Violin

3. BRAHMS. . . .
   a) Geheimniss
   b) Therese
   c) Ständchen
   d) Wiegenlied
   e) Des liebsten Schwur.
   f) Vergebliches Ständchen

SOLI FOR VIOLIN.

4. a) SPOHR, . . . Adagio from the Concerto No. 9
   b) MISKA HAUSER, . . . Hungarian Rhapsody

5. a) R. DE KOVEN, ... Indian Love Song
   b) TSCHAIKOWSKY, ... Beim Tanze
   c) RICHARD STRAUSS, ... Serenade
   d) JENSEN, ... Am Manzanares
   e) SCHUMANN . . . . . Frühlingsnacht

Eve. Post NY
3/8

The Nikisch Song Recital.

No department of music of equal importance is so much neglected in New York as that of the Lied, or lyric song. It is true that lyric songs, like lyric poems, are better suited for home enjoyment than for a public place, but there are a large number which bear transplantation and which should be more frequently heard. There is to be more music of this variety during the closing months of the present season than ordinarily. Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch gave a recital at Chickering Hall yesterday which is to be soon followed by one or two by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, and later on several more by the famous Lieder singer, Frau Joachim, wife of the great violinist.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch yesterday had the assistance of Master Fiedemann, who played three selections in a mediocre fashion. Mrs. Nikisch seemed at first to suffer a little from nervousness, which, however, soon passed away, leaving the audience free to enjoy her voice, which is best in the upper register, and her style, which is in close sympathy with the utterances of the best lyric writers. With the exception of a song by Mr. R. De Koven, the Lieder given were of the German school. As usual on such occasions, Brahms was much more liberally represented than Franz, which is very much to be regretted, for Franz, as a song-writer, has a hundred times the genius of Brahms. One of the Brahms songs was encored. Mr. Nikisch played the accompaniments as he only can play them.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/8

MR. AND MRS. NIKISCH'S RECITAL.

The recital originally announced some time ago by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, but which was several times postponed by reason of Mrs. Nikisch's illness, was given at Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon. It proved to be a delightful entertainment. Mrs. Nikisch sang a number of songs by different composers—Schumann, Franz, Brahms, Goldmark, De Koven and others—disclosing a fine appreciation of the varying shades of expression requisite for their proper interpretation and a rare ability in carrying her intentions into effect. In voice and in style she is thoroughly acceptable and admirably equipped as a singer of German lieder. Mr. Nikisch's well-known excellence as an accompanist was again delightfully shown, and his presence at the pianoforte added to the effect of the vocal work, and also that of Master Alexander Fiedeman, the accomplished young violinist, who played several selections with Mr. Nikisch as accompanist.

[144]

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.
OUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.

WM. M. THOMS, Editor.

The first and most important object the journalis should have in mind is to criticise productive and reproductive art with such discriminating care and honesty of purpose as to offer a safe guide to popular judgment rather than act as its echo, thus creating a demand for higher culture in artists.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 5, 1892.

X

17TH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

MENDELSSOHN'S Ruy Blas overture is always acceptable, with its windy suggestions of mystery; and one is sure to enjoy Liszt's Symphonic Poem the Preludes; but, in addition to these favorites Mr. Nikisch gave two novelties, one for the first time here, A Prairie Scene in Central Asia, by Borodin of St. Petersburg, who died not many years ago, and was one of Liszt's riends. It is a most enjoyable composition, nd here is the description appended to the ore:

> In the silence of the sandy steppes of Central Asia there is heard the first refrain of a Russian folk-song, and also the melancholy notes of the songs of the Orient, followed by the hoof beats of the approaching horses and camels. A caravan, crossing the great desert, and escorted by Russian soldiers, pursues its long journey without fear, confidently relying on its military guard. The procession steadily advances. The voices of the Russians and of the natives blend in the same harmony. Their songs are heard for a long time, and are finally lost in the distance.

But the greater novelty was Dvorak's Fourth Symphony in G, finished last year, produced in Vienna and London, under Richter, and now heard for the first time in America. On simple direct themes Dvorak has built a structure of beautifully proportioned melody, and given us a symphony worthy of classification with the great works of the masters. Here is the official analysis:

The first movement, Allegro con brio, begins with a rather melancholy theme in G minor, played by the 'cellos and horns, which soon develops into a bright motif in G, given out by the flute, and, after a tremendous crescendo, brought forth by the full orchestra fortissimo. Contrary to the prevalent custom in symphonic works, of introducing in extended elaboration between the first and second principal themes, Dvorak, after a short independent passage of ten bars, glides into the second theme, in B-minor, followed by a third principal motif in B. Then the composer begins, without the usual repetition of the first part, to work out the melancholy introductory motif of the movement, which is developed to a strong climax. Then follows the first principal subject, given out pianissimo by the English horn; and after the repetition of the second theme in G, the movement comes to a brilliant close with full orchestra.

Adagio. There occurs a musical curiosity in this movement, in that the principal themes are invariably brought forward in the main keys of C-minor and C-major, only being interrupted by short modulations in another key.

Allegretto grazioso. A dainty motif assigned to the violins begins this movement, with an accompaniment of lofty figures by the flute and clarinet, in rapid sixteenth triplets. When the first theme appears the second time the situation is changed, the wood-wind taking the melody, and the violins playing a counter melody. In the place of the usual

---

EAGLE, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Date 3/6

The advent of the Boston Symphony orchestra is the theme of conversation among musical people of Grand Rapids. Although it will be two months before they play in Hartman's hall, expectations and questionings are rife as to what the programme will consist of, the cost of seats and when the sale will begin. Arrangements will be made with the railroads running into the city to give reduced rates to those wishing to attend the concert from the surrounding towns. It has been decided by the management to have the tickets $1.50 in the gallery and $1.00 in the body of the hall. Considering that it will cost $1,500 to bring them here, this is a very low price for the tickets, as in other towns where the halls are not so large, $2 and $2.50 is the price of tickets. The greatest pianist in the world, Eugen d'Albert, will be the soloist at this concert. It is almost three years since the last orchestral concert (that of Theodore Thomas) was heard in Grand Rapids, and people are in good trim for another.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, MARCH 8, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mme. Amalie Joachim, gave the last in its course of six chamber concerts in Union Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:

Ottokar Novácek: Quartet in E minor.
Songs with pianoforte—
Beethoven: Mignon, Op. 75, No. 1.
Mozart: Das Veilchen.
Hayden: Ständchen.
Beethoven: Variations from Quartet, Op. 18, No. 5.
Songs with pianoforte—
J. R. Ahle: Geistlicher Dialog.
J. A. P. Schulz: "Sagt, wo sind die Veilchen hin."
Mendelssohn: Venezianisches Gondellied.
Schubert: Haidenröschen.
Beethoven: Quartet in E-flat, Op. 74.

The quartet by Mr. Novacek—the young violist who has recently joined the Symphony Orchestra, and has played second viola with the Kneisels in the course of the present season—is a work that rather dazes one at the first hearing. It was brought out in Leipzig not long ago, and called forth very various comments from the critical press there. It certainly speaks well for it that the Kneisel Quartet has thought it worth while to play it here—and in no spirit of mere camaraderie, either; for some of the members of the quartet have been speaking of it lately in terms of unfeigned enthusiasm, and they evidently play it con amore. As for ourselves, a single hearing has given us nothing wherein to base a critical judgment; we dislike it thoroughly, but dislikes at first acquaintance are not necessarily lasting. It seems just the sort of composition to foil a critic's foresight. For aught we can tell, it may as well be the work of a new, original genius, or the miscarriage of a talent that will never ripen. It was superbly played, which is saying not a little for the performers, for its technical difficulty is enormous.

We were unspeakably delighted with the tempo at which the quartet took the variations from the fifth Lobkowitz Quartet; it went far towards healing an old sore, for we have long protested against the two common lackadaisical dragging out of this Andante cantabile. Last evening we noticed the following marginal note, in pencil, in our score, "Müller-Campanari Quartet, metronome 60, Feb. 12, 1883." We remember perfectly well our then rage at this tempo, for which the otherwise admirable 'cellist Müller was doubtless responsible. All thanks to the Kneisels for bringing it up to "metr. 80"; it sounded as if it had really been written by Beethoven. The performance of these variations was admirable throughout, and the rather "mystical" harmonies of the fourth variation sounded all the more impressive from the tempo being taken a trifle slower than that of the original theme, instead of faster, as was the case in the other performance we have referred to.

The great E-flat quartet, opus 74—known in Germany as the "Harfen-Quartett," and dedicated also to Prince Lobkowitz, although composed nine years later than the set of six that are commonly associated with his name—was wonderfully well played. The performance may be accounted as one of the finest achievements of the Kneisels.

Of Mme. Joachim's singing much can be said; but one would first say a word or two about two of the songs she sang, which have no little historic interest. The first of these is the "Geistlicher Dialog"—or Sacred Dialogue—by Ahle. Johann Rudolph Ahle was born at Mühlhausen, in Thuringia, on Dec. 24, 1625, and died there on July 8, 1673. He was educated at Göttingen and Erfurt, was appointed organist at the latter place, and afterwards director of a newly established music school there; on his return to Mühlhausen he was appointed organist at the Blasius-Kirche, and soon became councillor and even burgomaster of the town. He wrote and published a once famous treatise on singing, some instrumental works, and many secular and sacred songs and "dialogues." His rank among German song-writers of the seventeenth century was very high, and some of his melodies have still a place in Lutheran choral-books. The dialogue on the Advent, sung last evening, is an admirable example of his simple, heartfelt religious musical expression.

The name of Johann Abraham Peter Schulz is, perhaps, not very well known in America, although some of his music is; time was when his melody, "Müde bin ich, geh' zur Ruh'," was hummed by almost every cradle-side in New England, as it still is in Germany. Others of his times have worked their way into our hymnbooks, under more or less geographical, or topographical, titles. In Germany he is almost always known by his full name, unabbreviated—Christian name, two middle names and surname—and children's song-books are never without some of his melodies. He was born at Lüneburg on March 30, 1747, and died at Schwedt on June 10, 1800; he was a pupil of the great Kirnberger. Curiously enough for one whose posthumous fame was wholly that of a song writer, and most especially of a writer of Volkslieder, he was known during his lifetime as an opera composer and opera conductor; he travelled a good deal and held official positions in several capitals in Europe. But, of all he wrote, only his songs have survived; their simple melodic beauty has won them a permanent place in German hearts, and those that are best known have become folk-songs in the best sense of the term. With Friedrich Silcher, Albert Gottlieb Methfessel and Hans Georg Nägeli, his name will go down to posterity as that of one of the most charming folk-song writers of all time. The song of his sung by Mme. Joachim—who, besides standing as the acknowledged interpreter of Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn and Franz, makes a specialty of old songs in humbler forms—is an excellent example of his sincere, simple, heartfelt style.

Mme. Joachim has a glorious contralto voice, not in its first freshness, to be sure, but still rich, full and mellow. Of her singing last evening one need not speak too critically, for it was evident at the outset that she was not in perfect condition; she sang too often out of tune, a fault, however, which cured itself more and more as she went on. One felt that, had she sang a quarter of an hour longer, and got well warmed up to her work, every note would have been true as a die. But leaving, for the time, this point out of consideration, one could not but be struck by the fine intellectual and artistic mastery she showed. More than this, she is what the French call a "tempérament"; she sings from the heart out, and from a very warm, strong and womanly heart, too. We shall have ample opportunity in the course of the next few weeks of analyzing her surpassing talent at leisure. We will only say now that she sings—as the late Erminia Rudersdorff sang—as one who "knows all about it;" and this more: that to hear her would be an admirable lesson to more than one of our song singers, if only to remind them that Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn and Schubert wrote in something far stronger than what Mrs. Browning called "ink diluted with tears," and that there is no need of throwing their songs into the stove, as "the only means of giving them some warmth."

CHICKERING HALL.

THURSDAY EVE'G, MARCH 10, 1892, AT 8.

RECITAL

BY

MR. & MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH,

ASSISTED BY

MASTER ALEXANDER FIEDEMANN, VIOLIN.

PROGRAMME.

1.	a) GOLDMARK.
	b) SCHUMANN.	DIE QUELLE
	c) AUGUST BUNGERT.	DER NUSSBAUM
	d) RICHARD HEUBERGER.	VOLKSLIED
	e) ROBERT FRANZ.	EIN BETTLERPÄRCHEN
	f) SCHUMANN.	STÄNDCHEN
		PROVENCALISCHES LIED
2.	VIEUXTEMPS.	FANTASIE CAPRICE FOR VIOLIN
3.	BRAHMS.	a) GEHEIMNISS b) THERESE c) STÄNDCHEN d) WIEGENLIED e) DES LIEBSTEN SCHWUR. f) VERGEBLICHES STÄNDCHEN

SOLI FOR VIOLIN.

4.	a) SPOHR.	ADAGIO FROM THE CONCERTO NO. 9
	b) MISKA HAUSER.	HUNGARIAN RHAPSODY
5.	a) R. DE KOVEN.	INDIAN LOVE SONG
	b) TSCHAIKOWSKY.	BEIM TANZE
	c) RICHARD STRAUSS.	SERENADE
	d) JENSEN.	AM MANZANARES
	e) SCHUMANN	FRÜHLINGSNACHT

3/10 NY

The Nikisch Song Recital.

No department of music of equal importance is so much neglected in New York as that of the Lied, or lyric song. It is true that lyric songs, like lyric poems, are better suited for home enjoyment than for a public place, but there are a large number which bear transplantation and which should be more frequently heard. There is to be more music of this variety during the closing months of the present season than ordinarily. Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch gave a recital at Chickering Hall yesterday which is to be soon followed by one or two by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, and later on several more by the famous Lieder singer, Frau Joachim, wife of the great violinist.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch yesterday had the assistance of Master Fiedemann, who played three selections in a mediocre fashion. Mrs. Nikisch seemed at first to suffer a little from nervousness, which, however, soon passed away, leaving the audience free to enjoy her voice, which is best in the upper register, and her style, which is in close sympathy with the utterances of the best lyric writers. With the exception of a song by Mr. R. De Koven, the Lieder given were of the German school. As usual on such occasions, Brahms was much more liberally represented than Franz, which is very much to be regretted, for Franz, as a song-writer, has a hundred times the genius of Brahms. One of the Brahms songs was encored. Mr. Nikisch played the accompaniments as he only can play them.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/8

MR. AND MRS. NIKISCH'S RECITAL.

The recital originally announced some time ago by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, but which was several times postponed by reason of Mrs. Nikisch's illness, was given at Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon. It proved to be a delightful entertainment. Mrs. Nikisch sang a number of songs by different composers—Schumann, Franz, Brahms, Goldmark, De Koven and others—disclosing a fine appreciation of the varying shades of expression requisite for their proper interpretation and a rare ability in carrying her intentions into effect. In voice and in style she is thoroughly acceptable and admirably equipped as a singer of German lieder. Mr. Nikisch's well-known excellence as an accompanist was again delightfully shown, and his presence at the pianoforte added to the effect of the vocal work, and also that of Master Alexander Fiedeman, the accomplished young violinist, who played several selections with Mr. Nikisch as accompanist.

[144]

EAGLE, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Date 3/6

The advent of the Boston Symphony orchestra is the theme of conversation among musical people of Grand Rapids. Although it will be two months before they play in Hartman's hall, expectations and questionings are rife as to what the programme will consist of, the cost of seats and when the sale will begin. Arrangements will be made with the railroads running into the city to give reduced rates to those wishing to attend the concert from the surrounding towns. It has been decided by the management to have the tickets $1.50 in the gallery and $1.00 in the body of the hall. Considering that it will cost $1,500 to bring them here, this is a very low price for the tickets, as in other towns where the halls are not so large, $2 and $2.50 is the price of tickets. The greatest pianist in the world, Eugen d'Albert, will be the soloist at this concert. It is almost three years since the last orchestral concert (that of Theodore Thomas) was heard in Grand Rapids, and people are in good trim for another.

---

trio of the Scherzo there comes another bright, lofty theme in G, which, after the first sixteen bars, is taken up by the strings forte. After being twice repeated, with slight changes in the orchestration, a return is made to the first subject in G-minor, leading to a coda molto vivace in G-major, bringing the movement to a rapid close, after the fashion of a Slavonic dance.

Finale, Allegro ma non troppo. The last movement opens with a fan fare by the trumpets, and then assumes the form of a theme with variations, but interpreted with more freedom than is customary. The first theme of this movement has such a striking resemblance to the main subject of the opening movement as to suggest that it was intentional. For the second theme the composer uses a rather rhythmical motif in C-minor, assigned to the oboes and clarinets, which he works out with a bold harmonic freedom, and a great array of orchestral effects. After thus attaining a brilliant climax, there follows a descent to the simple first motif, played pianissima by the 'cellos. After a second repetition of this theme with variations, the movement ends with a brilliant coda.

AT THE BOSTON ART CLUB.

A VERY interesting concert was given latter February, which Mr. John Cone Kimball did much to arrange. Three or four artists made their Boston debut. One was Tom Ward, the Syracuse tenor, who, for almost the first time in his life, was afflicted with a sore throat, which took the form of tonsilitis. Nevertheless, his enunciation was perfect and his vocalization vigorous in "I Cannot Sleep," from Buck's Golden Legend, and songs by Rotoli and Dressler. Mr. Ward is the gentleman to whom Syracuse owes its elaborate festival and its Madrigal Club, and he came to his American work with the best English instruction.

Another new comer was Mrs. Virginia P. Marwich, the wife of a Hartford, Conn., druggist, who came to our city with her. Mrs. Marwich has studied under Shakespeare and others in London, and is now one of Winch's pupil's. Unfortunately she was also suffering with throat trouble, though in a far milder form, the vocal cords being so unnerved as to affect her middle register; but she won her audience by her sweet face and bearing, and by her fine voice (mezzo soprano, I should call it) in the Cinq Mars cantilena, songs by Camp and De Koven, and a duet with Mr. Ward, from Buck's Don Munio. Mrs. Marwick is a native of Maine, and won distinction at the Virginia Petersburg Festival under B. P. Paine.

Then we heard Brodsky's juvenile pupil of whom Nikisch has such hopeful expectations, Alexander Fiedemann. He prepossesses you by the bright beauty of his youthful face and form, but you forget his age when you hear the strong breadth of his playing in selections from Spohr, Vieutemps, and Hauser. Mr. E. Rosé was the accompanist, a cellist in the Symphony Orchestra. The one Boston artist was Stasny, the pianist, not yet fully recovered from inflammatory rheumatism in his right arm, but bringing out lovely tones from the middle register of the Knabe grand in five pieces, one of which, Popper's Elfin Dance, he had not before played in this country.

The Art Club does much to help music, as well as pictures and statuary.

MELODIOUS MARCHES.

LA RUSSELL CIGALE.

SUNDRY Paderewski farewells.

WE regret to learn that Mr. Daniel Morris, the Boston manufacturer, is not so well as he has been for a few weeks past.

SOMETHING new at the hub is ladies blacking themselves for a public minstrel show,— without some of his melodies. He was born at Lüneburg on March 30, 1747, and died at Schwedt on June 10, 1800; he was a pupil of the great Kirnberger. Curiously enough for one whose posthumous fame was wholly that of a song writer, and most especially of a writer of Volkslieder, he was known during his lifetime as an opera composer and opera conductor; he travelled a good deal and held official positions in several capitals in Europe. But, of all he wrote, only his songs have survived; their simple melodic beauty has won them a permanent place in German hearts, and those that are best known have become folk-songs in the best sense of the term. With Friedrich Silcher, Albert Gottlieb Methfessel and Hans Georg Nägeli, his name will go down to posterity as that of one of the most charming folk-song writers of all time. The song of his sung by Mme. Joachim—who, besides standing as the acknowledged interpreter of Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn and Franz, makes a specialty of old songs in humbler forms—is an excellent example of his sincere, simple, heartfelt style.

---

Mme. Joachim has a glorious contralto voice, not in its first freshness, to be sure, but still rich, full and mellow. Of her singing last evening one need not speak too critically, for it was evident at the outset that she was not in perfect condition; she sang too often out of tune, a fault, however, which cured itself more and more as she went on. One felt that, had she sang a quarter of an hour longer, and got well warmed up to her work, every note would have been true as a die. But leaving, for the time, this point out of consideration, one could not but be struck by the fine intellectual and artistic mastery she showed. More than this, she is what the French call a "tempérament"; she sings from the heart out, and from a very warm, strong and womanly heart, too. We shall have ample opportunity in the course of the next few weeks of analyzing her surpassing talent at leisure. We will only say now that she sings—as the late Erminia Rudersdorff sang—as one who "knows all about it;" and this more: that to hear her would be an admirable lesson to more than one of our song singers, if only to remind them that Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn and Schubert wrote in something far stronger than what Mrs. Browning called "ink diluted with tears," and that there is no need of throwing their songs into the stove, as "the only means of giving them some warmth."

CHICKERING HALL.

THURSDAY EVE'G. MARCH 10, 1892, AT 8.

RECITAL

BY

MR. & MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH,

ASSISTED BY

MASTER ALEXANDER FIEDEMANN, VIOLIN.

PROGRAMME.

1.	a) GOLDMARK.	DIE QUELLE
	b) SCHUMANN.	DER NUSSBAUM
	c) AUGUST BUNGERT.	VOLKSLIED
	d) RICHARD HEUBERGER.	EIN BETTLERPÄRCHEN
	e) ROBERT FRANZ.	STÄNDCHEN
	f) SCHUMANN.	PROVENCALISCHES LIED
2.	VIEUXTEMPS.	FANTASIE CAPRICE FOR VIOLIN
3.	BRAHMS.	a) GEHEIMNISS b) THERESE c) STÄNDCHEN d) WIEGENLIED e) DES LIEBSTEN SCHWUR. f) VERGEBLICHES STÄNDCHEN
	SOLI FOR VIOLIN.
4.	a) SPOHR.	ADAGIO FROM THE CONCERTO NO. 9
	b) MISKA HAUSER.	HUNGARIAN RHAPSODY
5.	a) R. DE KOVEN.	INDIAN LOVE SONG
	b) TSCHAIKOWSKY.	BEIM TÄNZE
	c) RICHARD STRAUSS.	SERENADE
	d) JENSEN.	AM MANZANARES
	e) SCHUMANN	FRÜHLINGSNACHT

3/8 ? NY

The Nikisch Song Recital.

No department of music of equal importance is so much neglected in New York as that of the Lied, or lyric song. It is true that lyric songs, like lyric poems, are better suited for home enjoyment than for a public place, but there are a large number which bear transplantation and which should be more frequently heard. There is to be more music of this variety during the closing months of the present season than ordinarily. Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch gave a recital at Chickering Hall yesterday which is to be soon followed by one or two by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, and later on several more by the famous Lieder singer, Frau Joachim, wife of the great violinist.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch yesterday had the assistance of Master Fiedemann, who played three selections in a mediocre fashion. Mrs. Nikisch seemed at first to suffer a little from nervousness, which, however, soon passed away, leaving the audience free to enjoy her voice, which is best in the upper register, and her style, which is in close sympathy with the utterances of the best lyric writers. With the exception of a song by Mr. R. De Koven, the Lieder given were of the German school. As usual on such occasions, Brahms was much more liberally represented than Franz, which is very much to be regretted, for Franz, as a songwriter, has a hundred times the genius of Brahms. One of the Brahms songs was encored. Mr. Nikisch played the accompaniments as he only can play them.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/8

MR. AND MRS. NIKISCH'S RECITAL.

The recital originally announced some time ago by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, but which was several times postponed by reason of Mrs. Nikisch's illness, was given at Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon. It proved to be a delightful entertainment. Mrs. Nikisch sang a number of songs by different composers—Schumann, Franz, Brahms, Goldmark, De Koven and others—disclosing a fine appreciation of the varying shades of expression requisite for their proper interpretation and a rare ability in carrying her intentions into effect. In voice and in style she is thoroughly acceptable and admirably equipped as a singer of German lieder. Mr. Nikisch's well-known excellence as an accompanist was again delightfully shown, and his presence at the pianoforte added to the effect of the vocal work, and also that of Master Alexander Fiedeman, the accomplished young violinist, who played several selections with Mr. Nikisch as accompanist.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 9, 1892.

Boston Office of The Musical Courier,
157 Tremont Street, Saturday, March 5, 1892.

THE program for the eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall this evening was: Symphonic poem, "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky (first time); concerto for violin, No. 3, in D minor, op. 58, Bruch (first time); symphony No. 4, D minor, op. 120, Schumann. Mrs. Camilla Urso was the soloist.

The opening number, given for the first time in this country, is a tone picture of the usual characteristics, extravagant in orchestration, surprisingly bold and unconventional in treatment and abounding in opportunities for exercising one's imagination, however vivid.

The chief satisfaction to be gained from a hearing of this work would, it seemed to us, lie in giving just such a vivid imagination limitless scope, treating it to blood congealing visions of ghosts, assassinations and gore galore. Musically it was not enjoyable. Mr. Nikisch did all that was possible to make the performance technically perfect, both in letter and spirit, and succeeded.

The Bruch concerto also had its first hearing here this evening, and the Symphony audience was fortunate in having such a consummate artist as Mrs. Urso to give the first impressions of a work, although musicianly, yet somewhat tedious. As we have ever been pleased to observe, it has been an invariable delight to listen to any work Mrs. Urso may have seen fit to do for us.

Her efforts this evening were fully as enjoyable as ever and as heartily appreciated and acknowledged by the audience.

The soloist for the coming week will be Mr. Eugen d'Albert, who will play the Beethoven E flat concerto. The original version of the Schumann symphony No. 4, in D minor, will then have its first performance in Boston.

* * * *

The Nikisch Recital.

THE much postponed song recital of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, of Boston, finally took place on Monday afternoon of this week, the lady having recovered completely from her recent severe indisposition. It is gratifying to be able to state that the recital was in every manner a most pronounced success and that Mrs. Nikisch was as warmly received in New York as her sincerest admirers could have wished for. She sang with all that grace and refinement which one might be led to expect from so lovely and cultured a woman, but above all with such a delicious musical flavor in each and every song of her varied program that it could not but give genuine artistic pleasure to even the most blasé of musical ears. The following was the interesting program presented:

"Die Quelle" .... Goldmark
"Der Nussbaum" .... Schumann
"Volkslied" .... August Bungert
"Ein Bettlerpaerchen" .... Richard Heuberger
"Staendchen" .... Robert Franz
"Provençalisches Lied" .... Schumann
Fantaisie Caprice, for violin .... Vieuxtemps
"Geheimniss" ....
"Therese" ....
"Staendchen" .... } .... Brahms
"Wiegenlied" ....
"Des Liebsten Schwur" ....
"Vergebliches Ständchen" ....
Soli for violin—
Adagio from the Concerto No. 9 .... Spohr
Hungarian Rhapsody .... Miska Hauser
"Indian Love Song" .... R. de Koven
"Beim Tanze" .... Tschaikowsky
Serenade .... Richard Strauss
"Am Manzanares" .... Jensen
"Fruehlingsnacht" .... Schumann

If there be a possibility of pointing out anything especially superior in a performance in which everything was so delightful and artistic, one would like to particularize the Bungert "Volkslied;" from the Brahms group the "Wiegenlied," which was sung with infinite tenderness, and the "Vergebliches Ständchen," which was given with so much grace and archfulness that the audience insisted on a da capo singing of it, and in the third group that most intense and characteristic love song in B minor, "Beim Tanze," by Tschaikowsky, which was interpreted with deep feeling and lovely expression, and lastly Jensen's beautiful song, "Am Manzanares."

Not the least attractions of the concert were Mr. Nikisch's accompaniments at the piano, which for refinement, taste, discretion and genuine musicianship justified his well-known reputation of being as great a pianist as he is a violinist and as great a conductor as he is a musician.

Master Alexander Fiedemann, the adopted son of Concertmaster Brodsky, played his violin solo in a manner surprising for one of his years. He showed the excellent results of the parental teaching in the way his talent for the violin has been cultivated as to tone, purity of intonation, bowing and phrasing. He will become a great violinist in due time, provided he is not spoiled, as such pretty wonder children are apt to be, by too many and too early public appearances and resultant overpraise.

The extra concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the benefit of its members, on Wednesday evening, proved, as was expected, an affair of the "red letter" order.

Mr. Paderewski and Mrs. Julie Wyman volunteered their very valuable services, and in consequence a particularly large and high-classed audience was drawn together on this occasion.

The program was attractive, interesting and very well performed, the members of the orchestra evidently putting their best efforts into the work, especially in the opening number, the "Tannhäuser" overture, which was given with a finish, fire and grandeur never before equaled by this band.

Mr. Paderewski gave a broad and artistic interpretation of the Schumann concerto in A minor, at the close of which Mr. Kneisel, on behalf of the orchestra, presented him with a magnificent laurel wreath of silver. Thereupon the enthusiasm of the audience knew no bounds, and Mr. Paderewski was compelled to bow his acknowledgments again and again, finally giving in response to such imperative de-

Mrs. Julie Wyman contributed several enjoyable vocal numbers and Mr. Schroeder a group of short compositions for the 'cello. The concert came to an end with the Liszt Hungarian fantaisie for piano and orchestra. Taken all in all the occasion was a most enjoyable one, and with nearly every seat in the Music Hall taken must have been productive of very satisfactory results from a financial point of view.

* * * *

Providence Music.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., February 27.

A REVIEW of the past month presents a formidable array of musical events, from which I will extract those which seem to be of greatest local or general interest.

The admirable Kneisel Quartet gave us one of its enjoyable evenings of chamber music on February 2. The program for the quartet was Dittersdorf's quartet in E flat—a charming number, Beethoven's quartet in G, No. 18, and the andante from Tschaikowsky's quartet in D. Between these came a group of solos for the violin and another for the 'cello, both of which were rendered in a thoroughly finished and artistic manner by Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder.

Ann Arbor Music.

ANN ARBOR, Mich., February 26, 1892.

THIS month has been an eventful one musically, for the University Musical Society on February 12 and 15 presented two of the finest concerts ever heard in the State. The University Choral Union of 240 voices gave a fine program for their first choral concert, and chorus, orchestra and soloists did magnificentwork. Mrs. Genevra Johnstone-Bishop is a great favorite and sang the solos in Bruch's "Fair Ellen," "Flight into Egypt," and "Gallia" superbly. Mr. Max Heinrich aroused the large audience into the wildest enthusiasm by his artistic singing. He sang a group of songs and solos in "Fair Ellen," Foote's "Wreck of the Hesperus," and Grieg's "Discovery."

The Choral Union is admittedly the finest chorus in Michigan, and proposes Berlioz's "Faust" for its last concert. The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays here on May 9, and this concert is looked forward to with high expectation, for Mr. Nikisch always gives us one of the choicest programs on the Western tour. Paderewski played on February 15 to an audience of 2,500. To say that he was enthusiastically received is to put it mildly. In university circles are many excellent judges of music, and it is the universal testimony that such playing was never before heard in University Hall, and all are hoping that he may come next year again.

Providence
News
Feb 29

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From the standpoint of the lover of the deeper music that appeals alike to the intellect and the emotions—such as that of Beethoven or Wagner—last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be only partially satisfying, but for the broadly cultivated musician, who wishes to hear all the varieties of style, and for the musical diletante who loves music for music's sake alone, the program could not have been bettered. It is a great source of credit to Mr. Nikisch that he almost always devotes a portion of his evening to some new work, thus keeping his hearers abreast of the musical development of the period, and at the same tims showing by his reading of the scores that the field for musical composition has not all been tilled by the old masters; that there are still an infinite number of paths in which real genius can yet for ages continue to create materpieces that will always command the sincere admiration of music-lovers. The program follows:

Overture—"Le Roi d'Ys .... Lalo
Symphony in G major, No. 4 .... Dvorak
First movement from the Concerto for Violin in D major .... Paganini
Mr. Kneisel.
Aase's Death, from the Suite "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg
Pilgrims March, from the Symphony "Harold in Italy" .... Berlioz
Cavatina, from "Faust" .... Gounod
Mr. Campanari.

The tonal effects of Le Roi d'Ys, for emotional and sustained qualities were exquisitely setforth by the orchestra but the passages of Aase's Death were marvelously rendered. The shading of sixty musical instruments in the production of a pianissimo tone that scarcely exceeds a whisper in quantity but whose quality is perfection, cannot be described in words, it must be heard. The low and plaintive tones of deep sorrow have never been touched by a truer artist than Grieg in this melody from Peer Gynt.

Space only prohibited a more extended comment on the solo work. Campanari's voice was as usual, grandly sympathetic, and moved the audience as only that most wonderful of all instruments, the musical human voice, can. Dvorak's symphony is is a series of surprises that appeals rather to the imagination than the emotions, and is a number rather to be added to the program for its newness and strangeness than for its permanent value.

---

pping from

Union, Springfield, Mass

Date 3/9

Profaning the ymphony.

The Boston symphony concerts have become, in a way, sacred ceremonials, at which even those not born with a musical ear must assist in becoming fashion. One Friday afternoon the two little daughters of a certain family returned from the music hall "in a state of mind." One of them was evidently scornful and the other depressed. "What's the the matter?" asked some one. "Was n't the concert fine?" "The concert was all right," said Ethel, superbly. "I don't complain of the concert." "Then, what did go wrong? Something, I'm sure." "The amount of the matter is," said the young lady, looking haughtily at her drooping sister, "that Mildred has disgraced herself. She sneezed in the middle of the symphony."—Youth's Companion.

---

pping from

Record, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3/11

—At the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given on Monday next at the ACADEMY OF MUSIC, Eugen D'Albert, pianist, will be the solo

---

Providence
Telegram
Feb 29

Rich Treat by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Night—Other Concert.

There were rich and enjoyable features in the Boston Symphony orchestra concert in Infantry hall last night. The program was a sumptuous one in the character and diversity of its numbers, as the following list of works given shows:

Overture, "Le Roi d'ys" .... Lalo
Concerto for violin in D major ...... Paganini
Franz Kneisel.
"Aale's Death," from suite, "Peer Gynt," .... Grieg
"Pilgrims' March," from symphony, "Harold in Italy" .... Berlioz
(Viola solo, Franz Kneisel.)
Cavatina, from "Faust" .... Gounod
Mr. G. Campanari.
Symphony No. 4, G minor .... Dvorak
Allegro con brio,
Adagio,
Allegretto grazioso,
Finale; allegro ma non troppo.

The overture written by Lalo proved to be a composition abounding in round, resonant melody and heavy effects, such as sudden swells and tone expansions, long roles and deep rumblese. It was artistically handled by Nikisch, who displayed his masterly abilities in conductorship as he has not done in any previous performance in this city. The work from bar to bar seemed to be an aim at the art of demonstrating by the most ingenius devices what there is in real melody, and for this reason its presentation in a manner so intelligent and musician tripled the pleasure it excited.

The "Pilgrims' March" was delightfully performed, and all its wealth of harmonic peculiarities bestowed upon the hearing of the auditors. Almost every instrument in the chorus had a special part to carry, which gave each, or each class, an opportunity of rising to temporary prominence above the others, and sustaining some delicious secondary air, or a modification of the original theme.

Mr. Kneisel played a curiously scored viola solo in one section, which, as an example of delicate quaintness, was uncommonly sweet and beautiful.

Dr. Dvorak's symphony was given for the first time in Providence, and its appearance on the program of the Symphony orchestra in Boston Saturday the first time it has been played in this country. The composer only finished it last year. The work consisted of four movements. The third was the gayest and most exhilarating, the first two being devoted largely to combinations of the tones that suggest a melancholy or pensive state of mind. In the third movement was a part for the strung pieces, gorgeously written and exquisitely elegant in effect.

1 Mr. Kneisel's solos were perfectly executed. His violin performance was as graceful and polished a specimen of refined playing as the daintiest connoisseur would wish to hear, and his viola work was charmingly done.

Mr. Campanari sang his selection with taste and feeling, and in the operation revealed a voice that, with thorough cultivation, would yield him handsome returns on the concert or the operatic platform. Mr. Campanari is one of the 'cellists of the orchestra, and his brother is also a member. He was once a singer of great promise in Milan and other cities of Southern Europe, and today if he would forsake instrumental music for vocal, and give himself up to the art, he would be a bright star in the world of song.

At the concert by the orchestra April 6, Eugen D'Albert, the pianist, will be the soloist.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, MARCH 11, 1892.

Mrs. Nikisch's Recital.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch gave a song recital last evening in Chickering Hall. She was assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann, violinist, and Mr. Arthur Nikisch, pianist. The programme included songs by Goldmark, Schumann, Bungert, Heuberger, Franz, Brahms, De Koven, Tschaikowsky, R. Strauss, Jensen.

Mrs. Nikisch showed last evening the results of careful training in certain and limited directions. She sang with less rigidity and with more confidence than on former occasions; and there is a slight gain in the matter of expression. Her voice is naturally of such agreeable quality that it is unfortunate that she has not more closely applied herself to the elements of her art. She has not mastered the science of tone-production. The tone does not carry; instead of being round and full it is a shell. The intonation is not always pure, and at the end of a phrase she is apt to fall below the true pitch. Her attack is not precise, and the habit of scooping, which was so apparent last year, seems now confirmed. Nor does the dramatic feeling or musical intelligence displayed in her performance atone for these grievous faults. For, although she sings at times with archness, with coquetry, the musical emotion never rises above pleasant superficiality. There is no depth, no passion, no direct and irresistible appeal to the heart. So last evening she was most successful in the songs of a light and sportive character, and the effect in these songs was heightened by the charm of her personal appearance. The accompaniments were played in a thoroughly delightful manner by Mr. Nikisch, and the singer was frequently and loudly applauded.

The feature of the concert, however, was the appearance of the 12-year-old violinist, Alexander Fiedemann. The boy is under the protection and guidance of Mr. Brodsky, the admirable concert meister of the Damrosch Orchestra, and he shows in many ways the influence of his teacher. Last evening he played Vieuxtemps's fantasie caprice, the adagio of Spohr's concerto No. 9, and Hauser's Hungarian Rhapsody. The boy's tone is full and eminently virile. He even now plays with the passion of a robust man. But this passion is under control. His performance is not, then, merely the parrot cleverness of a quick-eared youth. It is thoughtful and at the same time apparently spontaneous. His mechanism, though not faultless, is highly developed; his stage presence wins sympathy and commands respect. And perhaps the highest praise is this: That the hearer in watching the earnest and romantic face of the boy, in remarking the freedom and strength of the performance, forgets the existence of such a thing as an infant phenomenon and greets a genuine musician.

PHILIP HALE.

Providence
Journal
Feb 29

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Infantry Hall was filled last even for the fifth concert of the Boston Sy phony Orchestra, and certainly no m enjoyable concert has been given that organization here this winter. T compositions presented were mostly of semi-heroic, semi-romantic nture. T verture "Le Roi d'Ys" is sentimental to extreme, except when certain parts of seem to merge into flights of fancy, whi relieve the sombreness of the whole. " Roi d'Ys" is new, and possibly is o of the things in which fresh beauti are continually developing and surprisin the hearer, but certainly at the fir hearing it is rather disappointing. O part of it, however, was certainly ap preciated when Alwin Schroeder was hear through the medium of his instrument, an a short but beautiful solo for 'cello was in troduced.

The first movement from the Concert in D-major, by Paganini, played by Mr Franz Kneisel, was the piece of the eve
ing. The movement is in and by itsel beautiful part of this overture, and it ffects were added to and enhanced by Mr. Kneisels interpretation. His tones were clear-out as crystal, pure throughout n intonation and beautiful in quality.
lengthy cadenza closed the movement, howing the deep, full sounds Mr. Kneisel an draw from his instrument. Rounds of applause greeted him as he finished, and the audience was not satisfied until he had bowed his acknowledgment many times. His viola solo in the "Pilgrim's March," from the symphony "Harold in Italy," by Berlioz, was equally well rendered. A word must be said in regard to Mr. Nikisch's accompanying. "Aase's Death," from Grieg's suite, "Peer Gynt," is a short but exquisite part of the suite, thoroughly characteristic of this wonderful composer in the eminently weird harmonies and chords with which it teems. The ending of this part of the suite is scarcely more than a breath, so pianissimo is it taken, notwithstanding which every tone was perfectly distinct, played as though by one man. The composition is one which works upon the feelings unconsciously, and though applause was given because deserved, it was given grudgingly as though afraid of the indescribable spell which the music left.

"Dvorak's Symphony, No. 4," in G-major, is quite new, and was received with much interest last evening. The first movement has little of real originality in it, but is so full of bright, beautiful themes and brilliant orchestration as to make up for this deficiency. The second movement is not particularly interesting. The whole movement, which is none too short, is in the two main keys of C-minor and C-major. The effect is not entirely pleasing when so much of a sameness is used to represent ideas. The third and fourth movements are entirely different from the first two in many respects, and leave at the end a good impression of the whole. The harmonies are distributed better, the themes are spicy and original, and the whole has a go and vim to it which characterizes this composer.

Mr. Campanari's baritone was heard to advantage in Gounod's cavatina from "Faust." He possesses a voice rich and full in quality and with a good scope. The sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place Wednesday evening, April 6th.

Boston Post

MOTTO:

With a Mission

—AND—

Without a Muzzle.

FRIDAY MORNING, MAR. 11, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The long-expected recital by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Master Alexander Fiedemann took place last evening in Chickering Hall, where, notwithstanding the nasty weather, one of the best audiences Boston can produce was assembled. From an artistic standpoint it was one of the best musical events of an unusual season, and was above criticism; we can only emphasize a few of the best points.

Mrs. Nikisch was the particular subject of interest, for whatever may have been her standing as a vocalist in the comparatively small circle in which she has heretofore been heard, the musical public has had no opportunity this season to judge her ability, for the small part she sang in "Manfred" was no test of her powers. Even those who were fortunate enough to hear her last season were surprised at last night's performance. She sang seventeen songs, one of which she repeated, all but one in German—songs that fully tested the power and compass of her voice, which is rare in quality, possessing vibration quite unlike the tremolo so much affected by singers of the present day. The tones are full and round, true to pitch, and evenly developed throughout the entire register. She phrases exquisitely. The six Brahms selections were very beautiful but difficult, as his music is prone to be, but she mastered the difficulties with ease and skill. Mrs. Nikisch is doubly fortunate in possessing such ability combined with a charming personality.

Mr. Nikisch's skill as an accompanist has been as firmly established as his position among the few really fine conductors. His accompaniments for both the songs and the violin solos were beautiful for shading and delicacy. He seems to possess in a high degree the intuitive sense so necessary in an accompanist.

It was hard to realize that such rich, clear tones, such breadth of style, such an intelligent manner of treatment of subject, could be accomplished by a mere lad of 13 years. His interpretation of Vieuxtemps' fantasie caprice, Spohr's adagio from the concerto No. 9, and Hungarian Rhapsody by Miska Hauser, was a revelation even to the people who could read genius in the young face and head, which bears a striking resemblance to the familiar pictures of Beethoven. The boy has a future, and the world will be indebted to Professor Brodsky for this addition to the list of virtuosos, as Fiedemann has been under his instruction since the discovery of his talent.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 9, 1892.

BOSTON OFFICE OF THE MUSICAL COURIER,
157 Tremont Street, Saturday, March 5, 1892.

THE program for the eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall this evening was: Symphonic poem, "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky (first time); concerto for violin, No. 3, in D minor, op. 58, Bruch (first time); symphony No. 4, D minor, op. 120, Schumann. Mrs. Camilla Urso was the soloist.

The opening number, given for the first time in this country, is a tone picture of the usual characteristics, extravagant in orchestration, surprisingly bold and unconventional in treatment and abounding in opportunities for exercising one's imagination, however vivid.

The chief satisfaction to be gained from a hearing of this work would, it seemed to us, lie in giving just such a vivid imagination limitless scope, treating it to blood congealing visions of ghosts, assassinations and gore galore. Musically it was not enjoyable. Mr. Nikisch did all that was possible to make the performance technically perfect, both in letter and spirit, and succeeded.

The Bruch concerto also had its first hearing here this evening, and the Symphony audience was fortunate in having such a consummate artist as Mrs. Urso to give the first impressions of a work, although musicianly, yet somewhat tedious. As we have ever been pleased to observe, it has been an invariable delight to listen to any work Mrs. Urso may have seen fit to do for us.

Her efforts this evening were fully as enjoyable as ever and as heartily appreciated and acknowledged by the audience.

The soloist for the coming week will be Mr. Eugen d'Albert, who will play the Beethoven E flat concerto. The original version of the Schumann symphony No. 4, in D minor, will then have its first performance in Boston.

* * * *

The Nikisch Recital.

THE much postponed song recital of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, of Boston, finally took place on Monday afternoon of this week, the lady having recovered completely from her recent severe indisposition. It is gratifying to be able to state that the recital was in every manner a most pronounced success and that Mrs. Nikisch was as warmly received in New York as her sincerest admirers could have wished for. She sang with all that grace and refinement which one might be led to expect from so lovely and cultured a woman, but above all with such a delicious musical flavor in each and every song of her varied program that it could not but give genuine artistic pleasure to even the most blasé of musical ears. The following was the interesting program presented:

"Die Quelle" .... Goldmark
"Der Nussbaum" .... Schumann
"Volkslied" .... August Bungert
"Ein Bettlerpaerchen" .... Richard Heuberger
"Staendchen" .... Robert Franz
"Provençalisches Lied" .... Schumann
Fantaisie Caprice, for violin .... Vieuxtemps
"Geheimniss" ....
"Therese" ....
"Staendchen" ....
"Wiegenlied" ....
"Des Liebsten Schwur" ....
"Vergebliches Ständchen" .... } .... Brahms
Soli for violin—
  Adagio from the Concerto No. 9 .... Spohr
  Hungarian Rhapsody .... Miska Hauser
"Indian Love Song" .... R. de Koven
"Beim Tanze" .... Tschaikowsky
Serenade .... Richard Strauss
"Am Manzanares" .... Jensen
"Fruehlingsnacht" .... Schumann

If there be a possibility of pointing out anything especially superior in a performance in which everything was so delightful and artistic, one would like to particularize the Bungert "Volkslied;" from the Brahms group the "Wiegenlied," which was sung with infinite tenderness, and the "Vergebliches Ständchen," which was given with so much grace and archfulness that the audience insisted on a da capo singing of it, and in the third group that most intense and characteristic love song in B minor, "Beim Tanze," by Tschaikowsky, which was interpreted with deep feeling and lovely expression, and lastly Jensen's beautiful song, "Am Manzanares."

Not the least attractions of the concert were Mr. Nikisch's accompaniments at the piano, which for refinement, taste, discretion and genuine musicianship justified his well-known reputation of being as great a pianist as he is a violinist and as great a conductor as he is a musician.

Master Alexander Fiedemann, the adopted son of Concertmaster Brodsky, played his violin solo in a manner surprising for one of his years. He showed the excellent results of the parental teaching in the way his talent for the violin has been cultivated as to tone, purity of intonation, bowing and phrasing. He will become a great violinist in due time, provided he is not spoiled, as such pretty wonder children are apt to be, by too many and too early public appearances and resultant overpraise.

The extra concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the benefit of its members, on Wednesday evening, proved, as was expected, an affair of the "red letter" order.

Mr. Paderewski and Mrs. Julie Wyman volunteered their very valuable services, and in consequence a particularly large and high-classed audience was drawn together on this occasion.

The program was attractive, interesting and very well performed, the members of the orchestra evidently putting their best efforts into the work, especially in the opening number, the "Tannhäuser" overture, which was given with a finish, fire and grandeur never before equaled by this band.

Mr. Paderewski gave a broad and artistic interpretation of the Schumann concerto in A minor, at the close of which Mr. Kneisel, on behalf of the orchestra, presented him with a magnificent laurel wreath of silver. Thereupon the enthusiasm of the audience knew no bounds, and Mr. Paderewski was compelled to bow his acknowledgments again and again, finally giving in response to such imperative demands Schumann's "Des Abends."

Mrs. Julie Wyman contributed several enjoyable vocal numbers and Mr. Schroeder a group of short compositions for the 'cello. The concert came to an end with the Liszt Hungarian fantaisie for piano and orchestra. Taken all in all the occasion was a most enjoyable one, and with nearly every seat in the Music Hall taken must have been productive of very satisfactory results from a financial point of view.

* * * *

Providence Music.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., February 27.

A REVIEW of the past month presents a formidable array of musical events, from which I will extract those which seem to be of greatest local or general interest.

The admirable Kneisel Quartet gave us one of its enjoyable evenings of chamber music on February 2. The program for the quartet was Dittersdorf's quartet in E flat—a charming number, Beethoven's quartet in G, No. 18, and the andante from Tschaikowsky's quartet in D. Between these came a group of solos for the violin and another for the 'cello, both of which were rendered in a thoroughly finished and artistic manner by Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder.

Ann Arbor Music.

ANN ARBOR, Mich., February 26, 1892.

THIS month has been an eventful one musically, for the University Musical Society on February 12 and 15 presented two of the finest concerts ever heard in the State. The University Choral Union of 240 voices gave a fine program for their first choral concert, and chorus, orchestra and soloists did magnificentwork. Mrs. Genevra Johnstone-Bishop is a great favorite and sang the solos in Bruch's "Fair Ellen," "Flight into Egypt," and "Gallia" superbly. Mr. Max Heinrich aroused the large audience into the wildest enthusiasm by his artistic singing. He sang a group of songs and solos in "Fair Ellen," Foote's "Wreck of the Hesperus," and Grieg's "Discovery."

The Choral Union is admittedly the finest chorus in Michigan, and proposes Berlioz's "Faust" for its last concert. The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays here on May 9, and this concert is looked forward to with high expectation, for Mr. Nikisch always gives us one of the choicest programs on the Western tour. Paderewski played on February 15 to an audience of 2,500. To say that he was enthusiastically received is to put it mildly. In university circles are many excellent judges of music, and it is the universal testimony that such playing was never before heard in University Hall, and all are hoping that he may come next year again.

Providence
Telegram
Feb 29

Rich Treat by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Night—Other Concert.

There were rich and enjoyable features in the Boston Symphony orchestra concert in Infantry hall last night. The program was a sumptuous one in the character and diversity of its numbers, as the following list of works given shows:

Overture, "Le Roi d'ys" .... Lalo
Concerto for violin in D major .... Paganini
  Franz Kneisel.
"Aaie's Death," from suite, "Peer Gyat," .... Grieg
"Pilgrims' March," from symphony, "Harold in Italy" .... Berlioz
  (Viola solo, Franz Kneisel.)
Cavatina, from "Faust" .... Gounod
  Mr. G. Campanari.
Symphony No. 4, G minor .... Dvorak
  Allegro con brio,
  Adagio,
  Allegretto grazioso,
  Finale; allegro ma non troppo.

The overture written by Lalo proved to be a composition abounding in round, resonant melody and heavy effects, such as sudden swells and tone expansions, long roles and deep rumblese. It was artistically handled by Nikisch, who displayed his masterly abilities in conductorship as he has not done in any previous performance in this city. The work from bar to bar seemed to be an aim at the art of demonstrating by the most ingenius devices what there is in real melody, and for this reason its presentation in a manner so intelligent and musician tripled the pleasure it excited.

The "Pilgrims' March" was delightfully performed, and all its wealth of harmonic peculiarities bestowed upon the hearing of the auditors. Almost every instrument in the chorus had a special part to carry, which gave each, or each class, an opportunity of rising to temporary prominence above the others, and sustaining some delicious secondary air, or a modification of the original theme.

Mr. Kneisel played a curiously scored viola solo in one section, which, as an example of delicate quaintness, was uncommonly sweet and beautiful.

Dr. Dvorak's symphony was given for the first time in Providence, and its appearance on the program of the Symphony orchestra in Boston Saturday the first time it has been played in this country. The composer only finished it last year. The work consisted of four movements. The third was the gayest and most exhilarating, the first two being devoted largely to combinations of the tones that suggest a melancholy or pensive state of mind. In the third movement was a part for the strung pieces, gorgeously written and exquisitely elegant in effect.

Mr. Kneisel's solos were perfectly executed. His violin performance was as graceful and polished a specimen of refined playing as the daintiest connoisseur would wish to hear, and his viola work was charmingly done.

Mr. Campanari sang his selection with taste and feeling, and in the operation revealed a voice that, with thorough cultivation, would yield him handsome returns on the concert or the operatic platform. Mr. Campanari is one of the 'cellists of the orchestra, and his brother is also a member. He was once a singer of great promise in Milan and other cities of Southern Europe, and today if he would forsake instrumental music for vocal, and give himself up to the art, he would be a bright star in the world of song.

At the concert by the orchestra April 6, Eugen D'Albert, the pianist, will be the soloist.

Providence
Journal
Feb 29

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Infantry Hall was filled last evening for the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and certainly no more enjoyable concert has been given by that organization here this winter. The compositions presented were mostly of a semi-heroic, semi-romantic nture. The verture "Le Roi d'Ys" is sentimental to an extreme, except when certain parts of it seem to merge into flights of fancy, which relieve the sombreness of the whole. "Le Roi d'Ys" is new, and possibly is one of the things in which fresh beauties are continually developing and surprising the hearer, but certainly at the first hearing it is rather disappointing. One part of it, however, was certainly appreciated when Alwin Schroeder was heard through the medium of his instrument, and a short but beautiful solo for 'cello was introduced.

The first movement from the Concerto in D-major, by Paganini, played by Mr. Franz Kneisel, was the piece of the evening. The movement is in and by itself a beautiful part of this overture, and its effects were added to and enhanced by Mr. Kneisels interpretation. His tones were clear-cut as crystal, pure throughout in intonation and beautiful in quality. A lengthy cadenza closed the movement, showing the deep, full sounds Mr. Kneisel can draw from his instrument. Rounds of applause greeted him as he finished, and the audience was not satisfied until he had bowed his acknowledgment many times. His viola solo in the "Pilgrim's March," from the symphony "Harold in Italy," by Berlioz, was equally well rendered. A word must be said in regard to Mr. Nikisch's accompanying. "Aase's Death," from Grieg's suite, "Peer Gynt," is a short but exquisite part of the suite, thoroughly characteristic of this wonderful composer in the eminently weird harmonies and chords with which it teems. The ending of this part of the suite is scarcely more than a breath, so pianissimo is it taken, notwithstanding which every tone was perfectly distinct, played as though by one man. The composition is one which works upon the feelings unconsciously, and though applause was given because deserved, it was given grudgingly as though afraid of the indescribable spell which the music left.

"Dvorak's Symphony, No. 4," in G-major, is quite new, and was received with much interest last evening. The first movement has little of real originality in it, but is so full of bright, beautiful themes and brilliant orchestration as to make up for this deficiency. The second movement is not particularly interesting. The whole movement, which is none too short, is in the two main keys of C-minor and C-major. The effect is not entirely pleasing when so much of a sameness is used to represent ideas. The third and fourth movements are entirely different from the first two in many respects, and leave at the end a good impression of the whole. The harmonies are distributed better, the themes are spicy and original, and the whole has a go and vim to it which characterizes this composer.

Mr. Campanari's baritone was heard to advantage in Gounod's cavatina from "Faust." He possesses a voice rich and full in quality and with a good scope. The sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place Wednesday evening, April 6th.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From the standpoint of the lover of the deeper music that appeals alike to the intellect and the emotions—such as that of Beethoven or Wagner—last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be only partially satisfying, but for the broadly cultivated musician, who wishes to hear all the varieties of style, and for the musical diletante who loves music for music's sake alone, the program could not have been bettered. It is a great source of credit to Mr. Nikisch that he almost always devotes a portion of his evening to some new work, thus keeping his hearers abreast of the musical development of the period, and at the same tims showing by his reading of the scores that the field for musical composition has not all been tilled by the old masters; that there are still an infinite number of paths in which real genius can yet for ages continue to create materpieces that will always command the sincere admiration of music-lovers. The program follows:

Overture—"Le Roi d'Ys .... Lalo
Symphony in G major, No. 4 .... Dvorak
First movement from the Concerto for Violin in D major .... Paganini
  Mr. Kneisel.
Aase's Death, from the Suite "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg
Pilgrims March, from the Symphony "Harold in Italy" .... Berlioz
Cavatina, from "Faust" .... Gounod
  Mr. Campanari.

The tonal effects of Le Roi d'Ys, for emotional and sustained qualities were exquisitely setforth by the orchestra but the passages of Aase's Death were marvelously rendered. The shading of sixty musical instruments in the production of a pianissimo tone that scarcely exceeds a whisper in quantity but whose quality is perfection, cannot be described in words, it must be heard. The low and plaintive tones of deep sorrow have never been touched by a truer artist than Grieg in this melody from Peer Gynt.

Space only prohibited a more extended comment on the solo work. Campanari's voice was as usual, grandly sympathetic, and moved the audience as only that most wonderful of all instruments, the musical human voice, can. Dvorak's symphony is is a series of surprises that appeals rather to the imagination than the emotions, and is a number rather to be added to the program for its newness and strangeness than for its permanent value.

Union, Springfield, Mass

Date

Profaning the Symphony.

The Boston symphony concerts have become, in a way, sacred ceremonials, at which even those not born with a musical ear must assist in becoming fashion, One Friday afternoon the two little daughters of a certain family returned from the music hall "in a state of mind." One of them was evidently scornful and the other depressed. "What's the the matter?" asked some one. "Was n't the concert fine?" "The concert was all right," said Ethel, superbly. "I don't complain of the concert." "Then, what did go wrong? Something, I'm sure." "The amount of the matter is," said the young lady, looking haughtily at her drooping sister, "that Mildred has disgraced herself. She sneezed in the middle of the symphony."—Youth's Companion.

Record, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

—At the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given on Monday next at the ACADEMY OF MUSIC, Eugen D'Albert, pianist, will be the solo

---

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, MARCH 11, 1892.

Mrs. Nikisch's Recital.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch gave a song recital last evening in Chickering Hall. She was assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann, violinist, and Mr. Arthur Nikisch, pianist. The programme included songs by Goldmark, Schumann, Bungert, Heuberger, Franz, Brahms, De Koven, Tschaikowsky, R. Strauss, Jensen.

Mrs. Nikisch showed last evening the results of careful training in certain and limited directions. She sang with less rigidity and with more confidence than on former occasions; and there is a slight gain in the matter of expression. Her voice is naturally of such agreeable quality that it is unfortunate that she has not more closely applied herself to the elements of her art. She has not mastered the science of tone-production. The tone does not carry; instead of being round and full it is a shell. The intonation is not always pure, and at the end of a phrase she is apt to fall below the true pitch. Her attack is not precise, and the habit of scooping, which was so apparent last year, seems now confirmed. Nor does the dramatic feeling or musical intelligence displayed in her performance atone for these grievous faults. For, although she sings at times with archness, with coquetry, the musical emotion never rises above pleasant superficiality. There is no depth, no passion, no direct and irresistible appeal to the heart. So last evening she was most successful in the songs of a light and sportive character, and the effect in these songs was heightened by the charm of her personal appearance. The accompaniments were played in a thoroughly delightful manner by Mr. Nikisch, and the singer was frequently and loudly applauded.

The feature of the concert, however, was the appearance of the 12-year-old violinist, Alexander Fiedemann. The boy is under the protection and guidance of Mr. Brodsky, the admirable concert meister of the Damrosch Orchestra, and he shows in many ways the influence of his teacher. Last evening he played Vieuxtemps's fantasie caprice, the adagio of Spohr's concerto No. 9, and Hauser's Hungarian Rhapsody. The boy's tone is full and eminently virile. He even now plays with the passion of a robust man. But this passion is under control. His performance is not, then, merely the parrot cleverness of a quick-eared youth. It is thoughtful and at the same time apparently spontaneous. His mechanism, though not faultless, is highly developed; his stage presence wins sympathy and commands respect. And perhaps the highest praise is this: That the hearer in watching the earnest and romantic face of the boy, in remarking the freedom and strength of the performance, forgets the existence of such a thing as an infant phenomenon and greets a genuine musician.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Post

MOTTO:
With a Mission
—AND—
Without a Muzzle.

FRIDAY MORNING, MAR. 11, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The long-expected recital by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Master Alexander Fiedemann took place last evening in Chickering Hall, where, notwithstanding the nasty weather, one of the best audiences Boston can produce was assembled. From an artistic standpoint it was one of the best musical events of an unusual season, and was above criticism; we can only emphasize a few of the best points.

Mrs. Nikisch was the particular subject of interest, for whatever may have been her standing as a vocalist in the comparatively small circle in which she has heretofore been heard, the musical public has had no opportunity this season to judge her ability, for the small part she sang in "Manfred" was no test of her powers. Even those who were fortunate enough to hear her last season were surprised at last night's performance. She sang seventeen songs, one of which she repeated, all but one in German—songs that fully tested the power and compass of her voice, which is rare in quality, possessing vibration quite unlike the tremolo so much affected by singers of the present day. The tones are full and round, true to pitch, and evenly developed throughout the entire register. She phrases exquisitely. The six Brahms selections were very beautiful but difficult, as his music is prone to be, but she mastered the difficulties with ease and skill. Mrs. Nikisch is doubly fortunate in possessing such ability combined with a charming personality.

Mr. Nikisch's skill as an accompanist has been as firmly established as his position among the few really fine conductors. His accompaniments for both the songs and the violin solos were beautiful for shading and delicacy. He seems to possess in a high degree the intuitive sense so necessary in an accompanist.

It was hard to realize that such rich, clear tones, such breadth of style, such an intelligent manner of treatment of subject, could be accomplished by a mere lad of 13 years. His interpretation of Vieuxtemps' fantasie caprice, Spohr's adagio from the concerto No. 9, and Hungarian Rhapsody by Miska Hauser, was a revelation even to the people who could read genius in the young face and head, which bears a striking resemblance to the familiar pictures of Beethoven. The boy has a future, and the world will be indebted to Professor Brodsky for this addition to the list of virtuosos, as Fiedemann has been under his instruction since the discovery of his talent.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING, MAR. 11, 1892.

The Nikisch Concert.

After much postponment, the concert announced by Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch took place in Chickering Hall last night before a large and friendly audience. The lady's stage presence was one of the important factors in the success attained, for she is one of the most attractive of our public singers. The selection of the numbers, too, was done with much good taste, and many different schools were represented on the programme. The accompaniments were in themselves a most musical part of the works, for only Mr. Lang achieves such a perfect welding of the piano to the voice as Mr. Nikisch does, and the constant cooperation of the artistic pair reminded one of the days when a former symphonic conductor and his American wife appeared in concerts together. If the success was not so great last night as on those wonderful occasions, it was still enough to awaken hearty appreciation on the part of the audience. The programme began with a song by Goldmark, which at once showed the merits and defects of the vocalist. Her intonation is true, her shading artistic, and she manages to impart a degree of piquancy to her phrases that is sure to win the larger part of any audience; her voice is broad and powerful and effective in many climaxes. The faults are an audible breathing almost amounting to gasping, a too-frequently-used partamento, and a too-explosive style. She could make much more of the softer passages, and her enunciation of both German and English could be bettered. Nevertheless the fact of improvement over former performances is undeniable.

Especially good were Schumann's "Provencalisches Lied,"Brahms' tender" Cradle Song" (although this could have been handled more delicately), Brahms' "Serénade," which won a deserved encore, and De Koven's charming "Indian Love Song." Jensen, in his "Am Ufer des Flusses," proves true the accusation so often made, that he frequently wrote piano compositions with vocal obbligato, and in this the accompaniment certainly usurped the chief place. It did the same in Schumann's "Fruehlingsnacht," but here the voice too had a grand climax, and the number closed the programme with much eclat.

A young artist on the violin, a boy named Alexander Fiedemann, aroused the greatest enthusiasm of the concert by three finely played numbers. He will become a great artist; he has good intonation, broad bowing, is sure in skips and runs, in high positions and in harmonics. But it is not only because of these points that I make the prediction, but because there seemed to be back of these more of individuality and less of a mere reflection of the teacher, than might have been expected in one so young. Only in the intonation of the rapid ending of the "Hungarian Rhapsody," and in a few phrases in harmonics, was there any trace of insecurity, and these faults were so evanescent that they scarcely deserve to be chronicled at all.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 71.

FRIDAY, MARCH 11, 1892.

The Recital by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

The many times postponed recital, announced originally some weeks ago by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, was given last evening in Chickering Hall, and the friends and admirers of these well known artists filled the auditorium.

Illness and other causes have prevented a frequent hearing of Mrs. Nikisch in the concert rooms of this city, and so the opportunity given last evening was very pleasantly anticipated. She selected as her first group of songs, Goldmark's "Die Quelle," Schumann's "Der Nussbaum," August Bungert's "Volkslied," Richard Heuberger's "Ein Bettlerparchen," Robert Franz' "Standchen" and Schumann's "Provencalisches Lied." A second group consisted of Brahms' "Geheimniss," "Therese," "Standchen," "Weigenlied," "Des Liebsten Schwur" and "Vergebliches Standchen," and her final offerings were R. de Koven's "Indian Love Song," Tschaikowsky's "Beim Tanze," Richard Strauss' "Serenade," Jensen's "Am Manzanares" and Schumann's "Fruhlingsnacht."

Mrs. Nikisch's voice is not of large volume, but it is used with admirable skill and taste, and her singing of the several songs on the programme was greatly appreciated. The admirable finish of her interpretations, the artistic fashion in which she phrases such compositions as the Brahms' songs, and the rare musical intelligence shown in all her vocal work quite justified the applause which rewarded her efforts.

Mr. Nikisch played the difficult accompaniments with his usual rare skill and exquisite taste, and added in no small degree to the enjoyment of the evening's programme.

Master Alexander Fiedemann, a young violinist brought to this country by Mr. Brodsky, played Vieuxtemps' fantaisie caprice for violin, the adagio from Spohr's concerto No. 9, and Miska Hauser's Hungarian rhapsody with commendable success.

Clipping from Herald
Washington D.C.

Date 2/28

The Coming Symphony Concert.

The programme for the next concert in Washington of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of rare excellence, and will be especially attractive to musicians and musical amateurs. It will include the following: Weber, overture, "Der Freischuetz;" Beethoven, concerto for piano, No. 5, E minor, Eugene D'Albert; Saint-Saens, symphonic poem, "The Rouet d'Omphale; solo for piano, Eugene D'Albert; Dvorak, symphony No. 4, [illegible] major. The last will be played for the [illegible] in Washington. Its first American [illegible] was in Boston on February 27.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, MARCH 11.

THE NIKISCH RECITAL.

A Notable Audience Welcomes the Popular Artists.

The long deferred recital was given by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch at Chickering Hall last evening, the popular artists being assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann, a youthful violinist who is a pupil of Mr. Brodsky, the first violin of the Damrosch orchestra.

Despite the storm the hall was filled with a friendly and notably select audience that heartily appreciated the delightful entertainment. The programme was made up of compositions by modern German writers and Mr. R. de Koven.

Mrs. Nikisch's singing was charaterized by exquisite taste and sympathetic expression, and her pure soprano voice, although showing a slight trace of her recent illness, was as charming as ever, and used with consummate artistic skill and refinement. Her brilliant rendition of Brahm's "Standchen" elicited an encore, and she was obliged to repeat the number.

The fine accompaniments played by Mr. Nikisch contributed in a great measure to the success of the evening. It is seldom one hears such admirable examples of his art, and the thorough artistic understanding between vocalist and the performer made the union of voice and piano particularly enjoyable.

The young violinist, Master Fiedemann, played a vieuxtemps caprice and selections from Spohr and Miska Hauser. The juvenile artist is a clever performer and was heard at his best in the Hauser rhapsody, which was brilliantly performed. His bowing at present lacks strength, but his execution is facile, and his tones are pure, though not broad and resonant. He was warmly applauded.

Boston Daily Traveller

FRIDAY, MARCH 11, 1892.

Master Alexander Fiedemann.

The recital by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch at Chickering Hall last evening, was notable in the fact that it introduced to a Boston audience Master Alexander Fiedemann, a youth of about 14 years, a pupil of Mr. Brodsky, the leader of the New York Symphony Orchestra, the latter who it will be remembered gave a short time since a masterly rendering of the Brahms violin concerto, at one of the Boston Symphony Concerts.

Master Fiedemann proved to be a genuine prodigy, for he exhibited in his efforts the breadth of a mature artist in all that he did. His command of the technique of the instrument was simply wonderful for one so young.

There was a serious, positive purpose in the manner he rendered his numbers, that indicated a conception of the author rather than of a mere "coaching" for the performance. The pieces played were "Fantasie Caprice," by Vieuxtemps; the Adagio from Spohr's Concerto No. 9; and "Hungarian Rhapsody," by Miska Hauser. This was a task indeed for a ripe artist to undertake, but the youngster was equal to it and mastered all the difficulties with apparent ease, displaying in the rendering a versatility sufficient to characterize the three different schools of violin music represented in the selections given.

It is gratifying to speak so warmly in praise of this young artist's playing, and to bespeak for him a brilliant future when he has ripened with time through a pursuance of serious study under his able teacher.

Mr. Nikisch played, in a most artistic manner, the piano accompaniments for Master Fiedemann. This rare gift Mr. Nikisch possesses in a superior degree, and he exercised it also in a most charming and discreet manner in aiding the efforts of Mrs. Nikisch in her contribution to the programme, wherein was essayed the display of many authors. It was evident that Mrs. Nikisch did her best to meet the requirements of the undertaking, but she labors with the misfortune of a corrupt method of voice production; and the consequent obstacles that present themselves are not agreeable to a sensitive ear. As, for instance, a constant singing in her nose—as if she had been taught by that Paris humbug, Madame Marchesi—a false intonation, the loss of quality, the dragging up and down of intervals, and an unsteady, tremulous emission of tone, all of which are distinguishing marks of a lack of cultivation or because of bad training. Bereft of the beautifully-played accompaniments of Mr. Nikisch, her efforts would have dragged more heavily still upon the critical listener. There was a large contingent of Mr. Nikisch's band present, and there were many empty seats in the hall. It must be recorded, however, that this first presentation of Master Fiedemann proved an artistic success, as regards his ability, and a great many of the listeners who were present will watch his career with hopeful interest.

---

edger, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3/9

At the Boston symphony concert in the Academy of Music, Monday evening next, Eugene D'Albert, the distinguished pianist, is to be heard in Beethoven's E flat concerto. The symphony will be the "Harold in Italy," of Berlioz.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

◆◆◆ Season of 1891–92. ◆◆◆

MARCH ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, March 13, at 7 P.M. New York and New England Depot.

Arrive Philadelphia Monday, March 14, at 7, A.M., Broad Street Station Penna. R. R.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.

Leave Philadelphia Tuesday, March 15, 9.30 A.M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 9th and Green Street.

Arrive in New York at 11.55 A.M.

PARK AVENUE HOTEL.

Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 1, P.M.

Concert at Chickering Hall, 8.00 P. M.

Leave New York Wednesday, March 16, at 9 A. M. via Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.

Arrive Baltimore 2.05 P.M.

CARROLLTON HOTEL.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, at 6 P.M.

Arrive Washington 7 05 P.M.

Concert at Congregational Church, cor. 10th and G Sts., at 8 P.M.

Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.

Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.

Rehearsal at Academy Concert Hall, Thursday March 17, at noon.

Concert at Academy Concert Hall. at 8 P.M.

Leave Baltimore, Thursday, March 17, at 12.45, midnight. Sleeping Cars ready at eleven o'clock.

Arrive New York Friday, March 18, at 7 A.M.

PARK AVENUE HOTEL.

Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, at 3 P.M.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday Mar. 19, 8.15 P.M.

Leave Brooklyn directly after the concert. Long Island Depot, corner Flatbush and Atlantic Avenues.

Arrive Boston Sunday, March 20, at 9 A.M. New York and New England Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

SATURDAY, March 12, 1892.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, MARCH 11, 1892.

The Nikisch Recital.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann (violin) gave a song recital in Chickering Hall, last evening, the programme being as follows:

Goldmark—Die Quelle.
Schumann—Der Nussbaum.
August Bungert—Volkslied.
Richard Heuberger—Ein Bettlerpärchen.
Robert Franz—Ständchen.
Schumann—Provencalisches Lied.
Vieuxtemps—Fantaisie-Caprice for Violin.
Brahms—Geheimniss.
Therese.
Ständchen.
Wiegenlied.
Des Liebsten Schwur.
Vergebliches Ständchen.
Spohr—Adagio from Concerto No. 9.
Miska Hauser—Hungarian Rhapsody.
R. de Koven—Indian Love Song.
Tschaikowsky—Beim Tanze.
Richard Strauss—Serenade.
Jensen—Am Mananzares.
Schumann—Frühlingsnacht.

So charming a singer and such an admirable accompanist are not often heard together. Except for the omission of the names of Schubert, Mendelssohn, Rubinstein and Peter Cornelius, the list of songs chosen by Mrs. Nikisch would hardly have given a more comprehensive view of the German Lied; it was a programme as enjoyable as it was instructive, and none of the composers drawn upon could complain that he was not characteristically represented.

Mrs. Nikisch's singing was delightful from first to last. Her fresh, lovely voice, her warmth and vivacity of feeling, her purely lyrical style, and charm of manner, all contribute to make her Lied singing well-nigh ideal. It is true that the programme, with all its variety, gave her little opportunity of showing what she could do in the highest and profoundest field of song singing. Songs of the grander type, like Franz's "Gewitter-nacht," Schubert's "Der Atlas," or some of the greater things by Brahms, were conspicuously absent. But, within the scope allowed her talent by the songs she had chosen, her singing was as nearly perfect as one could well wish to hear.

A factor of enormous importance in the effect she produced was her husband's admirably artistic accompanying. Such completeness of sympathy with both singer and composer is found in very few accompanists. Mr. Nikisch holds about middle ground between the old-school accompanists, whose chief aim was, as Brillat-Savarin put it, "de faire briller la voix" (to make the singer shine), and those who recognize fully in the songs of Franz and Schumann an application of the Bach maxim that "an accompaniment should be a completely organized musical entirety in itself." Few accompanists we have heard have known as well as he to which of those two ideas the preference should be given in particular cases.

Young Master Fiedemann, a twelve-year-old pupil of Mr. Adolf Brodsky, made a strikingly fine impression on this his first public appearance here. His technique is already wonderfully developed, his tone fine and clear and his playing distinctly musical. He plays with the sentiment, not of an abnormally precocious little man, but of a truly musical boy. This is as it should be. He evidently has a career before him.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

403 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

SATURDAY, MARCH 12.

MR. AND MRS. NIKISCH'S RECITAL.

Those who were fortunate enough to attend the recital given by Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch in Chickering Hall on Thursday evening must have felt amply repaid for braving the elements in the enjoyment of a most delightful evening. Mrs. Nikisch sang a group of songs by Brahms and songs by Schumann, Goldmark, Bungen, Henberger, Franz, De Koven, and others. Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch were assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann, violinist, who gave selections by Vieuxtemps, Spohr, and Miska Hauser. Mrs. Nikisch was always a delightful interpreter of German songs, and she has lost nothing in that respect, while her voice on Thursday evening was even rounder and more powerful than when she was last heard here. The portamento that was so continual and so distressing formerly was conspicuous by its absence, with one or two exceptions, on the evening of the recital. Mrs. Nikisch's charming manner and sweet, womanly self add much to the delight of her singing. Of Master Fiedemann it is almost impossible to speak too highly. The complete understanding he possesses of himself, his violin, and the composer whose work he is interpreting, would be marked in a man of thirty, but in a boy of twelve, or possibly fourteen, it is simply marvelous. His tone is pure, sweet and strong, his execution clear and brilliant, he plays entirely without notes, and with an amount of musicianly feeling that is wonderful in one so young. If anything would inspire an artist to his or her utmost it would be Mr. Nikisch's accompaniments; they were true accompaniments and not piano solos, and were simply exquisite.

VALENTINE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING, MAR. 11, 1892.

The Nikisch Concert.

After much postponment, the concert announced by Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch took place in Chickering Hall last night before a large and friendly audience. The lady's stage presence was one of the important factors in the success attained, for she is one of the most attractive of our public singers. The selection of the numbers, too, was done with much good taste, and many different schools were represented on the programme. The accompaniments were in themselves a most musical part of the works, for only Mr. Lang achieves such a perfect welding of the piano to the voice as Mr. Nikisch does, and the constant cooperation of the artistic pair reminded one of the days when a former symphonic conductor and his American wife appeared in concerts together. If the success was not so great last night as on those wonderful occasions, it was still enough to awaken hearty appreciation on the part of the audience. The programme began with a song by Goldmark, which at once showed the merits and defects of the vocalist. Her intonation is true, her shading artistic, and she manages to impart a degree of piquancy to her phrases that is sure to win the larger part of any audience; her voice is broad and powerful and effective in many climaxes. The faults are an audible breathing almost amounting to gasping, a too-frequently-used partamento, and a too-explosive style. She could make much more of the softer passages, and her enunciation of both German and English could be bettered. Nevertheless the fact of improvement over former performances is undeniable.

Especially good were Schumann's "Provencalisches Lied,"Brahms' tender" Cradle Song" (although this could have been handled more delicately), Brahms' "Serenade," which won a deserved encore, and De Koven's charming "Indian Love Song." Jensen, in his "Am Ufer des Flusses," proves true the accusation so often made, that he frequently wrote piano compositions with vocal obbligato, and in this the accompaniment certainly usurped the chief place. It did the same in Schumann's "Fruehlingsnacht," but here the voice too had a grand climax, and the number closed the programme with much eclat.

A young artist on the violin, a boy named Alexander Fiedemann, aroused the greatest enthusiasm of the concert by three finely played numbers. He will become a great artist; he has good intonation, broad bowing, is sure in skips and runs, in high positions and in harmonics. But it is not only because of these points that I make the prediction, but because there seemed to be back of these more of individuality and less of a mere reflection of the teacher, than might have been expected in one so young. Only in the intonation of the rapid ending of the "Hungarian Rhapsody," and in a few phrases in harmonics, was there any trace of insecurity, and these faults were so evanescent that they scarcely deserve to be chronicled at all.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 71.

FRIDAY, MARCH 11, 1892.

The Recital by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

The many times postponed recital, announced originally some weeks ago by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, was given last evening in Chickering Hall, and the friends and admirers of these well known artists filled the auditorium.

Illness and other causes have prevented a frequent hearing of Mrs. Nikisch in the concert rooms of this city, and so the opportunity given last evening was very pleasantly anticipated. She selected as her first group of songs, Goldmark's "Die Quelle," Schumann's "Der Nussbaum," August Bungert's "Volkslied," Richard Heuberger's "Ein Bettlerparchen," Robert Franz' "Standchen" and Schumann's "Provencalisches Lied." A second group consisted of Brahms' "Geheimniss," "Therese," "Standchen," "Weigenlied," "Des Liebsten Schwur" and "Vergebliches Standchen," and her final offerings were R. de Koven's "Indian Love Song," Tschaikowsky's "Beim Tanze," Richard Strauss' "Serenade," Jensen's "Am Manzanares" and Schumann's "Fruhlingsnacht."

Mrs. Nikisch's voice is not of large volume, but it is used with admirable skill and taste, and her singing of the several songs on the programme was greatly appreciated. The admirable finish of her interpretations, the artistic fashion in which she phrases such compositions as the Brahms' songs,and the rare musical intelligence shown in all her vocal work quite justified the applause which rewarded her efforts.

Mr. Nikisch played the difficult accompaniments with his usual rare skill and exquisite taste, and added in no small degree to the enjoyment of the evening's programme.

Master Alexander Fiedemann, a young violinist brought to this country by Mr. Brodsky, played Vieuxtemps' fantaisie caprice for violin, the adagio from Spohr's concerto No. 9, and Miska Hauser's Hungarian rhapsody with commendable success.

Clipping from Herald.
Washington D. C.

Date 2/28

The Coming Symphony Concert.

The programme for the next concert in Washington of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of rare excellence, and will be especially attractive to musicians and musical amateurs. It will include the following: Weber, overture, "Der Freischuetz;" Beethoven, concerto for piano, No. 5, E minor, Eugene D'Albert; Saint-Saens, symphonic poem, "The Rouet d'Omphale; solo for piano, Eugene D'Albert; Dvorak, symphony No. 4, in G major. The last will be played for the first time in Washington. Its first American performance was in Boston on February 27.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY. MARCH 11.

THE NIKISCH RECITAL.

A Notable Audience Welcomes the Popular Artists.

The long deferred recital was given by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch at Chickering Hall last evening, the popular artists being assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann, a youthful violinist who is a pupil of Mr. Brodsky, the first violin of the Damrosch orchestra.

Despite the storm the hall was filled with a friendly and notably select audience that heartily appreciated the delightful entertainment. The programme was made up of compositions by modern German writers and Mr. R. de Koven.

Mrs. Nikisch's singing was charaterized by exquisite taste and sympathetic expression, and her pure soprano voice, although showing a slight trace of her recent illness, was as charming as ever, and used with consummate artistic skill and refinement. Her brilliant rendition of Brahm's "Standchen" elicited an encore, and she was obliged to repeat the number.

The fine accompaniments played by Mr. Nikisch contributed in a great measure to the success of the evening. It is seldom one hears such admirable examples of his art, and the thorough artistic understanding between vocalist and the performer made the union of voice and piano particularly enjoyable.

The young violinist, Master Fiedemann, played a vieuxtemps caprice and selections from Spohr and Miska Hauser. The juvenile artist is a clever performer and was heard at his best in the Hauser rhapsody, which was brilliantly performed. His bowing at present lacks strength, but his execution is facile, and his tones are pure, though not broad and resonant. He was warmly applauded.

Boston Daily Traveller

FRIDAY, MARCH 11, 1892.

Master Alexander Fiedemann.

The recital by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch at Chickering Hall last evening, was notable in the fact that it introduced to a Boston audience Master Alexander Fiedemann, a youth of about 14 years, a pupil of Mr. Brodsky, the leader of the New York Symphony Orchestra, the latter who it will be remembered gave a short time since a masterly rendering of the Brahms violin concerto, at one of the Boston Symphony Concerts.

Master Fiedemann proved to be a genuine prodigy, for he exhibited in his efforts the breadth of a mature artist in all that he did. His command of the technique of the instrument was simply wonderful for one so young.

There was a serious, positive purpose in the manner he rendered his numbers, that indicated a conception of the author rather than of a mere "coaching" for the performance. The pieces played were "Fantasie Caprice," by Vieuxtemps; the Adagio from Spohr's Concerto No. 9; and "Hungarian Rhapsody," by Miska Hauser. This was a task indeed for a ripe artist to undertake, but the youngster was equal to it and mastered all the difficulties with apparent ease, displaying in the rendering a versatility sufficient to characterize the three different schools of violin music represented in the selections given.

It is gratifying to speak so warmly in praise of this young artist's playing, and to bespeak for him a brilliant future when he has ripened with time through a pursuance of serious study under his able teacher.

Mr. Nikisch played, in a most artistic manner, the piano accompaniments for Master Fiedemann. This rare gift Mr. Nikisch possesses in a superior degree, and he exercised it also in a most charming and discreet manner in aiding the efforts of Mrs. Nikisch in her contribution to the programme, wherein was essayed the display of many authors. It was evident that Mrs. Nikisch did her best to meet the requirements of the undertaking, but she labors with the misfortune of a corrupt method of voice production, and the consequent obstacles that present themselves are not agreeable to a sensitive ear. As, for instance, a constant singing in her nose—as if she had been taught by that Paris humbug, Madame Marchesi—a false intonation, the loss of quality, the dragging up and down of intervals, and an unsteady, tremulous emission of tone, all of which are distinguishing marks of a lack of cultivation or because of bad training. Bereft of the beautifully-played accompaniments of Mr. Nikisch, her efforts would have dragged more heavily still upon the critical listener. There was a large contingent of Mr. Nikisch's band present, and there were many empty seats in the hall. It must be recorded, however, that this first presentation of Master Fiedemann proved an artistic success, as regards his ability, and a great many of the listeners who were present will watch his career with hopeful interest.

---

eger. Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

At the Boston symphony concert in the Academy of Music, Monday evening next, Eugene D'Albert, the distinguished pianist, is to be heard in Beethoven's E flat concerto. The symphony will be the "Harold in Italy," of Berlioz.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * * Season of 1891–92. * * *

MARCH ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, March 13, at 7 P.M. New York and New England Depot.

Arrive Philadelphia Monday, March 14, at 7, A.M., Broad Street Station Penna. R. R.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.

Leave Philadelphia Tuesday, March 15, 9.30 A.M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 9th and Green Street.

Arrive in New York at 11.55 A.M.

PARK AVENUE HOTEL.

Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 1, P.M.

Concert at Chickering Hall, 8.00 P. M.

Leave New York Wednesday, March 16, at 9 A. M. via Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.

Arrive Baltimore 2.05 P.M.

CARROLLTON HOTEL.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, at 6 P.M.

Arrive Washington 7 05 P.M.

Concert at Congregational Church, cor. 10th and G Sts., at 8 P.M.

Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.

Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.

Rehearsal at Academy Concert Hall, Thursday March 17, at noon.

Concert at Academy Concert Hall, at 8 P.M.

Leave Baltimore, Thursday, March 17, at 12.45, midnight. Sleeping Cars ready at eleven o'clock.

Arrive New York Friday, March 18, at 7 A.M.

PARK AVENUE HOTEL

Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, at 3 P.M.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday Mar. 19, 8.15 P.M.

Leave Brooklyn directly after the concert. Long Island Depot, corner Flatbush and Atlantic Avenues.

Arrive Boston Sunday, March 20, at 9 A.M. New York and New England Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

SATURDAY, March 12, 1892.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, MARCH 11, 1892.

The Nikisch Recital.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann (violin) gave a song recital in Chickering Hall, last evening, the programme being as follows:

Goldmark—Die Quelle.
Schumann—Der Nussbaum.
August Bungert—Volkslied.
Richard Heuberger—Ein Bettlerpärchen.
Robert Franz—Ständchen.
Schumann—Provencalisches Lied.
Vieuxtemps—Fantaisie-Caprice for Violin.
Brahms—Geheimniss.
    Therese.
    Ständchen.
    Wiegenlied.
    Des Liebsten Schwur.
    Vergebliches Ständchen.
Spohr—Adagio from Concerto No. 9.
Miska Hauser—Hungarian Rhapsody.
R. de Koven—Indian Love Song.
Tschaikowsky—Beim Tanze.
Richard Strauss—Serenade.
Jensen—Am Mananzares.
Schumann—Frühlingsnacht.

So charming a singer and such an admirable accompanist are not often heard together. Except for the omission of the names of Schubert, Mendelssohn, Rubinstein and Peter Cornelius, the list of songs chosen by Mrs. Nikisch would hardly have given a more comprehensive view of the German Lied; it was a programme as enjoyable as it was instructive, and none of the composers drawn upon could complain that he was not characteristically represented.

Mrs. Nikisch's singing was delightful from first to last. Her fresh, lovely voice, her warmth and vivacity of feeling, her purely lyrical style, and charm of manner, all contribute to make her Lied singing well-nigh ideal. It is true that the programme, with all its variety, gave her little opportunity of showing what she could do in the highest and profoundest field of song singing. Songs of the grander type, like Franz's "Gewitter-nacht," Schubert's "Der Atlas," or some of the greater things by Brahms, were conspicuously absent. But, within the scope allowed her talent by the songs she had chosen, her singing was as nearly perfect as one could well wish to hear.

A factor of enormous importance in the effect she produced was her husband's admirably artistic accompanying. Such completeness of sympathy with both singer and composer is found in very few accompanists. Mr. Nikisch holds about middle ground between the old-school accompanists, whose chief aim was, as Brillat-Savarin put it, "de faire briller la voix" (to make the singer shine), and those who recognize fully in the songs of Franz and Schumann an application of the Bach maxim that "an accompaniment should be a completely organized musical entirety in itself." Few accompanists we have heard have known as well as he to which of those two ideas the preference should be given in particular cases.

Young Master Fiedemann, a twelve-year-old pupil of Mr. Adolf Brodsky, made a strikingly fine impression on this his first public appearance here. His technique is already wonderfully developed, his tone fine and clear and his playing distinctly musical. He plays with the sentiment, not of an abnormally precocious little man, but of a truly musical boy. This is as it should be. He evidently has a career before him.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

403 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

SATURDAY, MARCH 12,

MR. AND MRS. NIKISCH'S RECITAL.

Those who were fortunate enough to attend the recital given by Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch in Chickering Hall on Thursday evening must have felt amply repaid for braving the elements in the enjoyment of a most delightful evening. Mrs. Nikisch sang a group of songs by Brahms and songs by Schumann, Goldmark, Bungen, Henberger, Franz, De Koven, and others. Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch were assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann, violinist, who gave selections by Vieuxtemps, Spohr, and Miska Hauser. Mrs. Nikisch was always a delightful interpreter of German songs, and she has lost nothing in that respect, while her voice on Thursday evening was even rounder and more powerful than when she was last heard here. The portamento that was so continual and so distressing formerly was conspicuous by its absence, with one or two exceptions, on the evening of the recital. Mrs. Nikisch's charming manner and sweet, womanly self add much to the delight of her singing. Of Master Fiedemann it is almost impossible to speak too highly. The complete understanding he possesses of himself, his violin, and the composer whose work he is interpreting, would be marked in a man of thirty, but in a boy of twelve, or possibly fourteen, it is simply marvelous. His tone is pure, sweet and strong, his execution clear and brilliant, he plays entirely without notes, and with an amount of musicianly feeling that is wonderful in one so young. If anything would inspire an artist to his or her utmost it would be Mr. Nikisch's accompaniments; they were true accompaniments and not piano solos, and were simply exquisite. VALENTINE.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 12, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The eighteenth concert began with a novelty—Tschaikowsky's tone-poem called by him "Hamlet," and therefore intended to be in some way illustrative of that drama. But when it was all over one could hardly help quoting from Horatio—"These are but wild and whirling words, my lord." For, although the programme paragraph stated that the composer meant to typify in the contrasting themes the unrest of the Prince and the tender melancholy of his forlorn lover, the music, full of voluminous sound and perturbation, aroused no definite association and left no sweet or weighty impression. The ruminant introduction, gravely and dimly wandering and marked by the dull strokes of midnight, quaintly and cleverly imposed by the muted horn, seemed to us the best part of all, although the slower and more plaintive theme is sweet and when first presented promises a pathetic movement which is not accorded. After this Mme. Camilla Urso played a new violin concerto by Bruch, written—as he always writes for that instrument—with no less understanding of technical possibilities than musicianly devotion to the rhetoric of composition. But although Mme. Urso played, as she is is always wont to play, with noble tone, large phrasing, unaffected sentiment and ample strength, it was not altogether gratifying. The first movement is labored and gives no solid, clear thought to cling by; the adagio is warm and sympathetic, however, and the finale has dash of movement and decision of accent in its lilting measure. Schumann's D-minor symphony ended the concert, following the usual version, the promised presentation of the original version being reserved for a later date. The orchestra did a deal of splendid work and rendered close obedience; but Mr. Nikisch's notions were interposed too often between Schumann, who certainly knew what he wanted and did not need this conductor to explain for him and the audience. The programme for tonight is this: Overture, "Leonore," No. 2, Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat, Beethoven; and Symphony No. 4, D-minor, Schumann, according to the original version, which will, on this occasion, be heard for the first time in Boston. The soloist is to be Mr. Eugen d'Albert, who now makes his rentrée.

THE NIKISCH RECITAL.

The long-delayed recital by Mrs. Nikisch of songs from various composers, principally German, took place at Chickerings' on Thursday evening, Mr. Nikisch supplying those beautiful piano accompaniments which make that instrument fairly melt into the melody or delicately embrace it. Mrs. Nikisch's personal charms are many and never fail of grateful recognition. The natural quality of her voice is interesting and sweet, and she has various pretty ways in expression which captivate. There is in all this so much which is good that one cannot help wishing that she would take the art of singing more seriously, correct her tone production (which can hardly be said to have any real method) and try to get below a pleasant superficial sentiment in interpretation. It would do her a world of good and make her a greater power in the concert room that she can now ever hope to be if she would study in the right spirit such examples as Frau Joachim and Mr. Henschel will set before her. Really to sing a worthy song is not merely to phrase it neatly and vocalize it with a gracious look upon one's face; it is to make every word tell as if it were well spoken and to enhance its value by the color of fitting musical tones. There was introduced a young violinist named Alexander Fiedermann, whose twelve years have been sufficient for him to acquire a fine command of his instrument and to develop a serious and deep feeling, which is symmetrically displayed in his playing, and sympathetically expressed in his interesting face.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

A very large and fashionable audience attended the Kneisel Quartette concert on Monday evening, when there was an especial interest in the American début of Mme. Amalie Joachim, the famous lieder singer, of whose peculiar talent and art we speak elsewhere under an appropriate rubric. The evening began with a novelty—a quartette by Mr. Novacèk, the Symphony viola player. About this work, which is full of evidences of power, thought and technical knowledge, it is not possible to form an adequate opinion after a single hearing. It is bold, fiery and impressive, but erratic, so that one cannot feel sure as to whether certain of its phases are intended as deliberate efforts toward the expression of a purpose which they cannot reveal or whether they are the accidents and eccentricities of a talent which is not yet resolved as to what it wants to say. A certain passionateness, however, pervades the work and commands attention even when the musical language is wildest and speaks least intelligibly. If Mr. Novacèk can master the moods which seem here to sweep him hither and yon tempestuously and can educe from his musical knowledge and study logical and expressive forms of statement, he ought to give out something which shall give equable pleasure as well as surprise and curiosity. The Quartette had mastered the great difficulties of the work and played it with sympathetic earnestness. They were also in fine form in the variations and the quartette which they drew from Beethoven.

[147]

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 13, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

EIGHTEENTH CONCERT.

The eighteenth Symphony concert was given in Music hall, Saturday evening, March 5. The programme:

Tschaikowsky Symphonic Poem. "Hamlet." (First time.)

Bruch Concerto for Violin, No. 3, in D minor, op. 58.
Allegro energico—Adagio—Allegro molto.
(First time in Boston.)

Schumann Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120.
Introduction (adagio non troppo) — Allegro — Romance (adagio non troppo)—Scherzo—Finale (allegro).

Soloist: Mme. Camilla Urso.

If one is to judge of the symphonic poem music by the performance of the orchestra under Mr. Nikisch last Saturday evening, it must be stamped as having been a riotous, noisy demonstration of the most turbulent character. There is little wonder Ophelia went insane, albeit there is a motif which is supposed to depict her beautiful character. The grief of Hamlet at his father's death, represented by the striking of the midnight hour by muted horns, together with the subject representing Ophelia when the two are brought together, as they are in the music, is astonishingly more like a good-sized earthquake than the solemnities of a death scene. The orchestra undoubtedly did their part well, it being evident they had made careful preparations for the fiery ordeal. This was the first representation of the symphonic poem in Boston.

The violin concerto of Bruch, played by Mme. Camilla Urso, is, as a whole, disappointing. The first part by all odds is the most interesting as music. There are many fine passages which are well calculated to rivet the attention of sincere lovers of good music. The second movement begins with a melody which is carefully worked out to such a length as to become painfully monotonous. It contains so little of tone color, so little virility, that one soon loses all interest in following it to its end. The last and concluding movement is better calculated to show the technical powers of the violinist than any music it contains. Madame Urso is a violinist of rare abilities, musical and technical. Her rendering of the entire concerto was beautifully artistic, which the large audience present fully conceded, showing their appreciation with very hearty applause at the end. The orchestra were not always thoughtful enough to accompany her properly, playing much too loudly most of the time. The last movement demands a more masculine treatment than the madame accorded it, though she is not strikingly effeminate.

The Schumann symphony was well played, Mr. Nikisch imparting to it much of his brilliant, magnetic qualities, which, by the way, really belong to the symphony.

The concert was made particularly interesting by the two novelties presented, and the appearance, after some years' absence, of Madame Camilla Urso, always a great favorite with Boston people.

Eugene D'Albert ("little lion") is to be the next Symphony attraction.

JAMES M. TRACY.

The Kneisel quartette gave the sixth concert of its series Monday evening in Union hall. The first number of the programme was a quartetto in E minor by Ottokar Novacek, the first viola of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It is not an ordinary work; it is not one that is easily understood, and it is probable that even after repeated hearings many passages would still be unintelligible, says the Boston Journal. The frequent obscurity and the aggressive ugliness of certain portions are not accidental; they are evidently the expression of the purpose of the composer. The very opening is an exhibition of musical bad temper. Then there is a reduced version of a familiar imitation of snorting and neighing horses; there are sounds that might be produced by the application of wet thumbs to tumblers; there is the tearing of cloth; there are progressions that stab the ear; there are suggestions of Wagner in the more tuneful measures; and there is an open defiance of the characteristics and limitations of the string quartette. Yet in the midst of cacophony there is a fierce intensity, there is a rigidity of purpose and there is a rude rebellion against conventionality and commonplace that almost conquer the sympathy of the hearer. There is much that is beautiful in the slow movement, but that which is beautiful is rudely jostled by an ugly neighbor. The third movement appeals more strongly to popular taste; and here we greet old friends. Berlioz and Mendelssohn shake hands, while Saint-Saens stands by and whistles a strain of his "Danse Macabre." The finale is a prolonged shriek of varied intensity. In spite of the wilful eccentricities, the wild extravagances, the crudity, the cacophony of this quartette, Mr. Novacek is undoubtedly, and judged by this very work, a man of genuine musical stuff. He should remember, however, that in order to make a strong impression on the mind of the hearer it is not absolutely necessary for the musician to clutch his victim by the throat, knock him down, or stamp his prostrate body. This quartette was heartily applauded, and the third movement was repeated. It was played with loving, brotherly care. The other instrumental numbers were the variations from Beethoven's op. 18, No. 5, and the Beethoven quartette in E flat, op. 74. With a few trifling exceptions, as in the viola triplets in the second variation in op. 74, the performance of these numbers was most admirable. Mrs. Amalie Joachim made her first appearance in America. She sang Beethoven's "Mignon," Mozart's "The Violet," Haydn's "Serenade," Ahle's "The Advent of Our Saviour," a song by Schulz (a favorite writer of operettas in the last century), Mendelssohn's "Venetian Boat Song" and Schubert's "Halderoeslein." The postponed fourth concert of the Kneisel quartette will be given Monday, April 4.

Says the New York Sun: The long-deferred recital announced by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch almost two months ago took place at Chickering hall Monday afternoon, in presence of a numerous and sympathetic audience. Mrs. Nikisch sang songs by Schumann, Franz, Brahms, Jensen, Heuberger, De Koven, and other composers—seventeen numbers in all—and Mr. Nikisch accompanied her at the piano. Her performances were characterized by felicity of expression and also by consummate musicianly skill. The largest meed of praise may fairly be awarded her interpretation of Brahms's compositions. How admirably Mr. Nikisch accompanied his wife need scarcely be told music lovers that have had occasion to hear the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the less conspicuous rôle he sustained yesterday. The vocal numbers interpreted by Mrs. Nikisch derive much of their significance and beauty from their so-called accompaniment, and to say that to Mr. Nikisch's playing quite one-half of their effect was due, is only to estimate his work at its right value. The singing of Mrs. Nikisch was agreeably varied by the violin performances of Master Alexander Fiedemann, a youthful pupil and protégé of Mr. Brodsky's, who has been heard before and to somewhat greater advantage. His interpretation of Vieuxtemps's "Fantasie Caprice," with prudent eliminations, was not particularly good, his bowing being especially feeble. In Hauser's Hungarian Rhapsody he was more at his ease. Master Fiedemann is a remarkably clever boy, with a bright future before him. Perhaps it is fortunate that he should not be, in the exact sense of the term, an infant prodigy.

THE NIKISCH RECITAL.

On Thursday evening Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann, violinist, gave a song recital in Chickering hall. The programme was:

Goldmark—Die Quelle.
Schumann—Der Nussbaum.
August Bungert—Volkslied.
Richard Heuberger—Ein Bettlerpärchen.
Robert Franz—Stöndchen.
Schumann—Provencalisches Lied.
Vieuxtemps—Fantaisie-Caprice for violin.
Brahms—Geheimniss.
Therese.
Ständchen.
Wiegenlied.
Des Liebsten Schwur.
Vergebliches Ständchen.
Spohr—Adagio from Concerto No 9.
Miska Hauser—Hungarian Rhapsody.
R de Koven—Indian Love Song.
Tschaikowsky—Beim Tanze.
Richard Strauss—Serenade.
Jensen—Am Mananzares.
Schumann—Frühlingsnacht.

The programme was delightful, and delightfully rendered. Mrs. Nikisch has that spontaneity, vivacity, warmth and freshness which are indispensable to the proper interpretation of German leider. The songs showed her at her best in this line of vocal work, and the appreciation was unstinted.

The value and importance of the accompaniment never had a better illustration than in Mr. Nikisch's work. It was artistic in the extreme, thoroughly in sympathy with the singer and the composer: in short, the exact complement to the soloist which makes a perfect whole.

Master Fiedemann, a pupil of Mr. Adolf Brodsky, and twelve years of age, surprised his hearers, making a permanent impression for his remarkable technique and no less distinct musical feeling. He does not strike one as a prodigy, but as a youth with fine and strong musical instincts which have been well directed so far.

In great measure was this an ideal recital.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 73.

SUNDAY, MARCH 13, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The event of last evening's symphony concert was the appearance of Eugen D'Albert, the pianist, who has returned to America for a short tour with the Boston orchestra and a few recitals. He chose the concerto in E flat, No. 5, by Beethoven for this occasion, and gave the work such a performance as it has rarely had in later years.

The reception given the pianist left no doubt as to the sentiments of the audience, and the members of the orchestra joined with unusual enthusiasm in welcoming the soloist of the evening back to the scene of his earlier triumphs in the recitals of his earlier visit here.

His broad, masterly treatment of the opening allegro commanded the instant admiration of the audience, and no pianist could ask for a more attentive hearing than that given the concerto from first to last. The remarkable clearness and purity of tone brought out by this pianist's touch gives an indescribable enjoyment to the listener, and the maintainance of this characteristic of his playing throughout the most stupendous technical difficulties, gives a degree of satisfaction that is seldom realized in the piano work of the most noted soloists.

The beautiful adagio movement was played with admirable taste, and the theme was sung with rare expression and sentiment, the embellishments never interfering with the clearness of the subject thus elaborated. There was a womanly delicacy of touch combined with a masterly control of the instrument in this portion of the work that could but find the heartiest appreciation of the most critical. In the final movement the player surpassed his own remarkable work in former appearances here, and aroused the most pronounced demonstration in his honor at its end that has been known here for many seasons, the musicians all joining in the applause, which called the artist back to the stage repeatedly to make his acknowledgements.

Mr. Nikisch kept his promise of giving a hearing of the fourth of the Schumann symphonies, in its original version, and now that, as a clever man expressed it, "Boston has heard this symphony as Schumann didn't want it," there seems no good cause for a repetition of the work in the form which, thanks to Herr Brahms, has just been made public from the original manuscript, of which Brahms is the owner. There are few marked thematic differences between this original version and that which has been the standard in the orchestral libraries of the day, and the differences in themes and the orchestration are all in favor of the more generally known form of the symphony.

A very enjoyable performance of the "Leonore" overture No. 2 began the concert, and the work of the orchestra during the evening was at all times up to its best standard.

The usual monthly tour will take place the coming week, and the 20th of the season's concerts, on Saturday, the 26th inst., will be with Mme. Amalia Joachim as soloist, the programme including Brahms' "Tragic Overture," Aria from "Orpheus," Gluck's "Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien Tanz," from "Orpheus," songs, with piano, and Beethoven's symphony No. 8.

Mr. Georg Henschel has now the satisfaction of having turned the tide of popular favor toward his London symphony concerts, and an increased number of concerts are announced for next year.

Patrons of Music Hall should be comforted. St. James' Hall, London, is so dimly lighted that at a recent symphony concert given there, Mr. Henschel publicly declared his orchestra could not distinguish between a sharp and a flat. and in advance ventured to excuse any possible mistakes. and this in a concert room which, in full season, lets for upward of £60 per diem!

· Philadelphia Music and Drama ·

PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, MARCH 12, 1

The fifth Boston Symphony will occur at the Academy Monday evening. Eugene d'Albert, the pianist will be the soloist, and will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, and selections by Chopin, Schubert and Tausig. The orchestral numbers include selections from Berlioz, Beethoven, Saint-Sæns, Grieg and Wagner.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 12, 1892.

A WELCOME novelty at the 18th Boston Symphony Concert was Tschaikowsky's symphonic poem of Hamlet, which really seems to tell the story of his dilemma and sad end, albeit the Ophelia theme scarcely hints her character. Another welcome novelty was Bruch's Violin Concerto, No. 3, D-minor, op. 58, with Camilla Urso as the soloist,—a classical and well-rounded performance. The third number was Schumann's Fourth Symphony, op. 120, D-minor, played (as the author intended) continuously, with only one pause, and that a very brief one, between the Allegro and Romance. The awful condition of the sloppy streets made the attendance the smallest of the season.

SPECIAL Symphony Concert with Paderewski and other soloists, was given on Ash Wednesday for the benefit of members of the orchestra.

Boston Post

MOTTO:
With a Mission
—AND—
Without a Muzzle.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 14, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Saturday night's symphony concert was one of the most brilliant of the course, introducing Eugen D'Albert, the pianist, in Beethoven's concerto in E flat, No. 5, and giving a first rendition of Schumann's symphony, No. 4, Op. 120, as it was originally written,

Every seat in the hall was occupied, and all the available space in the outside aisles was taken up by the many who were not regular attendants, but had been attracted by the prospect of an unusually fine performance by the pianist whom all Europe unites in calling the greatest living exponent of piano music. As an interpreter of Beethoven he probably has no equal, and Saturday night's concert fully sustained the judgment passed upon him by foreign critics and those of our own country, during his visit two years ago.

D'Albert's treatment of the opening allegro was broad and masterly, and characterized by remarkable clearness and purity of tone. His easy mastery of the prodigious technical difficulties commanded the instant admiration of the audience.

The second movement, adagio, was beautifully rendered, the theme distinctly traceable and admirably disclosing his delicacy of touch, his taste and conception of technical finish, while the final movement brought forth the heartiest applause from the audience and the members of the orchestra as well.

It is something to have heard the original version of the Schumann symphony, but opinions concerning its merits are diversified, a few claiming its superiority to the one with which the public is familiar. In both arrangements it is soulful and beautiful and has been intelligently and well rendered by Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra.

The opening number on the programme was one of the three overtures to Fidelio, Leonora, No. 2, containing a lovely adagio in C, an original allegro and an exquisite pizzicato, in which the orchestra excelled. In no other composition has been exhibited such precision and purity of tone, such delicacy and beautiful manner of phrasing.

The organization will make its usual monthly tour this week, but the twentieth concert will take place March 26, with Mme. Amalie Joachim as soloist and a programme consisting of Brahm's "Tragic Overture," aria from "Orpheus," Gluck's "Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien Tanz," from Orpheus, Schubert's "Liebesbolschaft," Schumann's "Schoene Wiegemeiner Leiden," Schubert's "Elkoenig," and Beethoven's Symphony No.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 12, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The eighteenth concert began with a novelty—Tschaikowsky's tone-poem called by him "Hamlet," and therefore intended to be in some way illustrative of that drama. But when it was all over one could hardly help quoting from Horatio—"These are but wild and whirling words, my lord." For, although the programme paragraph stated that the composer meant to typify in the contrasting themes the unrest of the Prince and the tender melancholy of his forlorn lover, the music, full of voluminous sound and perturbation, aroused no definite association and left no sweet or weighty impression. The ruminant introduction, gravely and dimly wandering and marked by the dull strokes of midnight, quaintly and cleverly imposed by the muted horn, seemed to us the best part of all, although the slower and more plaintive theme is sweet and when first presented promises a pathetic movement which is not accorded. After this Mme. Camilla Urso played a new violin concerto by Bruch, written—as he always writes for that instrument—with no less understanding of technical possibilities than musicianly devotion to the rhetoric of composition. But although Mme. Urso played, as she is is always wont to play, with noble tone, large phrasing, unaffected sentiment and ample strength, it was not altogether gratifying. The first movement is labored and gives no solid, clear thought to cling by; the adagio is warm and sympathetic, however, and the finale has dash of movement and decision of accent in its lilting measure. Schumann's D-minor symphony ended the concert, following the usual version, the promised presentation of the original version being reserved for a later date. The orchestra did a deal of splendid work and rendered close obedience; but Mr. Nikisch's notions were interposed too often between Schumann, who certainly knew what he wanted and did not need this conductor to explain for him and the audience. The programme for tonight is this: Overture, "Leonore," No. 2, Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat, Beethoven; and Symphony No. 4, D-minor, Schumann, according to the original version, which will, on this occasion, be heard for the first time in Boston. The soloist is to be Mr. Eugen d'Albert, who now makes his rentrée.

THE NIKISCH RECITAL.

The long-delayed recital by Mrs. Nikisch of songs from various composers, principally German, took place at Chickerings' on Thursday evening, Mr. Nikisch supplying those beautiful piano accompaniments which make that instrument fairly melt into the melody or delicately embrace it. Mrs. Nikisch's personal charms are many and never fail of grateful recognition. The natural quality of her voice is interesting and sweet, and she has various pretty ways in expression which captivate. There is in all this so much which is good that one cannot help wishing that she would take the art of singing more seriously, correct her tone production (which can hardly be said to have any real method) and try to get below a pleasant superficial sentiment in interpretation. It would do her a world of good and make her a greater power in the concert room that she can now ever hope to be if she would study in the right spirit such examples as Frau Joachim and Mr. Henschel will set before her. Really to sing a worthy song is not merely to phrase it neatly and vocalize it with a gracious look upon one's face; it is to make every word tell as if it were well spoken and to enhance its value by the color of fitting musical tones. There was introduced a young violinist named Alexander Fiedermann, whose twelve years have been sufficient for him to acquire a fine command of his instrument and to develop a serious and deep feeling, which is symmetrically displayed in his playing, and sympathetically expressed in his interesting face.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

A very large and fashionable audience attended the Kneisel Quartette concert on Monday evening, when there was an especial interest in the American début of Mme. Amalie Joachim, the famous lieder singer, of whose peculiar talent and art we speak elsewhere under an appropriate rubric. The evening began with a novelty—a quartette by Mr. Novacèk, the Symphony viola player. About this work, which is full of evidences of power, thought and technical knowledge, it is not possible to form an adequate opinion after a single hearing. It is bold, fiery and impressive, but erratic, so that one cannot feel sure as to whether certain of its phases are intended as deliberate efforts toward the expression of a purpose which they cannot reveal or whether they are the accidents and eccentricities of a talent which is not yet resolved as to what it wants to say. A certain passionateness, however, pervades the work and commands attention even when the musical language is wildest and speaks least intelligibly. If Mr. Novacèk can master the moods which seem here to sweep him hither and yon tempestuously and can educe from his musical knowledge and study logical and expressive forms of statement, he ought to give out something which shall give equable pleasure as well as surprise and curiosity. The Quartette had mastered the great difficulties of the work and played it with sympathetic earnestness. They were also in fine form in the variations and the quartette which they drew from Beethoven.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 13, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

EIGHTEENTH CONCERT.

The eighteenth Symphony concert was given in Music hall, Saturday evening, March 5. The programme:

Tschaikowsky	Symphonic Poem. "Hamlet." (First time.)
Bruch	Concerto for Violin, No. 3, in D minor, op. 58. Allegro energico— Adagio—Allegro molto. (First time in Boston.)
Schumann	Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120. Introduction (adagio non troppo) — Allegro — Romance (adagio non troppo)—Scherzo—Finale (allegro).

Soloist: Mme. Camilla Urso.

If one is to judge of the symphonic poem music by the performance of the orchestra under Mr. Nikisch last Saturday evening, it must be stamped as having been a riotous, noisy demonstration of the most turbulent character. There is little wonder Ophelia went insane, albeit there is a motif which is supposed to depict her beautiful character. The grief of Hamlet at his father's death, represented by the striking of the midnight hour by muted horns, together with the subject representing Ophelia when the two are brought together, as they are in the music, is astonishingly more like a good-sized earthquake than the solemnities of a death scene. The orchestra undoubtedly did their part well, it being evident they had made careful preparations for the fiery ordeal. This was the first representation of the symphonic poem in Boston.

The violin concerto of Bruch, played by Mme. Camilla Urso, is, as a whole, disappointing. The first part by all odds is the most interesting as music. There are many fine passages which are well calculated to rivet the attention of sincere lovers of good music. The second movement begins with a melody which is carefully worked out to such a length as to become painfully monotonous. It contains so little of tone color, so little virility, that one soon loses all interest in following it to its end. The last and concluding movement is better calculated to show the technical powers of the violinist than any music it contains. Madame Urso is a violinist of rare abilities, musical and technical. Her rendering of the entire concerto was beautifully artistic, which the large audience present fully conceded, showing their appreciation with very hearty applause at the end. The orchestra were not always thoughtful enough to accompany her properly, playing much too loudly most of the time. The last movement demands a more masculine treatment than the madame accorded it, though she is not strikingly effeminate.

The Schumann symphony was well played, Mr. Nikisch imparting to it much of his brilliant, magnetic qualities, which, by the way, really belong to the symphony.

The concert was made particularly interesting by the two novelties presented, and the appearance, after some years' absence, of Madame Camilla Urso, always a great favorite with Boston people.

Eugene D'Albert ("little lion") is to be the next Symphony attraction.

JAMES M. TRACY.

The Kneisel quartette gave the sixth concert of its series Monday evening in Union hall. The first number of the programme was a quartette in E minor by Ottokar Novacek, the first viola of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It is not an ordinary work; it is not one that is easily understood, and it is probable that even after repeated hearings many passages would still be unintelligible, says the Boston Journal. The frequent obscurity and the aggressive ugliness of certain portions are not accidental; they are evidently the expression of the purpose of the composer. The very opening is an exhibition of musical bad temper. Then there is a reduced version of a familiar imitation of snorting and neighing horses; there are sounds that might be produced by the application of wet thumbs to tumblers; there is the tearing of cloth; there are progressions that stab the ear; there are suggestions of Wagner in the more tuneful measures; and there is an open defiance of the characteristics and limitations of the string quartette. Yet in the midst of cacophony there is a fierce intensity, there is a rigidity of purpose and there is a rude rebellion against conventionality and commonplace that almost conquer the sympathy of the hearer. There is much that is beautiful in the slow movement, but that which is beautiful is rudely jostled by an ugly neighbor. The third movement appeals more strongly to popular taste; and here we greet old friends. Berlioz and Mendelssohn shake hands, while Saint-Saens stands by and whistles a strain of his "Danse Macabre." The finale is a prolonged shriek of varied intensity. In spite of the wilful eccentricities, the wild extravagances, the crudity, the cacophony of this quartette, Mr. Novacek is undoubtedly, and judged by this very work, a man of genuine musical stuff. He should remember, however, that in order to make a strong impression on the mind of the hearer it is not absolutely necessary for the musician to clutch his victim by the throat, knock him down, or stamp his prostrate body. This quartette was heartily applauded, and the third movement was repeated. It was played with loving, brotherly care. The other instrumental numbers were the variations from Beethoven's op. 18, No. 5, and the Beethoven quartette in E flat, op. 74. With a few trifling exceptions, as in the viola triplets in the second variation in op. 74, the performance of these numbers was most admirable. Mrs. Amalie Joachim made her first appearance in America. She sang Beethoven's "Mignon," Mozart's "The Violet," Haydn's Serenade," Aule's "The Advent of Our Saviour," a song by Schulz (a favorite writer of operettas in the last century), Mendelssohn's "Venetian Boat Song" and Schubert's "Halderoeslein." The postponed fourth concert of the Kneisel quartette will be given Monday, April 4.

Says the New York Sun: The long-deferred recital announced by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch almost two months ago took place at Chickering hall Monday afternoon, in presence of a numerous and sympathetic audience. Mrs. Nikisch sang songs by Schumann, Franz, Brahms, Jensen, Heuberger, De Koven, and other composers—seventeen numbers in all—and Mr. Nikisch accompanied her at the piano. Her performances were characterized by felicity of expression and also by consummate musicianly skill. The largest meed of praise may fairly be awarded her interpretation of Brahms's compositions. How admirably Mr. Nikisch accompanied his wife need scarcely be told music lovers that have had occasion to hear the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the less conspicuous rôle he sustained yesterday. The vocal numbers interpreted by Mrs. Nikisch derive much of their significance and beauty from their so-called accompaniment, and to say that to Mr. Nikisch's playing quite one-half of their effect was due, is only to estimate his work at its right value. The singing of Mrs. Nikisch was agreeably varied by the violin performances of Master Alexander Fiedemann, a youthful pupil and protégé of Mr. Brodsky's, who has been heard before and to somewhat greater advantage. His interpretation of Vieuxtemps's "Fantasie Caprice," with prudent eliminations, was not particularly good, his bowing being especially feeble. In Hauser's Hungarian Rhapsody he was more at his ease. Master Fiedemann is a remarkably clever boy, with a bright future before him. Perhaps it is fortunate that he should not be, in the exact sense of the term, an infant prodigy.

THE NIKISCH RECITAL.

On Thursday evening Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann, violinist, gave a song recital in Chickering hall. The programme was:

Goldmark—Die Quelle.
Schumann—Der Nussbaum.
August Bungert—Volkslied.
Richard Heuberger—Ein Bettlerpärchen.
Robert Franz—Ständchen.
Schumann—Provencalisches Lied.
Vieuxtemps—Fantaisie-Caprice for violin.
Brahms—Geheimniss.
    Therese.
    Ständchen.
    Wiegenlied.
    Des Liebsten Schwur.
    Vergebliches Ständchen.
Spohr—Adagio from Concerto No 9.
Miska Hauser—Hungarian Rhapsody.
R de Koven—Indian Love Song.
Tschaikowsky—Beim Tanze.
Richard Strauss—Serenade.
Jensen—Am Mananzares.
Schumann—Frühlingsnacht.

The programme was delightful, and delightfully rendered. Mrs. Nikisch has that spontaneity, vivacity, warmth and freshness which are indispensable to the proper interpretation of German leider. The songs showed her at her best in this line of vocal work, and the appreciation was unstinted.

The value and importance of the accompaniment never had a better illustration than in Mr. Nikisch's work. It was artistic in the extreme, thoroughly in sympathy with the singer and the composer: in short, the exact complement to the soloist which makes a perfect whole.

Master Fiedemann, a pupil of Mr. Adolf Brodsky, and twelve years of age, surprised his hearers, making a permanent impression for his remarkable technique and no less distinct musical feeling. He does not strike one as a prodigy, but as a youth with fine and strong musical instincts which have been well directed so far.

In great measure was this an ideal recital.

· Philadelphia Music and Drama ·

PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, MARCH 12, 1

The fifth Boston Symphony will occur at the Academy Monday evening. Eugene d'Albert, the pianist will be the soloist, and will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, and selections by Chopin, Schubert and Tausig. The orchestral numbers include selections from Berlioz, Beethoven, Saint-Sæns, Grieg and Wagner.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 12, 1892.

A WELCOME novelty at the 18th Boston Symphony Concert was Tschaikowsky's symphonic poem of Hamlet, which really seems to tell the story of his dilemma and sad end, albeit the Ophelia theme scarcely hints her character. Another welcome novelty was Bruch's Violin Concerto, No. 3, D-minor, op. 58, with Camilla Urso as the soloist,—a classical and well-rounded performance. The third number was Schumann's Fourth Symphony, op. 120, D-minor, played (as the author intended) continuously, with only one pause, and that a very brief one, between the Allegro and Romance. The awful condition of the sloppy streets made the attendance the smallest of the season.

SPECIAL Symphony Concert with Paderewski and other soloists, was given on Ash Wednesday for the benefit of members of the orchestra.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 73.

SUNDAY, MARCH 13, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The event of last evening's symphony concert was the appearance of Eugen D'Albert, the pianist, who has returned to America for a short tour with the Boston orchestra and a few recitals. He chose the concerto in E flat, No. 5, by Beethoven for this occasion, and gave the work such a performance as it has rarely had in later years.

The reception given the pianist left no doubt as to the sentiments of the audience, and the members of the orchestra joined with unusual enthusiasm in welcoming the soloist of the evening back to the scene of his earlier triumphs in the recitals of his earlier visit here.

His broad, masterly treatment of the opening allegro commanded the instant admiration of the audience, and no pianist could ask for a more attentive hearing than that given the concerto from first to last. The remarkable clearness and purity of tone brought out by this pianist's touch gives an indescribable enjoyment to the listener, and the maintainance of this characteristic of his playing throughout the most stupendous technical difficulties, gives a degree of satisfaction that is seldom realized in the piano work of the most noted soloists.

The beautiful adagio movement was played with admirable taste, and the theme was sung with rare expression and sentiment, the embellishments never interfering with the clearness of the subject thus elaborated. There was a womanly delicacy of touch combined with a masterly control of the instrument in this portion of the work that could but find the heartiest appreciation of the most critical. In the final movement the player surpassed his own remarkable work in former appearances here, and aroused the most pronounced demonstration in his honor at its end that has been known here for many seasons, the musicians all joining in the applause, which called the artist back to the stage repeatedly to make his acknowledgements.

Mr. Nikisch kept his promise of giving a hearing of the fourth of the Schumann symphonies, in its original version, and now that, as a clever man expressed it, "Boston has heard this symphony as Schumann didn't want it," there seems no good cause for a repetition of the work in the form which, thanks to Herr Brahms, has just been made public from the original manuscript, of which Brahms is the owner. There are few marked thematic differences between this original version and that which has been the standard in the orchestral libraries of the day, and the differences in themes and the orchestration are all in favor of the more generally known form of the symphony.

A very enjoyable performance of the "Leonore" overture No. 2 began the concert, and the work of the orchestra during the evening was at all times up to its best standard.

The usual monthly tour will take place the coming week, and the 20th of the season's concerts, on Saturday, the 26th inst., will be with Mme. Amalia Joachim as soloist, the programme including Brahms' "Tragic Overture," Aria from "Orpheus," Gluck's "Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien Tanz," from "Orpheus," songs, with piano, and Beethoven's symphony No. 8.

Mr. Georg Henschel has now the satisfaction of having turned the tide of popular favor toward his London symphony concerts, and an increased number of concerts are announced for next year.

Patrons of Music Hall should be comforted. St. James' Hall, London, is so dimly lighted that at a recent symphony concert given there, Mr. Henschel publicly declared his orchestra could not distinguish between a sharp and a flat, and in advance ventured to excuse any possible mistakes, and this in a concert room which, in full season, lets for upward of £60 per diem!

Boston Post

MOTTO:
With a Mission
—AND—
Without a Muzzle.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 14, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Saturday night's symphony concert was one of the most brilliant of the course, introducing Eugen D'Albert, the pianist, in Beethoven's concerto in E flat, No. 5, and giving a first rendition of Schumann's symphony, No. 4, Op. 120, as it was originally written,

Every seat in the hall was occupied, and all the available space in the outside aisles was taken up by the many who were not regular attendants, but had been attracted by the prospect of an unusually fine performance by the pianist whom all Europe unites in calling the greatest living exponent of piano music. As an interpreter of Beethoven he probably has no equal, and Saturday night's concert fully sustained the judgment passed upon him by foreign critics and those of our own country, during his visit two years ago.

D'Albert's treatment of the opening allegro was broad and masterly, and characterized by remarkable clearness and purity of tone. His easy mastery of the prodigious technical difficulties commanded the instant admiration of the audience.

The second movement, adagio, was beautifully rendered, the theme distinctly traceable and admirably disclosing his delicacy of touch, his taste and conception of technical finish, while the final movement brought forth the heartiest applause from the audience and the members of the orchestra as well.

It is something to have heard the original version of the Schumann symphony, but opinions concerning its merits are diversified, a few claiming its superiority to the one with which the public is familiar. In both arrangements it is soulful and beautiful and has been intelligently and well rendered by Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra.

The opening number on the programme was one of the three overtures to Fidelio, Leonora, No. 2, containing a lovely adagio in C, an original allegro and an exquisite pizzicato, in which the orchestra excelled. In no other composition has been exhibited such precision and purity of tone, such delicacy and beautiful manner of phrasing.

The organization will make its usual monthly tour this week, but the twentieth concert will take place March 26, with Mme. Amalie Joachim as soloist and a programme consisting of Brahm's "Tragic Overture," aria from "Orpheus," Gluck's "Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien Tanz," from "Orpheus," Schubert's "Liebesbolschaft," Schumann's "Schoene Wiegemeiner Leiden," Schubert's "Elkoenig," and Beethoven's Symphony No.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 13, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

After an absence of two years Mr. Eugen D'Albert is once more in Boston. During his last visit here this distinguished pianist gave on more than one occasion convincing proof of his greatness as a pianist, and especially as an interpreter of Beethoven. His performance of the "Emperor" concerto, at the nineteenth Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon was further proof that he is still one of the first pianists of the day.

In every respect it was masterly; noble in conception; broad, expressive and fiery in execution. His tempi were just and sufficiently elastic to avoid any suggestion of rigidity, and his phrasing was thoroughly in harmony with the spirit of the music. Of his technical work too much cannot be said in praise. The difficulties of the concerto were simply child's play for him. His passage playing throughout was wonderfully clear, fluent and musical in quality; the chain trill in the adagio being especially noteworthy for its firmness, evenness and rapidity, and the closing scale runs for their extraordinary strength and brilliancy. At the conclusion of the work Mr. D'Albert was recalled five times, and finally returned to the piano and played the Schubert Impromptu, opus 90, in G. The accompaniment to the concerto was played with unusual finish and was in every way an enjoyable part of the performance. The symphony was the original version of Schumann's in D minor, No. 4. It certainly was interesting to hear this work as it was first performed (excepting the few changes made by Messrs. Brahms and Wullner). The principal points wherein the original version differs from the one which has been given for over forty years are plainly noticeable; the weaker scoring of the opening measures of the introduction, the tameness of the passage leading to the first allegro, and the slower tempo of the allegro itself; the run leading to the finale; the absence of the whirling figure (taken from the first allegro) from the opening measures of the finale; and several others of minor importance. It is evident that Schumann well knew what he was about when he rewrote this symphony. There is little probability that its original version will find a place in concert repertories of today, although it may be produced occasionally for educational purposes. The performance as a whole was rather unfinished and ineffective, which was without doubt owing to insufficient rehearsals, and to the comparative ineffectiveness of the score.

A dramatic performance of the second "Leonore" overture preceeded the concerto.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The sixth concert of the Kneisel Quartet series was given in Union Hall, Monday evening to an audience that filled the hall. A quartet by Mr. Ottokar Novacek, the first viola player of the Symphony Orchestra, stood at the head of the programme. We hesitate to express a decided opinion of this work after this, its first American performance because we suspect it contains more of worth than is apparent at a single hearing. The fact that the prestissimo, on its repetition, (in response to enthusiastic applause) seemed more purposeful as well as attractive, confirms our suspicion. This movement, aside from its fascinating sprightliness, has a trio which reveals much delicate fancy—a fancy which seems the reflection of the more earnest mood of the preceding adagio. The adagio, though of unpretentious construction, possesses a depth of feeling that is found all too seldom in musical compositions of today. It must be confessed that the two allegros are "hard nuts to crack." One great merit of the work is its conciseness; no unnecessary elaboration is discoverable. It was played with a will by Mr. Kneisel and his companions; energy, clearness and purity of tone being conspicuous throughout. Each movement was followed by long continued applause. Another event of the concert was the first appearance in Boston of Mme. Amalie Joachim, a noted concert singer of Germany, and wife of the celebrated violinist. Mme. Joachim was heard in two groups of songs; "Mignon," by Beethoven; "Das Veilchen," Mozart; "Standchen," Haydn; "Geistlicher Dialog," Able; "Sagt wo sind die Veilchen hin," Schulz; "Gondollied," Mendelssohn; and "Haiden-Roslein," Schubert. All these songs were rendered in an exceedingly artistic manner and won applause of the heartiest description, which after the last, was responded to with another song. In another article in this column will be found more extended comment on the characteristics of Mme. Joachim's singing. The remaining numbers were the variations from Beethoven's quartet, opus 18, and his beautiful quartet in E flat, opus 74. Both were admirably played.

THE NIKISCH RECITAL.

A large and fashionable audience filled Chickering Hall, Thursday evening on the occasion of a song recital by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who was assisted by Mr. Nikisch and Master Alexander Fiedemann, violinist. Mrs. Nikisch was heard in three artistically arranged groups of songs; one being confined to Brahm's and the other two made up from compositions by different writers. We have never heard Mrs. Nikisch before when she appeared to so thoroughly fine advantage. In freedom of tone production and accuracy of attack she seemed to have made decided gains; certainly her delivery was characterized by much greater ease and smoothness. It is true, however, that her technical work is not yet all that could be wished. Of the many delightful songs on the programme, Schumann's "Der Nussbaum," and "Provencalisches Lied," three "Standchen" by Franz, Brahms, and Richard Strauss (the second of which was repeated), "Beim Tanze," by Tschaikowsky, and "Am Manzanares," by Jensen, may be mentioned as among those in which Mrs. Nikisch's warm musical nature was most freely displayed. These were sung in a delightful manner, and well deserved the enthusiastic applause which followed their performance. Master Fiedemann's playing in Vieuxtemp's "Fantasie Caprice," the adagio of Spohr's ninth concerto, and a Hungarian rhapsody by Hauser, created a genuine sensation. Already, at the age of thirteen, this adopted child of Herr Brodsky, the concert master of the New York Symphony Orchestra, possesses a fluency of technique, a virility of tone and an ease of manner that are astonishing. Even in these days of prodigies such technical facility and artistic poise are rare. The little fellow's tasteful and brilliant efforts were fully appreciated, and won for him several recalls. The accompaniments were played by Mr. Nikisch, his exquisite work in those of the songs constituting one of the chief pleasures of the evening.

Boston Sunday Gl

SUNDAY, MARCH 13, 1892.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

D'ALBERT THE SOLOIST.

He Plays a Beethoven Concerto at the Symphony Concert.

The 19th rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was pleasantly anticipated by the regular patrons, and there was scarcely an absentee, and those who take chances for a seat were present to the limit.

This season has been replete with piano recitals. The fact that Paderewski can completely fill the Boston Music Hall at one of his concerts, and hold an audience in deep attention for two hours, speaks well for the hold this form of musical entertainment has on the Boston public.

The announcement that D'Albert was to take part in the Friday afternoon rehearsal doubtless drew many who were anxious to compare his style with that of other pianists who have so recently appeared here.

However that may be, when Mr. Nikisch took his baton in hand an unusually large and attentive audience were prepared to listen.

The concert began with one of the three overtures to Fidelio, Leonore, No. 2. This overture was composed in 1805, and though styled No. 2, is in reality No. 1, since the others were produced in 1806-7 respectively.

This overture opens adagio in the key of C, and at once captivates the ear and senses. The work is well distributed and introduces the well-known air of Florestan, which he sings in the dungeon scene in the second act of the opera.

Then came an allegro, which is in no way associated with the parent theme, but full of original thought.

The pizzicato was a delightful effect at this stage—sustained by the basses—doing accompaniment for the flutes and oboes.

A pleasing feature was the introduction of two trumpet calls announcing the arrival of the governor.

The first violins at this point begin a very faint introduction to the finale, followed in succession by the other strings, until the entire orchestra is involved in a most rapturous termination.

The concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat, by Beethoven, was selected to introdruce the soloist of the occasion, D'Albert. The movements were made up of allegro, adagio un poco mosso, allegro.

This best of Beethoven's concertos has been called a "symphony, with pianoforte obligato."

The pianist begins with a brilliant chromatic scale passage and his work thenceforth exhibits the great resources and fullness of this soloist.

He not only meets all the difficulties of the score, but sustains a volume of sound sufficient to dominate the whole work.

The adagio offered excellent opportunities for delicate shading which were accepted with becoming grace of treatment. In the allegro which followed, d'Albert warmed well to his work and was both spirited and brilliant.

The cada was short but emphatic, and when the artist arose to accept his well-earned applause he showed evidence of the earnestness he had put into his work.

He favored his audience with an encore, after having been called back repeatedly.

D'Abert is a hard worker and intensely earnest. He has the facility of Parchmann, but we would wish he possessed the sympathetic quality of Paderewski. D'Albert unquestionably has a very strong hold on his audiences, and is growing in popularity.

The third and last number was the No. 4 symphony in D minor (original version), by Schumann. This symphony was brought out by the New York Philharmonic Society some three weeks since for the first time in this country. It was delightfully rendered yesterday. It possesses in a high degree the soulful feelings of Schumann, and much of his romantic spirit. It is to be regretted that space does not admit of discussing merits at greater length.

The Kneisel quartet concert, postponed from Jan. 25, will be given in Union Hall on Monday, April 4.

—The Kneisel concert, Monday night, at Union Hall, drew a fashionable audience, the first appearance in public of Mme. Joachim being one of the features of special interest. She looked exceedingly well in primrose yellow satin. Among the large number in the hall were Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang and Miss Lang, Mrs. Apthorp, Mrs. Gardner, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote, Mr. W. P. Blake, Mr. and Mrs. Gardner Lamson, Dr. and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. G. W. Chadwick, Mr. and Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger, Mrs. J.M. Sears, Mr. B.L. Whelpley, Mr. Charles Sanderson, Mr. C. N. Allen, Mr. Carl Faelten, Mr. Carl Zerrahn, Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Rogers and Mr. W. H. W. Bicknell.

—Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will make their headquarters at Haydenville, Mass., while they are in this country. Their song recitals are already the success their friends anticipated, the advance sale being very large.

—Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch attracted, as might have been expected, the choicest concert audience of the week at their recital Thursday night at Chickering Hall. Mrs. Nikisch's charming personality never was more potently realized by her audience than when she stepped on the stage, followed by her husband, looking exquisitely pretty, dainty and young, all in white silk and chiffon, with a decollete and sleeveless bodice. She wore no jewels except a diamond necklace, and carried a loose cluster of pink roses. Her hair was simply dressed in a low knot, with no ornamentation, which showed the beautiful shaped head to best advantage. Mrs. Nikisch was in fine voice, the quality so full and round and true that it was a delight to listen. Mr. Nikisch as an accompanist is unequalled. After the second song a great bunch of roses was handed Mrs. Nikisch. The boy violinist made a deep impression. He has a sweet, childlike face, and his manner is very winning. Among the many in the brilliant audience, which was very prodigal in applause, were Mr. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. James Jackson, Mr. and Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. C. E. Inches, Mr. and Mrs. Lindall Winthrop, Mrs. Thomas Issigi, Mrs. Apthorp, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote, Mrs. Gardner, Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang, Miss Alice Stackpole, Mr. Russell Sturgis, Mrs. T. E. Chickering, Miss Margaret Lang, Mrs. Julie Wyman, Mme. Joachim and Miss Villa Whitney White, Mr. T. Adamowski and Mr. Joseph Adamowski, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Hubbard, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Hecht, Mr. and Mrs. Gardner Lamson, Mr. Henry A. Clapp, Mr. Whelpley, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Winch, Mrs. D. B. Stedman, Jr., and daughter, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, the Misses Riddle, Mrs. S. B. Field, Miss Josephine Jenkins, Mr. Perabo, Mr. and Mrs. Zack, Mrs. H. M. Rogers and Mr. and Mrs. G. H. Chickering.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 13.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening was:—Overture, "Lenore," No. 2, Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte No. 5, in E flat, Beethoven; and Symphony No. 4, in D-minor, Schumann, (according to the original version). The soloist was Mr. Eugen d'Albert. The overture was carefully read and admirably played. The differences between the orignal and the revised versions of the Schumann symphony are not easy to describe They are chiefly in the instrumentation, the version to which we are accustomed being more fully scored than the other. There are changes in the thematic development, but only two or three are of any marked importance. It may be possibly lack of taste or of appreciation, but we really find it difficult to prefer the second version to the first or the first to the second. If there be a choice it is in favor of the greater clearness of the original scoring; though in the revised edition the finale is an improvement on its original form. Still, if Schumann had permitted the first version to go to the world without revising it in another version, the work would have passed current as a fine one and nobody would have thought of a revision. It was spiritedly performed, though at times with a noisy bluster that might have been modified with excellent result. Mr. d'Albert's performance of the concerto was noble and masterly in every way. It was glorious Beethoven playing from beginning to end; free from affectation, from all attempt to make the composer say what he never meant to say, and from any effort to paint an old masterpiece in new colors. It is too late in the day to pay tribute to the artist's technique. To his reading of the work it would be hard to pay too much tribute. It was keenly in sympathy with the composer, manly in style and musicianly and dignified in all things. The tempi were perfect. The adagio was exquisitely given, and rarely have we heard the finale played with more nobility of taste and beauty of expression. The artist was applauded with immense enthusiasm and recalled four times. On the last occasion he responded at the piano, playing, if we are not mistaken, a Brahms rhapsody. The programme for the next concert is: Tragic Overture, Brahms; aria from "Orpheus," Gluck; Ballet music from "Orpheus" Gluck; songs by Schubert and Schumann, and Beethoven Symphony No. 8. The soloist is to be Mme. Amelie Joachim.

Music Notes.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartet gave their sixth concert in Union Hall, assisted by Mme. Amelie Joachim. The performance began with a Quartet in E minor, by Ottobar Novacek, which had its first performance in Boston on this occasion. Much has been said in the way of enthusiastic praise of the work by those who have studied and performed it; but for our own part we found it to be an incoherent jumble of all that is uninteresting to us in music; an example of that phase of composition that is familiarly known as "pudding-stone music." A second or a third hearing of the work might possibly cause us to modify our objections to it, but we are convinced that no number of hearings could remove the impression that it is hideously ugly, a misconception of the end and aim of musical art, and of about as much interest as would be the mathematical calculations anent the latest transit of Venus, turned into verse. We have heard, on reliable authority, that one of the performers, during a recent rehearsal of the work, was so overcome by the emotions it excited in him that tears ran down his cheeks and trickled from his chin to his violin. To do away with any misconception regarding this sensitive lachrymosity, we hasten to state that these tears were born of steadily increasing admiration for the music, and not of pain. This would seem to indicate that there is more in the quartet than we discovered, but we are content with one experience of it, and have no irrepressible desire to explore it further. We presume that every justice was done the work by the players, Its difficulties are great. We could almost wish that they were insurmountable. The variations from the Beethoven quartet, op. 18, No. 5, were exquisitely read and performed. The concert ended with Beethoven's noble E-flat quartet, op. 74, which also had a perfect interpretation. As fine as the playing of the organization has been through the season, it has not surpassed the performance of this work. Mme. Joachim was cordially received, but as we have considered her singing at length in our notice of her own concert, we shall not dwell on it here.

On Tuesday evening the long-deferred concert by Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch was given in Chickering Hall. The audience was large and exceedingly friendly. Mrs. Nikisch sang three groups of songs, one consisting of selections from Schumann, Franz, Goldmark, Rungelt, and Heuberger; another being devoted wholly to Brahms, and the third presenting songs by Schumann, Tschaikowski, R. Strauss, Jensen, and R. de Koven. Both Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch were welcomed with great cordiality. Mrs. Nikisch has a large voice, of excellent compass and quality. Unfortunately, it has not been properly trained in a good vocal school, and the result is that her singing exemplifies almost everything that is to be avoided in her art. Her breathing is very badly managed, and every respiration is plainly heard—a grievous fault. Her tone production is nasal, and she frequently forces her voice to such an extent that her intonation becomes both explosive and false. Worst of all is her persistent and inartistic use of portamento, both up and down, which imparts a painfully unpleasing effect of wailing to her singing; and matters are not improved by her habit of attacking a note below its pitch and scooping up to it. She sings with much fire, but her style is monotonously violent, and is perfunctory rather than emotional in spirit. Even when she is most pleasing, she never seems to probe sympathetically to the heart of her music, and therefore leaves the hearts of her hearers untouched. In fact, her singing is rough and unrefined; but it is only fair to add that it is better and less crude in some minor essentials than it was when it was heard here before. Mr. Nikisch's playing of the accompaniments was exquisite in every way, and proved a wholly delightful element in the evening's entertainment. Both artists were frequently and stormily applauded. On the whole, however, the feature of the concert was the violin playing of Alexander Fiedmann, an interesting youngster with a face of fine intelligence. He is only twelve years of age, and is already an artist. He performed the Fantasie Caprice by Vieuxtemps, the adagio from Spohr's ninth concerto, and Hauser's Hungarian Rhapsody. His tone is remarkably large and pure, his bowing is masterly in its freedom and in its perfect command over the resources of the bow, and his technique is extraordinary in its development when his youth is taken into consideration. Now and then there was a slip in intonation, but it was owing to the smallness of the player's hand, and not to any fault of ear. He plays with dignity, modesty and perfect self-possession. He is not only a prodigy in technique, but he interprets as well as plays. He reflects an individuality of his own, and suggests in nothing that he is merely repeating a well-learned lesson; and so mature in spirit was all that he did, that there was no necessary allowance to be made for his youth, and he may be listened to with all of the respect that is due a full-fledged artist. In fact we have heard men violinists on our prominent concert stage who produce a smaller volume of tone, and who play with far less of skill and of innate art feeling than does this remarkable boy.

[illegible]

MONDAY, MARCH 14, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the nineteenth Symphony concert, which was given Saturday evening in Music Hall, was as follows: Overture, "Lenore, No. 2," Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte No. 5, E flat, Beethoven; Schumann's Symphony No. 4 (original version). Mr. Eugen D'Albert was the pianist.

The manuscript of the original version of Schumann's D minor Symphony is owned by Johannes Brahms. He loaned it to Franz Wuellner of Cologne. It was played in that city in October, 1889, and there was so much talk about it that, under the editorship of Dr. Wuellner, it was published lately by Breitkopf & Haertel. Unfortunately for the student, the learned Brahms and Wuellner were not content with the Schumann version; they revised it, and in one or two instances they adopted the instrumentation of the later and familiar version. A week ago Saturday we heard Schumann's D minor Symphony as interpreted by Mr. Nikisch, full of exaggerations and even contradictions of the composer's expressly indicated wishes. Last Saturday we heard the Symphony in D minor, rejected by the composer and revised by Messrs. Brahms and Wuellner. It might now be a pleasure to hear Schumann's preferred version played with a due regard for his own directions.

It is true that in the first form of this symphony the instrumentation is clearer than it is in the second; for the instrumentation of Schumann's later period is not free from the reproach of muddiness. Nor, indeed, was the cunning mixing of orchestral tone colors ever a distinguishing feature of the genius of this composer. On the other hand, the thematic and contrapuntal alterations in the second version of 1851 are, as a rule, an improvement. In certain respects the performance of last Saturday was an improvement on that of a fortnight ago. The duties of the second violins and the violas were not passed over that the first violins might benefit thereby. The dynamic contrasts were more carefully observed. Schumann was evidently acquainted with fiery and "magnetic" conductors, for he wrote on the outer covering of the manuscript of 1841, "The sudden changes of piano and forte should be strictly observed." In the forte passages, however, there was at times a tendency to exaggerate, and Schumann's body was clothed in Hungarian dress. The dramatic overture of Beethoven was exceedingly well played.

Mr. D'Albert was most enthusiastically applauded after the concerto, and he played a rhapsody by Brahms. His performance of the concerto might justly excite gaudy words of extravagant praise, were it not that polychromatic adjectives would be at variance with the unsurpassable dignity of the occasion. It would be idle to speak of any technical display, for the supreme virtuosoship of Mr. D'Albert has been the wonder of his colleagues and the musical public ever since his first appearance in Germany. This virtuosoship was at first the plaything of his youth. The giant delighted in his strength. He abused it; so that often he smote the keys until the wires shrieked in agony. But now he seems to have fully mastered himself, the only task that remained for him. Saturday evening his mighty powers were used reverently in the service of Beethoven. The reading of the concerto was distinguished by its nobility. There was nothing common, mean or earthy. The soul of a great man was revealed, and the medium was content with the holy mission. Beethoven spoke. The pianist listened. He did not seek to interrupt, to contradict, to explain. He did not question any mood of the master. He accepted passion, tenderness, pride, arrogance, tumultuous joy, grotesque fancy. And it was as though D'Albert knew full well the value of the mavelous apostrophe of the Opium Eater to Shakspeare: "O mighty poet! Thy works are not as those of other men, simply and merely great works of art, but are also like the phenomena of nature, like the sun and the sea, the stars and the flowers, like frost and snow, rain and dew, hail storm and thunder, which are to be studied with entire submission of our own faculties, and in the perfect faith that in them there can be no too much or too little, nothing useless or inert, but that, the farther we press in our discoveries, the more we shall see proofs of design and self-supporting arrangement where the careless eye had seen nothing but accident!"

PHILIP HALE.

D.C.

te Post 3/10

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Those who attend the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday, March 16, will have the opportunity of hearing Eugen d'Albert, one of the greatest, if not the greatest, living player of the pianoforte. He was especially engaged by the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for twenty concerts, one of which is the coming concert in this city. Tickets will be placed on sale to-day at J. F. Ellis & Co.'s store.

WORLD, Baltimore, Md.

ate 3/11

The concert of all concerts, however, will be Thursday night, when Eugen D'Albert and the Boston symphony orchestra will appear at the Academy concert hall. D'Albert is one of the leading pianists of the world, and will be the greatest artist who has appeared at the symphony concerts this season.

---

edger, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3-11

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Arthur Nikisch, comes again to the Academy of Music on Monday evening. The programme is to comprise these numbers: Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," symphony (viola solo by Franz Kneisel), Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in E flat, No. 5 (Eugene D'Albert, soloist), Saint Saens's symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," and several piano solos for Mr. D'Albert.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 13, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

After an absence of two years Mr. Eugen D'Albert is once more in Boston. During his last visit here this distinguished pianist gave on more than one occasion convincing proof of his greatness as a pianist, and especially as an interpreter of Beethoven. His performance of the "Emperor" concerto, at the nineteenth Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon was further proof that he is still one of the first pianists of the day.

In every respect it was masterly; noble in conception; broad, expressive and fiery in execution. His tempi were just and sufficiently elastic to avoid any suggestion of rigidity, and his phrasing was thoroughly in harmony with the spirit of the music. Of his technical work too much cannot be said in praise. The difficulties of the concerto were simply child's play for him. His passage playing throughout was wonderfully clear, fluent and musical in quality; the chain trill in the adagio being especially noteworthy for its firmness, evenness and rapidity, and the closing scale runs for their extraordinary strength and brilliancy. At the conclusion of the work Mr. D'Albert was recalled five times, and finally returned to the piano and played the Schubert Impromptu, opus 90, in G. The accompaniment to the concerto was played with unusual finish and was in every way an enjoyable part of the performance. The symphony was the original version of Schumann's in D minor, No. 4. It certainly was interesting to hear this work as it was first performed (excepting the few changes made by Messrs. Brahms and Wullner). The principal points wherein the original version differs from the one which has been given for over forty years are plainly noticeable; the weaker scoring of the opening measures of the introduction, the tameness of the passage leading to the first allegro, and the slower tempo of the allegro itself; the run leading to the finale; the absence of the whirling figure (taken from the first allegro) from the opening measures of the finale; and several others of minor importance. It is evident that Schumann well knew what he was about when he rewrote this symphony. There is little probability that its original version will find a place in concert repertories of today, although it may be produced occasionally for educational purposes. The performance as a whole was rather unfinished and ineffective, which was without doubt owing to insufficient rehearsals, and to the comparative ineffectiveness of the score.

A dramatic performance of the second "Leonore" overture preceeded the concerto.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The sixth concert of the Kneisel Quartet series was given in Union Hall, Monday evening to an audience that filled the hall. A quartet by Mr. Ottokar Novacek, the first viola player of the Symphony Orchestra, stood at the head of the programme. We hesitate to express a decided opinion of this work after this, its first American performance because we suspect it contains more of worth than is apparent at a single hearing. The fact that the prestissimo, on its repetition, (in response to enthusiastic applause) seemed more purposeful as well as attractive, confirms our suspicion. This movement, aside from its fascinating sprightliness, has a trio which reveals much delicate fancy—a fancy which seems the reflection of the more earnest mood of the preceding adagio. The adagio, though of unpretentious construction, possesses a depth of feeling that is found all too seldom in musical compositions of today. It must be confessed that the two allegros are "hard nuts to crack." One great merit of the work is its conciseness; no unnecessary elaboration is discoverable. It was played with a will by Mr. Kneisel and his companions; energy, clearness and purity of tone being conspicuous throughout. Each movement was followed by long continued applause. Another event of the concert was the first appearance in Boston of Mme. Amalie Joachim, a noted concert singer of Germany, and wife of the celebrated violinist. Mme. Joachim was heard in two groups of songs; "Mignon," by Beethoven; "Das Veilchen," Mozart; "Standchen," Haydn; "Geistlicher Dialog," Ahle; "Sagt wo sind die Veilchen hin," Schulz; "Gondollied," Mendelssohn; and "Haiden-Roslein." Schubert. All these songs were rendered in an exceedingly artistic manner and won applause of the heartiest description, which after the last, was responded to with another song. In another article in this column will be found more extended comment on the characteristics of Mme. Joachim's singing. The remaining numbers were the variations from Beethoven's quartet, opus 18, and his beautiful quartet in E flat, opus 74. Both were admirably played.

THE NIKISCH RECITAL.

A large and fashionable audience filled Chickering Hall, Thursday evening on the occasion of a song recital by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who was assisted by Mr. Nikisch and Master Alexander Fiedemann, violinist. Mrs. Nikisch was heard in three artistically arranged groups of songs; one being confined to Brahm's and the other two made up from compositions by different writers. We have never heard Mrs. Nikisch before when she appeared to so thoroughly fine advantage. In freedom of tone production and accuracy of attack she seemed to have made decided gains; certainly her delivery was characterized by much greater ease and smoothness. It is true, however, that her technical work is not yet all that could be wished. Of the many delightful songs on the programme, Schumann's "Der Nussbaum," and "Provencalisches Lied," three "Standchen" by Franz, Brahms, and Richard Strauss (the second of which was repeated), "Beim Tanze," by Tschaikowsky, and "Am Manzanares," by Jensen, may be mentioned as among those in which Mrs. Nikisch's warm musical nature was most freely displayed. These were sung in a delightful manner, and well deserved the enthusiastic applause which followed their performance. Master Fiedemann's playing in Vieuxtemp's "Fantasie Caprice," the adagio of Spohr's ninth concerto, and a Hungarian rhapsody by Hanser, created a genuine sensation. Already, at the age of thirteen, this adopted child of Herr Brodsky, the concert master of the New York Symphony Orchestra, possesses a fluency of technique, a virility of tone and an ease of manner that are astonishing. Even in these days of prodigies such technical facility and artistic poise are rare. The little fellow's tasteful and brilliant efforts were fully appreciated, and won for him several recalls. The accompaniments were played by Mr. Nikisch, his exquisite work in those of the songs constituting one of the chief pleasures of the evening.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 13, 1892.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

D'ALBERT THE SOLOIST.

He Plays a Beethoven Concerto at the Symphony Concert.

The 19th rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was pleasantly anticipated by the regular patrons, and there was scarcely an absentee, and those who take chances for a seat were present to the limit.

This season has been replete with piano recitals. The fact that Paderewski can completely fill the Boston Music Hall at one of his concerts, and hold an audience in deep attention for two hours, speaks well for the hold this form of musical entertainment has on the Boston public.

The announcement that D'Albert was to take part in the Friday afternoon rehearsal doubtless drew many who were anxious to compare his style with that of other pianists who have so recently appeared here.

However that may be, when Mr. Nikisch took his baton in hand an unusually large and attentive audience were prepared to listen.

The concert began with one of the three overtures to Fidelio, Leonore, No. 2. This overture was composed in 1805, and though styled No. 2, is in reality No. 1, since the others were produced in 1806-7 respectively.

This overture opens adagio in the key of C, and at once captivates the ear and senses. The work is well distributed and introduces the well-known air of Florestan, which he sings in the dungeon scene in the second act of the opera.

Then came an allegro, which is in no way associated with the parent theme, but full of original thought.

The pizzicato was a delightful effect at this stage—sustained by the basses—doing accompaniment for the flutes and oboes.

A pleasing feature was the introduction of two trumpet calls announcing the arrival of the governor.

The first violins at this point begin a very faint introduction to the finale, followed in succession by the other strings, until the entire orchestra is involved in a most rapturous termination.

The concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat, by Beethoven, was selected to introduce the soloist of the occasion, D'Albert. The movements were made up of allegro, adagio un poco mosso, allegro.

This best of Beethoven's concertos has been called a "symphony, with pianoforte obligato."

The pianist begins with a brilliant chromatic scale passage and his work thenceforth exhibits the great resources and fullness of this soloist.

He not only meets all the difficulties of the score, but sustains a volume of sound sufficient to dominate the whole work.

The adagio offered excellent opportunities for delicate shading which were accepted with becoming grace of treatment. In the allegro which followed, d'Albert warmed well to his work and was both spirited and brilliant.

The cada was short but emphatic, and when the artist arose to accept his well-earned applause he showed evidence of the earnestness he had put into his work.

He favored his audience with an encore, after having been called back repeatedly.

D'Abert is a hard worker and intensely earnest. He has the facility of Parchmann, but we would wish he possessed the sympathetic quality of Paderewski. D'Albert unquestionably has a very strong hold on his audiences, and is growing in popularity.

The third and last number was the No. 4 symphony in D minor (original version), by Schumann. This symphony was brought out by the New York Philharmonic Society some three weeks since for the first time in this country. It was delightfully rendered yesterday. It possesses in a high degree the soulful feelings of Schumann, and much of his romantic spirit. It is to be regretted that space does not admit of discussing merits at greater length.

The Kneisel quartet concert, postponed from Jan. 25, will be given in Union Hall on Monday, April 4.

—The Kneisel concert, Monday night, at Union Hall, drew a fashionable audience, the first appearance in public of Mme. Joachim being one of the features of special interest. She looked exceedingly well in primrose yellow satin. Among the large number in the hall were Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang and Miss Lang, Mrs. Apthorp, Mrs. Gardner, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote, Mr. W. P. Blake, Mr. and Mrs. Gardner Lamson, Dr. and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. G. W. Chadwick, Mr. and Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger, Mrs. J.M. Sears, Mr. E.L. Whelpley, Mr. Charles Sanderson, Mr. C. N. Allen, Mr. Carl Faelten, Mr. Carl Zerrahn, Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Rogers and Mr. W. H. W. Bicknell.

—Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will make their headquarters at Haydenville, Mass., while they are in this country. Their song recitals are already the success their friends anticipated, the advance sale being very large.

—Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch attracted, as might have been expected, the choicest concert audience of the week at their recital Thursday night at Chickering Hall. Mrs. Nikisch's charming personality never was more potently realized by her audience than when she stepped on the stage, followed by her husband, looking exquisitely pretty, dainty and young, all in white silk and chiffon, with a decollete and sleeveless bodice. She wore no jewels except a diamond necklace, and carried a loose cluster of pink roses. Her hair was simply dressed in a low knot, with no ornamentation, which showed the beautiful shaped head to best advantage. Mrs. Nikisch was in fine voice, the quality so full and round and true that it was a delight to listen. Mr. Nikisch as an accompanist is unequalled. After the second song a great bunch of roses was handed Mrs. Nikisch. The boy violinist made a deep impression. He has a sweet, childlike face, and his manner is very winning. Among the many in the brilliant audience, which was very prodigal in applause, were Mr. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. James Jackson, Mr. and Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. C. E. Inches, Mr. and Mrs. Lindall Winthrop, Mrs. Thomas Iasigi, Mrs. Apthorp, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote, Mrs. Gardner, Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang, Miss Alice Stackpole, Mr. Russell Sturgis, Mrs. T. E. Chickering, Miss Margaret Lang, Mrs. Julie Wyman, Mme. Joachim and Miss Villa Whitney White, Mr. T. Adamowski and Mr. Joseph Adamowski, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Hubbard, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Hecht, Mr. and Mrs. Gardner Lamson, Mr. Henry A. Clapp, Mr. Whelpley, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Winch, Mrs. D. B. Stedman, Jr., and daughter, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, the Misses Riddle, Mrs. S. B. Field, Miss Josephine Jenkins, Mr. Perabo, Mr. and Mrs. Zack, Mrs. H. M. Rogers and Mr. and Mrs. G. B. Chickering.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 13.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening was:—Overture, "Lenore," No. 2, Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte No. 5, in E flat, Beethoven; and Symphony No. 4, in D-minor, Schumann, (according to the original version). The soloist was Mr. Eugen d'Albert. The overture was carefully read and admirably played. The differences between the orignal and the revised versions of the Schumann symphony are not easy to describe They are chiefly in the instrumentation, the version to which we are accustomed being more fully scored than the other. There are changes in the thematic development, but only two or three are of any marked importance. It may be possibly lack of taste or of appreciation, but we really find it difficult to prefer the second version to the first or the first to the second. If there be a choice it is in favor of the greater clearness of the original scoring; though in the revised edition the finale is an improvement on its original form. Still, if Schumann had permitted the first version to go to the world without revising it in another version, the work would have passed current as a fine one and nobody would have thought of a revision. It was spiritedly performed, though at times with a noisy bluster that might have been modified with excellent result. Mr. d'Albert's performance of the concerto was noble and masterly in every way. It was glorious Beethoven playing from beginning to end; free from affectation, from all attempt to make the composer say what he never meant to say, and from any effort to paint an old masterpiece in new colors. It is too late in the day to pay tribute to the artist's technique. To his reading of the work it would be hard to pay too much tribute. It was keenly in sympathy with the composer, manly in style and musicianly and dignified in all things. The tempi were perfect. The adagio was exquisitely given, and rarely have we heard the finale played with more nobility of taste and beauty of expression. The artist was applauded with immense enthusiasm and recalled four times. On the last occasion he responded at the piano, playing, if we are not mistaken, a Brahms rhapsody. The programme for the next concert is: Tragic Overture, Brahms; aria from "Orpheus," Gluck; Ballet music from "Orpheus'" Gluck; songs by Schubert and Schumann, and Beethoven Symphony No. 8. The soloist is to be Mme. Amelie Joachim.

Music Notes.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartet gave their sixth concert in Union Hall, assisted by Mme. Amelie Joachim. The performance began with a Quartet in E minor, by Ottobar Novacek, which had its first performance in Boston on this occasion. Much has been said in the way of enthusiastic praise of the work by those who have studied and performed it; but for our own part we found it to be an incoherent jumble of all that is uninteresting to us in music; an example of that phase of composition that is familiarly known as "pudding-stone music." A second or a third hearing of the work might possibly cause us to modify our objections to it, but we are convinced that no number of hearings could remove the impression that it is hideously ugly, a misconception of the end and aim of musical art, and of about as much interest as would be the mathematical calculations anent the latest transit of Venus, turned into verse. We have heard, on reliable authority, that one of the performers, during a recent rehearsal of the work, was so overcome by the emotions it excited in him that tears ran down his cheeks and trickled from his chin to his violin. To do away with any misconception regarding this sensitive lachrymosity, we hasten to state that these tears were born of steadily increasing admiration for the music, and not of pain. This would seem to indicate that there is more in the quartet than we discovered, but we are content with one experience of it, and have no irrepressible desire to explore it further. We presume that every justice was done the work by the players, Its difficulties are great. We could almost wish that they were insurmountable. The variations from the Beethoven quartet, op. 18, No. 5, were exquisitely read and performed. The concert ended with Beethoven's noble E-flat quartet, op. 74, which also had a perfect interpretation. As fine as the playing of the organization has been through the season, it has not surpassed the performance of this work. Mme. Joachim was cordially received, but as we have considered her singing at length in our notice of her own concert, we shall not dwell on it here.

On Tuesday evening the long-deferred concert by Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch was given in Chickering Hall. The audience was large and exceedingly friendly. Mrs. Nikisch sang three groups of songs, one consisting of selections from Schumann, Franz, Goldmark, Rungeit, and Heuberger; another being devoted wholly to Brahms, and the third presenting songs by Schumann, Tschaikowski, R. Strauss, Jensen, and R. de Koven. Both Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch were welcomed with great cordiality. Mrs. Nikisch has a large voice, of excellent compass and quality. Unfortunately, it has not been properly trained in a good vocal school, and the result is that her singing exemplifies almost everything that is to be avoided in her art. Her breathing is very badly managed, and every respiration is plainly heard—a grievous fault. Her tone production is nasal, and she frequently forces her voice to such an extent that her intonation becomes both explosive and false. Worst of all is her persistent and inartistic use of portamento, both up and down, which imparts a painfully unpleasing effect of wailing to her singing; and matters are not improved by her habit of attacking a note below its pitch and scooping up to it. She sings with much fire, but her style is monotonously violent, and is perfunctory rather than emotional in spirit. Even when she is most pleasing, she never seems to probe sympathetically to the heart of her music, and therefore leaves the hearts of her hearers untouched. In fact, her singing is rough and unrefined; but it is only fair to add that it is better and less crude in some minor essentials than it was when it was heard here before. Mr. Nikisch's playing of the accompaniments was exquisite in every way, and proved a wholly delightful element in the evening's entertainment. Both artists were frequently and stormily applauded. On the whole, however, the feature of the concert was the violin playing of Alexander Fiedmann, an interesting youngster with a face of fine intelligence. He is only twelve years of age, and is already an artist. He performed the Fantasie Caprice by Vieuxtemps, the adagio from Spohr's ninth concerto, and Hauser's Hungarian Rhapsody. His tone is remarkably large and pure, his bowing is masterly in its freedom and in its perfect command over the resources of the bow, and his technique is extraordinary in its development when his youth is taken into consideration. Now and then there was a slip in intonation, but it was owing to the smallness of the player's hand, and not to any fault of ear. He plays with dignity, modesty and perfect self-possession. He is not only a prodigy in technique, but he interprets as well as plays. He reflects an individuality of his own, and suggests in nothing that he is merely repeating a well-learned lesson; and so mature in spirit was all that he did, that there was no necessary allowance to be made for his youth, and he may be listened to with all of the respect that is due a full-fledged artist. In fact we have heard men violinists on our prominent concert stage who produce a smaller volume of tone, and who play with far less of skill and of innate art feeling than does this remarkable boy.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, MARCH 14, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the nineteenth Symphony concert, which was given Saturday evening in Music Hall, was as follows: Overture, "Leno re, No. 2." Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte No. 5, E flat, Beethoven; Schumann's Symphony No. 4 (original version). Mr. Eugen D'Albert was the pianist.

The manuscript of the original version of Schumann's D minor Symphony is owned by Johannes Brahms. He loaned it to Franz Wuellner of Cologne. It was played in that city in October, 1889, and there was so much talk about it that, under the editorship of Dr. Wuellner, it was published lately by Breitkouf & Haertel. Unfortunately for the student, the learned Brahms and Wuellner were not content with the Schumann version; they revised it, and in one or two instances they adopted the instrumentation of the later and familiar version. A week ago Saturday we heard Schumann's D minor Symphony as interpreted by Mr. Nikisch, full of exaggerations and even contradictions of the composer's expressly indicated wishes. Last Saturday we heard the Symphony in D minor, rejected by the composer and revised by Messrs. Brahms and Wuellner. It might now be a pleasure to hear Schumann's preferred version played with a due regard for his own directions.

It is true that in the first form of this symphony the instrumentation is clearer than it is in the second; for the instrumentation of Schumann's later period is not free from the reproach of muddiness. Nor, indeed, was the cunning mixing of orchestral tone colors ever a distinguishing feature of the genius of this composer. On the other hand, the thematic and contrapuntal alterations in the second version of 1851 are, as a rule, an improvement. In certain respects the performance of last Saturday was an improvement on that of a fortnight ago. The duties of the second violins and the violas were not passed over that the first violins might benefit thereby. The dynamic contrasts were more carefully observed. Schumann was evidently acquainted with fiery and "magnetic" conductors, for he wrote on the outer covering of the manuscript of 1841, "The sudden changes of piano and forte should be strictly observed." In the forte passages, however, there was at times a tendency to exaggerate, and Schumann's body was clothed in Hungarian dress. The dramatic overture of Beethoven was exceedingly well played.

Mr. D'Albert was most enthusiastically applauded after the concerto, and he played a rhapsody by Brahms. His performance of the concerto might justly excite gaudy words of extravagant praise, were it not that polychromatic adjectives would be at variance with the unsurpassable dignity of the occasion. It would be idle to speak of any technical display, for the supreme virtuosoship of Mr. D'Albert has been the wonder of his colleagues and the musical public ever since his first appearance in Germany. This virtuosoship was at first the plaything of his youth. The giant delighted in his strength. He abused it; so that often he smote the keys until the wires shrieked in agony. But now he seems to have fully mastered himself, the only task that remained for him. Saturday evening his mighty powers were used reverently in the service of Beethoven. The reading of the concerto was distinguished by its nobility. There was nothing common, mean or earthy. The soul of a great man was revealed, and the medium was content with the holy mission. Beethoven spoke. The pianist listened. He did not seek to interrupt, to contradict, to explain. He did not question any mood of the master. He accepted passion, tenderness, pride, arrogance, tumultuous joy, grotesque fancy. And it was as though D'Albert knew full well the value of the mavelous apostrophe of the Opium Eater to Shakspeare: "O mighty poet! Thy works are not as those of other men, simply and merely great works of art, but are also like the phenomena of nature, like the sun and the sea, the stars and the flowers, like frost and snow, rain and dew, hail storm and thunder, which are to be studied with entire submission of our own faculties, and in the perfect faith that in them there can be no too much or too little, nothing useless or inert, but that, the farther we press in our discoveries, the more we shall see proofs of design and self-supporting arrangement where the careless eye had seen nothing but accident!"

PHILIP HALE.

O.

re 3/10

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Those who attend the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday, March 16, will have the opportunity of hearing Eugen d'Albert, one of the greatest, if not the greatest, living player of the pianoforte. He was especially engaged by the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for twenty concerts, one of which is the coming concert in this city. Tickets will be placed on sale to-day at J. F. Ellis & Co.'s store.

WORLD, Baltimore, Md.

ate 3/11

The concert of all concerts, however, will be Thursday night, when Eugene D'Albert and the Boston symphony orchestra will appear at the Academy concert hall. D'Albert is one of the leading pianists of the world, and will be the greatest artist who has appeared at the symphony concerts this season.

---

edger, hiladelphia, Pa.

Date 3-11

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Arthur Nikisch, comes again to the Academy of Music on Monday evening. The programme is to comprise these numbers: Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," symphony (viola solo by Franz Kneisel), Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in E flat, No. 5 (Eugene D'Albert, soloist), Saint Saens's symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," and several piano solos for Mr. D'Albert.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy of Music, - Philadelphia,

Monday Evening, March 14, at 8.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

⑤

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets with reserved seats now on sale at 1119 Chestnut Street.

Congregational Church, - Corner Tenth and G Streets,

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE MUSIC COMMITTEE.

Wednesday Evening, March 16, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

④

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at J. F. Ellis & Co.'s, 937 Penna. Avenue.

Academy Concert Hall, - Baltimore,

Thursday Evening, March 17, at 8.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

⑤

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's ticket office, 13 North Charles Street.

Academy of Music, - Brooklyn.

Friday Afternoon, March 18, at 3 o'clock.
Saturday Evening, March 19, at 8.15 o'clock.

Under the auspices of the PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY OF BROOKLYN.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

⑤

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

[illegible]

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 14, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

The performance of the "Leonora" overture, which opened the concert of Saturday, was an epitome of the merits and defects of the Nikisch system. It was emphatically dramatic, and this, in a school of free overture of which Beethoven was, next to Gluck, the most earnest advocate, was a decided merit. We obtain now in our orchestral performances the virility which we have desired in previous years, and although it would be unjust to two conductors to allude to the fable of King Log and King Stork, it may be stated that we are getting too much of it. There was an abandon and a power in the performance that was refreshing, but the extreme exaggeration of the pauses, the ferocity of the kettledrum and the obliteration of the interior figures, were blemishes that are not to be condoned. Probably the last-named fault is the one most dangerous to the orchestra. In following any recent performance with a score one will see many figures and phrases with the eye which he will listen in vain for with the ear. The first violins overbalance the string quartette, and the brasses dominate the rest. The violas and second violins have seldom any prominence, and are often lost in the violent ensemble passages. Spite of these faults the overture was brilliant and exciting, the attacks of the orchestra more united than usual and the pizzicato of the contra basses almost as effective as the celebrated one which follows the horn quartette in the "Freischuetz" overture.

Then came the hero of the concert. Which is the bolder, a lion or a tiger? Which has the more delicious flavor, Johannisberger or Lacryma Christi? Answer these questions authoritatively and I can tell whether D'Albert eclipsed Paderewski or no. I can only compare D'Albert with D'Albert. In doing this I found the tone less resonant than heretofore and perhaps a trifle less sympathetic; but the performance of the "Emperor" concerto was one beyond and above criticism. Never a trace of exaggeration, never a suspicion of individuality! It was Beethoven pure and undefiled, not Beethoven spiced for an extra round of applause. The final rondo was a triumph of virtuosity, but of virtuosity applied to its proper end. At its termination there was recall after recall. The orchestra and its leader had a right to share in this triumph, for seldom has a concerto received more faithful orchestral treatment. But to give an encore-piece after the great work was a mistake; encores should never be allowed in these programmes, that is, if the programmes are made with any artistic ideal. There should be a certain homogeneity in a concert of this class, and any interpolated number does away with this. When the encore fiend is aided and abetted by conductor and soloist, it proves that the art of programme-making is undervalued or not understood. Any thoughtful auditor would have preferred to have had the impression of the concerto left undisturbed.

There is not enough of difference between the original version of Schumann's D minor symphony and its later revision to make it worth while to resuscitate the former; a few slight variations of development, and especially a fuller scoring, seem to be the chief points of change. The advantage is certainly on the side of the later version, although it may be pleaded that the first is clearer because of its rarer doubling of the parts. This advantage, however, if any, was lost by the tremendously forcible manner in which it was played, and the work seemed but a recapitulation of the symphony of the previous week so far as its general effect went. Brahms has not added much to the repertoire by fostering the performances of the version which Schumann discarded. It is not the first time that the Viennese master has dug up Schumann relics, for the very last theme that Schumann wrote, when his brain had practically given way, was a subject that he maintained had been communicated to him by spirits, and this sad reminder of an unsettled mind was made into piano variations by the phlegmatic musical heir.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Citizen, Brooklyn, N.Y.

Date 3-13

Fifth Symphony Rehearsal.

On Friday afternoon, March 18, commencing at 3 o'clock, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will give the fifth rehearsal of the present season at the Academy of Music, with Mr. Eugene D'Albert as piano soloist. Of the orchestra it is unnecessary to say one word. It has established its claim to be considered one of the most perfect musical organizations in the country, perhaps in the world. Eugene D'Albert is a pianist who possesses the finished technique of the modern school, wondrously combined with a wealth of poetic fancy which lends a charm to everything he attempts, no matter how hackneyed or commonplace. It is doubtful whether even Liszt himself at his best could make the piano both sing and talk so realistically as he.

The programme is as follows: Berlioz, symphony, "Harold in Italy," violin solo, Mr. Franz Kneisel. "Harold in the Mountains," scenes of melancholy, happiness and joy, Adagio, allegro. "March of the Pilgrims," singing the evening prayer, allegretto. "Serenade of a Mountaineer," allegro assai, allegretto. Orgy of the Brigands (recalling previous scenes), allegro frenetico. Beethoven, concerto for piano forte in E flat, No. 5—allegro, adagio, in poco mosso; allegro. Saint-Saens, symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d' Omphale;" solo for piano forte. Chopin, nocturne. Schubert, impromptu. Strauss-Tausig, valse, "Man Lebt Nur Einmal." Liszt, symphonic poem, "Les Preludes;" soloist, Mr. D'Albert.

Clipping from Citizen Brooklyn N.Y.

Date 3-12

The [illegible] Symphony Orchestra will give concerts under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at the Academy of Music. [illegible] Nikisch [illegible] D'Albert, the [illegible] The [illegible]

[illegible]

MONDAY, MARCH 14, 1892.

D'ALBERT AT MUSIC HALL.

The Great Pianist's Reappearance in this Country.

The principal feature of the 19th symphony concert Saturday evening was the reappearance in this country of Eugene D'Albert, the eminent pianist, whose position in his art is that of one of the greatest classic players of today, and one, in the opinion of many acute judges, having no rival among the younger players as a master in the rendition of the higher forms of piano composition. Mr. D'Albert chose for performance the great E flat concerto of Beethoven, a work the proper interpretation of which calls for powers of the loftiest character. Technically the work demands great facility of execution, but the player who possesses nothing more had best devote himself to less elevated material, for this work of the immortal master calls for a musician of noble qualities, devoid of sentimentality and devoted to a display of the composer's virtues rather than an exhibition of his own personality, made evident in a superficial, albeit a skilful, presentation of technical accomplishments. We have had enough and to spare of this latter, hence it was that on Saturday evening a deep sense of thankfulness and a high degree of gratification was experienced by the critical listener when Eugene D'Albert sat at the piano and in reverence to the master revealed the genius that emanates from every measure of this wonderful composition. It is unnecessary to observe that a technique knowing no limitations is at the command of Mr. D'Albert, and it remains to say only that his conception and interpretation were simply masterly in the highest sense that the term can imply. The listener had before him, from beginning to end of the performance, Beethoven in his most exalted form. The audience recognized this fact and recalled the player again and again after his masterly effort, who finally yielded to the overwhelming applause and responded with a performance of a Brahm's rhapsody.

As Mr. D'Albert established a positive tempo in each movement the orchestra followed with the accompaniment with fair success. At times it was overloud, and in some of the more delicate passages so beautifully played by Mr. D'Albert it was rather doubtful whether the concert was written for the piano or for the display of coarseness on the part of he wood-wind. Since Gericke's departure we have ceased expecting that the orchestra will prove to be a factor in enhancing the efforts of a skilful soloist by presenting an ensemble at once precise, discreet and subjective in every particular to the demands of the composition. To so control an orchestra requires an ability upon the part of the conductor that in my opinion Mr. Nikisch does not possess. At all events, so far it has not appeared, while on the contrary many bungling jobs can be recalled that would have been discreditable to any conductor who might by accident even be found in the position of conductor of the Symphony Orchestra.

The other numbers of the programme were "Leonora," overture No. 2, Beethoven, and the original version of Schumann's D minor symphony. In the performance of these works the strings played with commendable regard for the composer's indications, but the wind band was at spells as rank as ever, while the drummer spared no muscle in his efforts to o'ertop the din. There is no reason for a repetition of this original version of Schumann's No. 4 Symphony and it is to be hoped that it will remain undisturbed in the library of the orchestra in the future. The scoring of the familiar version gives our conductor a better opportunity for exaggeration, for it is fuller in places, hence we cannot see wherein the other is of value in the repertoire of the orchestra.

The Knabe Grand used on this occasion by Mr. D'Albert proved to be an exceptionally fine piano; a noble instrument in the hands of a masterly performer.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Eagle Brooklyn 3/11

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

On Friday afternoon and Saturday night the fifth rehearsal and concert in the Philharmonic series will be given at the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony orchestra. This splendid band will be heard in Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," a symphony that has not been played in Brooklyn for many years and that will disclose the rare gift for viola playing by Franz Kneisel; Saint Saens' symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," with its remarkable suggestion of a spinning wheel and Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes." The soloist will be Eugene d'Albert, a pianist with a surprising technique and keen insight. He has just returned to this country and at the rehearsal in Boston last Thursday the orchestra sprang to its feet and followed his performance with a "Hoch!" and the ratta. He will play Beethoven's E flat ("Emperor") concerto, a Chopin nocturne, one of Schubert's impromptus and Tausig's variations on the Strauss waltz, "Man Lives but Once." A remarkable and delightful concert is assured.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 14, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the nineteenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening was as follows:

Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 2.
Beethoven: Pianoforte concerto No. 5, in E-flat, op. 73.
Schumann: Symphony No. 4, in D minor (first version).

Mr. Eugen D'Albert was the pianist.

It was interesting to hear two "first versions" given at the same concert, and first versions, too, by men who were especially noted for subjecting their works to an elaborate process of retouching. Curiously enough, one finds that the changes made in both these works by their respective composers, in writing the second versions, are often of a very similar sort. It is reported that Schumann was prompted to make the second (generally accepted) version of his D minor symphony because of the poor quality of the wind in his orchestra at Düsseldorf, he having found that the wind players were not up to playing the frequent solo passages in the first version satisfactorily. Thus the second version was prepared mainly with an eye to giving prominence to no single wind instrument. But when Schumann once got to work on his second version he also made some changes of another sort, changes which may in general be described as of much the same nature as those made by Beethoven in writing the second version of his "Leonore" overture. (It should be remembered that the so-called overtures "No. 2" and "No. 3" are in reality the first and second versions. The so-called "No. 1" and "No. 4"—overture to "Fidelio"—have nothing to do with these; they were written later, on totally different thematic material.]

Now, the differences between the "Leonore" overtures Nos. 2 and 3, and between the first and second versions of Schumann's D minor symphony, consist largely in the suppression of a good deal of contrapuntal thematic work, and in fillingout long silences between crashing staccato chords for the full orchestra with melodic matter.

As for the "Leonore" overture, one can hardly feel any hesitation about much preferring the No. 3, in spite of Moscheles's opinion that the No. 2 was the "more perfect" of the pair. The immense improvement in the second theme, and in the development of the coda, the introduction of the beautiful slow passage from the prison-scene between the trumpet calls, and the superior conciseness and dramatic simplicity of the Durchführung, all contribute to make the No. 3 the finer and more titanic work. On the other hand, it would be hard to give the preference to either version of the Schumann symphony. Some of the changes made in the second are evidently improvements; but others are not.

Both overture and symphony were superbly played. We see no reason to change anything in what we wrote last week about Mr. Nikisch's "treatment" of the latter work, except to add that this treatment has the full and enthusiastic endorsement of Mme. Clara Schumann. But even this fact cannot change our feeling in the matter.

D'Albert's playing of the great Beethoven concerto was so absolutely magnificent, exhaustive and great that, having said this, one can find nothing more to say about it. It was a model at every point. He was four times recalled and played a rhapsody by Brahms wonderfully.

The next programme is: Brahms, Tragic Overture; Gluck, Aria from "Orpheus;" Gluck, Dance of blessed spirits and dance of furies, from "Orpheus;" songs with pianoforte; Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, in F. Mme. Amalie Joachim will be the singer.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 15, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

D'Albert Plays With the Boston Orchestra at the Academy.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening was of unusual dignity and importance. It opened with a very poetical and extraordinarily skilful performance of Berlioz's "Harold" symphony. The strange beauty of this remarkable work, its originality of invention and variety of incident and the nervous sentiment that runs through it all, were interpreted with admirable feeling and with a refinement of execution that could hardly be excelled. Mr. Kneisel's rather pale and passionless style gives scarcely full effect to the tenor obligato, and Berlioz would probably have wanted more fire both here and in the finale, but in technical detail Mr. Kneisel's work commanded admiration and the whole performance was a treat to be accepted without cavil.

Following immediately upon this came the glorious E flat concerto of Beethoven, with D'Albert at the piano. Of all the pianists we have lately heard there is none whose style is at once so fine and so large and noble. There is no affectation of novelty or parade of personal peculiarities, but just a big, firm, full and splendid execution of one of the greatest of all piano compositions. The power of the man is prodigious and his skill consummate, but power and skill are held in absolute mastery and applied to the intellectual interpretation of the music with a classic dignity that made this noble concerto an unalloyed delight. The orchestra seemed to gain inspiration from the piano. It has never played with greater fervor and rarely with so magnificent a tone.

The concerto was followed by a particularly bright and richly-colored rendering of Saint-Saens' "Rouet d'Omphale," after which D'Albert played a group of solos, the Chopin berceuse, a Schubert impromptu and Tausig's telling arrangement of a Strauss waltz. His touch in the berceuse was delightfully delicate and fluent, and the last selection was a marvelous tour-de-force, which was even excelled on a recall, when he came back and played Rubinstein's staccato etude with dazzling brilliancy and overwhelming power. Orchestral selections from Grieg and Wagner closed a concert on which Mr. Nikisch is to be sincerely congratulated.

[illegible]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

An audience so large as to crowd it in every part occupied the auditorium of the Academy of Music last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave the fifth concert of the current series. The programme was larger than usual and more than ordinarily varied. It included two symphonies, with obligato parts for solo instruments, namely, Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" and Beethoven's great pianoforte concerto, that in E flat, known as the "Emperor," and in addition there were Saint-Saens' "Rouet d'Omphale, the slow movement from Grieg's "Peer Gynt," some pianoforte music and Wagner's tempestuous "Huldigung's March." Every amateur will recognize this at once as a very interesting arrangement, and probably no concert of the season has afforded its audience a larger measure of enjoyment. It was all beautifully done. The Berlioz music is rather wearying, as music is apt to be which attempts to do more than it is within the province of the art to accomplish; but it is distinguished by the vivid and fantastic fancy and by the power of poetic suggestion which are the chief merits, and the salient characteristics of Berlioz' score and its obligato for the viola said to have been written for Pagsuini is both attractive and important. It was very skilfully delivered by Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concertmaster, who seemed as familiar with the longer stopping of the viola as with that of his accustomed instrument, and whose arpeggio playing in harmonics, the extreme difficulty of which few could have suspected, was marvellously fine. Mr. Kneisel produced a lovely quality of tone, but its volume might with advantage have been larger, while the viola which he used was so mellow as to render the mute unnecessary. The chief feature of the concert, however, was the performance of the Beethoven concerto, which as regards both orchestra and piano the writer has never heard excelled. Mr. Eugen D'Albert, who was the soloist, played with a breadth of manner, a dignity and virility of sentiment, a brilliancy of execution and a lucidity of intelligence which rendered his interpretation wholly enjoyable and altogether satisfying, and made it worthy of one of the very greatest of musical compositions. The audience recognized this by repeated rounds of applause, and afterwards Mr. D'Albert showed his versatility by the beautiful delicacy of touch and subtlety of feeling with which he rendered a Chopin nocturne and one of the Schubert impromptus. He made a deeply favorable impression. In the concerto he was finely supported by the orchestra, whose virtuosity was again strikingly displayed in a flawless rendering of Saint-Saens' bizarre and brilliant "Rouet d'Omphale." The concert closed with a vigorous performance of Wagner's rather labored "Huldigung's March."

Philadelphia Inquirer

TUESDAY, MARCH 15, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Eugen D'Albert Makes a Splendid Impression at the Academy.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night was in many respects the most delightful of the season. What rendered it particularly interesting was the piano playing of Mr. Eugen D'Albert, who created such a favorable impression here three years ago, when he appeared in conjunction with Sarasate, the violinist. The piece de resistance last night was Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, No. 5. This is one of the great composer's best works, somewhat restricted in theme, but broad in its treatment, calling for masterly technique and the most intelligent comprehension. The artist's appearance has changed somewhat since he was here last. He has grown stouter and has shorn his locks. Few men look less musical and few are better performers. It is a pleasure to see this man play, as well as to listen to his music. There is no effort at making an impression. He does not try to impress you with the fact that he has an interpretation different from the composer and that it is the best one. Utterly devoid of pretense, he is a great performer. He plays the music as it appears in the standard editions. He is not the composer nor his apostle. He is a performer. Divested of all the clap-trap so common among great artist, he appears before us not, indeed, as an automaton but as an intelligent artist.

The Beethoven concerto has never been heard to better advantage. He grasped the subject at once and paid no attention to anything else. His technique is unexcelled and his comprehension is certainly adequate. We have heard Beethoven recently interpreted by another great artist and not to our entire satisfaction. D'Albert can play Beethoven with as great satisfaction as any artist who has ever been here since Rubenstein. From beginning to end the concerto was played with masterly skill. Those who had the standard score before them saw that he made no attempt at pyrotechnics or individual variations. It was one of the most delightful pieces of work of the decade. Nor did the artist appear to less advantage in the shorter numbers by Chopin, Schubert and Strauss-Tausig.

The orchestral number of chief interest was the Berlioz symphony, "Harold in Italy," a dainty piece of work just suited to the orchestra and conductor. The other numbers were Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale," one portion of the "Peer Gynt" suite and the Huldigung March by Wagner. Nor should this close without a tribute to the orchestral work in accompanying the Beethoven concerto. Whatever may be the diverse opinions as to this organization's limitations, it is the best this country has ever known for accompanying a soloist. And this is by no means a small matter. To properly set a background for a soloist is perhaps the highest work a full orchestra can do, and certainly Mr. Nikisch leaves nothing to be desired in this respect.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 14, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

The performance of the "Leonora" overture, which opened the concert of Saturday, was an epitome of the merits and defects of the Nikisch system. It was emphatically dramatic, and this, in a school of free overture of which Beethoven was, next to Gluck, the most earnest advocate, was a decided merit. We obtain now in our orchestral performances the virility which we have desired in previous years, and although it would be unjust to two conductors to allude to the fable of King Log and King Stork, it may be stated that we are getting too much of it. There was an abandon and a power in the performance that was refreshing, but the extreme exaggeration of the pauses, the ferocity of the kettledrum and the obliteration of the interior figures, were blemishes that are not to be condoned. Probably the last-named fault is the one most dangerous to the orchestra. In following any recent performance with a score one will see many figures and phrases with the eye which he will listen in vain for with the ear. The first violins overbalance the string quartette, and the brasses dominate the rest. The violas and second violins have seldom any prominence, and are often lost in the violent ensemble passages. Spite of these faults the overture was brilliant and exciting, the attacks of the orchestra more united than usual and the pizzicato of the contra basses almost as effective as the celebrated one which follows the horn quartette in the "Freischuetz" overture.

Then came the hero of the concert. Which is the bolder, a lion or a tiger? Which has the more delicious flavor, Johannisberger or Lacryma Christi? Answer these questions authoritatively and I can tell whether D'Albert eclipsed Paderewski or no. I can only compare D'Albert with D'Albert. In doing this I found the tone less resonant than heretofore and perhaps a trifle less sympathetic; but the performance of the "Emperor" concerto was one beyond and above criticism. Never a trace of exaggeration, never a suspicion of individuality! It was Beethoven pure and undefiled, not Beethoven spiced for an extra round of applause. The final rondo was a triumph of virtuosity, but of virtuosity applied to its proper end. At its termination there was recall after recall. The orchestra and its leader had a right to share in this triumph, for seldom has a concerto received more faithful orchestral treatment. But to give an encore-piece after the great work was a mistake; encores should never be allowed in these programmes, that is, if the programmes are made with any artistic ideal. There should be a certain homogeneity in a concert of this class, and any interpolated number does away with this. When the encore fiend is aided and abetted by conductor and soloist, it proves that the art of programme-making is undervalued or not understood. Any thoughtful auditor would have preferred to have had the impression of the concerto left undisturbed.

There is not enough of difference between the original version of Schumann's D minor symphony and its later revision to make it worth while to resuscitate the former; a few slight variations of development, and especially a fuller scoring, seem to be the chief points of change. The advantage is certainly on the side of the later version, although it may be pleaded that the first is clearer because of its rarer doubling of the parts. This advantage, however, if any, was lost by the tremendously forcible manner in which it was played, and the work seemed but a recapitulation of the symphony of the previous week so far as its general effect went. Brahms has not added much to the repertoire by fostering the performances of the version which Schumann discarded. It is not the first time that the Viennese master has dug up Schumann relics, for the very last theme that Schumann wrote, when his brain had practically given way, was a subject that he maintained had been communicated to him by spirits, and this sad reminder of an unsettled mind was made into piano variations by the phlegmatic musical heir.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Citizen, Brooklyn, N.Y.

Date 3-13

Fifth Symphony Rehearsal.

On Friday afternoon, March 18, commencing at 3 o'clock, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will give the fifth rehearsal of the present season at the Academy of Music, with Mr. Eugene D'Albert as piano soloist. Of the orchestra it is unnecessary to say one word. It has established its claim to be considered one of the most perfect musical organizations in the country, perhaps in the world. Eugene D'Albert is a pianist who possesses the finished technique of the modern school, wondrously combined with a wealth of poetic fancy which lends a charm to everything he attempts, no matter how hackneyed or commonplace. It is doubtful whether even Liszt himself at his best could make the piano both sing and talk so realistically as he.

The programme is as follows: Berlioz, symphony, "Harold in Italy," violin solo, Mr. Franz Kneisel. "Harold in the Mountains," scenes of melancholy, happiness and joy, Adagio, allegro. "March of the Pilgrims," singing the evening prayer, allegretto. "Serenade of a Mountaineer," allegro assai, allegretto. Orgy of the Brigands (recalling previous scenes), allegro frenetico. Beethoven, concerto for piano forte in E flat, No. 5—allegro, adagio, in poco mosso; allegro. Saint-Saens, symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d' Omphale;" solo for piano forte. Chopin, nocturne. Schubert, impromptu. Strauss-Tausig, valse, "Man Lebt Nur Einmal." Liszt, symphonic poem, "Les Preludes;" soloist, Mr. D' Albert.

Clipping from Citizen Brooklyn N.Y.

Date 3-12

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give concerts under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at the Academy of Music. Arthur Nikisch will conduct and D'Albert, the well-known pianist, will be the soloist. The sale of seats is in progress at Chandler's.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, MARCH 14, 1892.

D'ALBERT AT MUSIC HALL

The Great Pianist's Reappearance in this Country.

The principal feature of the 19th symphony concert Saturday evening was the reappearance in this country of Eugene D'Albert, the eminent pianist, whose position in his art is that of one of the greatest classic players of today, and one, in the opinion of many acute judges, having no rival among the younger players as a master in the rendition of the higher forms of piano composition, Mr. D'Albert chose for performance the great E flat concerto of Beethoven, a work the proper interpretation of which calls for powers of the loftiest character. Technically the work demands great facility of execution, but the player who possesses nothing more had best devote himself to less elevated material, for this work of the immortal master calls for a musician of noble qualities, devoid of sentimentality and devoted to a display of the composer's virtues rather than an exhibition of his own personality, made evident in a superficial, albeit a skilful, presentation of technical accomplishments. We have had enough and to spare of this latter, hence it was that on Saturday evening a deep sense of thankfulness and a high degree of gratification was experienced by the critical listener when Eugene D'Albert sat at the piano and in reverence to the master revealed the genius that emanates from every measure of this wonderful composition. It is unnecessary to observe that a technique knowing no limitations is at the command of Mr. D'Albert, and it remains to say only that his conception and interpretation were simply masterly in the highest sense that the term can imply. The listener had before him, from beginning to end of the performance, Beethoven in his most exalted form. The audience recognized this fact and recalled the player again and again after his masterly effort, who finally yielded to the overwhelming applause and responded with a performance of a Brahm's rhapsody.

As Mr. D'Albert established a positive tempo in each movement the orchestra followed with the accompaniment with fair success. At times it was overloud, and in some of the more delicate passages so beautifully played by Mr. D'Albert it was rather doubtful whether the concert was written for the piano or for the display of coarseness on the part of he wood-wind. Since Gericke's departure we have ceased expecting that the orchestra will prove to be a factor in enhancing the efforts of a skilful soloist by presenting an ensemble at once precise, discreet and subjective in every particular to the demands of the composition. To so control an orchestra requires an ability upon the part of the conductor that in my opinion Mr. Nikisch does not possess. At all events, so far it has not appeared, while on the contrary many bungling jobs can be recalled that would have been discreditable to any conductor who might by accident even be found in the position of conductor of the Symphony Orchestra.

The other numbers of the programme were "Leonora," overture No. 2, Beethoven, and the original version of Schumann's D minor symphony. In the performance of these works the strings played with commendable regard for the composer's indications, but the wind band was at spells as rank as ever, while the drummer spared no muscle in his efforts to o'ertop the din. There is no reason for a repetition of this original version of Schumann's No. 4 Symphony and it is to be hoped that it will remain undisturbed in the library of the orchestra in the future. The scoring of the familiar version gives our conductor a better opportunity for exaggeration, for it is fuller in places, hence we cannot see wherein the other is of value in the repertoire of the orchestra.

The Knabe Grand used on this occasion by Mr. D'Albert proved to be an exceptionally fine piano; a noble instrument in the hands of a masterly performer.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Eagle Brooklyn

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

On Friday afternoon and Saturday night the fifth rehearsal and concert in the Philharmonic series will be given at the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony orchestra. This splendid band will be heard in Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," a symphony that has not been played in Brooklyn for many years and that will disclose the rare gift for viola playing by Franz Kneisel; Saint Saens' symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," with its remarkable suggestion of a spinning wheel and Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes." The soloist will be Eugene d'Albert, a pianist with a surprising technique and keen insight. He has just returned to this country and at the rehearsal in Boston last Thursday the orchestra sprang to its feet and followed his performance with a "Hoch!" and the ratta. He will play Beethoven's E flat ("Emperor") concerto, a Chopin nocturne, one of Schubert's impromptus and Tausig's variations on the Strauss waltz, "Man Lives but Once." A remarkable and delightful concert is assured.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 14, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the nineteenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening was as follows:

Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 2.
Beethoven: Pianoforte concerto No. 5, in E-flat, op. 73.
Schumann: Symphony No. 4, in D minor (first version).

Mr. Eugen D'Albert was the pianist.

It was interesting to hear two "first versions" given at the same concert, and first versions, too, by men who were especially noted for subjecting their works to an elaborate process of retouching. Curiously enough, one finds that the changes made in both these works by their respective composers, in writing the second versions, are often of a very similar sort. It is reported that Schumann was prompted to make the second (generally accepted) version of his D minor symphony because of the poor quality of the wind in his orchestra at Düsseldorf, he having found that the wind players were not up to playing the frequent solo passages in the first version satisfactorily. Thus the second version was prepared mainly with an eye to giving prominence to no single wind instrument. But when Schumann once got to work on his second version he also made some changes of another sort, changes which may in general be described as of much the same nature as those made by Beethoven in writing the second version of his "Leonore" overture. (It should be remembered that the so-called overtures "No. 2" and "No. 3" are in reality the first and second versions. The so-called "No. 1" and "No. 4"—overture to "Fidelio"—have nothing to do with these; they were written later, on totally different thematic material.1

Now, the differences between the "Leonore" overtures Nos. 2 and 3, and between the first and second versions of Schumann's D minor symphony, consist largely in the suppression of a good deal of contrapuntal thematic work, and in filling out long silences between crashing staccato chords for the full orchestra with melodic matter.

As for the "Leonore" overture, one can hardly feel any hesitation about much preferring the No. 3, in spite of Moscheles's opinion that the No. 2 was the "more perfect" of the pair. The immense improvement in the second theme, and in the development of the coda, the introduction of the beautiful slow passage from the prison-scene between the trumpet calls, and the superior conciseness and dramatic simplicity of the Durchführung, all contribute to make the No. 3 the finer and more titanic work. On the other hand, it would be hard to give the preference to either version of the Schumann symphony. Some of the changes made in the second are evidently improvements; but others are not.

Both overture and symphony were superbly played. We see no reason to change anything in what we wrote last week about Mr. Nikisch's "treatment" of the latter work, except to add that this treatment has the full and enthusiastic endorsement of Mme. Clara Schumann. But even this fact cannot change our feeling in the matter.

D'Albert's playing of the great Beethoven concerto was so absolutely magnificent, exhaustive and great that, having said this, one can find nothing more to say about it. It was a model at every point. He was four times recalled and played a rhapsody by Brahms wonderfully.

The next programme is: Brahms, Tragic Overture; Gluck, Aria from "Orpheus;" Gluck, Dance of blessed spirits and dance of furies, from "Orpheus;" songs with pianoforte; Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, in F. Mme. Amalie Joachim will be the singer.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 15, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

D'Albert Plays With the Boston Orchestra at the Academy.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening was of unusual dignity and importance. It opened with a very poetical and extraordinarily skilful performance of Berlioz's "Harold" symphony. The strange beauty of this remarkable work, its originality of invention and variety of incident and the nervous sentiment that runs through it all, were interpreted with admirable feeling and with a refinement of execution that could hardly be excelled. Mr. Kneisel's rather pale and passionless style gives scarcely full effect to the tenor obligato, and Berlioz would probably have wanted more fire both here and in the finale, but in technical detail Mr. Kneisel's work commanded admiration and the whole performance was a treat to be accepted without cavil.

Following immediately upon this came the glorious E flat concerto of Beethoven, with D'Albert at the piano. Of all the pianists we have lately heard there is none whose style is at once so fine and so large and noble. There is no affectation of novelty or parade of personal peculiarities, but just a big, firm, full and splendid execution of one of the greatest of all piano compositions. The power of the man is prodigious and his skill consummate, but power and skill are held in absolute mastery and applied to the intellectual interpretation of the music with a classic dignity that made this noble concerto an unalloyed delight. The orchestra seemed to gain inspiration from the piano. It has never played with greater fervor and rarely with so magnificent a tone.

The concerto was followed by a particularly bright and richly-colored rendering of Saint-Saens' "Rouet d'Omphale," after which D'Albert played a group of solos, the Chopin berceuse, a Schubert impromptu and Tausig's telling arrangement of a Strauss waltz. His touch in the berceuse was delightfully delicate and fluent, and the last selection was a marvelous tour-de-force, which was even excelled on a recall, when he came back and played Rubinstein's staccato etude with dazzling brilliancy and overwhelming power. Orchestral selections from Grieg and Wagner closed a concert on which Mr. Nikisch is to be sincerely congratulated.

The North American

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

An audience so large as to crowd it in every part occupied the auditorium of the Academy of Music last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave the fifth concert of the current series. The programme was larger than usual and more than ordinarily varied. It included two symphonies, with obligato parts for solo instruments, namely, Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" and Beethoven's great pianoforte concerto, that in E flat, known as the "Emperor," and in addition there were Saint-Saens' "Rouet d'Omphale, the slow movement from Grieg's "Peer Gynt," some pianoforte music and Wagner's tempestuous "Huldigung's March." Every amateur will recognize this at once as a very interesting arrangement, and probably no concert of the season has afforded its audience a larger measure of enjoyment. It was all beautifully done. The Berlioz music is rather wearying, as music is apt to be which attempts to do more than it is within the province of the art to accomplish; but it is distinguished by the vivid and fantastic fancy and by the power of poetic suggestion which are the chief merits, and the salient characteristics of Berlioz' score and its obligato for the viola said to have been written for Pagsuini is both attractive and important. It was very skilfully delivered by Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concertmaster, who seemed as familiar with the longer stopping of the viola as with that of his accustomed instrument, and whose arpeggio playing in harmonics, the extreme difficulty of which few could have suspected, was marvellously fine. Mr. Kneisel produced a lovely quality of tone, but its volume might with advantage have been larger, while the viola which he used was so mellow as to render the mute unnecessary. The chief feature of the concert, however, was the performance of the Beethoven concerto, which as regards both orchestra and piano the writer has never heard excelled. Mr. Eugen D'Albert, who was the soloist, played with a breadth of manner, a dignity and virility of sentiment, a brilliancy of execution and a lucidity of intelligence which rendered his interpretation wholly enjoyable and altogether satisfying, and made it worthy of one of the very greatest of musical compositions. The audience recognized this by repeated rounds of applause, and afterwards Mr. D'Albert showed his versatility by the beautiful delicacy of touch and subtlety of feeling with which he rendered a Chopin nocturne and one of the Schubert impromptus. He made a deeply favorable impression. In the concerto he was finely supported by the orchestra, whose virtuosity was again strikingly displayed in a flawless rendering of Saint-Saens' bizarre and brilliant "Rouet d'Omphale." The concert closed with a vigorous performance of Wagner's rather labored "Hulchgung's March."

Philadelphia Inquirer

TUESDAY, MARCH 15, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Eugen D'Albert Makes a Splendid Impression at the Academy.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night was in many respects the most delightful of the season. What rendered it particularly interesting was the piano playing of Mr. Eugen D'Albert, who created such a favorable impression here three years ago, when he appeared in conjunction with Sarasate, the violinist. The piece de resistance last night was Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, No. 5. This is one of the great composer's best works, somewhat restricted in theme, but broad in its treatment, calling for masterly technique and the most intelligent comprehension. The artist's appearance has changed somewhat since he was here last. He has grown stouter and has shorn his locks. Few men look less musical and few are better performers. It is a pleasure to see this man play, as well as to listen to his music. There is no effort at making an impression. He does not try to impress you with the fact that he has an interpretation different from the composer and that it is the best one. Utterly devoid of pretense, he is a great performer. He plays the music as it appears in the standard editions. He is not the composer nor his apostle. He is a performer. Divested of all the clap-trap so common among great artist, he appears before us not, indeed, as an automaton but as an intelligent artist.

The Beethoven concerto has never been heard to better advantage. He grasped the subject at once and paid no attention to anything else. His technique is unexcelled and his comprehension is certainly adequate. We have heard Beethoven recently interpreted by another great artist and not to our entire satisfaction. D'Albert can play Beethoven with as great satisfaction as any artist who has ever been here since Rubenstein. From beginning to end the concerto was played with masterly skill. Those who had the standard score before them saw that he made no attempt at pyrotechnics or individual variations. It was one of the most delightful pieces of work of the decade. Nor did the artist appear to less advantage in the shorter numbers by Chopin, Schubert and Strauss-Taussig.

The orchestral number of chief interest was the Berlioz symphony, "Harold in Italy," a dainty piece of work just suited to the orchestra and conductor. The other numbers were Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale," one portion of the "Reer Gynt" suite and the Huldigung March by Wagner. Nor should this close without a tribute to the orchestral work in accompanying the Beethoven concerto. Whatever may be the diverse opinions as to this organization's limitations, it is the best this country has ever known for accompanying a soloist. And this is by no means a small matter. To properly set a background for a soloist is perhaps the highest work a full orchestra can do, and certainly Mr. Nikisch leaves nothing to be desired in this respect.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 14, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

The performance of the "Leonora" overture, which opened the concert of Saturday, was an epitome of the merits and defects of the Nikisch system. It was emphatically dramatic, and this, in a school of free overture of which Beethoven was, next to Gluck, the most earnest advocate, was a decided merit. We obtain now in our orchestral performances the virility which we have desired in previous years, and although it would be unjust to two conductors to allude to the fable of King Log and King Stork, it may be stated that we are getting too much of it. There was an abandon and a power in the performance that was refreshing, but the extreme exaggeration of the pauses, the ferocity of the kettledrum and the obliteration of the interior figures, were blemishes that are not to be condoned. Probably the last-named fault is the one most dangerous to the orchestra. In following any recent performance with a score one will see many figures and phrases with the eye which he will listen in vain for with the ear. The first violins overbalance the string quartette, and the brasses dominate the rest. The violas and second violins have seldom any prominence, and are often lost in the violent ensemble passages. Spite of these faults the overture was brilliant and exciting, the attacks of the orchestra more united than usual and the pizzicato of the contra basses almost as effective as the celebrated one which follows the horn quartette in the "Freischuetz" overture.

Then came the hero of the concert. Which is the bolder, a lion or a tiger? Which has the more delicious flavor, Johannisberger or Lacryma Christi? Answer these questions authoritatively and I can tell whether D'Albert eclipsed Paderewski or no. I can only compare D'Albert with D'Albert. In doing this I found the tone less resonant than heretofore and perhaps a trifle less sympathetic; but the performance of the "Emperor" concerto was one beyond and above criticism. Never a trace of exaggeration, never a suspicion of individuality! It was Beethoven pure and undefiled, not Beethoven spiced for an extra round of applause. The final rondo was a triumph of virtuosity, but of virtuosity applied to its proper end. At its termination there was recall after recall. The orchestra and its leader had a right to share in this triumph, for seldom has a concerto received more faithful orchestral treatment. But to give an encore-piece after the great work was a mistake; encores should never be allowed in these programmes, that is, if the programmes are made with any artistic ideal. There should be a certain homogeneity in a concert of this class, and any interpolated number does away with this. When the encore fiend is aided and abetted by conductor and soloist, it proves that the art of programme-making is undervalued or not understood. Any thoughtful auditor would have preferred to have had the impression of the concerto left undisturbed.

There is not enough of difference between the original version of Schumann's D minor symphony and its later revision to make it worth while to resuscitate the former; a few slight variations of development, and especially a fuller scoring, seem to be the chief points of change. The advantage is certainly on the side of the later version, although it may be pleaded that the first is clearer because of its rarer doubling of the parts. This advantage, however, if any, was lost by the tremendously forcible manner in which it was played, and the work seemed but a recapitulation of the symphony of the previous week so far as its general effect went. Brahms has not added much to the repertoire by fostering the performances of the version which Schumann discarded. It is not the first time that the Viennese master has dug up Schumann relics, for the very last theme that Schumann wrote, when his brain had practically given way, was a subject that he maintained had been communicated to him by spirits, and this sad reminder of an unsettled mind was made into piano variations by the phlegmatic musical heir.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Citizen, Brooklyn, N.Y.
Date 3-13

Fifth Symphony Rehearsal.

On Friday afternoon, March 18, commencing at 3 o'clock, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will give the fifth rehearsal of the present season at the Academy of Music, with Mr. Eugene D'Albert as piano soloist. Of the orchestra it is unnecessary to say one word. It has established its claim to be considered one of the most perfect musical organizations in the country, perhaps in the world. Eugene D'Albert is a pianist who possesses the finished technique of the modern school, wondrously combined with a wealth of poetic fancy which lends a charm to everything he attempts, no matter how hacknered or commonplace. It is doubtful whether even Liszt himself at his best could make the piano both sing and talk so realistically as he.

The programme is as follows: Berlioz, symphony, "Harold in Italy," violin solo, Mr. Franz Kneisel. "Harold in the Mountains," scenes of melancholy, happiness and joy, Adagio, allegro. "March of the Pilgrims," singing the evening prayer, allegretto. "Serenade of a Mountaineer," allegro assai, allegretto. Orgy of the Brigands (recalling previous scenes), allegro frenetico. Beethoven, concerto for piano forte in E flat, No. 5—allegro, adagio, in poco mosso; allegro. Saint-Saens, symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d' Omphale;" solo for piano forte. Chopin, nocturne. Schubert, impromptu. Strauss-Tausig, valse, "Man Lebt Nur Einmal." Liszt, symphonic poem, "Les Preludes;" soloist, Mr. D' Albert.

Clipping from Citizen Brooklyn N.Y.
Date 3-12

The ~~Boston~~ Symphony Orchestra will give concerts ~~under the auspices of the~~ Philharmonic Society on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at the Academy of Music. Arthur Nikisch will conduct and D'Albert, the well-known pianist, will be the soloist. The sale of seats is in progress at Chandler's.

Boston Daily Traveller
MONDAY, MARCH 14, 1892.

D'ALBERT AT MUSIC HALL.

The Great Pianist's Reappearance in this Country.

The principal feature of the 19th symphony concert Saturday evening was the reappearance in this country of Eugene D'Albert, the eminent pianist, whose position in his art is that of one of the greatest classic players of today, and one, in the opinion of many acute judges, having no rival among the younger players as a master in the rendition of the higher forms of piano composition, Mr. D'Albert chose for performance the great E flat concerto of Beethoven, a work the proper interpretation of which calls for powers of the loftiest character. Technically the work demands great facility of execution, but the player who possesses nothing more had best devote himself to less elevated material, for this work of the immortal master calls for a musician of noble qualities, devoid of sentimentality and devoted to a display of the composer's virtues rather than an exhibition of his own personality, made evident in a superficial, albeit a skilful, presentation of technical accomplishments. We have had enough and to spare of this latter, hence it was that on Saturday evening a deep sense of thankfulness and a high degree of gratification was experienced by the critical listener when Eugene D'Albert sat at the piano and in reverence to the master revealed the genius that emanates from every measure of this wonderful composition. It is unnecessary to observe that a technique knowing no limitations is at the command of Mr. D'Albert, and it remains to say only that his conception and interpretation were simply masterly in the highest sense that the term can imply. The listener had before him, from beginning to end of the performance, Beethoven in his most exalted form. The audience recognized this fact and recalled the player again and again after his masterly effort, who finally yielded to the overwhelming applause and responded with a performance of a Brahm's rhapsody.

As Mr. D'Albert established a positive tempo in each movement the orchestra followed with the accompaniment with fair success. At times it was overloud, and in some of the more delicate passages so beautifully played by Mr. D'Albert it was rather doubtful whether the concert was written for the piano or for the display of coarseness on the part of he wood-wind. Since Gericke's departure we have ceased expecting that the orchestra will prove to be a factor in enhancing the efforts of a skilful soloist by presenting an ensemble at once precise, discreet and subjective in every particular to the demands of the composition. To so control an orchestra requires an ability upon the part of the conductor that in my opinion Mr. Nikisch does not possess. At all events, so far it has not appeared, while on the contrary many bungling jobs can be recalled that would have been discreditable to any conductor who might by accident even be found in the position of conductor of the Symphony Orchestra.

The other numbers of the programme were "Leonora," overture No. 2, Beethoven, and the original version of Schumann's D minor symphony. In the performance of these works the strings played with commendable regard for the composer's indications, but the wind band was at spells as rank as ever, while the drummer spared no muscle in his efforts to o'ertop the din. There is no reason for a repetition of this original version of Schumann's No. 4 Symphony and it is to be hoped that it will remain undisturbed in the library of the orchestra in the future. The scoring of the familiar version gives our conductor a better opportunity for exaggeration, for it is fuller in places, hence we cannot see wherein the other is of value in the repertoire of the orchestra.

The Knabe Grand used on this occasion by Mr. D'Albert proved to be an exceptionally fine piano; a noble instrument in the hands of a masterly performer.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Eagle Brooklyn

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

On Friday afternoon and Saturday night the fifth rehearsal and concert in the Philharmonic series will be given at the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony orchestra. This splendid band will be heard in Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," a symphony that has not been played in Brooklyn for many years and that will disclose the rare gift for viola playing by Franz Kneisel: Saint Saens' symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," with its remarkable suggestion of a spinning wheel and Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes." The soloist will be Eugene d'Albert, a pianist with a surprising technique and keen insight. He has just returned to this country and at the rehearsal in Boston last Thursday the orchestra sprang to its feet and followed his performance with a "Hoch!" and the ratta. He will play Beethoven's E flat ("Emperor") concerto, a Chopin nocturne, one of Schubert's impromptus and Tausig's variations on the Strauss waltz, "Man Lives but Once." A remarkable and delightful concert is assured.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, MARCH 14, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the nineteenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven:	Overture to "Leonore," No. 2.
Beethoven:	Pianoforte concerto No. 5, in E-flat, op. 73.
Schumann:	Symphony No. 4, in D minor (first version).

Mr. Eugen D'Albert was the pianist.

It was interesting to hear two "first versions" given at the same concert, and first versions, too, by men who were especially noted for subjecting their works to an elaborate process of retouching. Curiously enough, one finds that the changes made in both these works by their respective composers, in writing the second versions, are often of a very similar sort. It is reported that Schumann was prompted to make the second (generally accepted) version of his D minor symphony because of the poor quality of the wind in his orchestra at Düsseldorf, he having found that the wind players were not up to playing the frequent solo passages in the first version satisfactorily. Thus the second version was prepared mainly with an eye to giving prominence to no single wind instrument. But when Schumann once got to work on his second version he also made some changes of another sort, changes which may in general be described as of much the same nature as those made by Beethoven in writing the second version of his "Leonore" overture. (It should be remembered that the so-called overtures "No. 2" and "No. 3" are in reality the first and second versions. The so-called "No. 1" and "No. 4"—overture to "Fidelio"—have nothing to do with these; they were written later, on totally different thematic material.1

Now, the differences between the "Leonore" overtures Nos. 2 and 3, and between the first and second versions of Schumann's D minor symphony, consist largely in the suppression of a good deal of contrapuntal thematic work, and in filling out long silences between crashing staccato chords for the full orchestra with melodic matter.

As for the "Leonore" overture, one can hardly feel any hesitation about much preferring the No. 3, in spite of Moscheles's opinion that the No. 2 was the "more perfect" of the pair. The immense improvement in the second theme, and in the development of the coda, the introduction of the beautiful slow passage from the prison-scene between the trumpet calls, and the superior conciseness and dramatic simplicity of the Durchführung, all contribute to make the No. 3 the finer and more titanic work. On the other hand, it would be hard to give the preference to either version of the Schumann symphony. Some of the changes made in the second are evidently improvements; but others are not.

Both overture and symphony were superbly played. We see no reason to change anything in what we wrote last week about Mr. Nikisch's "treatment" of the latter work, except to add that this treatment has the full and enthusiastic endorsement of Mme. Clara Schumann. But even this fact cannot change our feeling in the matter.

D'Albert's playing of the great Beethoven concerto was so absolutely magnificent, exhaustive and great that, having said this, one can find nothing more to say about it. It was a model at every point. He was four times recalled and played a rhapsody by Brahms wonderfully.

The next programme is: Brahms, Tragic Overture; Gluck, Aria from "Orpheus;" Gluck, Dance of blessed spirits and dance of furies, from "Orpheus;" songs with pianoforte; Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, in F. Mme. Amalie Joachim will be the singer.

The Times
PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 15, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

D'Albert Plays With the Boston Orchestra at the Academy.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening was of unusual dignity and importance. It opened with a very poetical and extraordinarily skilful performance of Berlioz's "Harold" symphony. The strange beauty of this remarkable work, its originality of invention and variety of incident and the nervous sentiment that runs through it all, were interpreted with admirable feeling and with a refinement of execution that could hardly be excelled. Mr. Kneisel's rather pale and passionless style gives scarcely full effect to the tenor obligato, and Berlioz would probably have wanted more fire both here and in the finale, but in technical detail Mr. Kneisel's work commanded admiration and the whole performance was a treat to be accepted without cavil.

Following immediately upon this came the glorious E flat concerto of Beethoven, with D'Albert at the piano. Of all the pianists we have lately heard there is none whose style is at once so fine and so large and noble. There is no affectation of novelty or parade of personal peculiarities, but just a big, firm, full and splendid execution of one of the greatest of all piano compositions. The power of the man is prodigious and his skill consummate, but power and skill are held in absolute mastery and applied to the intellectual interpretation of the music with a classic dignity that made this noble concerto an unalloyed delight. The orchestra seemed to gain inspiration from the piano. It has never played with greater fervor and rarely with so magnificent a tone.

The concerto was followed by a particularly bright and richly-colored rendering of Saint-Saens' "Rouet d'Omphale," after which D'Albert played a group of solos, the Chopin berceuse, a Schubert impromptu and Taussig's telling arrangement of a Strauss waltz. His touch in the berceuse was delightfully delicate and fluent, and the last selection was a marvelous tour-de-force, which was even excelled on a recall, when he came back and played Rubinstein's staccato etude with dazzling brilliancy and overwhelming power. Orchestral selections from Grieg and Wagner closed a concert on which Mr. Nikisch is to be sincerely congratulated.

The North American

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

An audience so large as to crowd it in every part occupied the auditorium of the Academy of Music last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave the fifth concert of the current series. The programme was larger than usual and more than ordinarily varied. It included two symphonies, with obligato parts for solo instruments, namely, Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" and Beethoven's great pianoforte concerto, that in E flat, known as the "Emperor," and in addition there were Saint-Saens' "Rouet d'Omphale, the slow movement from Grieg's "Peer Gynt," some pianoforte music and Wagner's tempestuous "Huldigung's March." Every amateur will recognize this at once as a very interesting arrangement, and probably no concert of the season has afforded its audience a larger measure of enjoyment. It was all beautifully done. The Berlioz music is rather wearying, as music is apt to be which attempts to do more than it is within the province of the art to accomplish; but it is distinguished by the vivid and fantastic fancy and by the power of poetic suggestion which are the chief merits, and the salient characteristics of Berlioz' score and its obligato for the viola said to have been written for Pagsuini is both attractive and important. It was very skilfully delivered by Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concertmaster, who seemed as familiar with the longer stopping of the viola as with that of his accustomed instrument, and whose arpeggio playing in harmonics, the extreme difficulty of which few could have suspected, was marvellously fine. Mr. Kneisel produced a lovely quality of tone, but its volume might with advantage have been larger, while the viola which he used was so mellow as to render the mute unnecessary. The chief feature of the concert, however, was the performance of the Beethoven concerto, which as regards both orchestra and piano the writer has never heard excelled. Mr. Eugen D'Albert, who was the soloist, played with a breadth of manner, a dignity and virility of sentiment, a brilliancy of execution and a lucidity of intelligence which rendered his interpretation wholly enjoyable and altogether satisfying, and made it worthy of one of the very greatest of musical compositions. The audience recognized this by repeated rounds of applause, and afterwards Mr. D'Albert showed his versatility by the beautiful delicacy of touch and subtlety of feeling with which he rendered a Chopin nocturne and one of the Schubert impromptus. He made a deeply favorable impression. In the concerto he was finely supported by the orchestra, whose virtuosity was again strikingly displayed in a flawless rendering of Saint-Saens' bizarre and brilliant "Rouet d'Omphale." The concert closed with a vigorous performance of Wagner's rather labored "Hulchgung's March."

Philadelphia Inquirer
TUESDAY, MARCH 15, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Eugen D'Albert Makes a Splendid Impression at the Academy.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night was in many respects the most delightful of the season. What rendered it particularly interesting was the piano playing of Mr. Eugen D'Albert, who created such a favorable impression here three years ago, when he appeared in conjunction with Sarasate, the violinist. The piece de resistance last night was Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, No. 5. This is one of the great composer's best works, somewhat restricted in theme, but broad in its treatment, calling for masterly technique and the most intelligent comprehension. The artist's appearance has changed somewhat since he was here last. He has grown stouter and has shorn his locks. Few men look less musical and few are better performers. It is a pleasure to see this man play, as well as to listen to his music. There is no effort at making an impression. He does not try to impress you with the fact that he has an interpretation different from the composer and that it is the best one. Utterly devoid of pretense, he is a great performer. He plays the music as it appears in the standard editions. He is not the composer nor his apostle. He is a performer. Divested of all the clap-trap so common among great artist, he appears before us not, indeed, as an automaton but as an intelligent artist.

The Beethoven concerto has never been heard to better advantage. He grasped the subject at once and paid no attention to anything else. His technique is unexcelled and his comprehension is certainly adequate. We have heard Beethoven recently interpreted by another great artist and not to our entire satisfaction. D'Albert can play Beethoven with as great satisfaction as any artist who has ever been here since Rubenstein. From beginning to end the concerto was played with masterly skill. Those who had the standard score before them saw that he made no attempt at pyrotechnics or individual variations. It was one of the most delightful pieces of work of the decade. Nor did the artist appear to less advantage in the shorter numbers by Chopin, Schubert and Strauss-Taussig.

The orchestral number of chief interest was the Berlioz symphony, "Harold in Italy," a dainty piece of work just suited to the orchestra and conductor. The other numbers were Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale," one portion of the "Reer Gynt" suite and the Huldigung March by Wagner. Nor should this close without a tribute to the orchestral work in accompanying the Beethoven concerto. Whatever may be the diverse opinions as to this organization's limitations, it is the best this country has ever known for accompanying a soloist. This is by no means a small matter. To properly set a background for a soloist is perhaps the highest work a full orchestra can do, and certainly Mr. Nikisch leaves nothing to be desired in this respect.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Tuesday, March 15, 1892.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Not so much because of its extreme length (lasting until well up to 11 o'clock), last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one of the best ever given here by that splendid organization, and the vast audience that crowded the Academy gave many and hearty manifestations of pleasure and approval. First there came a superb performance of the "Harold in Italy" symphony of Berlioz. It was something of an oversight on the part of the writer of the excellent analytical programmes provided at these concerts not to have noted somewhere in the remarks that this work has for its subject Byron's hero, "Childe Harold," whose vain efforts to find contentment and peace by travelling amid scenes of beauty, merriment and excitement, after he had exhausted the pleasures of youth, are portrayed with such grandeur and delicacy by the French genius. This would have greatly aided those unacquainted with the subject, of whom there may have been very many in the audience, to more keenly appreciate the meaning and the value of the music. Berlioz knew all the instruments of the orchestra as no other orchestral composer has known them, the value of each and its limitations, together with the best effects attainable by combinations of them. As time glides by his mastery is more and more widely acknowledged, and with a conductor and band like those of last night's concert to do him justice the fact is made delightfully impressive. Superb as the performance was, it could have been made increasedly effective had Mr. Nikisch spurred his men into greater impetuosity and fire in some of the more mettlesome passages.

Franz Kneisel, as the viola soloist (representing, in a measure, individually, the "melancholy dreamer" of the Pilgrimage), played with artistic intelligence, and, therefore, with the poetic sentiment required, if not with distinctive brilliancy, the lines originally written for the great Paganini, who, by the way, discarded the music because it did not give him sufficient prominence in the concerto that formed the nucleus of what Berlioz afterward extended to his second symphony. The single defect in Mr. Kneisel's playing was that he frequently played passage after passage inaudibly, instead of keeping the solo viola dominant.

The remaining numbers for orchestra were all familiar, but none the less welcome on that account. Saint Saens's symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale" (which shows the close study its author has made of his great dead compatriot, whose symphony had the place of honor on the programme), the Aase's Death movement, from the "Peer Gynt" suite of Grieg, and Wagner's "Huldigung's March."

The soloist was Eugen D'Albert, a pianist whose fine accomplishments had previously been noted in this city. He played the E flat concerto of Beethoven (the last that master wrote for piano, and equal to the best of its predecessors) in splendid fashion, and was heartily recalled by the audience at its conclusion. Afterward he was heard in three excerpts that placed his almost marvellous technical powers in a more vivid light, and as it is in these that he is chiefly great, he won something of an ovation from the audience. He played a Chopin nocturne with really charming effect, and wound up with a piece of admirable bravura, playing the Strauss Taussig "Man Lebt Nur Einmal" walz, that led to a comparatively unanimous demand for an encore. Responding, he gave the audience another exhibition of a pyrotechnical order with a Rubinstein study. Mr. D'Albert can flatter himself that he added to the success of a notable concert.

The Philadelphia Press.

TUESDAY, MARCH 15, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

Every time one hears the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one is newly impressed with its unity and its mobility. It plays as evenly as though it were one instrument and shades as delicately. The "Rouet d'Omphale" or the movement from the Peer Gynt suite, could hardly have been rendered more perfectly down to the fine details than they were last evening. That very short movement is a beautiful thing in itself, full of charming, unexpected modulations. The "Rouet d'Omphale," too, is most charming and picturesque. The music is not deeply emotional; it is just the sort of thing that demands one's attention, but is not particularly inspiring. One sits contentedly hearing woman spinning threads about man, listening to man's groans in his captivity and woman's triumphant taunts at him, without feeling any sympathy for man.

The Symphony, "Harold in Italy, is rather remarkable. The solo on the viola by Franz Kneisel, was played with all that artist's ability. The appealing tones of that instrument are particularly effective.

Eugen D'Albert added one more triumph to his many past successes. It is hardly necessary to say more than a word about his marvelous technique and his good conception. His performance, perhaps, does not suggest that he has vast reserve force, as does that of Paderewski, but it is always satisfactory and often more. He was very well received. After the Beethoven concert he was recalled four times and barely escaped an encore. After the Strauss-Taussig valse he granted an encore.

The audience filled the Academy.

NEWS, Baltimore, Md.

Date 3-13

Thursday evening the programme of the [illegible] Symphony Orchestra will be Tschai[illegible] overture-fantasie, entitled "Ham[illegible] Saint-Saens symphonic poem, "L[illegible] d'Omphale," and Dvorak Symphony [illegible] major, all these are played fo[illegible] in Baltimore. The soloist wil[illegible] d'Albert, who will play th[illegible] concerto with the orchestra [illegible] numbers, Schubert im[illegible] No. 3, Liszt valse im[illegible] Napolo. Th[illegible] and th

---

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, March 15, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Not a vacant seat could be seen in any part of the vast Academy of Music last evening, when the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given. Eugen D'Albert was the soloist, his principal number being Beethoven's superb Concerto No. 5, in E flat. This work, which the composer himself never attempted to surpass, was given with all the classical grace and precision which Mr. Nikisch's musical forces know so well how to employ. The solo passages were deprived of a share of due effectiveness by the inadequacy of the instrument used by Mr. D'Albert, the tones of which had scarcely carrying power and sonority enough for the proper interpretation of Beethoven's majestic chef d' œuvre. In lighter numbers by Chopin and Schubert D'Albert was heard to greater advantage. The other selections were "Aase's Death," from Grey's "Peer Gynt," Wagner's "Huldigung's March," Saint Salen's "Spinning wheel of Omphale" and Berlioz's tuneful symphony, "Harold in Italy." The solo passages for viola in the latter composition were admirably played by Franz Kneisel.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16, 1892.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The programme offered for public delectation at the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall last night was varied in its character and content. Four composers were represented in that part of the evening's work in which the orchestra was heard. All four differed in their national and temporal environments, in feeling, and in purpose. All four of them displayed (and two are still displaying) a strange disregard of the æsthetical theory of Dr. Edward Hauslick that the subject matter of music is not feeling, but simply music. These four composers were Beethoven, Nicode, Tschaikowsky, and Liszt. The first was represented by his glorious seventh symphony, which, viewed from the point of either Dr. Hauslick or Richard Wagner, is great music always; the second by a vocal excerpt, the "Fata Morgana," from his symphonic ode, "The Sea," of which the ambitious orchestral tone paintings have already been given by the Philharmonic Society; the third by his noble overture fantasy, as it is called, to "Hamlet," and the fourth by what is generally regarded as the best of his symphonic poems, "Les Preludes." In addition to these numbers there were three songs with piano accompaniment—Richard Strauss's "Staendchen," Chopin's "Das Ringelein," and Schumann's "Aufträge," supplemented in response to recalls with Brahms's "Vergebliches Staendchen."

The only serious fault that can be found with this programme is one which the average hearer will not find. Perhaps the general concertgoer will discover a superabundance of purism in the wish that songs with piano accompaniment, even when that accompaniment is so beautiful in its sympathy and so exquisite in its technical finish as Mr. Nikisch's, might be refused admission to orchestral concerts. To be sure, Mrs. Nikisch is heard at her best in lieder. She sings them with the true German personal intimacy of communication, and that we take to be the real secret of lieder singing—the secret which the Italians never find. Perhaps it was as a means to an end that Mr. Nikisch gave us the songs, but they were hardly consistent with the eternal fitness of things, even though the custom of such introductions is continued in European musical centres. The Nicode "Fata Morgana," though it is something of a jewel in its way, lost some of its lustre through removal from its setting.

Mr. Nikisch's reading of the seventh symphony was characteristic of the conductor. First, last, and all the time he is a romanticist, and he displayed his usual quick perception and affectionate exposition of the romantic side of the work in hand. It is the fashion to find fault with musicians who treat Beethoven in this manner, and undoubtedly the manner is to be condemned when it is softened and sweetened into sentimentalism. It is impossible to temper the austerity of Beethoven's utterance without danger of misrepresenting him to the receptive listener. An expert stone polisher would smooth the grandeur out of the wrinkled front of the Sphinx. But Mr. Nikisch does not sentimentalize Beethoven. He does not read him in a false light. He simply accentuates that part of the master's utterance which appeals to his romantic feeling, and in this he does no violence, for Beethoven was both classic and romantic. Nor can it be said that the pure musical beauty of the master's classicism is at all obscured when the romantic spirit of his works is fully and eloquently exposed so long as this is done with breadth and dignity. So far as we are able to discern the value of Mr. Nikisch's Beethoven reading, it consists in his ability to accomplish this task, which requires not only keen intellectual insight, but self-control, the foundation of true artistic repose.

The "Hamlet" prelude of Tschaikowsky has been sufficiently discussed in these columns to pass without further comment at this time than the bald reminder that it is one of the most eloquent works of a very able man. The intense modernism of its treatment and the unequivocal manner in which it betrays the composer's aim at making programme music might be subjects for dispute were such dispute fruitful of good. But the value of programme music depends so much on the agreement of the hearer with the theory on which the composer bases his effort, that it may as well be frankly admitted that the opponent of this kind of composition disproves its worth for himself, and leaves emotional enjoyment for him who is willing to seek it. Mr. Nikisch, as a romanticist, believes in the expressive power of music and reads such compositions as Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" accordingly. His construction of the salient passages of the work did not differ from those with which we are familiar except in a little broadening of the tempo of the cantabile and a mild repression of the more stormy episodes—the latter induced, perhaps, by regard for the auditorium in which the performance was given. Whatever may be the differences of opinion as to the readings of the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, they make food for thought, and that is something for which all music lovers should be grateful.

The World

JOSEPH PULITZER.

Published Every Day in the Year at Nos. 53-63 Park Row.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Exceptionally Excellent Programme Finely Rendered.

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall last night was one of exceptional excellence and interest. It was this:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 7.
Nicode, "Fata Morgana," for soprano and orchestra; from symphonic poem, "The Sea."
Tschaikowsky, Ouverture-Fantaisie, "Hamlet."
Songs, with piano,
  a Richard Straus, Staendchen,
  b Chopin, "Das Ringelein."
  c Schumann, "Auftraege."
Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."
Soloist, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

The only novelty was the number from Nicode's symphonic poem, "The Sea." If M. Nicode had a tithe as much invention as he has pretentious eccentricity and knowledge of orchestral gymnastics and oddities he might well rival Wagner. As he has not, he seldom succeeds in getting beyond a certain technical cleverness. "Fata Morgana" is certainly less objectionable than the other parts of the poem of which it forms a part, and is even in places almost melodious.

Mrs. Nikisch made the most of a somewhat thankless task, sang well (showing decided dramatic possibilities), and was most cordially received. She was heard to better advantage perhaps in the group of songs which she gave delightfully, singing with great taste and finish. She was encored.

Between Tschaikowsky and Nicode lies the whole difference which separates the modern musical pedagogue from the man of genius. The "Hamlet" fantasie overture is a work of great power, of original thought most originally expressed, of strong dramatic purpose, feeling and climax, besides being evidently the work of a consummate master of his art. One can with little trouble read the whole tragic story of the unhappy Prince, half mad with contending passions, in this strangely emotional work; unquestionably the greatest since Wagner. It was, indeed, almost too intense and vivid for the size of the hall. Mr. Nikisch's reading was instinct with passionate energy and fire, the orchestra played magnificently and the whole interpretation was wonderfully impressive and gave one a distinct sensation, physical as well as mental. The future of modern music lies along this road.

Mr. Nikisch's reading of Beethoven's à la danse symphony was fairly fascinating. It is not often one's privilege to hear a finer and more interesting performance of a work about whose significance such differences of opinion exist. Mr. Nikisch would seem on the whole to agree with that commentator who thinks the work a description of a marriage fête ending in an orgie. The first movement, with all its delicate, arabesque-like tracery—exquisitely executed by the wood wind—was taken, perhaps, a little too emotional. Still, quietly rather than boisterously gay. The allegro and presto (schirzo) were absolutely well done; unimpeachable, in fact, in every respect. The "Allegro con Brio" did indeed suggest a wild orgie as read by Mr. Nikisch. The humor was grimly sardonic rather than gay, and the merriment of the supposed wedding revellers reached indeed a pitch and pace of frenzy towards the end.

The reading was novel and, it must be admitted, a trifle sensational, but not an unwarrantable if not entirely the conventional one. The orchestra played superbly throughout, and has not been heard to greater advantage this season. A very fine performance of Liszt's most beautiful symphonic poem brought to a close a most thoroughly enjoyable concert.

The Sun.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra given last evening in Chickering Hall was in the preponderance of its numbers essentially romantic in character. Tschaikowsky's impressive overture fantasia "Hamlet," Liszt's "Preludes," Nicode's song for soprano from his symphonic poem, "The Sea," and modern German love songs furnished this element, while classic music was represented by Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The interpretation of the latter was serious, formal, and shaped according to the strictest conventional rules as opposed to impulse or fantasy. Conscientious and careful playing, without exaggeration of any kind, marked its rendering. For the "Hamlet" overture, however, the whole gamut of passion seemed to be in use, and the immensely dramatic phrases were delineated with a power vastly impressive. It is a magnificent composition, to which every point of meaning and expression was fully granted. So also with Liszt's "Preludes." Mr. Nikisch, with a reserve which is perhaps the highest proof of true art, keeps all his effects well within bounds, so that where every varying emotion in the music is indicated nothing is allowed to become forced or extreme. The "Preludes" were particularly admirable in their performance, the smoothness and beauty of the string passages being especially lovely.

Mrs. Nikish contributed largely to the charm of the concert by her songs, the piano accompaniments of which, played by Mr. Nikisch, were perfect poems. Mrs. Nikisch's sincerity and deep earnestness of manner, combined with a rich, mellow voice, make her rarely interesting.

---

ecord, Philadelphia, Pa.

te 3-13

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given to-morrow evening at the Academy of Music under the direction of Arthur Nikisch. The programme is to comprise these numbers: Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," symphony (viola solo by Franz Kneisel); Beethoven's piano forte concerto in E flat, No. 5 (Eugen D'Albert, soloist); Saint Saens' symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," and several piano solos for Mr. D'Albert,

---

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall last night provided pleasure of the highest kind, but also grievous disappointment. The latter feeling, unfortunately, came from the composition on the programme from which, in justice to the art, the most was expected. We refer to Beethoven's seventh symphony, which opened the concert. The wilfulness of conductors has played such havoc with this great work recently that, unless there is a return to sound principles of interpretation, the lovers of Beethoven will soon hear with regret the announcement that the A-major symphony is to be performed. Mr. Thomas began the perversions a few years ago with his distortions of the phrasing to suit the scientific theories of Dr. Riemann. Mr. Damrosch followed with his amendment of the famous horn passage in the trio of the Scherzo by which the obvious purpose of the composer and the delightful humor of the music were wiped out. Now comes Mr. Nikisch and plays the bewitching entrance for the introduction to the first Allegro in so labored and heavy-footed a manner and substitutes such a sluggishness in the movement for its bright, cheery incisiveness that to enjoy it becomes impossible. In cases of this kind argument is wasted. The fact that the obvious and beautiful purposes of the composer, who of all composers is the most easily understood in the matter of tempo and feeling, can only be recorded together with an expression of regret. It was a notable circumstance last night that the first movement was received with but faint applause, though the Symphony Orchestra's audiences are always generous with their signs of approbation, and that it was not until the close of the last movement, which was played with admirable spirit and understanding, that real hearty enthusiasm manifested itself. Far different was the reception given to Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet," which invited the rhapsodic style of treatment in which Mr. Nikisch is a master, and was played with a dash, brilliancy and precision in marked contrast to the work of the orchestra in the symphony. This work, because of the eloquent manner in which it was played (for we can not put it in the front rank of the Russian composer's productions) gave much pleasure and sound to keep warm the admiration which New-York has always felt for Mr. Nikisch and his men.

Mrs. Nikisch has become a prime favorite here, and deservdly so. She sings straight from her heart and with a fulness of intelligence that makes admirers of all her hearers. Last night she sang a beautiful and richly scored solo entitled, "Fata Morgan," from Nicode's ode, "The Sea" (two parts of which Mr. Seidl brought forward at the first concert this season of the Philharmonic Society) and from songs, by Richard Strauss, Chopin, Schumann and Brahms. The last was the "Vergebliches Staendchen" sung in response to a recall. All the songs were marvellously accompanied by Mr. Nikisch on the pianoforte.

The New York Recorder.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fifth concert of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Chickering Hall and was as usual a remarkably enjoyable affair musically and socially. The programme was simplicity itself. Beethoven's seventh symphony, Tschaikowsky's "Overture" fantosie "Hamlet" and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes," were the instrumental numbers, while Mrs. Arthur Nikisch furnished the vocal part of the evening's entertainment. There is no gainsaying the technical finish of the orchestra nor of its leader's enormous magnetism, but the first movement of the symphony was as un-Beethovenish as possible, though extremely interesting withal.

The Tschaikowsky overture was superbly played, all of its barbaric splendor of coloring, fiery rhythms and dramatic feeling being finely brought out by Mr. Nikisch. Mrs. Nikisch sang a solo from Nicode's symphonic poem; "The Sea," and later songs by Richard Strauss, Chopin and Schumann in delightful fashion.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16, 1892.

BOSTON'S BAND AT ITS BEST.

The fifth New York concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season was given in Chickering Hall last evening before the usual crowded house, and with possibly more than the customary measure of enthusiasm.

The programme consisted of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the "Fata Morgana" excerpt from Nicode's symphonic poem, "The Sea;" Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" overture, songs of Richard Strauss, Chopin and Schumann, and Liszt's "Les Préludes." It need hardly be said that the symphony and Liszt's poem were beautifully played. Aside from a somewhat unpleasant tendency to drag the time in the first movement, Mr. Nikisch follows the accepted tempi throughout the symphony, and gave a particularly spirited and effective performance of the final allegro. The Liszt "Preludes" offered the band an opportunity for brilliant playing, of which it availed itself to the utmost.

The most interesting features of the concert, were, however, the excerpt from Nicode's "The Sea," and the already familiar Tschaikowsky overture. In the Nicode music, which is of extraordinary and subtle beauty, Mrs. Nikisch sang the vocal part with rare taste and feeling. In both this weird composition and in the "Hamlet" music the orchestra's work was superb.

Mrs. Nikisch's songs, with a piano accompaniment exquisitely played by Mr. Nikisch, were the "Staendchen" of Strauss, Chopin's "Das Ringelein," and Schumann's "Auftraege," all delicately sung and warmly applauded.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, MARCH 17, 1892.

....The Symphony Orchestra and Mr d'Albert have gone their conquering way this week from New York to Washington and cities in between.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Tuesday, March 15, 1892.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Not so much because of its extreme length (lasting until well up to 11 o'clock), last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one of the best ever given here by that splendid organization, and the vast audience that crowded the Academy gave many and hearty manifestations of pleasure and approval. First there came a superb performance of the "Harold in Italy" symphony of Berlioz. It was something of an oversight on the part of the writer of the excellent analytical programmes provided at these concerts not to have noted somewhere in the remarks that this work has for its subject Byron's hero, "Childe Harold," whose vain efforts to find contentment and peace by travelling amid scenes of beauty, merriment and excitement, after he had exhausted the pleasures of youth, are portrayed with such grandeur and delicacy by the French genius. This would have greatly aided those unacquainted with the subject, of whom there may have been very many in the audience, to more keenly appreciate the meaning and the value of the music. Berlioz knew all the instruments of the orchestra as no other orchestral composer has known them, the value of each and its limitations, together with the best effects attainable by combinations of them. As time glides by his mastery is more and more widely acknowledged, and with a conductor and band like those of last night's concert to do him justice the fact is made delightfully impressive. Superb as the performance was, it could have been made increasedly effective had Mr. Nikisch spurred his men into greater impetuosity and fire in some of the more mettlesome passages.

Franz Kneisel, as the viola soloist (representing, in a measure, individually, the "melancholy dreamer" of the Pilgrimage), played with artistic intelligence, and, therefore, with the poetic sentiment required, if not with distinctive brilliancy, the lines originally written for the great Paganini, who, by the way, discarded the music because it did not give him sufficient prominence in the concerto that formed the nucleus of what Berlioz afterward extended to his second symphony. The single defect in Mr. Kneisel's playing was that he frequently played passage after passage inaudibly, instead of keeping the solo viola dominant.

The remaining numbers for orchestra were all familiar, but none the less welcome on that account. Saint Säens's symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale" (which shows the close study its author has made of his great dead compatriot, whose symphony had the place of honor on the programme), the Aase's Death movement, from the "Peer Gynt" suite of Grieg, and Wagner's "Huldigung's March."

The soloist was Eugen D'Albert, a pianist whose fine accomplishments had previously been noted in this city. He played the E flat concerto of Beethoven (the last that master wrote for piano, and equal to the best of its predecessors) in splendid fashion, and was heartily recalled by the audience at its conclusion. Afterward he was heard in three excerpts that placed his almost marvellous technical powers in a more vivid light, and as it is in these that he is chiefly great, he won something of an ovation from the audience. He played a Chopin nocturne with really charming effect, and wound up with a piece of admirable bravura, playing the Strauss Taussig "Man Lebt Nur Einmal" walz, that led to a comparatively unanimous demand for an encore. Responding, he gave the audience another exhibition of a pyrotechnical order with a Rubinstein study. Mr. D'Albert can flatter himself that he added to the success of a notable concert.

The Philadelphia Press.

TUESDAY, MARCH 15, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

Every time one hears the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one is newly impressed with its unity and its mobility. It plays as evenly as though it were one instrument and shades as delicately. The "Rouet d'Omphale" or the movement from the Peer Gynt suite, could hardly have been rendered more perfectly down to the fine details than they were last evening. That very short movement is a beautiful thing in itself, full of charming, unexpected modulations. The "Rouet d'Omphale," too, is most charming and picturesque. The music is not deeply emotional; it is just the sort of thing that demands one's attention, but is not particularly inspiring. One sits contentedly hearing woman spinning threads about man, listening to man's groans in his captivity and woman's triumphant taunts at him, without feeling any sympathy for man.

The Symphony, "Harold in Italy, is rather remarkable. The solo on the viola by Franz Kneisel, was played with all that artist's ability. The appealing tones of that instrument are particularly effective.

Eugen D'Albert added one more triumph to his many past successes. It is hardly necessary to say more than a word about his marvelous technique and his good conception. His performance, perhaps, does not suggest that he has vast reserve force, as does that of Paderewski, but it is always satisfactory and often more. He was very well received. After the Beethoven concert he was recalled four times and barely escaped an encore. After the Strauss-Taussig valse he granted an encore.

The audience filled the Academy.

NEWS, Baltimore, Md.

Date 3-13

Thursday evening the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Tschoi-kowsky overture-fantasie, entitled "Ham[illegible]" Saint-Saens symphonic poem, "L[illegible] [illegible] d'Omphale," and Dvorak Symphony [illegible] in G major; all these are played fo[illegible] [illegible] time in Baltimore. The soloist wil[illegible] [illegible] d'Albert, who will play th[illegible] [illegible] minor concerto with the orchestra [illegible] solo numbers, Schubert im[illegible] [illegible] pus 90, No. 3, Liszt valse im[illegible] [illegible] Venezia e Napolo. Th[illegible] [illegible] to-morrow, and th[illegible] [illegible] on the b[illegible]

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, March 15, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Not a vacant seat could be seen in any part of the vast Academy of Music last evening, when the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given. Eugen D'Albert was the soloist, his principal number being Beethoven's superb Concerto No. 5, in E flat. This work, which the composer himself never attempted to surpass, was given with all the classical grace and precision which Mr. Nikisch's musical forces know so well how to employ. The solo passages were deprived of a share of due effectiveness by the inadequacy of the instrument used by Mr. D'Albert, the tones of which had scarcely carrying power and sonority enough for the proper interpretation of Beethoven's majestic chef d' œuvre. In lighter numbers by Chopin and Schubert D'Albert was heard to greater advantage. The other selections were "Aase's Death," from Grey's "Peer Gynt," Wagner's "Huldigung's March," Saint Salen's "Spinning wheel of Omphale" and Berlioz's tuneful symphony, "Harold in Italy." The solo passages for viola in the latter composition were admirably played by Franz Kneisel.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16, 1892.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The programme offered for public delectation at the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall last night was varied in its character and content. Four composers were represented in that part of the evening's work in which the orchestra was heard. All four differed in their national and temporal environments, in feeling, and in purpose. All four of them displayed (and two are still displaying) a strange disregard of the æsthetical theory of Dr. Edward Hauslick that the subject matter of music is not feeling, but simply music. These four composers were Beethoven, Nicode, Tschaikowsky, and Liszt. The first was represented by his glorious seventh symphony, which, viewed from the point of either Dr. Hauslick or Richard Wagner, is great music always; the second by a vocal excerpt, the "Fata Morgana," from his symphonic ode, "The Sea," of which the ambitious orchestral tone paintings have already been given by the Philharmonic Society; the third by his noble overture fantasy, as it is called, to "Hamlet," and the fourth by what is generally regarded as the best of his symphonic poems, "Les Preludes." In addition to these numbers there were three songs with piano accompaniment—Richard Strauss's "Staendchen," Chopin's "Das Ringelein," and Schumann's "Aufträge," supplemented in response to recalls with Brahms's "Vergebliches Staendchen."

The only serious fault that can be found with this programme is one which the average hearer will not find. Perhaps the general concert-goer will discover a superabundance of purism in the wish that songs with piano accompaniment, even when that accompaniment is so beautiful in its sympathy and so exquisite in its technical finish as Mr. Nikisch's, might be refused admission to orchestral concerts. To be sure, Mrs. Nikisch is heard at her best in lieder. She sings them with the true German personal intimacy of communication, and that we take to be the real secret of lieder singing—the secret which the Italians never find. Perhaps it was as a means to an end that Mr. Nikisch gave us the songs, but they were hardly consistent with the eternal fitness of things, even though the custom of such introductions is continued in European musical centres. The Nicode "Fata Morgana," though it is something of a jewel in its way, lost some of its lustre through removal from its setting.

Mr. Nikisch's reading of the seventh symphony was characteristic of the conductor. First, last, and all the time he is a romanticist, and he displayed his usual quick perception and affectionate exposition of the romantic side of the work in hand. It is the fashion to find fault with musicians who treat Beethoven in this manner, and undoubtedly the manner is to be condemned when it is softened and sweetened into sentimentalism. It is impossible to temper the austerity of Beethoven's utterance without danger of misrepresenting him to the receptive listener. An expert stone polisher would smooth the grandeur out of the wrinkled front of the Sphinx. But Mr. Nikisch does not sentimentalize Beethoven. He does not read him in a false light. He simply accentuates that part of the master's utterance which appeals to his romantic feeling, and in this he does no violence, for Beethoven was both classic and romantic. Nor can it be said that the pure musical beauty of the master's classicism is at all obscured when the romantic spirit of his works is fully and eloquently exposed so long as this is done with breadth and dignity. So far as we are able to discern the value of Mr. Nikisch's Beethoven reading, it consists in his ability to accomplish this task, which requires not only keen intellectual insight, but self-control, the foundation of true artistic repose.

The "Hamlet" prelude of Tschaikowsky has been sufficiently discussed in these columns to pass without further comment at this time than the bald reminder that it is one of the most eloquent works of a very able man. The intense modernism of its treatment and the unequivocal manner in which it betrays the composer's aim at making programme music might be subjects for dispute were such dispute fruitful of good. But the value of programme music depends so much on the agreement of the hearer with the theory on which the composer bases his effort, that it may as well be frankly admitted that the opponent of this kind of composition disproves its worth for himself, and leaves emotional enjoyment for him who is willing to seek it. Mr. Nikisch, as a romanticist, believes in the expressive power of music and reads such compositions as Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" accordingly. His construction of the salient passages of the work did not differ from those with which we are familiar except in a little broadening of the tempo of the cantabile and a mild repression of the more stormy episodes—the latter induced, perhaps, by regard for the auditorium in which the performance was given. Whatever may be the differences of opinion as to the readings of the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, they make food for thought, and that is something for which all music lovers should be grateful.

The World

JOSEPH PULITZER.

Published Every Day in the Year at Nos. 53-63 Park Row.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Exceptionally Excellent Programme Finely Rendered.

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall last night was one of exceptional excellence and interest. It was this:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 7.
Nicode, "Fata Morgana," for soprano and orchestra; from symphonic poem, "The Sea."
Tschaikowsky, Ouverture-Fantaisie, "Hamlet."
Songs, with piano,
  a Richard Straus, Staendchen,
  b Chopin, "Das Ringelein."
  c Schumann, "Auftraege."
Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."
Soloist, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

The only novelty was the number from Nicode's symphonic poem, "The Sea." If M. Nicode had a tithe as much invention as he has pretentious eccentricity and knowledge of orchestral gymnastics and oddities he might well rival Wagner. As he has not, he seldom succeeds in getting beyond a certain technical cleverness. "Fata Morgana" is certainly less objectionable than the other parts of the poem of which it forms a part, and is even in places almost melodious.

Mrs. Nikisch made the most of a somewhat thankless task, sang well (showing decided dramatic possibilities), and was most cordially received. She was heard to better advantage perhaps in the group of songs which she gave delightfully, singing with great taste and finish. She was encored.

Between Tschaikowsky and Nicode lies the whole difference which separates the modern musical pedagogue from the man of genius. The "Hamlet" fantasie overture is a work of great power, of original thought most originally expressed, of strong dramatic purpose, feeling and climax, besides being evidently the work of a consummate master of his art. One can with little trouble read the whole tragic story of the unhappy Prince, half mad with contending passions, in this strangely emotional work; unquestionably the greatest since Wagner. It was, indeed, almost too intense and vivid for the size of the hall. Mr. Nikisch's reading was instinct with passionate energy and fire, the orchestra played magnificently and the whole interpretation was wonderfully impressive and gave one a distinct sensation, physical as well as mental. The future of modern music lies along this road.

Mr. Nikisch's reading of Beethoven's à la danse symphony was fairly fascinating. It is not often one's privilege to hear a finer and more interesting performance of a work about whose significance such differences of opinion exist. Mr. Nikisch would seem on the whole to agree with that commentator who thinks the work a description of a marriage fête ending in an orgie. The first movement, with all its delicate, arabesque-like tracery—exquisitely executed by the wood wind—was taken, perhaps, a little too emotional. Still, quietly rather than boisterously gay. The allegro and presto (schirzo) were absolutely well done; unimpeachable, in fact, in every respect. The "Allegro con Brio" did indeed suggest a wild orgie as read by Mr. Nikisch. The humor was grimly sardonic rather than gay, and the merriment of the supposed wedding revellers reached indeed a pitch and pace of frenzy towards the end.

The reading was novel and, it must be admitted, a trifle sensational, but not an unwarrantable if not entirely the conventional one. The orchestra played superbly throughout, and has not been heard to greater advantage this season. A very fine performance of Liszt's most beautiful symphonic poem brought to a close a most thoroughly enjoyable concert.

The Sun.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra given last evening in Chickering Hall was in the preponderance of its numbers essentially romantic in character. Tschaikowsky's impressive overture fantasia "Hamlet," Liszt's "Preludes," Nicode's song for soprano from his symphonic poem, "The Sea," and modern German love songs furnished this element, while classic music was represented by Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The interpretation of the latter was serious, formal, and shaped according to the strictest conventional rules as opposed to impulse or fantasy. Conscientious and careful playing, without exaggeration of any kind, marked its rendering. For the "Hamlet" overture, however, the whole gamut of passion seemed to be in use, and the immensely dramatic phrases were delineated with a power vastly impressive. It is a magnificent composition, to which every point of meaning and expression was fully granted. So also with Liszt's "Preludes." Mr. Nikisch, with a reserve which is perhaps the highest proof of true art, keeps all his effects well within bounds, so that where every varying emotion in the music is indicated nothing is allowed to become forced or extreme. The "Preludes" were particularly admirable in their performance, the smoothness and beauty of the string passages being especially lovely.

Mrs. Nikish contributed largely to the charm of the concert by her songs, the piano accompaniments of which, played by Mr. Nikisch, were perfect poems. Mrs. Nikisch's sincerity and deep earnestness of manner, combined with a rich, mellow voice, make her rarely interesting.

---

ecord, Philadelphia, Pa.

te 3-13

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given to-morrow evening at the Academy of Music under the direction of Arthur Nikisch. The programme is to comprise these numbers: Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," symphony (viola solo by Franz Kneisel); Beethoven's piano forte concerto in E flat, No. 5 (Eugen D'Albert, soloist); Saint Saens' symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," and several piano solos for Mr. D'Albert,

[151]

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall last night provided pleasure of the highest kind, but also grievous disappointment. The latter feeling, unfortunately, came from the composition on the programme from which, in justice to the art, the most was expected. We refer to Beethoven's seventh symphony, which opened the concert. The wilfulness of conductors has played such havoc with this great work recently that, unless there is a return to sound principles of interpretation, the lovers of Beethoven will soon hear with regret the announcement that the A-major symphony is to be performed. Mr. Thomas began the perversions a few years ago with his distortions of the phrasing to suit the scientific theories of Dr. Riemann. Mr. Damrosch followed with his amendment of the famous horn passage in the trio of the Scherzo by which the obvious purpose of the composer and the delightful humor of the music were wiped out. Now comes Mr. Nikisch and plays the bewitching entrance for the introduction to the first Allegro in so labored and heavy-footed a manner and substitutes such a sluggishness in the movement for its bright, cheery incisiveness that to enjoy it becomes impossible. In cases of this kind argument is wasted. The fact that the obvious and beautiful purposes of the composer, who of all composers is the most easily understood in the matter of tempo and feeling, can only be recorded together with an expression of regret. It was a notable circumstance last night that the first movement was received with but faint applause, though the Symphony Orchestra's audiences are always generous with their signs of approbation, and that it was not until the close of the last movement, which was played with admirable spirit and understanding, that real hearty enthusiasm manifested itself. Far different was the reception given to Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet," which invited the rhapsodic style of treatment in which Mr. Nikisch is a master, and was played with a dash, brilliancy and precision in marked contrast to the work of the orchestra in the symphony. This work, because of the eloquent manner in which it was played (for we can not put it in the front rank of the Russian composer's productions) gave much pleasure and sound to keep warm the admiration which New-York has always felt for Mr. Nikisch and his men.

Mrs. Nikisch has become a prime favorite here, and deservdly so. She sings straight from her heart and with a fulness of intelligence that makes admirers of all her hearers. Last night she sang a beautiful and richly scored solo entitled, "Fata Morgan," from Nicode's ode, "The Sea" (two parts of which Mr. Seidl brought forward at the first concert this season of the Philharmonic Society) and from songs, by Richard Strauss, Chopin, Schumann and Brahms. The last was the "Vergebliches staendchen" sung in response to a recall. All the songs were marvellously accompanied by Mr. Nikisch on the pianoforte.

The New York Recorder.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fifth concert of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Chickering Hall and was as usual a remarkably enjoyable affair musically and socially. The programme was simplicity itself. Beethoven's seventh symphony, Tschaikowsky's "Overture" fantosie "Hamlet" and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes," were the instrumental numbers, while Mrs. Arthur Nikisch furnished the vocal part of the evening's entertainment. There is no gainsaying the technical finish of the orchestra nor of its leader's enormous magnetism, but the first movement of the symphony was as un-Beethovenish as possible, though extremely interesting withal.

The Tschaikowsky overture was superbly played, all of its barbaric splendor of coloring, fiery rhythms and dramatic feeling being finely brought out by Mr. Nikisch. Mrs. Nikisch sang a solo from Nicode's symphonic poem; "The Sea," and later songs by Richard Strauss, Chopin and Schumann in delightful fashion.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16, 1892.

BOSTON'S BAND AT ITS BEST.

The fifth New York concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season was given in Chickering Hall last evening before the usual crowded house, and with possibly more than the customary measure of enthusiasm.

The programme consisted of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the "Fata Morgana" excerpt from Nicode's symphonic poem, "The Sea;" Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" overture, songs of Richard Strauss, Chopin and Schumann, and Liszt's "Les Préludes." It need hardly be said that the symphony and Liszt's poem were beautifully played. Aside from a somewhat unpleasant tendency to drag the time in the first movement, Mr. Nikisch follows the accepted tempi throughout the symphony, and gave a particularly spirited and effective performance of the final allegro. The Liszt "Preludes" offered the band an opportunity for brilliant playing, of which it availed itself to the utmost.

The most interesting features of the concert, were, however, the excerpt from Nicodé's "The Sea," and the already familiar Tschaikowsky overture. In the Nicodé music, which is of extraordinary and subtle beauty, Mrs. Nikisch sang the vocal part with rare taste and feeling. In both this weird composition and in the "Hamlet" music the orchestra's work was superb.

Mrs. Nikisch's songs, with a piano accompaniment exquisitely played by Mr. Nikisch, were the "Staendchen" of Strauss, Chopin's "Das Ringelein," and Schumann's "Auftraege," all delicately sung and warmly applauded.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, MARCH 17, 1892.

....The Symphony Orchestra and Mr. d'Albert have gone their conquering way this week from New York to Washington and cities in between.

The Musical Courier.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16, 1892.

IT is reported that Col. Henry L. Higginson, the patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has added a codicil to his will that leaves an investment of $1,000,000 as an endowment fund, the interest of which is to be used for the permanent maintenance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SOME extraordinary piano playing was heard in Boston last week. Eugen d'Albert played Beethoven's E flat concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and surpassed himself in the marvelous interpretation and reading of this great work. His performance again emphasizes the general opinion that he is one of the greatest living exponents of classical piano music.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

THE program for the nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall this evening was: Overture, "Lenore," No. 2, Beethoven; concerto for piano, No. 5, in E flat, Beethoven, and Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Schumann (according to the original version.) The soloist was Mr. Eugen d'Albert.

In the opening number the orchestra reached a state of perfection which should fill every individual member with merited pride, and did, as it was, fill every member of the audience with melodious delight. Nothing was wanting in the performance of this number. If ever a faultless reading were given this earliest of the four great "Lenore" overtures it surely was by Mr. Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening. The "original version" of the Schumann symphony played this evening is not so widely different from the edition heard last week. At least the difference is not so great as we have been led to expect from the many annotators who have felt called upon to make themselves shine with reflected glory?

The more modern color given the orchestration in the revised version seems to be its principal distinguishing mark and is possibly the favorite form at the present time. Scarcely less praiseworthy was the work of the orchestra in this than in the preceding number.

The most enjoyable feature of the program, quite needless to observe, was the great "Emperor" concerto, so called, and to write of Mr. d'Albert and his performance of it, as should be written, calls for greater descriptive powers than are at our command and a more profound appreciation of master workmanship than we possess. Such breadth of conception, such straightforward methods, such true piano playing have certainly not been excelled in Boston since Rubinstein's visit. As a Beethoven player, religiously faithful to the every intention of the composer, he surely has no rival.

Mr. d'Albert was recalled five times, at last responding with an impromptu by Schubert.

The program for the next concert is: "Tragic" overture, Brahms; aria from "Orpheus," Gluck; ballad music from "Orpheus," Gluck; songs by Schubert and Schumann, and Beethoven symphony No. 8. The soloist is to be Mrs. Amelie Joachim.

* * * *

On Monday evening occurred the sixth Kneisel Quartet concert, with Mrs. Amelie Joachim as soloist. A new quartet by Mr. Ottokar Navàcek, the solo viola of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given first place upon the program. This was the first hearing given it in America.

We trust it may be the last, for such exhibitions of musical ill temper, unintelligible sound making and shocking harmonic progressions have no proper place upon a program to be performed by an organization like the Kneisel Quartet. The second (adagio) movement was much the more enjoyable of the four, from a musical standpoint. Technically, the work of the quartet was admirable, and to say anything new in praise of it one must find new words.

Mrs. Joachim was vocally a disappointment, artistically a delight.

In justice to a great artist, allowance must be made for a severe cold, from the effects of which the singer was evidently suffering, and it is to be presumed that under favorable circumstances her intonation would have been true.

As an interpreter of German Lieder Mrs. Joachim has won enduring fame.

In no single instance was she other than the artist, even when the vocal organ refused to obey her will.

The Beethoven variations were played in a most befitting manner, and the program was brought to a close by a perfect performance of the quartet in E flat by the same composer.

The postponed fourth concert, ending the series, will be given Monday April 4.

* * * *

Clipping from Com. Advertiser, ~~Sun~~, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/15

The next to the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will take place to-night in Chickering Hall, at which Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will be the soloist, singing three songs by Strauss, Chopin and Schumann. The orchestral selections will be Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Tschaikowsky's overture to "Hamlet" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

BULLETIN, Philadelphia 3/15

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is doubtful whether the Academy of Music was ever so crowded for an orchestral concert as it was last evening, when Mr. Nikisch and his superb band appeared for the fifth time this season. Hundreds of people had to stand in all the tiers, and the audience was one that really appreciated the fine music. The programme was long, and less interesting than some of the others. The symphony of Berlioz, Harold in Italy, is one of the best examples of his work—peculiar if not strikingly original or stirring. The orchestral parts were finely given, of course, and Mr. Kneisel played that not very stimulating instrument, the viola, with the utmost delicacy, grace and refinement. Beethoven's great concerto in E flat was played magnificently, Mr. Eugen d'Albert being the pianist. He is a brilliant artist, with little sentiment, and his interpretation, while technically good, was prosaic—at least it was not more poetical than that of Herr Joseffy, who is quite his equal as an executant. The Rouet d'Omphale of Saint-Saens is a dreamy suggestion of a mythological fable, meant to be descriptive; but music always fails to describe; its subjects must be explained, and then its intent may be understood. Otherwise it can hardly even suggest the troubles or the joys of gods and men. The symphonic poem would have been just as delightful without its title.

The remainder of the programme included several piano solos by Herr d'Albert, a part of Grieg's Peer Gynt and Huldigung's March by Wagner. The concert was not over until nearly 11 o'clock, but the audience was in a mood for enjoying the whole of it.

Commercial Advertiser.

[Established 1797.]

JOHN A. COCKERILL, Editor.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, MAR. 16, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been giving here this winter is rapidly drawing to a close, much to the regret, we are sure, of those who are appreciative of what is best and most worthy in the interpretation of orchestral music. The fifth concert (which is next to the last) took place last evening in Chickering Hall and attracted an audience much larger than the room could comfortably accommodate, thereby attesting to the remarkable popularity which this organization from another town enjoys in a city which boasts of two great orchestras of its own.

The programme offered at this concert was peculiarly interesting, not only from the intrinsic attractiveness of the works interpreted, but also because of the striking contrasts which it afforded, which brought into strong relief the great merits and the few defects of Mr. Nikisch's celebrated orchestra; such, for instance, as might have been observed between the severe Beethoven symphony, No. 7, and the impetuous overture to "Hamlet" by Tschaikowsky, which is palpitating with warmth and passion. In the dramatic and rhapsodical this band is far and away ahead of any similar organization in this country. In all which it does it is replete with virility, abandon, brilliancy, magnificent tone coloring and an impressive reserve force which hints subtly at much that is not revealed but strongly suggested, which after all is one of the highest expressions of art in any of its various forms.

These splendid qualities are not precisely neutralized, but, to a certain degree, weakened by the freedom with which the conductor departs from the score, the unnecessary predominance of the brasses whenever used and the frequency with which the first violins overbalance the remainder of the string quartette. But when all has been said it must be confessed once and for all that there is a higher delight in listening to its performances than is offered by any other orchestra we are privileged to hear.

It was a mistake in the playing of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony to depart from classical precedent, as was done in the first and fourth movements, but there was much of compensation in the delightful rendering of the second and third movements, which were given with a sensuous beauty that was positively ravishing. In addition to the Tschaikowsky number to which we have already adverted, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," was also performed in an entirely satisfactory manner.

One of the chief charms of the concert was the singing of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who was heard first in a "Fata Morgana" for soprano and orchestra from Nicode's symphonic poem "The Sea" (two movements of which, it may be remembered, were played by the Philharmonic orchestra at its second concert), and a group of songs by Strauss, Chopin and Schumann. She has a sweet, pure voice and much of that quality which the French call "temperament," which enables one to sing from the heart and to touch the hearts of others, too. If she lack anything it is what might be called a sensibility of vocal touch, which she can cultivate, or, better still, borrow from her husband's hands, who played her accompaniments on the piano with delicious sympathy and subtle refinement.

Transcript, Portland, Me.

Date 3/16

The 8th entertainment in the Stockbridge course will be given on Tuesday evening the 29th, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, sixty musicians, with [redacted] and Mrs. Nikisch, vocal soloist. Good seats can be had at Stockbridge's.

The Evening Post.

New York, Wednesday, March 16, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Nikisch has never given a more delightful concert in this city with his noble Boston Orchestra than he did last evening. Chickering Hall was crowded to the doors, and the interest of the concert increased so steadily that no one left before the end. Beethoven's seventh symphony opened the entertainment, and, barring the fact that the first movement seemed to us molto sostenato rather than poco sostenato, it was admirably interpreted and played. It was interesting to hear Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" and Liszt's "Préludes" within the same half-hour, not only because both are masterworks, but because one could see therefrom how Liszt has left his mark on modern composers by his orchestral as well as by his pianoforte works. Liszt's "Préludes" is almost forty years old, yet it sounds as modern and as fresh as if Dvorák or Richard Strauss had written it yesterday. Mrs. Nikisch provided an agreeable variety amid the orchestral selections by singing songs by R. Strauss, Chopin, Schumann, and Brahms, with Mr. Nikisch's delightful accompaniments at the piano. Her voice is at its best when supported by a rich accompaniment, and she was therefore heard to less advantage in Chopin's "Ringlein" than in her other selections, especially in the "Fata Morgana" from Nicodé's symphonic poem "The Sea." She was warmly applauded and obliged to add an extra number after Schumann's "Aufträge."

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS

No. 23 Park Row.

Wednesday Evening, March 16, 1892

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Fifth Concert at Chickering Hall—A Fine Performance.

The fifth of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts at Chickering Hall was given last evening to a very large and appreciative audience. The orchestral part of the programme consisted of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Tschaikowsky's overture fantasia, "Hamlet," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." To these was added an excerpt from Nicode's symphonic poem, "The Sea," for soprano and orchestra, and a group of songs by Richard Strauss, Chopin and Schumann, Mrs. Nikisch being the vocalist.

The ever-welcome Beethoven symphony was beautifully played, and the varied dramatic effects, which form so striking a feature in Tschaikowsky's sonorous composition were superbly set forth. The "Preludes" also was brilliantly given under Mr. Nikisch's direction.

It is fortunate for Mrs. Nikisch that she has so admirable an accompanist as is found in her husband, unless, indeed, it may be that the listener's attention sometimes is diverted from the singer to the exquisite art with which the accompaniment is given. She was not heard to such good advantage last evening as at her recital, but her singing gave great pleasure to the audience. The Nicode selection was given with fine dramatic expression, and in the love songs her expressive voice, her earnestness and vivacity and her thoroughly lyrical style made her singing of them delightful.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 20, 1892.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel have again set foot on our shores and begin Tuesday a series of vocal recitals similar to those which so charmed our music lovers in former years and which have since made their names famous throughout Europe. These recitals are comparable with no other musical entertainment. They possess a charm, wholly their own, and afford a kind and degree of pleasure that it is difficult to characterize. It can be said of them that the enjoyment they afford is unalloyed. After singing in New York, Philadelphia and Washington they come to Boston and will be heard at the Meionian, on Thursday evening, March 29, and the afternoons of March 31, April 5 and 9. Subscription tickets for the series will be on sale next Monday at Music Hall, At the first recital Tuesday Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will sing in duet: "Quel onda che rovina," Padre Martini; duet from the "Taming of the Shrew," Goetz; duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village, Boieldieu; Mr. Henschel will sing "Der Doppelzanger," "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus," "Der Schiffer," Schubert; aria from "Il Maestro di Musica," Peroglesi; aria buffa from "Calandrino." Cimorosa; the Czar's song [from "Czar and Carpenter," Lortzing, couplets de Vulcain, from "Philemon et Baucis," Gounod. Mrs. Henschel will sing Mingnon song, Beethoven; "Auf Flugeln des Gesanges," Mendelssohn; "In the Woods," Franz; "Romance," "Morgens als Lerche," "Der Bote," Henschel; aria, "Oh, Sleep," from "Semele," aria, "Qual farfaletta," from "Partenope," Handel.

Clipping No. 7

Clipping from Telegram New York N. Y.

Date 3/12

The Nikisch song recital at Chickering Hall on Monday afternoon was well attended. Mrs. Nikisch, in spite of her recent illness, sang delightfully, being accompanied on the piano by Mr. Nikisch.

N. Y. Herald 3/15

The last New York concert but one of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be given [illegible] evening, in Chickering Hall, when [illegible] will be as follows:—Symphony No. 7, [illegible] "Fata Morgana," for soprano and [illegible] symphonic poem, "The Sea," Nicode; [illegible] tasie, "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky; songs, [illegible] Staendchen, Richard Strauss; b. [illegible] Chopin; c. "Auftraege," Schumann; [illegible] "Les Preludes," Liszt. Mrs. Arthur N[illegible] soloist.

SUN, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/15

The last concert but one of the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place at Chickering Hall next Tuesday evening. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will be the soloist, and the programme is as follows: 1, Symphony No. 7, Beethoven; 2, "Fata Morgana," for soprano and orchestra, from symphonic poem, "The Sea," Nicode; 3, Ouverture-Fantaisie, "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky; 4, Songs, with piano, (a) Staendchen, Richard Strauss; (b) "Das Ringelein," Chopin; (c) "Auftraege," Schumann; 5, Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," Liszt.

The Musical Courier.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16, 1892.

IT is reported that Col. Henry L. Higginson, the patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has added a codicil to his will that leaves an investment of $1,000,000 as an endowment fund, the interest of which is to be used for the permanent maintenance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SOME extraordinary piano playing was heard in Boston last week. Eugen d' Albert played Beethoven's E flat concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and surpassed himself in the marvelous interpretation and reading of this great work. His performance again emphasizes the general opinion that he is one of the greatest living exponents of classical piano music.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

THE program for the nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall this evening was: Overture, "Lenore," No. 2, Beethoven; concerto for piano, No. 5, in E flat, Beethoven, and Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Schumann (according to the original version.) The soloist was Mr. Eugen d'Albert.

In the opening number the orchestra reached a state of perfection which should fill every individual member with merited pride, and did, as it was, fill every member of the audience with melodious delight. Nothing was wanting in the performance of this number. If ever a faultless reading were given this earliest of the four great "Lenore" overtures it surely was by Mr. Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening. The "original version" of the Schumann symphony played this evening is not so widely different from the edition heard last week. At least the difference is not so great as we have been led to expect from the many annotators who have felt called upon to make themselves shine with reflected glory:

The more modern color given the orchestration in the revised version seems to be its principal distinguishing mark and is possibly the favorite form at the present time. Scarcely less praiseworthy was the work of the orchestra in this than in the preceding number.

The most enjoyable feature of the program, quite needless to observe, was the great "Emperor" concerto, so called, and to write of Mr. d'Albert and his performance of it, as should be written, calls for greater descriptive powers than are at our command and a more profound appreciation of master workmanship than we possess. Such breadth of conception, such straightforward methods, such true piano playing have certainly not been excelled in Boston since Rubinstein's visit. As a Beethoven player, religiously faithful to the every intention of the composer, he surely has no rival.

Mr. d'Albert was recalled five times, at last responding with an impromptu by Schubert.

The program for the next concert is: "Tragic" overture, Brahms; aria from "Orpheus," Gluck; ballad music from "Orpheus," Gluck; songs by Schubert and Schumann, and Beethoven symphony No. 8. The soloist is to be Mrs. Amelie Joachim.

* * * *

On Monday evening occurred the sixth Kneisel Quartet concert, with Mrs. Amelie Joachim as soloist. A new quartet by Mr. Ottokar Navàcek, the solo viola of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given first place upon the program. This was the first hearing given it in America.

We trust it may be the last, for such exhibitions of musical ill temper, unintelligible sound making and shocking harmonic progressions have no proper place upon a program to be performed by an organization like the Kneisel Quartet. The second (adagio) movement was much the more enjoyable of the four, from a musical standpoint. Technically, the work of the quartet was admirable, and to say anything new in praise of it one must find new words.

Mrs. Joachim was vocally a disappointment, artistically a delight.

In justice to a great artist, allowance must be made for a severe cold, from the effects of which the singer was evidently suffering, and it is to be presumed that under favorable circumstances her intonation would have been true.

As an interpreter of German Lieder Mrs. Joachim has won enduring fame.

In no single instance was she other than the artist, even when the vocal organ refused to obey her will.

The Beethoven variations were played in a most befitting manner, and the program was brought to a close by a perfect performance of the quartet in E flat by the same composer.

The postponed fourth concert, ending the series, will be given Monday April 4.

* * * *

Clipping from Com. Advertiser,
~~STAR~~, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/15

The next to the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will take place to-night in Chickering Hall, at which Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will be the soloist, singing three songs by Strauss, Chopin and Schumann. The orchestral selections will be Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Tschaikowsky's overture to "Hamlet" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3/15

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is doubtful whether the Academy of Music was ever so crowded for an orchestral concert as it was last evening, when Mr. Nikisch and his superb band appeared for the fifth time this season. Hundreds of people had to stand in all the tiers, and the audience was one that really appreciated the fine music. The programme was long, and less interesting than some of the others. The symphony of Berlioz, Harold in Italy, is one of the best examples of his work—peculiar if not strikingly original or stirring. The orchestral parts were finely given, of course, and Mr. Kneisel played that not very stimulating instrument, the viola, with the utmost delicacy, grace and refinement. Beethoven's great concerto in E flat was played magnificently, Mr. Eugen d'Albert being the pianist. He is a brilliant artist, with little sentiment, and his interpretation, while technically good, was prosaic—at least it was not more poetical than that of Herr Joseffy, who is quite his equal as an executant. The Rouet d'Omphale of Saint-Saens is a dreamy suggestion of a mythological fable, meant to be descriptive; but music always fails to describe; its subjects must be explained, and then its intent may be understood. Otherwise it can hardly even suggest the troubles or the joys of gods and men. The symphonic poem would have been just as delightful without its title.

The remainder of the programme included several piano solos by Herr d'Albert, a part of Grieg's Peer Gynt and Huldigung's March by Wagner. The concert was not over until nearly 11 o'clock, but the audience was in a mood for enjoying the whole of it.

Commercial Advertiser.

[Established 1797.]

JOHN A. COCKERILL, Editor.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, MAR. 16, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been giving here this winter is rapidly drawing to a close, much to the regret, we are sure, of those who are appreciative of what is best and most worthy in the interpretation of orchestral music. The fifth concert (which is next to the last) took place last evening in Chickering Hall and attracted an audience much larger than the room could comfortably accommodate, thereby attesting to the remarkable popularity which this organization from another town enjoys in a city which boasts of two great orchestras of its own.

The programme offered at this concert was peculiarly interesting, not only from the intrinsic attractiveness of the works interpreted, but also because of the striking contrasts which it afforded, which brought into strong relief the great merits and the few defects of Mr. Nikisch's celebrated orchestra; such, for instance, as might have been observed between the severe Beethoven symphony, No. 7, and the impetuous overture to "Hamlet" by Tschaikowsky, which is palpitating with warmth and passion. In the dramatic and rhapsodical this band is far and away ahead of any similar organization in this country. In all which it does it is replete with virility, abandon, brilliancy, magnificent tone coloring and an impressive reserve force which hints subtly at much that is not revealed but strongly suggested, which after all is one of the highest expressions of art in any of its various forms.

These splendid qualities are not precisely neutralized, but, to a certain degree, weakened by the freedom with which the conductor departs from the score, the unnecessary predominance of the brasses whenever used and the frequency with which the first violins overbalance the remainder of the string quartette. But when all has been said it must be confessed once and for all that there is a higher delight in listening to its performances than is offered by any other orchestra we are privileged to hear.

It was a mistake in the playing of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony to depart from classical precedent, as was done in the first and fourth movements, but there was much of compensation in the delightful rendering of the second and third movements, which were given with a sensuous beauty that was positively ravishing. In addition to the Tschaikowsky number to which we have already adverted, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," was also performed in an entirely satisfactory manner.

One of the chief charms of the concert was the singing of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who was heard first in a "Fata Morgana" for soprano and orchestra from Nicode's symphonic poem "The Sea" (two movements of which, it may be remembered, were played by the Philharmonic orchestra at its second concert), and a group of songs by Strauss, Chopin and Schumann. She has a sweet, pure voice and much of that quality which the French call "temperament," which enables one to sing from the heart and to touch the hearts of others, too. If she lack anything it is what might be called a sensibility of vocal touch, which she can cultivate, or, better still, borrow from her husband's hands, who played her accompaniments on the piano with delicious sympathy and subtle refinement.

Transcript,

Date 3/16

The 8th entertainment in the Stockbridge course will be given on Tuesday evening the 29th, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, sixty musicians, with [redacted] and Mrs. Nikisch, vocal soloist. Good seats can be had at Stockbridge's.

The Evening Post.

New York, Wednesday, March 16, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Nikisch has never given a more delightful concert in this city with his noble Boston Orchestra than he did last evening. Chickering Hall was crowded to the doors, and the interest of the concert increased so steadily that no one left before the end. Beethoven's seventh symphony opened the entertainment, and, barring the fact that the first movement seemed to us molto sostenato rather than poco sostenato, it was admirably interpreted and played. It was interesting to hear Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" and Liszt's "Préludes" within the same half-hour, not only because both are masterworks, but because one could see therefrom how Liszt has left his mark on modern composers by his orchestral as well as by his pianoforte works. Liszt's "Préludes" is almost forty years old, yet it sounds as modern and as fresh as if Dvorák or Richard Strauss had written it yesterday. Mrs. Nikisch provided an agreeable variety amid the orchestral selections by singing songs by R. Strauss, Chopin, Schumann, and Brahms, with Mr. Nikisch's delightful accompaniments at the piano. Her voice is at its best when supported by a rich accompaniment, and she was therefore heard to less advantage in Chopin's "Ringlein" than in her other selections, especially in the "Fata Morgana" from Nicodé's symphonic poem "The Sea." She was warmly applauded and obliged to add an extra number after Schumann's "Aufträge."

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS

No. 23 Park Row.

Wednesday Evening, March 16, 1892

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Fifth Concert at Chickering Hall—A Fine Performance.

The fifth of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts at Chickering Hall was given last evening to a very large and appreciative audience. The orchestral part of the programme consisted of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Tschaikowsky's overture fantasia, "Hamlet," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." To these was added an excerpt from Nicode's symphonic poem, "The Sea," for soprano and orchestra, and a group of songs by Richard Strauss, Chopin and Schumann, Mrs. Nikisch being the vocalist. The ever-welcome Beethoven symphony was beautifully played, and the varied dramatic effects, which form so striking a feature in Tschaikowsky's sonorous composition were superbly set forth. The "Preludes" also was brilliantly given under Mr. Nikisch's direction.

It is fortunate for Mrs. Nikisch that she has so admirable an accompanist as is found in her husband, unless, indeed, it may be that the listener's attention sometimes is diverted from the singer to the exquisite art with which the accompaniment is given. She was not heard to such good advantage last evening as at her recital, but her singing gave great pleasure to the audience. The Nicode selection was given with fine dramatic expression, and in the love songs her expressive voice, her earnestness and vivacity and her thoroughly lyrical style made her singing of them delightful.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 20, 1892.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel have again set foot on our shores and begin Tuesday a series of vocal recitals similar to those which so charmed our music lovers in former years and which have since made their names famous throughout Europe. These recitals are comparable with no other musical entertainment. They possess a charm, wholly their own, and afford a kind and degree of pleasure that it is difficult to characterize. It can be said of them that the enjoyment they afford is unalloyed. After singing in New York, Philadelphia and Washington they come to Boston and will be heard at the Meionian, on Thursday evening, March 29, and the afternoons of March 31, April 5 and 9. Subscription tickets for the series will be on sale next Monday at Music Hall, At the first recital Tuesday Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will sing in duet: "Quel onda che rovina," Padre Martini; duet from the "Taming of the Shrew," Goetz; duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village, Boieldieu; Mr. Henschel will sing "Der Doppelzanger," "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus," "Der Schiffer," Schubert; aria from "Il Maestro di Musica," Peroglesi; aria buffa from "Calandrino." Cimorosa; the Czar's song from "Czar and Carpenter," Lortzing, couplets de Vulcain, from "Philemon et Baucis," Gounod. Mrs. Henschel will sing Mingnon song, Beethoven; "Auf Flugeln des Gesanges," Mendelssohn; "In the Woods," Franz; "Romance," "Morgens als Lerche," "Der Bote," Henschel; aria, "Oh, Sleep," from "Semele," aria, "Qual farfaletta," from "Partenope," Handel.

Clipping No.

Clipping from Telegram
New York N.Y.

Date 3/12

The Nikisch song recital at Chickering Hall on Monday afternoon was well attended. Mrs. Nikisch, in spite of her recent illness, sang delightfully, being accompanied on the piano by Mr. Nikisch.

N.Y. Herald
3/13

The last New York concert but one of the Boston Orchestra this season will be given on Tuesday evening, in Chickering Hall, when the programme will be as follows:—Symphony No. 7, Beethoven; "Fata Morgana," for soprano and orchestra, from symphonic poem, "The Sea." Nicode; Ouverture-Fantasie, "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky; songs with piano, a, Staendchen, Richard Strauss; b, "Das Ringelein," Chopin; c, "Auftraege," Schumann; symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," Liszt. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will be the soloist.

SUN, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/13

The last concert but one of the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place at Chickering Hall next Tuesday evening. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch is to be the soloist, and the programme is as follows: 1, Symphony No. 7, Beethoven; 2, "Fata Morgana," for soprano and orchestra, from symphonic poem, "The Sea," Nicode; 3, Ouverture-Fantaisie, "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky; 4, Songs, with piano, (a) Staendchen, Richard Strauss; (b) "Das Ringelein," Chopin; (c) "Auftraege," Schumann; 5, Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," Liszt.

Season of 1892

Mr. & Mrs. Georg Henschel's

. . American Tour . .

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

Four Vocal Recitals

MEIONAON,
BOSTON.

Tuesday Evening, March 29, at 8.
Thursday Afternoon, March 31, }
Tuesday Afternoon, April 5, } at 2.30
Saturday Afternoon, April 9, }

Subscription tickets for the series of four Recitals, $5.00. Single tickets, $1.50. The sale of subscription tickets opens Monday, March 21, at Music Hall.

BRATTLE HALL, CAMBRIDGE.

1892

Tuesday Evening, March 22,
Wednesday Evening, March 30.
Tuesday Evening, April 19.

THREE CONCERTS
BY THE

KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL,
Mr. L. SVECENSKI,
Mr. OTTO ROTH,
Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

ASSISTING ARTISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.
MR. F. BUSONI.

Tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $3.00. Single Tickets, $1.25. On sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, March 19.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 19, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

One of the most expert and experienced lapidaries was wont to say that it was practically impossible to compare one jewel with another unless the two were side by side—to inspect one and then to judge another by the memory of it, even if only a few minutes of time and a few rods of space separated his first examination from the second. And so if one in a hundred of the Symphony audience could carry over from the eighteenth concert—even with all the support of previous acquaintance with the work—a sufficiently exact memory of Schumann's fourth symphony, as heretofore played, to enable him to detect and pass judgment upon the original version of that symphony, first heard here at the nineteenth concert, it was as much as could be reasonably expected. The professional musician might do so, and the connoisseur experienced in score-reading, if he had before him a copy of the standard edition, might recognize the differences in themes and perceive an unfamiliar treatment or the modifications in the distribution of parts and tone-colors. To make successfully the experiment which Mr. Nikisch tried most laudably in giving the two versions, both ought to have been played, movement by movement, on the same evening, and a carefully made synopsis, explaining the differences in a way which even moderately good musical scholars could understand and follow, should have been in every hand. Mr. Nikisch showed his enterprise in bringing this hitherto unknown score before his audience so soon after Brahms, who owns the manuscript of it, had made it public, and of course hundreds were glad to get the gist of so beautiful and favorite a symphony twice over; but we cannot help thinking that most of the differential details were lost on the hearers. The playing was generally excellent, and in directing it Mr. Nikisch held rather more closely to the evident intentions of the composer than at the previous concert. Praise is also to be awarded for a good rendering of Beethoven's second "Lenore" overture.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Eugen D'Albert, who then made his first appearance of the tour upon which he now enters under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis. He chose Beethoven's fifth pianoforte concerto, that superb creation in E-flat, which ends the master's short series of compositions in this form. Of Mr. D'Albert's command of his instrument, it is needless now to speak, for all the musical world knows it. This mastery, once used quite as much for personal display as to give art its proper support and strength, has gradually been turned to its right use, and he read the concerto with respect, giving its form definiteness and its sentiment vitality. We should have liked to find the final rondo just a degree more cheerful in pace and temper; but even a considerable reserve would be better than any excess of levity or speed. The performance was received at its full value and Mr. D'Albert was applauded to his heart's content.

There is no concert tonight. Next week Mme. Joachim will sing, and the orchestra will play from Glück, Beethoven and Brahms.

THE HENSCHEL RECITALS.

The arrival in this country of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will awaken a wide degree of interest among lovers of music, and already some twenty-four cities have secured dates for their unique recitals,—a sort of musical entertainment in giving which this talented pair have made delightful excursions over the whole civilized world, and charmed them as them did us a few years ago. It will be like a new sensation to have them again, as we shall when they come to Boston. Their dates here are Tuesday evening, March 29, and the afternoons of March 31, April 5 and 9 at the Meionaon. Subscription tickets for the series will go on sale at Music Hall on next Monday

---

RECORDER, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/14

The fifth rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Arthur Nikisch will be given at the Academy of Music on Friday afternoon, March 18. Eugene D'Albert will be the piano soloist. A choice programme has been prepared.

[illegible] Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3/13

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Modern and romantic music predominates in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's next program, which comprises Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, Saint-Saens' "Ronet d'Omphale," a movement from Grieg's "Peer Gyat," Wagner's "Huldigung's March" and Beethoven's E flat piano forte concerto, to be played by Eugen D'Albert. The date of the concert is Monday evening. It will take place at the Academy of Music. Seats at 1119 Chestnut street.

Clipping from TIMES, New York, N.

Date 3/13

—The last concert but one of the present series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening next. The programme is as follows: Symphony No. VII., Beethoven; "Fata Morgana," for soprano and orchestra, from symphonic poem, "The Sea," Nicode; overture-fantaisie, "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky; songs with piano, "Staendchen," Richard Strauss; "Das Ringelein," Chopin, and "Auftraege," Schumann; symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," Liszt. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will be the soloist.

BALTIMORE NEW

RIDAY EVENING, MARCH 18, 1892

D'ALBERT'S GREAT TRIUMPH.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Last Evening.

"Every seat taken, standing room all sold, and several hundred turned from the door, was the business record of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert at the Academy Concert Hall last evening. But this artistic triumph was far beyond that of the business part. Great expectations had been raised about D'Albert, now named the King of Pianists, but he surpassed the wildest expectations of the most enthusiastic.

The Chopin E minor concerto has been heard in Baltimore many times, but never like last night. The instrumentation of the concerto was the original or first one, although neither is Chopin's own work. It is thin, but, nevertheless, musical and poetic. But the rendition last night was beyond all praise. The blending of the piano and orchestral tones was perfection itself. The piano had been tuned to a shade, so that the piano and orchestral harmonies fairly ran together in undistinguishable melody.

This was especially notable in the dialogue between the bassoon and piano in the slow movement of the concerto. The piano is sometimes played as an accompaniment to the bassoon; or, taking the other extreme, the virtuoso destroys the beautiful tones of the soft, plaintive melody of the "low wood." But D'Albert's inspiration leads him through the middle course, and the tones of the two instruments are simply wedded. At the close of the movement he was cheered, and bravos rang from all parts of the house. The old-fashioned concerto, under D'Albert's magical touch and Nikisch's sympathetic direction, had the honors of the evening. It was a triumph in art that will never be forgotten in this city.

Not less perfect were the three piano solo numbers, to which he added the Rubinstein stocato etude. The listeners almost exhausted the dictionary, as well as fatigued their hands in the ovation that followed, and it was a good while before the programme could go on. The orchestra rendered a number of novelties which the listeners were hardly able to consider intellectually and intelligently because their ears and minds were so full of D'Albert. But the Tschaikowsky Hovelet overature, the Saint-Saens symphonin poem and Dvorak symphony were faithfully given, and by themselves would have made a programme of great excellence.

TIMES, Los Angeles, Cal.

Date 3/6

CRITICISM FROM THE HUB.

Even Anton Rubinstein, the arch enemy of Wagner, admits the greatness and beauty of his Faust overture, but a little thing like that does not deter a Boston man when once he "takes his pen in hand" to write musical criticism, as witness the following: "The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening opened with Wagner's inscrutable Faust overture. That ever-reliable incentive to acute melancholia has long been before a world more or less interested in discovering its meaning, but its mystery remains as elusive as ever. Some ingenuous but pervertedly imaginative people have from time to time plunged into its dark profound and returned panting to the surface with what they deemed an interpretation of its meaning, but they have not succeeded in making followers and have left the world as vague and as comfortless on the subject as it was before. As music this overture has the same frolicsome flexibility and the same winsome cheerfulness that are such pleasing qualities in abstruse problems in conic equations. As a tone poem it is lacking in that plainness of purpose and lucidity of treatment that characterize the equally cacophonous and no less fervid overtures that are poured forth in the silence of night under the moon, in broad catacoustics and simple but effective polyphony by wooing felines ignorant of any music but that of nature."

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 3-14

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Appearance Under the Auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will render carefully selected programmes at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Friday afternoon, March 18, at 3 o'clock, and Saturday evening, March 19, at 8:15 o'clock. The programme of the fifth rehearsal and concert, which takes place on these dates, includes the appearance of the soloist, Eugene D'Albert. Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," is one of the selections and will be given as a viola solo by Mr. Frank Kneisel. Beethoven's concerto for the piano in E flat, Opus No. 5, and Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes," and selections from Chopin, Schubert and Strauss-Tausig will also be rendered. This is the eleventh season of the orchestra, at present under the baton of Arthur Nikisch. The sixth and last rehearsal and concert will be given on Friday afternoon, April 29, at 3 o'clock and Saturday evening, April 30, at 8:15, at the same place and under the same auspices.

Season of 1892

Mr. & Mrs. Georg Henschel's

. . American Tour . .

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

Four Vocal Recitals

MEIONAON,
BOSTON.

Tuesday Evening, March 29, at 8.
Thursday Afternoon, March 31, }
Tuesday Afternoon, April 5, } at 2.30
Saturday Afternoon, April 9, }

Subscription tickets for the series of four Recitals, $5.00. Single tickets, $1.50. The sale of subscription tickets opens Monday, March 21, at Music Hall.

BRATTLE HALL, CAMBRIDGE.

1892

Tuesday Evening, March 22.
Wednesday Evening, March 30.
Tuesday Evening, April 19.

THREE CONCERTS

BY THE

KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Mr. L. SVECENSKI,
Mr. OTTO ROTH, Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

ASSISTING ARTISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.
MR. F. BUSONI.

Tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $3.00. Single Tickets, $1.25. On sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, March 19.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 19, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

One of the most expert and experienced lapidaries was wont to say that it was practically impossible to compare one jewel with another unless the two were side by side—to inspect one and then to judge another by the memory of it, even if only a few minutes of time and a few rods of space separated his first examination from the second. And so if one in a hundred of the Symphony audience could carry over from the eighteenth concert—even with all the support of previous acquaintance with the work—a sufficiently exact memory of Schumann's fourth symphony, as heretofore played, to enable him to detect and pass judgment upon the original version of that symphony, first heard here at the nineteenth concert, it was as much as could be reasonably expected. The professional musician might do so, and the connoisseur experienced in score-reading, if he had before him a copy of the standard edition, might recognize the differences in themes and perceive an unfamiliar treatment or the modifications in the distribution of parts and tone-colors. To make successfully the experiment which Mr. Nikisch tried most laudably in giving the two versions, both ought to have been played, movement by movement, on the same evening, and a carefully made synopsis, explaining the differences in a way which even moderately good musical scholars could understand and follow, should have been in every hand. Mr. Nikisch showed his enterprise in bringing this hitherto unknown score before his audience so soon after Brahms, who owns the manuscript of it, had made it public, and of course hundreds were glad to get the gist of so beautiful and favorite a symphony twice over; but we cannot help thinking that most of the differential details were lost on the hearers. The playing was generally excellent, and in directing it Mr. Nikisch held rather more closely to the evident intentions of the composer than at the previous concert. Praise is also to be awarded for a good rendering of Beethoven's second "Lenore" overture.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Eugen D'Albert, who then made his first appearance of the tour upon which he now enters under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis. He chose Beethoven's fifth pianoforte concerto, that superb creation in E-flat, which ends the master's short series of compositions in this form. Of Mr. D'Albert's command of his instrument, it is needless now to speak, for all the musical world knows it. This mastery, once used quite as much for personal display as to give art its proper support and strength, has gradually been turned to its right use, and he read the concerto with respect, giving its form definiteness and its sentiment vitality. We should have liked to find the final rondo just a degree more cheerful in pace and temper; but even a considerable reserve would be better than any excess of levity or speed. The performance was received at its full value and Mr. D'Albert was applauded to his heart's content.

There is no concert tonight. Next week Mme. Joachim will sing, and the orchestra will play from Glück, Beethoven and Brahms.

THE HENSCHEL RECITALS.

The arrival in this country of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will awaken a wide degree of interest among lovers of music, and already some twenty-four cities have secured dates for their unique recitals,—a sort of musical entertainment in giving which this talented pair have made delightful excursions over the whole civilized world, and charmed them as them did us a few years ago. It will be like a new sensation to have them again, as we shall when they come to Boston. Their dates here are Tuesday evening, March 29, and the afternoons of March 31, April 5 and 9 at the Meionaon. Subscription tickets for the series will go on sale at Music Hall on next Monday

---

RECORDER, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/14

The fifth rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Arthur Nikisch will be given at the Academy of Music on Friday afternoon, March 18. Eugene D'Albert will be the piano soloist. A choice programme has been prepared.

Date 3/13

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Modern and romantic music predominates in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's next program, which comprises Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, Saint-Saens' "Ronet d'Omphale," a movement from Grieg's "Peer Gyat," Wagner's "Huldigung's March" and Beethoven's E flat piano forte concerto, to be played by Eugen D'Albert. The date of the concert is Monday evening. It will take place at the Academy of Music. Seats at 1119 Chestnut street.

Clipping from TIMES, New York, N.

Date 3/13

—The last concert but one of the present series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening next. The programme is as follows: Symphony No. VII., Beethoven; "Fata Morgana," for soprano and orchestra, from symphonic poem, "The Sea," Nicode; overture-fantaisie, "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky; songs with piano, "Staendchen," Richard Strauss; "Das Ringelein," Chopin, and "Auftraege," Schumann; symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," Liszt. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will be the soloist.

THE BALTIMORE NEWS.

FRIDAY EVENING, MARCH 18, 1892.

D'ALBERT'S GREAT TRIUMPH.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Last Evening.

"Every seat taken, standing room all sold, and several hundred turned from the door, was the business record of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert at the Academy Concert Hall last evening. But this artistic triumph was far beyond that of the business part. Great expectations had been raised about D'Albert, now named the King of Pianists, but he surpassed the wildest expectations of the most enthusiastic.

The Chopin E minor concerto has been heard in Baltimore many times, but never like last night. The instrumentation of the concerto was the original or first one, although neither is Chopin's own work. It is thin, but, nevertheless, musical and poetic. But the rendition last night was beyond all praise. The blending of the piano and orchestral tones was perfection itself. The piano had been tuned to a shade, so that the piano and orchestral harmonies fairly ran together in undistinguishable melody.

This was especially notable in the dialogue between the bassoon and piano in the slow movement of the concerto. The piano is sometimes played as an accompaniment to the bassoon; or, taking the other extreme, the virtuoso destroys the beautiful tones of the soft, plaintive melody of the "low wood." But D'Albert's inspiration leads him through the middle course, and the tones of the two instruments are simply wedded. At the close of the movement he was cheered, and bravos rang from all parts of the house. The old-fashioned concerto, under D'Albert's magical touch and Nikisch's sympathetic direction, had the honors of the evening. It was a triumph in art that will never be forgotten in this city.

Not less perfect were the three piano solo numbers, to which he added the Rubinstein stocato etude. The listeners almost exhausted the dictionary, as well as fatigued their hands in the ovation that followed, and it was a good while before the programme could go on. The orchestra rendered a number of novelties which the listeners were hardly able to consider intellectually and intelligently because their ears and minds were so full of D'Albert. But the Tschaikowsky Hovelet overature, the Saint-Saens symphonin poem and Dvorak symphony were faithfully given, and by themselves would have made a programme of great excellence.

TIMES, Los Angeles, Cal.

Date

CRITICISM FROM THE HUB.

Even Anton Rubinstein, the arch enemy of Wagner, admits the greatness and beauty of his Faust overture, but a little thing like that does not deter a Boston man when once he "takes his pen in hand" to write musical criticism, as witness the following: "The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening opened with Wagner's inscrutable Faust overture. That ever-reliable incentive to acute melancholia has long been before a world more or less interested in discovering its meaning, but its mystery remains as elusive as ever. Some ingenuous but pervertedly imaginative people have from time to time plunged into its dark profound and returned panting to the surface with what they deemed an interpretation of its meaning, but they have not succeeded in making followers and have left the world as vague and as comfortless on the subject as it was before. As music this overture has the same frolicsome flexibility and the same winsome cheerfulness that are such pleasing qualities in abstruse problems in conic equations. As a tone poem it is lacking in that plainness of purpose and lucidity of treatment that characterize the equally cacophonous and no less fervid overtures that are poured forth in the silence of night under the moon, in broad catacoustics and simple but effective polyphony by wooing felines ignorant of any music but that of nature."

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 3-14

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Appearance Under the Auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will render carefully selected programmes at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Friday afternoon, March 18, at 3 o'clock, and Saturday evening, March 19, at 8:15 o'clock. The programme of the fifth rehearsal and concert, which takes place on these dates, includes the appearance of the soloist, Eugene D'Albert. Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," is one of the selections and will be given as a viola solo by Mr. Frank Kneisel. Beethoven's concerto for the piano in E flat, Opus No. 5, and Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes," and selections from Chopin, Schubert and Strauss-Tausig will also be rendered. This is the eleventh season of the orchestra, at present under the baton of Arthur Nikisch. The sixth and last rehearsal and concert will be given on Friday afternoon, April 29, at 3 o'clock and Saturday evening, April 30, at 8:15, at the same place and under the same auspices.

[153]

MEIONAON, - - - - BOSTON

FIRST RECITAL

Tuesday Evening, March 29, at 8 o'clock.

. . PROGRAMME . .

DUET. "Quel onda che rovina." . . . Padre Martini
Mr. and Mrs. HENSCHEL.

a Aria, "Oh, Sleep," from "Semele." b Aria, "Qual farfaletta," from "Partenope." . . . Handel
Mrs. HENSCHEL.

a Aria from "Il Maestro di Musica." . . . Pergolesi
b Aria Buffa from "Calandrino." . . . Cimarosa
Mr. HENSCHEL.

a Mignon's Song. . . . Beethoven
b "Auf Flügeln des Gesanges." . . . Mendelssohn
c "In the Woods." . . . Franz
Mrs. HENSCHEL.

a "Der Doppelzänger."
b "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus." . . . Schubert
c "Der Schiffer."
Mr. HENSCHEL.

DUET from the "Taming of the Shrew." . . . Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. HENSCHEL.

a Romance.
b "Morgens als Lerche." (New.) . . . Henschel
c "Der Bote."
Mrs. HENSCHEL.

a The Czar's Song, from "Czar and Carpenter." . . . Lortzing
b Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philemon et Baucis." . . . Gounod
Mr. HENSCHEL.

DUET from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village." . . . Boieldieu
Mr. and Mrs. HENSCHEL.

MEIONAON, - - - - BOSTON

SECOND RECITAL

Thursday Afternoon, March 31, at 2.30 o'clock.

. . PROGRAMME . .

DUETTO BUFFO. "La cosa non va netta." . . . Paisiello
Mr. and Mrs. HENSCHEL.

a "Vergissmeinnicht." . . . J. S. Bach
b Serenata from "Agrippina."
c Recitative and Air from "Susanna." . . . Handel
Mr. HENSCHEL.

a "It was a Lover and his Lass." . . . (Old English)
b "Polly Willis," . . . Dr. Arne
c "The Glen of Kenmare." . . . (Old Irish)
Mrs. HENSCHEL.

a "Die Mainacht."
b "Sontags."
c "Unüberwindlich." . . . Brahms
Mr. HENSCHEL.

a "Lullaby." . . . Tschaikowsky
b Mignon's Song. . . . Liszt
c "O Sun that wakenest." . . . F. Corder
Mrs. HENSCHEL.

DUET from "Faust." . . . Schumann
Mr. and Mrs. HENSCHEL.

a Crugantino's Song from Goethe's "Claudine von Villa Bella" (1790). Beethoven
b BALLAD, "Die verfallene Mühle." . . . Loewe
Mr. HENSCHEL.

a Polish Song. . . . Paderewski
b "Sérénade du Passant." . . . Massenet
c GAVOTTE, "Il faut aimer." . . . Sgambati
Mrs. HENSCHEL.

DUET from "Hamlet." . . . Ambroise Thomas
Mr. and Mrs. HENSCHEL.

BRATTLE HALL, CAMBRIDGE.

❧1892❧

Tuesday Evening, March 22,
Wednesday Evening, March 30.
Tuesday Evening, April 19.

THREE CONCERTS

BY THE

KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Mr. L. SVECENSKI,
Mr. OTTO ROTH, Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

ASSISTING ARTISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.
MR. F. BUSONI.

Tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $3.00. Single Tickets, $1.25. On sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, March 19.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Beac

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MA

THE SYMPHONY CO

One of the most expert ar lapidaries was wont to say th
tically impossible to compare another unless the two were s inspect one and then to judge memory of it, even if only a time and a few rods of spac
first examination from the seco
one in a hundred of the Sym could carry over from the eight even with all the support quaintance with the work exact memory of Schumann's fo
as heretofore played, to enable and pass judgment upon the
of that symphony, first hear nineteenth concert, it was as
be reasonably expected. Th musician might do so, and the perienced in score-reading, if
him a copy of the standard recognize the differences in t
ceive an unfamiliar treatment tions in the distribution of colors. To make successfully which Mr. Nikisch tried in giving the two version to have been played, movemen
on the same evening, and a synopsis, explaining the diffe which even moderately good n could understand and follo been in every hand. Mr. Nik enterprise in bringing this hi
score before his audience
Brahms, who owns the manu
made it public, and of course glad to get the gist of so bea
ite a symphony twice over;
help thinking that most of th
tails were lost on the hearers was generally excellent, and in Nikisch held rather more cl dent intentions of the comp previous concert. Praise is a ed for a good rendering of Bee
"Lenore" overture.

The soloist of the evening
D'Albert, who then made h ance of the tour upon which under the management o
Ellis. He chose Beethoven forte concerto, that su in E-flat, which ends the mast of compositions in this form.
bert's command of his instru less now to speak, for all the knows it. This mastery, onc much for personal display as proper support and strength
been turned to its right use, concerto with respect, giving ness and its sentiment vitalit have liked to find the final r gree more cheerful in pace an even a considerable reserve
than any excess of levity or s formance was received at its
Mr. D'Albert was applaudec content.

There is no concert tonig
Mme. Joachim will sing, and will play from Glück, Beethov

THE HENSCHEL R

The arrival in this country
Georg Henschel will awake of interest among lovers of m some twenty-four cities hav for their unique recitals,—a entertainment in giving whi pair have made delightful ex whole civilized world, and
them did us a few years ago.
new sensation to have them
when they come to Boston.
are Tuesday evening, March
noons of March 31, April
Meionaon. Subscription tic will go on sale at Music Hal

RECORDER, New York, N. Y

Date 3/14

The fifth rehearsal of the Boston Sympho chestra under Arthur Nikisch will be given
Academy of Music on Friday afternoon, Ma
Eugene D'Albert will be the piano soloist. A programme has been prepared.

Date 3/13

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Modern and romantic music predomin
in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program, which comprises Berlioz's " old in Italy" symphony, Saint-Saens' "R d'Omphale," a movement from Gr
"Peer Gyat," Wagnor's "Huldigu
March" and Beethoven's E flat piano concerto, to be played by Eugen D'Al
The date of the concert is Monday even
It will take place at the Academy of M
Seats at 1119 Chestnut street.

Clipping from TIMES, New York

Date 3/13

—The last concert but one of the present s
given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra place at Chickering Hall on Tuesday eve next. The programme is as follows: Symp
No. VII., Beethoven; "Fata Morgana," soprano and orchestra, from symphonic
"The Sea," Nicode; overture-fantaisie, " let," Tschaikowsky; songs with piano, "St chen," Richard Strauss; "Das Ringelein," pin, and "Auftraege," Schumann; symp poem, "Les Preludes," Liszt. Mrs. A
Nikisch will be the soloist.

MEIONAON, - - - - BOSTON

THIRD RECITAL

Tuesday Afternoon, April 5, at 2.30 o'clock.

. . PROGRAMME . .

DUET from "Giulio Cesare." . . . . Handel
Mr. and Mrs. HENSCHEL.

a Song of the Harem-keeper from "Il Seraglio." . . . . . Mozart
b Aria from "Orfeo." . . . . Haydn
c Busslied. . . . . Beethoven
Mr. HENSCHEL.

a Mignon's Song.
b "Auf dem Wasser zu singen." . . . . . . Schubert
c "Geheimes."
Mrs. HENSCHEL.

a BALLAD, "Die Löwenbraut." . . . . Schumann
b BALLAD, "The Erl-king." . . . . Loewe
Mr. HENSCHEL.

a "Le Soir." . . . . Ambroise Thomas b Air from "Samson et Dalila." . . . . Saint-Saëns
c Vieille Chanson. . . . . Bizet
Mrs. HENSCHEL.

DUET, "Drei Schlösser" (new). . . . . Henschel
Mr. and Mrs. HENSCHEL.

a "Der Asra."
b Persisches Lied. . . . . Rubinstein
c Song from the "Magellone." . . . . Brahms
Mr. HENSCHEL.

a BALLAD, "There was an Ancient King."
b Four "Lieder im Volkston." . . . . Henschel
Mrs. HENSCHEL.

Duetto Buffo from "Don Pasquale." . . . . Donizetti
Mr. and Mrs. HENSCHEL.

MEIONAON, - - - - BOSTON

FOURTH RECITAL

Saturday Afternoon, April 9, at 2.30 o'clock.

. . PROGRAMME . .

TWO DUETS. a From "Joseph." . . . . Méhul
b From "Richard Cœur de Lion." . . . . . Grétry
Mr. and Mrs. HENSCHEL.

a "If thou thy Heart bestowest." . . . . Giovannini
b "Le Portrait." . . . . Pacini
c "La Charmante Marguerite." . . . . (Old French)
Mrs. HENSCHEL.

a BALLAD, "Belsatzar." . . . . Schumann
b BALLAD, "Die Vätergruft." . . . . Liszt
Mr. HENSCHEL.

a Schlummerlied from the "Magellone."
b "Des Mädchen's Fluch." . . . . Brahms
Mrs. HENSCHEL.

BALLAD, "Archibald Douglas." . . . . Loewe
Mr. HENSCHEL.

TWO DUETS. . . . . Saint-Saëns
Mr. and Mrs. HENSCHEL.

a "Dov' è la Lorella?" . . . . Henschel
b "The Little Red Lark." . . . . (Old Irish)
c May Song. . . . . A. Hervey
Mrs. HENSCHEL.

a BALLAD, "Jung Dieterich." . . . . Henschel
b BALLAD, "The Grenadiers." . . . . Schumann
Mr. HENSCHEL.

DUET, "Gondoliera." . . . . Henschel
Mr. and Mrs. HENSCHEL.

BRATTLE HALL, CAMBRIDGE.

1892

Tuesday Evening, March 22,
Wednesday Evening, March 30.
Tuesday Evening, April 19.

THREE CONCERTS

BY THE

KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Mr. L. SVECENSKI,
Mr. OTTO ROTH, Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

ASSISTING ARTISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.
MR. F. BUSONI.

Tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $3.00. Single Tickets, $1.25. On sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, March 19.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Beac
BOSTON, SATURDAY, MA

THE SYMPHONY CO

One of the most expert an lapidaries was wont to say th
tically impossible to compare another unless the two were s inspect one and then to judge memory of it, even if only a time and a few rods of spac
first examination from the seco
one in a hundred of the Sym could carry over from the eight even with all the support
quaintance with the work
exact memory of Schumann's fo
as heretofore played, to enable
and pass judgment upon the
of that symphony, first hear nineteenth concert, it was as
be reasonably expected. Th musician might do so, and the perienced in score-reading, if
him a copy of the standard recognize the differences in t
ceive an unfamiliar treatment
tions in the distribution of colors. To make successfully which Mr. Nikisch tried in giving the two version to have been played, movemen
on the same evening, and a synopsis, explaining the diffe which even moderately good
could understand and follo
been in every hand. Mr. Nik enterprise in bringing this hi
score before his audience
Brahms, who owns the manu
made it public, and of course
glad to get the gist of so bea
ite a symphony twice over;
help thinking that most of th
tails were lost on the hearers
was generally excellent, and in Nikisch held rather more cl
dent intentions of the comp previous concert. Praise is a ed for a good rendering of Bee
"Lenore" overture.
The soloist of the evening
D'Albert, who then made h
ance of the tour upon which under the management
Ellis. He chose Beethove
forte concerto, that s in E-flat, which ends the mas
of compositions in this form
bert's command of his instru
less now to speak, for all the knows it. This mastery, on much for personal display a proper support and strength
been turned to its right use,
concerto with respect, giving ness and its sentiment vitali have liked to find the final gree more cheerful in pace a
even a considerable reserve
than any excess of levity or s formance was received at its
Mr. D'Albert was applaude
content.
There is no concert tonig
Mme. Joachim will sing, an will play from Glück, Beetho

THE HENSCHEL

The arrival in this country
Georg Henschel will awake of interest among lovers of m
some twenty-four cities ha for their unique recitals,— entertainment in giving wh pair have made delightful ex
whole civilized world, and
them did us a few years ago.
new sensation to have them
when they come to Boston.
are Tuesday evening, March
noons of March 31, April
Meionaon. Subscription tic will go on sale at Music Ha

RECORDER, New York, N.
3/14
Date ....
The fifth rehearsal of the Boston Symph
chestra under Arthur Nikisch will be given
Academy of Music on Friday afternoon, Ma
Eugene D'Albert will be the piano soloist.
programme has been prepared.

3/13
Date ....
The Boston Symphony Concert
Modern and romantic music predomi
in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program, which comprises Berlioz's
old in Italy" symphony, Saint-Saens' d'Omphale," a movement from G
"Peer Gynt," Wagner's "Huldig
March" and Beethoven's E flat piano concerto, to be played by Eugen D'A
The date of the concert is Monday eve
It will take place at the Academy of
Seats at 1119 Chestnut street.

Clipping from ....
TIMES, New Yor
3/13
Date ....
—The last concert but one of the present
given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra place at Chickering Hall on Tuesday e next. The programme is as follows: Sym
No. VII., Beethoven; "Fata Morgana, soprano and orchestra, from symphonic
"The Sea," Nicodé; overture-fantaisie, let," Tschaikowsky; songs with piano, "S
chen," Richard Strauss; "Das Ringelein, pin, and "Auftraege," Schumann; sym
poem, "Les Preludes," Liszt. Mrs. A
Nikisch will be the soloist.

. . PRESS NOTICES . .

"In these two singers the public is treated to a spectacle of most rare and happy union of vocal gifts, taste, and intelligence." N. Y. Times.

"Mr. and Mrs. Henschel filled an hour and a half of the afternoon with delightful music at Chickering Hall."—N. Y. Tribune.

"Replete with interest in every part."—N. Y. Sun.

"There are few musical pupils who could not learn a valuable lesson by attending one of these recitals."—N. Y. Evening Post.

"A delightful entertainment."—N. Y. Herald.

"Both are admirable vocalists, and their cultured style enables them to interpret every form of song that the refined amateur cares to listen to."—London Musical Times.

"Every number of the programme was performed in the perfect style to which both artists have accustomed their hearers."—London Saturday Review, Feb. 13, 1892.

"The visitors seemed positively enraptured by the singing of the talented couple."—London Black and White, Feb. 6, 1892.

"On Wednesday afternoon Mr. and Mrs. Henschel gave the second of their delightful vocal recitals, and St. James Hall was crowded."—London Despatch, Feb. 14, 1892.

BRATTLE HALL, CAMBRIDGE.

1892

Tuesday Evening, March 22,
Wednesday Evening, March 30.
Tuesday Evening, April 19.

THREE CONCERTS
BY THE
KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Mr. L. SVECENSKI,
Mr. OTTO ROTH, Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

ASSISTING ARTISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.
MR. F. BUSONI.

Tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $3.00. Single Tickets, $1.25. On sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, March 19.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Beaco

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MA

THE SYMPHONY CON

One of the most expert an lapidaries was wont to say tha tically impossible to compare another unless the two were si inspect one and then to judge memory of it, even if only a f time and a few rods of space
first examination from the seco
one in a hundred of the Symp could carry over from the eighte
even with all the support
quaintance with the work—
exact memory of Schumann's fo
as heretofore played, to enable
and pass judgment upon the
of that symphony, first heard nineteenth concert, it was as
be reasonably expected. Th musician might do so, and the perienced in score-reading, if
him a copy of the standard recognize the differences in t
ceive an unfamiliar treatment tions in the distribution of p colors. To make successfully which Mr. Nikisch tried in giving the two version to have been played, movemen
on the same evening, and a synopsis, explaining the diffe
which even moderately good could understand and follo been in every hand. Mr. Niki enterprise in bringing this hi
score before his audience
Brahms, who owns the manu
made it public, and of course
glad to get the gist of so bea
ite a symphony twice over;
help thinking that most of the tails were lost on the hearers
was generally excellent, and in Nikisch held rather more cl
dent intentions of the comp previous concert. Praise is a ed for a good rendering of Bee
"Lenore" overture.

The soloist of the evening
D'Albert, who then made ance of the tour upon which
under the management
Ellis. He chose Beethove
forte concerto, that s in E-flat, which ends the mas
of compositions in this form
bert's command of his instru
less now to speak, for all the knows it. This mastery, on much for personal display a proper support and strength
been turned to its right use,
concerto with respect, giving ness and its sentiment vitali have liked to find the final gree more cheerful in pace a
even a considerable reserve
than any excess of levity or s formance was received at it
Mr. D'Albert was applaude
content.

There is no concert toni
Mme. Joachim will sing, an will play from Glück, Beetho

THE HENSCHEL

The arrival in this countr
Georg Henschel will awak of interest among lovers of some twenty-four cities ha
for their unique recitals,— entertainment in giving w pair have made delightful e whole civilized world, and
them did us a few years ago
new sensation to have them
when they come to Boston.
are Tuesday evening, Marc noons of March 31, Apr Meionaon. Subscription ti will go on sale at Music Ha

RECORDER, New York, N.

Date 3/14

The fifth rehearsal of the Boston Symp chestra under Arthur Nikisch will be give Academy of Music on Friday afternoon, M
Eugene D'Albert will be the piano soloist.
programme has been prepared.

[illegible] Philadelphia,

Date 3/13

The Boston Symphony Conce

Modern and romantic music predom in the Boston Symphony Orchestra' program, which comprises Berlioz's
old in Italy" symphony, Saint-Saens' d'Omphale," a movement from
"Peer Gynt," Wagner's "Huld March" and Beethoven's E flat pian concerto, to be played by Eugen D'
The date of the concert is Monday e
It will take place at the Academy of
Seats at 1119 Chestnut street.

Clipping from TIMES, New Yo

Date 3/13

—The last concert but one of the presen given by the Boston Symphony Orchest place at Chickering Hall on Tuesday next. The programme is as follows: Sy
No. VII., Beethoven; "Fata Morgan soprano and orchestra, from symphoni
"The Sea," Nicode; overture-fantaisie, let," Tschaikowsky; songs with piano, "
chen," Richard Strauss; "Das Ringelei piu, and "Auftraege," Schumann; sy poem, "Les Preludes," Liszt. Mrs.
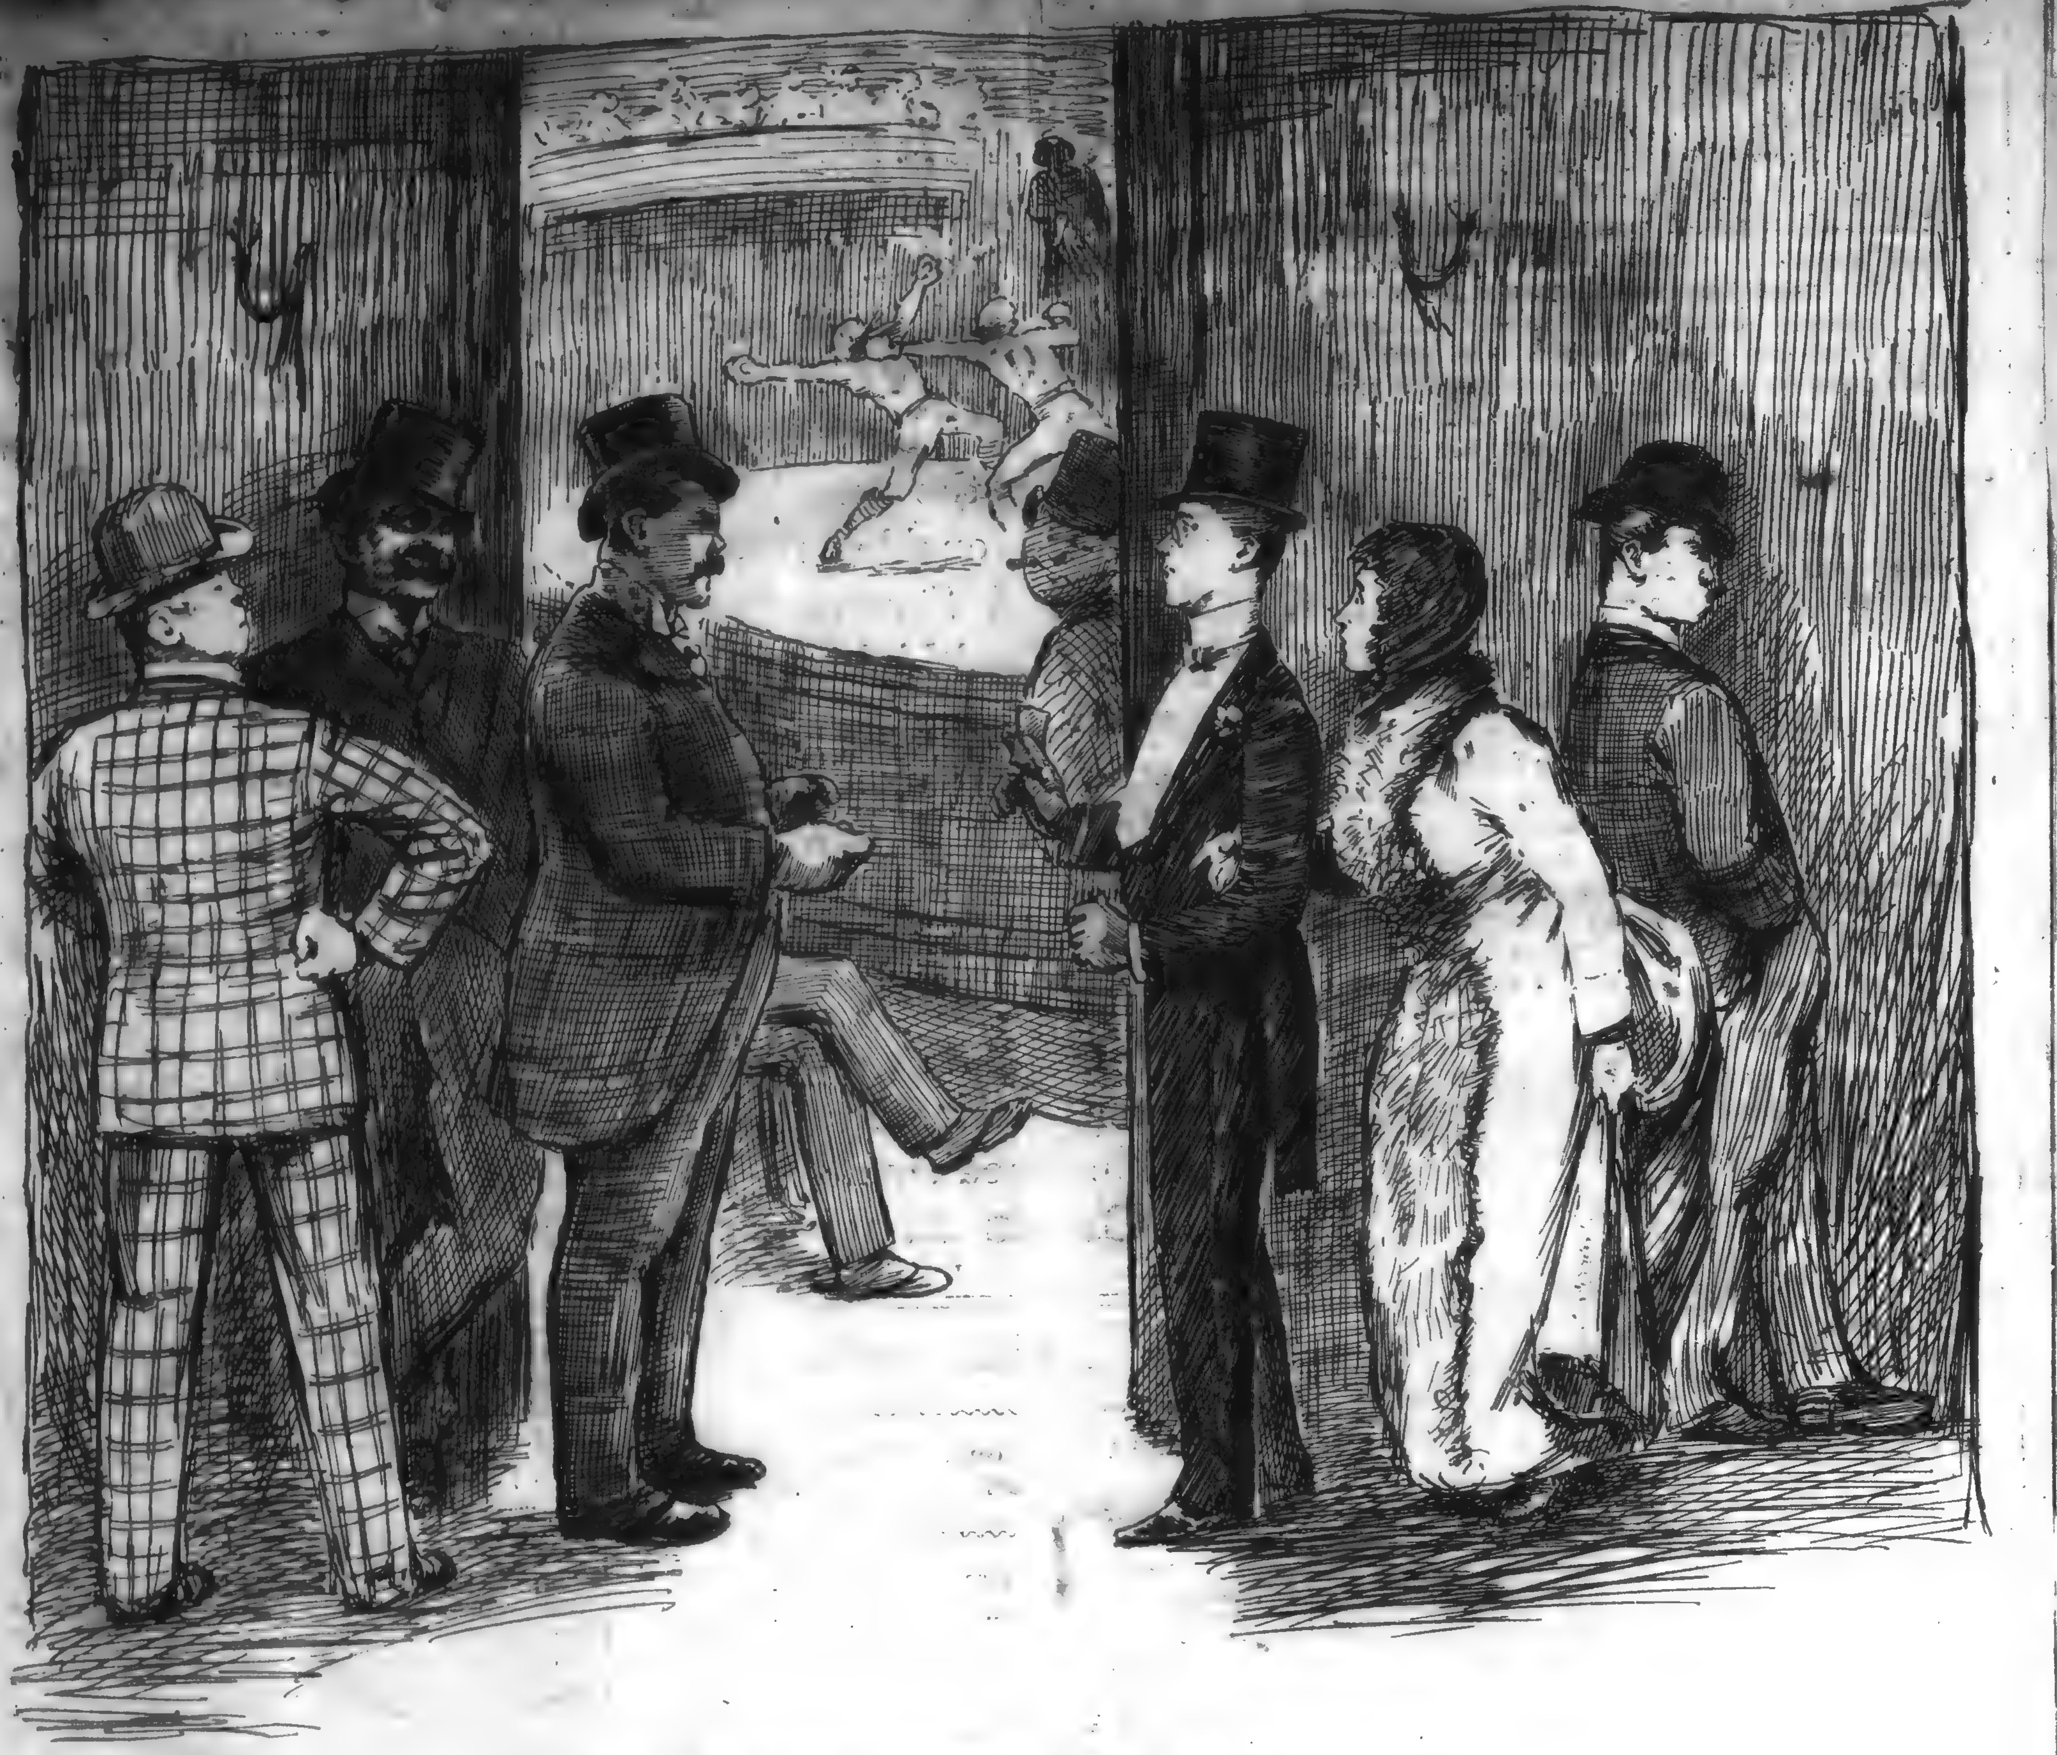
Nikisch will be the soloist.

THE BEACON BOSTON, MASS., SATURDAY MORNING, MARCH 19, 1892.



AN OFF NIGHT FOR THE SYMPHONY.

(Mr. and Mrs. Algernon Browning have tickets for the Symphony concert.)
THE CROWD—Get on to the dude comin' in with his girl.
DOORKEEPER—Them ain't no good here.
MR. AND MRS. BROWNING (together)—What, is this not the Symphony night?
DOORKEEPER—Don't know nothing 'bout Sinfonus. WE'RE running a sluggin' match.

Philadelphia Music and Drama
Saturday, March 19, 1892.

The Boston Symphony.

On last Monday evening the Niksch Orchestra gave its fifth concert of the season before a crowded audience at the Academy of Music. The orchestra exhibited the traits of refinement and subordination which have attached to these players ever since the Gericke days. Mr. Nikisch is no less repressive in his directing than was Mr. Gericke, but he shows more originality and much more sentiment in his interpretations. An undue fondness for extreme pianissimo effects was noticeable, but the audience enjoyed each occasion of it, and applauded to the echo. The largely increased string force of the orchestra has in no wise overbalanced it, and the leading wood and brass instruments were played with beautiful tone quality in every instance where they were given leading subjects.

The program was uncommonly attractive, and the old and new music were pleasantly distributed. The important numbers were Berlioz's "Harold" Symphony and Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto. The Symphony is a most interesting composition, and opportunities to hear it are far too infrequent. It was played here many years ago by the Thomas orchestra with Mr. Charles Bætens, as viola soloist. The solo was played with beautiful tone and artistic expression on the present occasion by Mr. Franz Kneisel. The symphony "Harold in Italy," has a history. It was composed by Berlioz in 1834, at the suggestion of the famous violinist, Paganini, who desired him to compose a concerto for viola. The symphony was the result, but it strayed so far beyond the boundaries of Paganini's wishes that he never played it in public. It is the fourth of Berlioz's symphonies in date of composition, and as the name implies, it has a shadowy self-portraiture. It is music of a lofty order, and the instrumentation is crowded with all the wealth of splendid effects for which this remarkable composer is entitled to a place far up towards Beethoven himself. The march in the second movement was performed at the composer's funeral in 1869. The first movement, however, with the lovely theme for viola, afterwards repeated and adorned with the utmost splendor of orchestration, is the most important section of the symphony.

The "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven was heard under very satisfactory conditions on this occasion. The rich and manifold beauties of the orchestral parts, which form a symphony in themselves, were wonderfully executed from first to last. The pianist, Mr. Eugene D'Albert is entirely worthy to interpret this august composition. He has had no equal among the long list of great players who have been listened to here since Rubinstein's departure. His reception was of the heartiest character. At the close of three well contrasted solos which he played in a later portion of the program he was induced, after prolonged applause, to play again. The remaining selections during the concert were Saint-Sæns, Symphonic Poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale," the scene of Aase's death from Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite and the old time Wagnerian favorite, Huldigung's March.

J. BUNTING.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will give two matinee vocal recitals at the Chestnut Street Opera House next week Tuesday and Friday.

Among the coming musical events of interest will be the Fourth Annual Conven-

---

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 20, 1892.

THE HENSCHEL CONCERTS.

Once more we are to hear Mr. and Mrs. Henschel in their unique vocal recitals. These favorites of Boston are now equally favorites of English and continental music-lovers and their appearances are welcome occasions there as well as in this country. Concerning them, we have heretofore expressed an opinion and can only repeat that they are among the finest exponents of songs and leider that have sung in the city. Their cultured and finished art and their absorption in the music produce a wonderfully fascinating effect on the listener and reveal possibilities in music that were before only imagined. They will come to Boston on March 29 to begin a series of four recitals at the Meionaon. The first one is in the evening of that day, and the other three on the afternoons of March 31, April 5 and 9.

Subscription tickets for the series will be placed on sale Monday morning at Music hall.

THE SYMPHONIES.

NINETEENTH CONCERT.

The programme for the nineteenth concert of the Symphony orchestra in Music hall Saturday evening, March 12, was:

Beethoven. Overture. "Lenore, No. 2."
Beethoven. Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat.
Allegro.—Adagio un poco mosso.—Rondo (Allegro).
Schumann. Symphony No. 4, op. 120.
Andante con moto.—Allegro di molto.—Romanza.—Scherzo. Largo.—Finale.
(Original version first time.)
Soloist:—Mr. Eugen D'Albert.

If our memory serves us rightly, we heard the Gewandhaus orchestra give this original version of Schumann's great D minor symphony twice. Whatever may be said concerning the two versions, there is no question about the second being far the best. This fact being conceded, we can only speak of the revised version as one of the great masterpieces of Schumann: in it he tries to picture to the world a life-like tone picture of his inmost soul. Whether he has succeeded in this or not, is an open question, one which each must answer for himself. There are beautiful passages in the work which appeal directly to the innermost soul, while there are others exactly the opposite, almost revolting. The treatment of the themes is ingenious, scholarly and vigorous, like most of this master's compositions. There are strong reminders of Wagner's music in the brass effects, but of course it was Wagner who copied, not Schumann. No fault can be found with Mr. Nikisch's reading of the score, the whole symphony being well and [illegible] played by his orchestra.

The E flat concerto of Beethoven, the ne plus ultra of pianoforte concertos, was the chief attraction of the evening, because that "little giant," as Liszt called him, was to be in command. It matters not what people may say, one thing is absolutely certain: Mr. D'Albert knows how, has the technique, the physique, and the true perception to play Beethoven's music in an honest, straightforward, vigorous manner, as tradition says it must be played. There are no moments of effeminacy or mawkish sentiment about D'Albert's Beethoven playing, not a bit. The moment the first chord was struck, there was a feeling that a master-hand was at the helm, and no fears were entertained that it would not remain so to the end. So far as we remember, the concerto has never received a more noteworthy or satisfactory presentation in Boston. It was quite evident that the soloist suffered somewhat from nervousness, owing in a measure, no doubt, to fears that the orchestra would not fully support him. While they were not entirely perfect in this respect, they did much better than at some other times during the season. The whole work of D'Albert was marked by a brilliant, clean-cut technique, an intense force and power in interpretive skill, not equalled, or at least not surpassed, by any pianist who has gone before. In response to a persistent encore, D'Albert played a rather sombre piece, we think by Liszt.

The second "Lenore" overture has quite a lengthy history, but it is not necessary to go into it here. Suffice it to say, the Third symphony, so often played here, is a much more elaborated form of almost the identical themes contained in the second, and certainly is the one best suited to our taste.

The orchestral work of the evening was more than usually satisfactory, and from our position down-stairs, instead of way up, the brasses did not produce the headache they often have in the past. After a tour of observation around the musical circle, the orchestra will return with new laurels and gay feathers, giving the next concert, Saturday evening, March 26. Madame Amalie Joachim will be the soloist. She is the wife of the greatest violinist (so thought) in the world. Thirty years ago the madame was the great singer of Berlin's Royal opera, but retired many years since from an overtaxed and worn voice.

JAMES M. TRACY.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 20, 1892.

The Henschel Recitals.

Four vocal recitals by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, who have just arrived in this country, will be given in the Meionaon on Tuesday evening, March 29, and the afternoons of March 31, April 5 and 9. Concerning these artists much might be said, but they are so well known and admired in Boston that this is hardly necessary.

Their long residence here and the delights experienced when they sang and appeared in concert warrant the most pleasant anticipations for the coming visit. It will please their friends to know that their artistic and social career in England and over Europe has been a remarkably successful one, and their recitals have been among the events in musical circles there.

The sale of subscription tickets to this series of four recitals opens Monday morning at Music Hall.

The Symphony concert at Music Hall, next Saturday evening, will comprise selections from Brahms, Gluck and Beethoven. Mme. Joachim will be the singer.

The first of a series of three concerts at Brattle Hall, Cambridge, will be given by the Kneisel quartet on Tuesday evening, March 22.

—Mrs. Nikisch's singing at the fifth New York Symphony orchestra concert Tuesday night was very warmly applauded. Mr. Nikisch's accompaniments were "exquisitely" played, as usual.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 20.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

—D'Albert drew an enormous and most enthusiastic audience to Music Hall when he played at the Symphony concert. Mrs. Gardner brought Mr. Russell Sullivan, Mr. Arthur Foote escorted Mrs. Arthur Warren; Mr. and Mrs. Josiah Millett were in Mrs. Field's seats, Mrs. Field having gone to Europe; Mr. Hodgson and Mr. Harry Hodges occupied the seats of Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Winch; the Langs, Mrs. Whitman and Mrs. Fiske Warren were also in their corner of the right balcony. Pretty Mrs. Frank Watson brought Mr. Arlo Bates with her, and the Misses Stackpole were noticeable near the stage.

—Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, of London, will be the guests next week of Mrs. Charles R. Hayden, at No. 29 Brimmer street.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will give vocal recitals in the Melonian, on Tuesday evening, March 29, and the afternoons of Thursday, March 31, Tuesday, April 5, and Saturday, April 9. Subscription tickets for the series will be ready at Music Hall tomorrow morning. The sale of single tickets will begin later.

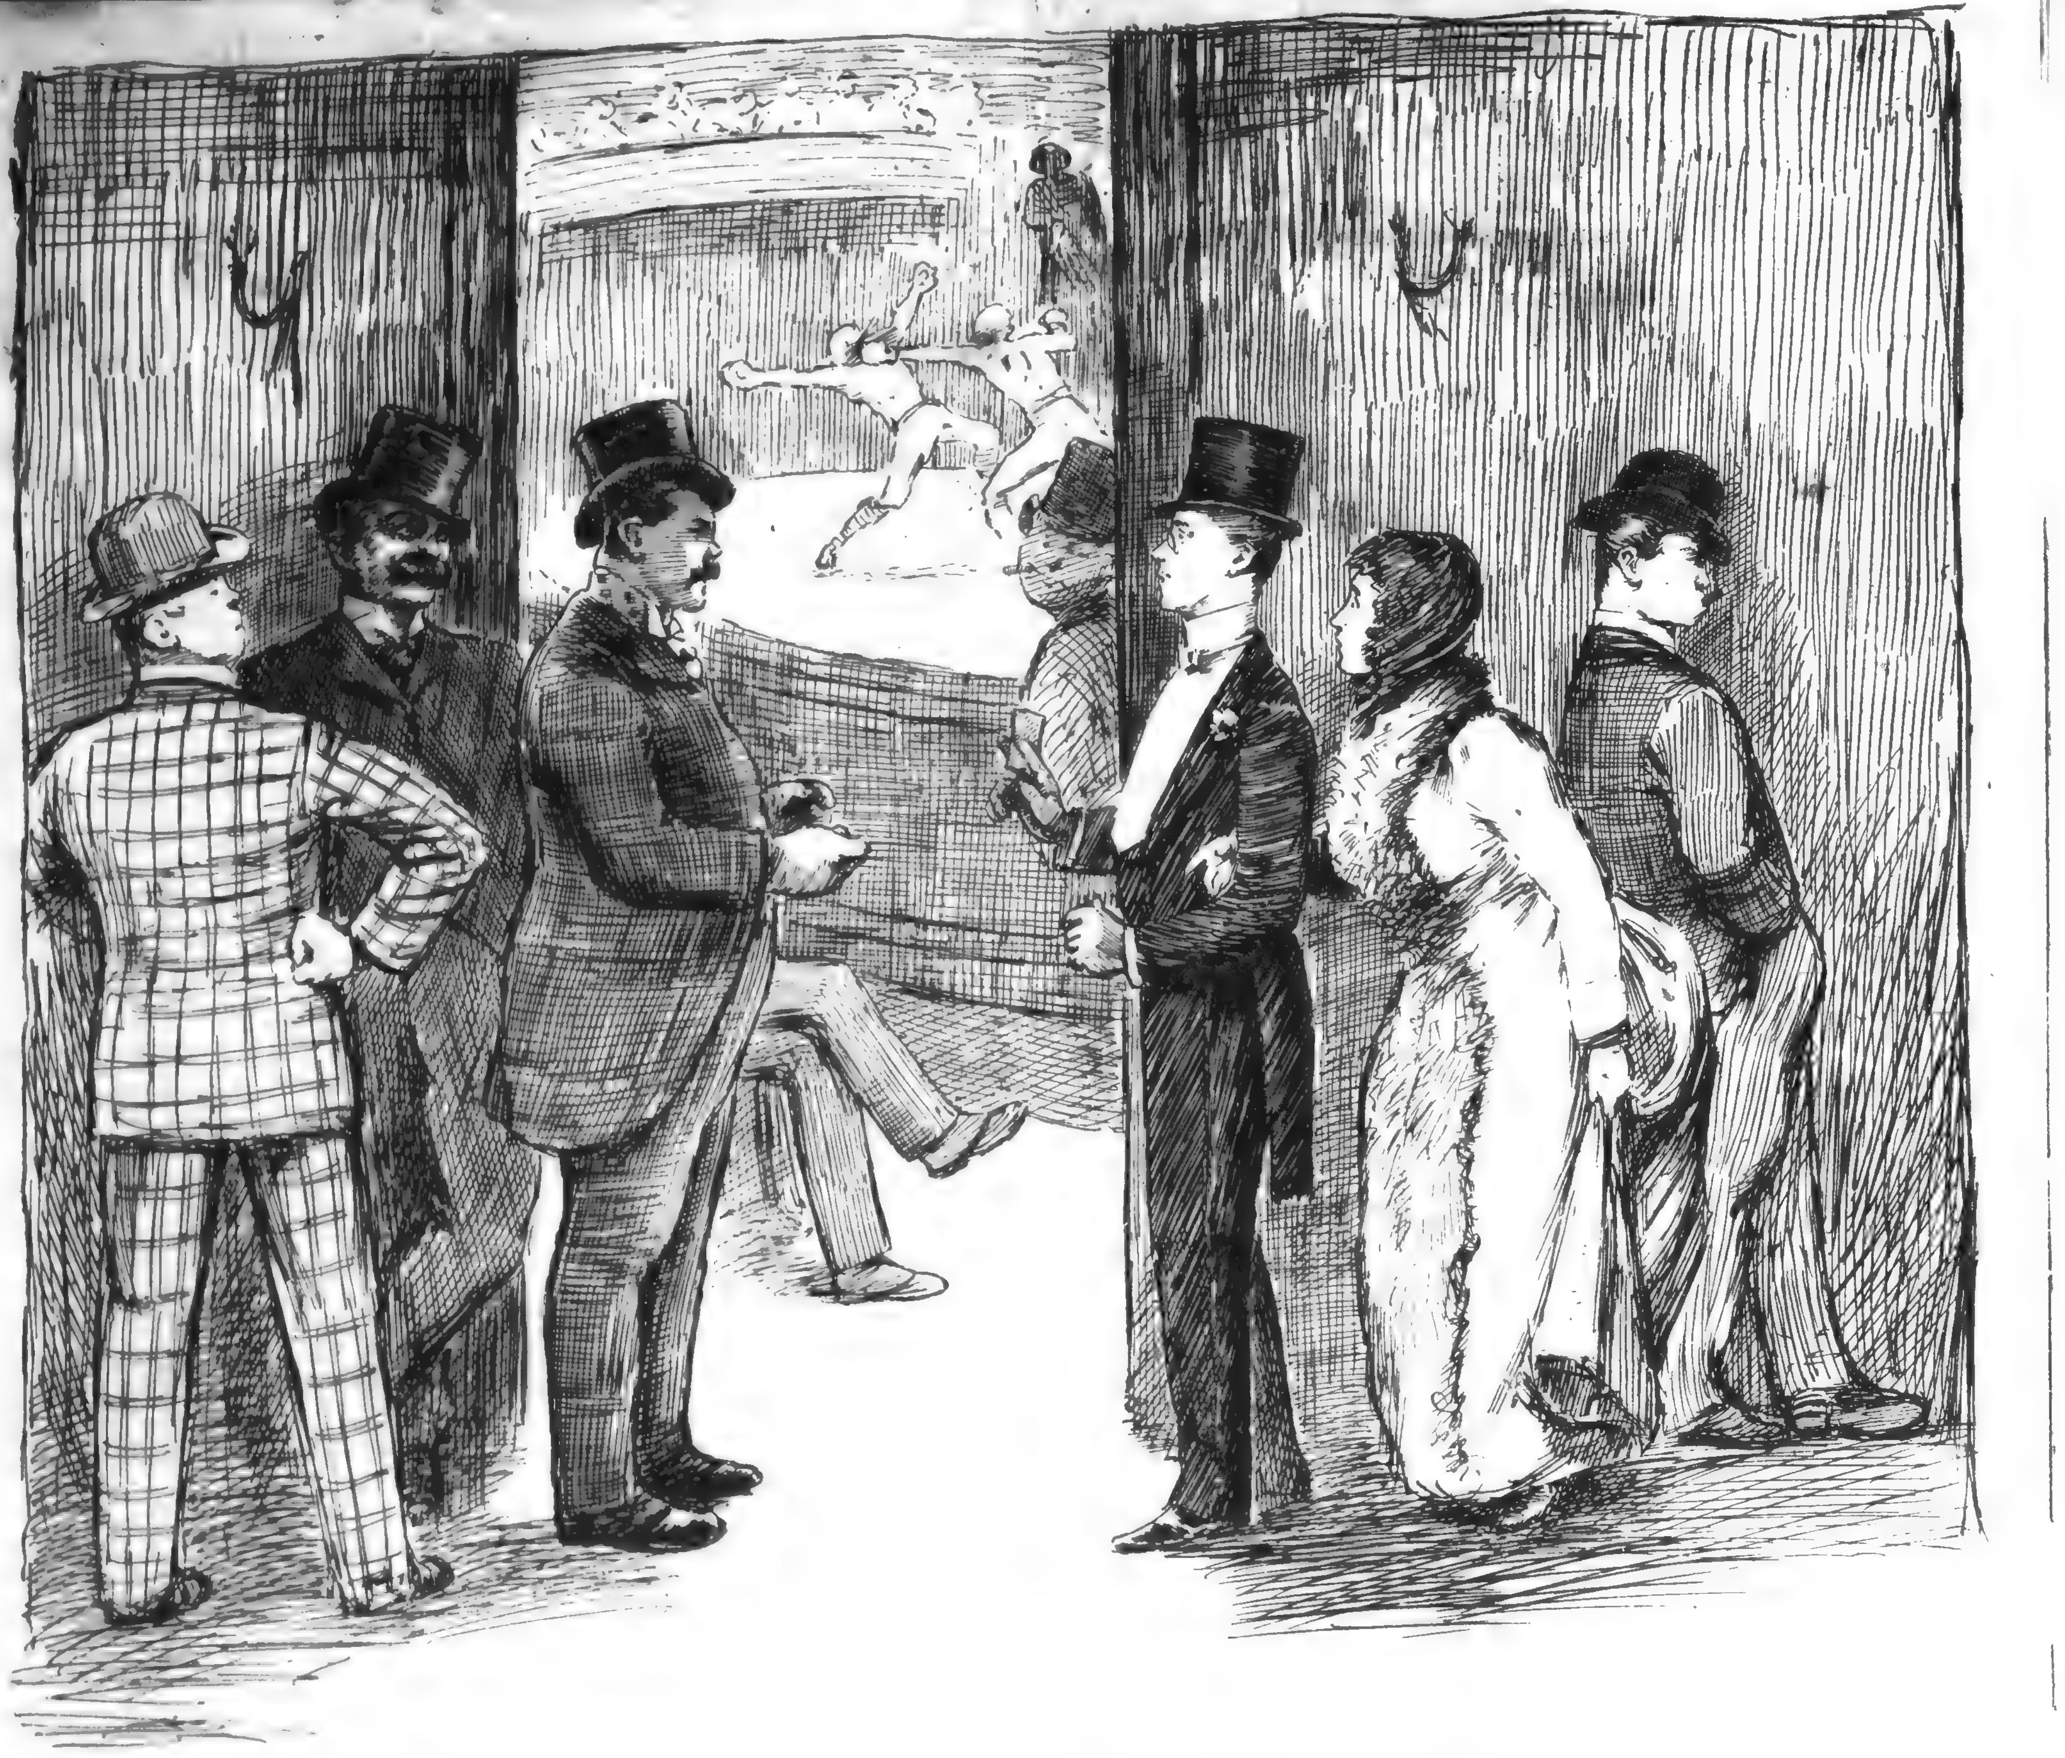
The first of a series of three concerts in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, by the Kneisel Quartet, will be given on Tuesday, March 22.

WORLD, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/13

The very attractive programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening will include Symphony No. 7, Beethoven; fantaisie overture, "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky; symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," Liszt, and "Fata Morgana," for soprano and orchestra, from Nicode's symphonic ode, "The Sea."

THE BEACON BOSTON, MASS., SATURDAY MORNING, MARCH 19, 1892.



AN OFF NIGHT FOR THE SYMPHONY.

(Mr. and Mrs. Algernon Browning have tickets for the Symphony concert.)

THE CROWD—Get on to the dude comin' in with his girl.

DOORKEEPER—Them ain't no good here.

MR. AND MRS. BROWNING (together)—What, is this not the Symphony night?

DOORKEEPER—Don't know nothing 'bout Sinfonus. WE'RE running a sluggin' match.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH. 20, 1892.

THE HENSCHEL CONCERTS.

Once more we are to hear Mr. and Mrs. Henschel in their unique vocal recitals. These favorites of Boston are now equally favorites of English and continental music-lovers and their appearances are welcome occasions there as well as in this country. Concerning them, we have heretofore expressed an opinion and can only repeat that they are among the finest exponents of songs and leider that have sung in the city. Their cultured and finished art and their absorption in the music produce a wonderfully fascinating effect on the listener and reveal possibilities in music that were before only imagined. They will come to Boston on March 29 to begin a series of four recitals at the Meionaon. The first one is in the evening of that day, and the other three on the afternoons of March 31, April 5 and 9.

Subscription tickets for the series will be placed on sale Monday morning at Music hall.

THE SYMPHONIES.

NINETEENTH CONCERT.

The programme for the nineteenth concert of the Symphony orchestra in Music hall Saturday evening, March 12, was:

Beethoven.	Overture. "Lenore, No. 2."
Beethoven.	Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat. Allegro. — Adagio un poco mosso.—Rondo (Allegro).
Schumann.	Symphony No. 4, op. 120. Andante con moto.—Allegro di molto.—Romanza.—Scherzo. Largo.—Finale. (Original version first time.)

Soloist:—Mr. Eugen D'Albert.

If our memory serves us rightly, we heard the Gewandhaus orchestra give this original version of Schumann's great D minor symphony twice. Whatever may be said concerning the two versions, there is no question about the second being far the best. This fact being conceded, we can only speak of the revised version as one of the great masterpieces of Schumann: in it he tries to picture to the world a life-like tone picture of his inmost soul. Whether he has succeeded in this or not, is an open question, one which each must answer for himself. There are beautiful passages in the work which appeal directly to the innermost soul, while there are others exactly the opposite, almost revolting. The treatment of the themes is ingenious, scholarly and vigorous, like most of this master's compositions. There are strong reminders of Wagner's music in the brass effects, but of course it was Wagner who copied, not Schumann. No fault can be found with Mr. Nikisch's reading of the score, the whole symphony being well and adequately played by his orchestra.

The E flat concerto of Beethoven, the ne plus ultra of pianoforte concertos, was the chief attraction of the evening, because that "little giant," as Liszt called him, was to be in command. It matters not what people may say, one thing is absolutely certain: Mr. D'Albert knows how, has the technique, the physique, and the true perception to play Beethoven's music in an honest, straightforward, vigorous manner, as tradition says it must be played. There are no moments of effeminacy or mawkish sentiment about D'Albert's Beethoven playing, not a bit. The moment the first chord was struck, there was a feeling that a master-hand was at the helm, and no fears were entertained that it would not remain so to the end. So far as we remember, the concerto has never received a more noteworthy or satisfactory presentation in Boston. It was quite evident that the soloist suffered somewhat from nervousness, owing in a measure, no doubt, to fears that the orchestra would not fully support him. While they were not entirely perfect in this respect, they did much better than at some other times during the season. The whole work of D'Albert was marked by a brilliant, clean-cut technique, an intense force and power in interpretive skill, not equalled, or at least not surpassed, by any pianist who has gone before. In response to a persistent encore, D'Albert played a rather sombre piece, we think by Liszt.

The second "Lenore" overture has quite a lengthy history, but it is not necessary to go into it here. Suffice it to say, the Third symphony, so often played here, is a much more elaborated form of almost the identical themes contained in the second, and certainly is the one best suited to our taste.

The orchestral work of the evening was more than usually satisfactory, and from our position down-stairs, instead of way up, the brasses did not produce the headache they often have in the past. After a tour of observation around the musical circle, the orchestra will return with new laurels and gay feathers, giving the next concert, Saturday evening, March 26. Madame Amalie Joachim will be the soloist. She is the wife of the greatest violinist (so thought) in the world. Thirty years ago the madame was the great singer of Berlin's Royal opera, but retired many years since from an overtaxed and worn voice.

JAMES M. TRACY.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 20, 1892.

The Henschel Recitals.

Four vocal recitals by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, who have just arrived in this country, will be given in the Meionaon on Tuesday evening, March 29, and the afternoons of March 31, April 5 and 9. Concerning these artists much might be said, but they are so well known and admired in Boston that this is hardly necessary.

Their long residence here and the delights experienced when they sang and appeared in concert warrant the most pleasant anticipations for the coming visit. It will please their friends to know that their artistic and social career in England and over Europe has been a remarkably successful one, and their recitals have been among the events in musical circles there.

The sale of subscription tickets to this series of four recitals opens Monday morning at Music Hall.

The Symphony concert at Music Hall, next Saturday evening, will comprise selections from Brahms, Gluck and Beethoven. Mme. Joachim will be the singer.

The first of a series of three concerts at Brattle Hall, Cambridge, will be given by the Kneisel quartet on Tuesday evening, March 22.

—Mrs. Nikisch's singing at the fifth New York Symphony orchestra concert Tuesday night was very warmly applauded. Mr. Nikisch's accompaniments were "exquisitely" played, as usual.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 20.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

—— D'Albert drew an enormous and most enthusiastic audience to Music Hall when he played at the Symphony concert. Mrs. Gardner brought Mr. Russell Sullivan, Mr. Arthur Foote escorted Mrs. Arthur Warren; Mr. and Mrs. Josiah Millett were in Mrs. Field's seats, Mrs. Field having gone to Europe; Mr. Hodgson and Mr. Harry Hodges occupied the seats of Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Winch; the Langs, Mrs. Whitman and Mrs. Fiske Warren were also in their corner of the right balcony. Pretty Mrs. Frank Watson brought Mr. Arlo Bates with her, and the Misses Stackpole were noticeable near the stage.

—— Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, of London, will be the guests next week of Mrs. Charles R. Hayden, at No. 29 Brimmer street.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will give vocal recitals in the Melonian, on Tuesday evening, March 29, and the afternoons of Thursday, March 31, Tuesday, April 5, and Saturday, April 9. Subscription tickets for the series will be ready at Music Hall tomorrow morning. The sale of single tickets will begin later.

The first of a series of three concerts in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, by the Kneisel Quartet, will be given on Tuesday, March 22.

WORLD, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/13

The very attractive programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening will include Symphony No. 7, Beethoven; fantaisie overture, "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky; symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," Liszt, and "Fata Morgana," for soprano and orchestra, from Nicode's symphonic ode, "The Sea."

Philadelphia Music and Drama

Saturday, March 19, 1892.

The Boston Symphony.

On last Monday evening the Niksch Orchestra gave its fifth concert of the season before a crowded audience at the Academy of Music. The orchestra exhibited the traits of refinement and subordination which have attached to these players ever since the Gericke days. Mr. Nikisch is no less repressive in his directing than was Mr. Gericke, but he shows more originality and much more sentiment in his interpretations. An undue fondness for extreme pianissimo effects was noticeable, but the audience enjoyed each occasion of it, and applauded to the echo. The largely increased string force of the orchestra has in no wise overbalanced it, and the leading wood and brass instruments were played with beautiful tone quality in every instance where they were given leading subjects.

The program was uncommonly attractive, and the old and new music were pleasantly distributed. The important numbers were Berlioz's "Harold" Symphony and Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto. The Symphony is a most interesting composition, and opportunities to hear it are far too infrequent. It was played here many years ago by the Thomas orchestra with Mr. Charles Bætens, as viola soloist. The solo was played with beautiful tone and artistic expression on the present occasion by Mr. Franz Kneisel. The symphony "Harold in Italy," has a history. It was composed by Berlioz in 1834, at the suggestion of the famous violinist, Paganini, who desired him to compose a concerto for viola. The symphony was the result, but it strayed so far beyond the boundaries of Paganini's wishes that he never played it in public. It is the fourth of Berlioz's symphonies in date of composition, and as the name implies, it has a shadowy self-portraiture. It is music of a lofty order, and the instrumentation is crowded with all the wealth of splendid effects for which this remarkable composer is entitled to a place far up towards Beethoven himself. The march in the second movement was performed at the composer's funeral in 1869. The first movement, however, with the lovely theme for viola, afterwards repeated and adorned with the utmost splendor of orchestration, is the most important section of the symphony.

The "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven was heard under very satisfactory conditions on this occasion. The rich and manifold beauties of the orchestral parts, which form a symphony in themselves, were wonderfully executed from first to last. The pianist, Mr. Eugene D'Albert is entirely worthy to interpret this august composition. He has had no equal among the long list of great players who have been listened to here since Rubinstein's departure. His reception was of the heartiest character. At the close of three well contrasted solos which he played in a later portion of the program he was induced, after prolonged applause, to play again. The remaining selections during the concert were Saint-Sæns, Symphonic Poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale," the scene of Aase's death from Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite and the old time Wagnerian favorite, Huldigung's March.

J. BUNTING.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will give two matinee vocal recitals at the Chestnut Street Opera House next week Tuesday and Friday.

Among the coming musical events of interest will be the Fourth Annual Conven-

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Chickering Hall, - - New York,

Tuesday Evening, March 15, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON - 1891-92

PROGRAMME

5

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.
F. A. SCHWAB, Acting Manager New York Concerts.

The New-York Times.

TWENTY PAGES.

NEW-YORK, SUNDAY, MARCH 20, 1892.

MR. AND MRS. HENSCHEL SING.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel have returned to America, and yesterday afternoon gave the first of two song recitals at Chickering Hall. These artists are so well known and so warmly admired that a large audience was a foregone conclusion. The welcome which the assembly gave the talented couple must have assured them of an abundance of affectionate remembrance, and it was their happy privilege not to disappoint those in whose minds that affectionate remembrance had developed lively expectation.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel yesterday sang duets by Padre Martini, Goetz, and Donizetti; Mrs. Henschel sang songs by Handel, Stanford, A. Hervey, and her husband, and Mr. Henschel's numbers were by Rubinstein, Massenet, Schubert, Mozart, and Beethoven. The programme was altogether delightful, and if Villiers Stanford's Irish ditties sounded a great deal like something one has heard before, it was none the less a pleasure to listen in the concert hall to the unfamiliar quaintness of the cadences of Erin.

As to the execution of their duties by the two artists only praise can be uttered. We know, and we say it with some shame, of no other musical entertainments where there is so little to offend the sensitiveness of a fine ear and a cultivated taste as at a song recital by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel. There are other entertainments at which one can find more to stir the blood, to warm the heart, to animate the mind, but none where the sweetness of a delicately-refined art makes a clearer musical atmosphere.

There is something of wonder at the bottom of one's admiration, too; for Mrs. Henschel's voice is not large, while Mr. Henschel's lacks liquidity and is beyond question a somewhat refractory organ. But Mrs. Henschel's phrasing and breath management are backed by so high a training and by so exquisite a taste that her singing seems to be the spontaneous creation of nature rather than the ultimate product of a studied art. Nothing lovelier has been heard on the local concert stage in many moons than her delivery of the aria "Lusinghe piu care," from Handel's "Alessandro," which, by reason of her fearlessness in the matter of tempo and Mr. Henschel's beautifully-colored accompaniment, exerted the full influence of its vigorous and ever-fresh spirit.

Mr. Henschel's mastery of his own voice and the remarkable effects of color which he produces with it are food for constant study and delight, while the eloquence of the details of his shading reveals a musical intelligence of the highest order. Mr. Henschel is a dramatist in song, and under his treatment Schubert's "Die Krähe" and "Der Leiermann" become little dramas in tone, just as they were in the immortal composer's imagination. And the artist's accompaniments are picturesque in the excellence of their expressiveness. Altogether, these two singers offer to the public song recitals which are conceived and performed in the finest [illegible] of a very subtle art.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, SUNDAY, MARCH 20, 1892.

MR. AND MRS. HENSCHEL'S RECITAL.

After an absence of three years Mr. and Mrs. Henschel appeared in Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon and delighted a large audience with a number of songs and duos beautifully sung and exquisitely accompanied by Mrs. Henschel.

It is almost superfluous to say that Mr. and Mrs. Henschel are the best lieder singers we have an opportunity of hearing. Both are gifted with rare taste, exceptional musical skill and pleasant voices.

The Henschels' programme yesterday, as is their wont, was taken from a wide range of song, from a duo of Padre Martini and songs of Handel to compositions of Massenet and Mr. Henschel. Of the best known songs sung by Mr. Henschel Schubert's "Winterviese" group, Rubinstein's "Gold rollt mir zu Füssen," and the baritone air from Massenet's "Roi de Lahore" may be mentioned. With the exception of the Rubinstein song, which was given with far less animation than it demands, the result was more than satisfactory.

Mrs. Henschel's lovely voice was heard to great advantage in some Irish songs set by Stanford, of which one, "The Little Red Lark," was repeated, and also in three musicianly songs by Mrs. Henschel.

If any criticism is to be made upon the programme it is that more modern work would have been preferable. The buffo duo from "Don Pasquale," with which the recital closed, was so admirably sung as to make one wish that such rare art had been applied to something better worth the while.

NEW YORK RECORDER

SUNDAY, MARCH 20,

The Henschels' Recital.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel have, in accordance with their annual custom, paid us a Spring visit, and a very welcome one it is, for the singing of this artistic couple improves with age, like wine. Their song-scheme yesterday afternoon at Chickering Hall comprised songs and duos by Martini, Handel, Beethoven, Mozart, Stanford, Hervey, Henschel, Schubert and others. Mrs. Henschel did some beautiful singing in the Handel numbers, her voice sounding as pure and clear as the proverbial lark's. Mr. Henschel's dramatic style and amazing variety of moods were shown to the best advantage in the Schubert group. He is one of those singers whose brain is superior to his vocal environment. The second recital occurs next Saturday afternoon at the same place.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 19, 1892.

PHILHARMONIC REHEARSAL.

The fifth of the programmes of music arranged by Mr. Nikisch for hearing in this city, in the series of performances still called by courtesy Philharmonic concerts and rehearsals, was presented yesterday at the Academy of Music, to which it drew a large audience, considering what the weather was, for if the orchestra from Boston has not yet gained the active support of the Philharmonic society, it at least has secured Philharmonic weather. It may be that somewhere on earth there is better music than there was at the Academy yesterday, but if so the names of the place and the players are not known. It was as near perfection as we are going to reach this year, anyway. If there was any one number on the bill that might be chosen to illustrate this assurance it was "The Preludes" of Liszt—the best of the things that he wrote, and that furnished a spirited and suitable ending for the concert. The various meanings of this symphonic poem were brought out with rare discrimination by Mr. Nikisch and the body whose artistic soul he is, the tender love music being told on the strings with beautiful tone and expression. The sentimental and lachrymose Lamartine, whose phrases from the "Poetic Meditations" are the text for this work, says that "Love is the enchanted dawn of every heart, but what mortal is there over whose first joys and happiness does not break some storm, dispelling with its icy breath his fanciful illusions and shattering his altar?" This experience and that of the battle into which the man is hurled by his own unrest are the clearest pictures in the work, and the episode of fight was given with so much stir and veracity that the pulse beat quicker at the sound of the trumpets and the roll of the drums. In absolute beauty the two themes that form the substance of the work are surpassed in nothing else that Liszt wrote, and they rank with any of the symphonic themes of the masters. As Mr. Nikisch phrased them, marking every incident with all the grace and vigor that could be imparted to it without exaggeration, they gained in charm and in grandeur. The piece de resistance was Berloiz's "Harold in Italy"—a symphony that has not been given in this city since Theodore Thomas produced it, probably not less than ten years ago, when Mr. Schwartz, leader of his violas, played the solo part that runs through it, expressing the comments and reflections of the hero on the incidents that befall him in his journey. This part was played yesterday, not by the leader of the viola division, but by the the first violinist, Franz Kneisel. He played superbly, with a proper suppression of self and subordination of the solo to the incidental significance of the drama, making his music, in short, a recitative, harmonious and explanatory. His tone was a little hoarse in the lower notes at beginning, but it developed a richness like the best of tenor voices as he proceeded. The long passage where arpeggios are played in harmonics developed the usual nasal and jew's harp effect, for which Berlioz was striving, on the principle that in music, as in some other things, it is better to be different than to be usual, for Berlioz was a man who seemed to be constantly going out of his way to find emotions and to have things happen to him that he need not have been troubled with had he consented to take matters as they came to him. As an emotionalist he is pumpy and meandering. Some of his sentiment in this work is down to the "Willie, We Have Missed You," level, but perhaps in the very next bar he finds an emotion worth having, and winged words to speak it. When he has a good thing, however, he half spoils the effect of it by lugging it around until the freshness is gone, then wandering off in the vaguest manner after something different—for all the world like nearly everybody else. Yet, perhaps, his feverish unrest qualifies him to interpret Byron better than some of the sturdier souls that stand on their own personality more composedly. The word interpret is used in its freest sense, because literally the symphony takes nothing out of Byron's "Childe Harold." Harold never saw a march of pilgrims or heard a mountaineer singing under his mistress's window, or shared in an orgy of brigands. It is only his gloom, the rather stagy gloom of a hero with wide collars and long hair, that entices Berlioz into making a voice for him. In the opening measures there is the disheartened plodding over the mountains, with a strain for solace that Offenbach borrowed or unconsciously adapted to put around the saber song in the "Grand Duchess." You also hear the first bar of the old minstrel air, "O, Susanna," after the prayer in the second division of the work, a division that is notable, however, chiefly for the march of the pilgrims, a serious and even impressive incident. In the seranade a drone bass suggests the leathern bagpipes that are played to solo on a flageolet, the performers on these primitive instruments occasionally appearing in our streets and making the most wild and entertaining music that is offered there. In the bacchanal at the close the various themes, leading motives, in fact, are reviewed, though the purpose of the artist is to indicate a wild abandon, in which all thought of goodness is thrown aside and the wanderer is to indulge in moral, mental and possibly perceptible intoxication. The "Harold" music was written at the suggestion of the fiddler Paganini, who, however, like the average soloist, wanted to be the entire show himself, and when Berlioz produced the first part the Italian would not take it. The manuscript lay on a shelf for some time, but was eventually brought out and completed, and it is possible that the author, in keeping the viola part down to sensible proportions and making it a chance of the work, instead of subjecting his orchestra to one man, was actuated by a permissible spirit of revenge. He gives the clew to the making of the symphony in this statement: "I conceived the idea of writing a series of scenes for the orchestra in which the viola should find itself mixed up, like a person more or less in action, always preserving his own individuality. The background I formed from the recollections of my wanderings in the Abruzzi, introducing the viola as a sort of melancholy dreamer, in the style of Byron's 'Childe Harold.'" Color is always interesting in Berlioz, and in this symphony, as in his other compositions, the thematic material is of less moment than the setting he has given to it. The other orchestral piece was the Saint Saens symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel"—programme music in that the whirr of the wheel is described by the strings and the grumbling of Hercules at the uncongenial is interjected, but just as dainty, as artistic, as pretty without a programme as with it, as all music must be if it is to prosper in the favor of the right minded. The soloist was Eugen D'Albert, the pianist. The orchestra was the thing to hear, of course, but Mr. D'Albert is a wonderful player and he received more applause than the more wonderful orchestra. He first gave the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven with a force and brilliancy that were convincing beyond criticism, at least while one was listening to it. It is the best of the Beethoven concertos and is one that has the merit of making the piano an integral instead of a leading feature of the tone productive force. Mr. D'Albert was as near heroic as his physical limitation would admit; he plowed his way through the difficulties with rare animation; he went from the adagio to the allegro with a plunge, and he displayed a pyrotechnic brilliancy in the ornamental features. Though we have had Rosenthal here it does not seem as if even that master mechanic at piano playing surpassed this artist in his own merit, and D'Albert has soul too—some soul, for he exposed it in his solos; the Chopin cradle song, a Schubert impromptu, Tausig's elaboration of the old Strauss waltz, "Man Lives but Once," and in the Chopin polonaise, that he gave when recalled to the stage. In the latter pieces his agility (to look no higher in his acquirement) was astonishing. It does not seem as if human fingers with only the customary number of joints could go over so many keys in one second of time as those of the big headed, dwarfish, lank haired genius that huddled over the piano yesterday. There is just a little lacking in force, for he has not the physical propulsion necessary to the highest achievements in that direction, but in brilliancy, dash, exploit, he has no master. And he played the first Chopin number with refined feeling, too. At the concert to-night the same programme will be repeated.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

SUNDAY, MARCH 20, 1892.

MR. AND MRS. HENSCHEL'S RECITAL.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were welcomed back to our concert-rooms by a numerous and refined audience in Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon when the gifted couple gave the first of two song recitals. The entertainment differed in nothing from its predecessors of former years. Both singers are such consummate artists and have so long been such that a change in the character of their recitals could only come from a loss of voice or skill on the part of one or the other or a complete revolution in their choice of music. The former contingency, so far as it is possible to judge, is fortunately not imminent; the latter is not likely to occur so long as Mr. Henschel shows his present appreciation of the vast wealth of musical beauty in the field which he is cultivating. Several of the songs sung by Mrs. Henschel and himself yesterday had graced his programmes in former years; others were new. Among the latter were two dainty and characteristic Irish songs set by C. Villiers Stanford and a "May Song" by A. Hervey. Mrs. Henschel also sang three of her husband's compositions, notable specimens of poetical and highly emotionalized musical writing. She has lost nothing either in voice or sympathetic manner. Mr. Henschel's most significant success was in five of Schubert's "Winterreise" songs, which he sang with just pathos and fine appreciation of their dramatic contents. In the last recital next Saturday the programme will embrace numbers by Gagliomo, Gretry, Cimarosa, Handel, Dr. Arne, Rubinstein, Loewe, Henschel, Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Boieldieu, Gounod, Thomas, Saint-Saens and Bizet.

MR. NIKISCH IN BROOKLYN.

The fifth of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in Brooklyn last night was made notable by a performance of Berlioz's "Harold" symphony and the reappearance here after an absence of two years of Eugen d'Albert. In the symphony Mr. Kneisel repeated his marvellous achievement in the treatment of the obligato viola and the whole work was performed in a finished and most delightful manner. Mr. d'Albert presented himself in the character in which his success was most decided when last he was here. He played Beethoven's Concerto in E-flat in the large, sustained and dignified style which in the minds of all who are not special pleaders is recognized as appropriate to the great master's music. The difference between this style as exemplified last night and by Mr. Rummel at the last concert of the Symphony Society is as far removed from dry pedantry as it is from the capricious seeking for effects which is characteristic of so much pianoforte music to-day. Later in the evening Mr. d'Albert played Chopin's Berceuse, an Impromptu by Schubert, and the Strauss-Tausig waltz, "Man lebt nur einmal." In the last number and in the Staccato study with which he supplemented it he set out to bewilder his hearers with an exhibition of his technical skill, and succeeded completely. It was past description brilliant pianoforte playing.

PRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/16

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Admirable Work of Both Mr. Nikisch and His Gifted Wife.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the able direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, was heard last night at Chickering Hall in a concert of exceptional excellence and brilliancy. The seventh Beethoven Symphonie was given with admirable feeling and great precision, as was the Tschaikowski Fantasie overture to Hamlet. Liszt's symphonly poem, "Les Preludes," gave occasion for a very remarkable exhibition of powerful, brilliant conducting on the part of Mr. Nikisch and vivid, appreciative responsiveness from the orchestra.

Of Mrs. Nikisch too much cannot be said in praise. Her clear, true soprano is as sweet and soft in the upper register as any concert voice known to New Yorkers, and there is not a note in her range that is not sympathetic and tuneful. She sang a trio of German songs and an aria from "The Sea," a symphonic poem.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 19, 1892.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra performed the following program at Chickering Hall, on Tuesday evening, when Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was the soloist: 1. Beethoven, Symphony No. VII.; 2. Nicode, "Fata Morgana," for Soprano and Orchestra, from Symphonic Poem, "The Sea;" 3. Tschaikowsky, Ouverture-Fantaisie, "Hamlet;" 4. Songs, with Piano; a, Richard Strauss, Staendchen, b, Chopin, "Das Ringelein," c, Schumann, "Auftraege," 5. Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

It is satisfactory to learn that the past season has been far more successful than any other which Mr. Henschel has hitherto directed. Indeed the result is so gratifying that Mr. Henschel has resolved to give an increased number of performances next winter. The moral will not be lost upon Sir Charles Halle, for that veteran sought to economize by refraining from engaging good vocalists and instrumental soloists. Mr. Henschel adopted the better plan, and enterprise has had its reward.

D'ALBERT was so tremendously applauded after his grand rendition of the Fifth Beethoven Concerto, at the 19th Symphony Concert, that he was finally compelled to come back and play a lovely and simple encore. Indeed, the girls were saying, "It'll be mean if he don't play again!" Every tone of the Knabe could be heard in the farthest corner of the house. The preceding overture was the Second Leonore. As the customary version of the Fourth Schumann Symphony had been played the week before, we now had the pleasure (and it was a pleasure!) of listening to the original version for the first time in Boston. "How happy could I be with either, were t'other dear charmer away!" The Symphony programs are now ornamented with heads of the composers, and the descriptions are far more to the point than they were a few weeks ago.

MME. JOACHIM'S BOSTON DEBUT. NOVACEK'S QUARTET.

THE very perfection of art, in the string quartet line, was the March Kneisel Concert, in Christian Union Hall.

The established classic school was represented by two Beethoven selections, the moving Variations from his Quartet, op. 18, and his exquisitely tender Quartet in E-flat, op. 74.

The modern school was represented by the production, for the first time in America, of Ettokar Novacek's E-minor Quartet, with its four quaintly delightful movements, brisk, brief, and bracing,—Allegro, Adagio, Prestissimo, Allegro molto agitato. The work is replete with instrumental humor, and a repetition of the Prestissimo was loudly demanded.

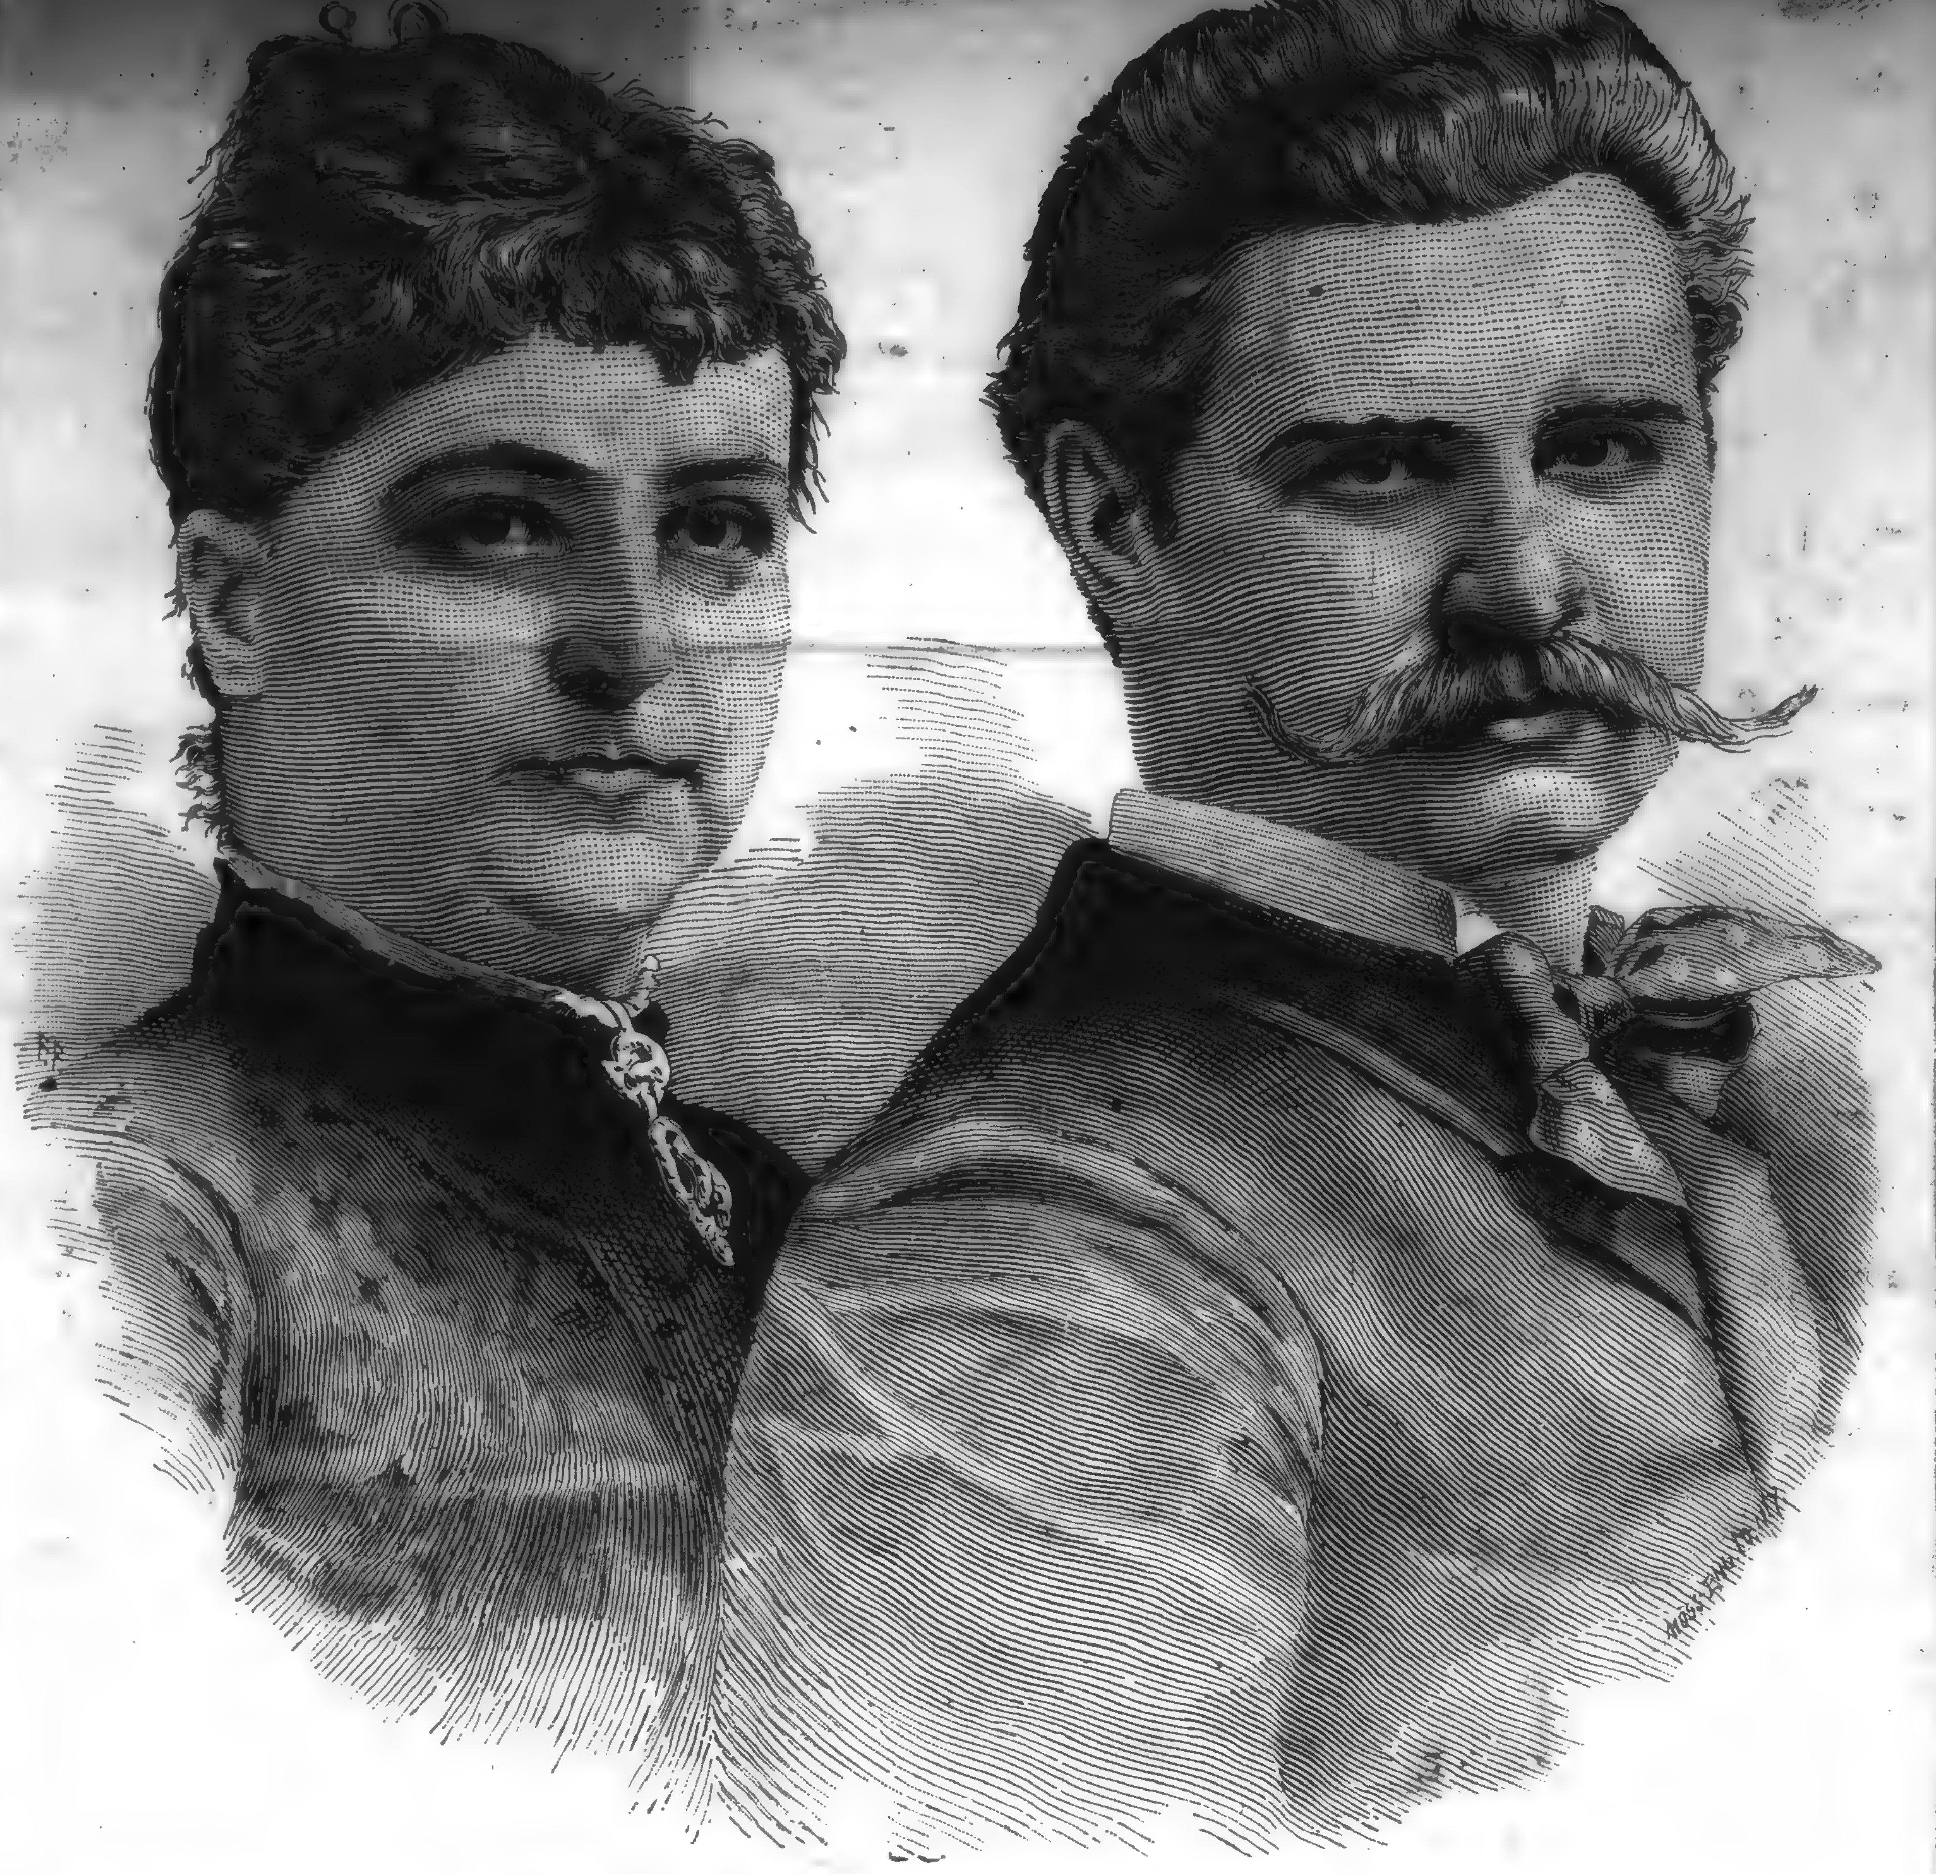
This quartet was the more interesting, because Mr. Novacek lives among us, where we can shake hands with him, as a new member of the Symphony Orchestra. If such a work must come, as some aver, from a man who is either a crank or a genius (like the discovery of the cure for radical hernia, made by Dr. George Heaton away back in the forties). I should say, that in Mr. Novacek's case there is no need to resort to the crank hypothesis. Genius carries the day sometimes, and original thinkers in music are not all past and gone; or, if they are, we may say, with the old hymn, "The Evening Shades Appear." We might add, with Blanco White, that glories are hidden by the daylight, and declare with Hiawatha:

But I like the starlight better,
Better do I like the moonlight!

Nearly every musical celebrity in Boston was on hand to welcome Madame Joachim, the distinguished wife of a distinguished husband. In demeanor and "the art of putting things" she is, as she has so long been, a mistress of the concert stage. She made her Boston bow in seven songs and an encore, from Haydn, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert. She drew upon Johann Abraham Peter Schulz (who died with the beginning of our century) for his Sagt wo sind die Veilchen hin. She even went back to Johann Rudolph Ahle (a church writer, born about the time of our Pilgrim immigration) for his Advent Dialogue.

In connection with her impending personal recitals, more must be said later about Mrs. Joachim. For this writing it must suffice to say that she has a magnificent presence and a glorious voice, which she handles grandly, though in spots it shows the effects of long and arduous use. Her closing notes are sustained like the blast of an organ pipe, yet her Brahms Good Night was soft and domestic. She is a singer to jump one from his feet, and was enthusiastically received.

A queer blunder on the bill was the transformation of Heidenröslein into Haideraskin.



MME. LILLI LEHMANN AND HERR PAUL KALISCH.

THE · PRESTO.

EVERY THURSDAY. ABBOTT, EDITOR. 325. STREET. CHICAGO. THE MUSIC TRADE INDUSTRIES.

MARCH 17, 1892

A WEEKLY MUSIC JOURNAL OF THE TIMES.

The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently presented Conductor Arthur Nikisch with a magnificent French clock in gold and enamel engraved with the words "In gratitude and admiration."

Mme. Joachim, the famous lieder singer, made her first appearance in this country at the Kneisel concert in Boston last week. A distinguished audience of musicians was present to greet the famous singer.

EUGEN D'ALBERT made his re-appearance in Boston on Friday last, playing Beethoven's E flat Concerto No. 5 with the Beethoven Symphony Orchestra. His work was most enthusiastically received. He impressed the large audience present with his thorough earnestness, breadth of interpretation and superb technic.

Eugen D'Albert's first piano recital will be given at Central Music Hall next Thursday evening.

TIMES, New York, N. Y

Date 3-19

BROOKLYN PHILHARMONIC.

The feature of the fifth public rehearsal of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society at the Brooklyn Academy of Music yesterday was the reappearance in the neighborhood of New-York of the famous pianist Eugen d'Albert. Since his departure from these shores two years ago the little giant of the pianoforte has been playing with increasing success on the Continent of Europe, and his return here at this time is especially interesting, in view of the dispute which has arisen in regard to Beethoven playing.

Mr. Rummel at the last Symphony Society concert made a powerful argument in favor of Beethoven's music, and yesterday Mr. d'Albert made another through the composer's E flat concerto. It will be time enough to discuss d'Albert's work in detail when he comes to New-York. All that is necessary to say at the present time is that he fully sustained his great reputation yesterday by a broad, noble, and beautifully eloquent performance of a supremely beautiful composition. His work was swiftly and warmly recognized by the audience, and he was recalled several times. Later in the afternoon he played several solos in which his splendid technic was fully displayed.

The orchestra under Mr. Nikisch played Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, Saint-Saëns's "Rouet d'Omphale," and Liszt's "Les Préludes." Franz Kneisel repeated his admirable performance of the viola obligato in the Berlioz work, already heard in this city.

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3/19

It is reported that Colonel Henry L. Higginson, the patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has added a codicil to his will that leaves an investment of $1,000,000 as an endowment fund, the interest of which is to be used for the permanent maintenance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 80.

SUNDAY, MARCH 20, 1892.

THE HENSCHELS' RECITAL.

Gotham Music Lovers Experience an Afternoon of Rare Delight.

[Special Dispatch to the Sunday Herald.]

NEW YORK, March 19, 1892. An afternoon of pure and unmitigated enjoyment was offered to music lovers today by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

From former delightful experiences of the performances of these two cultivated artists the public knows what to expect when their song recitals are announced, and, consequently, Chickering Hall overflowed this afternoon with a fashionable audience.

Georg Henschel handles music with such familiarity and ease that it seems fairly to grow, as if by magic, from under his fingers.

To hear him sing "Five Songs from Schubert's 'Cyclus die Winter-Reise,'" was today a magnificent exposition of that great master's deep poetic feeling, which Henshel caught in its fulness and translated. How rare and refreshing in their genial jollity were the two merry songs by Beethoven and Mozart, from "Claudine von Villa Bella" and "Il Seraglio."

But, for the most part, though Mr. Henschel sings genial songs with a peculiarly unctuous manner, he leaves the lightness and beauty and gayety of the programme to his fair wife, being content to furnish for her a serious, sombre background.

Mrs. Henschel was particularly attractive today in her two first airs by Handel, which she sang with absolute repose and with beautiful finish of execution, and in three light songs, two settings of Irish poems and one exquisite spring song.

Her voice is much more flexible than of old, while it has lost none of its first fresh sweetness.

The second recital follows on Saturday, March 26.

THE HENSCHEL RECITALS.

The return to Boston of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will be awaited with eager interest by the large circle of friends and admirers of their artistic career here in the early years of the Boston Symphony orchestra. They are already safely landed, and on Tuesday evening, the 29th inst., at the Meionaon, they are to give the first of four vocal recitals arranged upon the same lines as those in which they have appeared here to so much advantage in former years. The first programme is:

Duet, "Quel onda che rovina" .... Padre Martini
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Aria, "Oh, Sleep," from "Semele" } Handel
Aria, "Qual farfaletta;" from "Partenope" } Handel
Mrs. Henschel.
Aria from "Il Maestro di Musica" .... Pergolesi
Aria buffa from "Calandrino" .... Cimarosa
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's song .... Boethoven
"Auf Flugeln des Gesanges" .... Mendelssohn
"In the Woods" .... Franz
Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Doppelzanger" }
"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" } .... Schubert
"Der Schiffer" }
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from the "Taming of the Shrew" .... Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Romance, }
"Morgens als Lerche" } New .... Henschel
"Der Bote" }
Mrs. Henschel.
The Czar's song, from "Czar and Carpenter," Lortzing
Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philemon et Baucis," Gounod
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village," Boieldieu
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

The other recitals will be given on Thursday afternoon, March 31, Tuesday afternoon, April 5, and Saturday afternoon, April 9. Season tickets go on sale tomorrow morning at Music Hall.

The programme of the Symphony rehearsal and concert of Friday and Saturday, the 25th and 26th, is as follows: "Tragic" overture, Brahmus; ballet music from Gluck's "Orpheus"; Beethoven's Symphony, No. 8. Mrs. Amalie Joachim will sing an aria from Gluck's "Orpheus," and three songs with pianoforte accompaniment; Schubert's "Liebesbotschaft," and "Erlkoenig," and Schumann's "Schoene Wiege."

Clipping from Journal Lewiston Me

Date 3-17

"An error in the date of the advertisement placed the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Portland one week ahead of time. The date will be March 29th. Mrs. Nikisch will be vocal soloist. Good evening seats can be obtained at Stockbridge's."—Portland Press.

about Rossini, appropriate to his centennial year. One of them is to the effect that during a conversation some one spoke of a sonata by Hadyn which was little known. Rossini recollected that he had heard it twenty years before and he sat down and played it on the piano in a marvelons manner, the piece containing twenty pages.

Eagle, Brooklyn N. Y.

Date 3/18

To-morrow evening the fifth concert by the matchless Boston symphony orchestra will be given at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The "Harold in Italy" symphony, and symphonic poems by Saint Saens and Liszt will be played, while Eugen D'Albert will give three solos and will appear in Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto.

Ignaz Paderewski will make his last appearance in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music on Monday night. As he will sail for Europe in a few days, this will be the last opportunity to hear the most wonderful pianist who has visited these shores.

Clipping from Com. Adv.
~~STAR~~, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/19

Nikisch and his Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their fifth rehearsal in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon. D'Albert was the soloist. The concert will be given this evening. Paderewski's farewell recital will be heard at the Academy on Monday night.

Post, Washington, D. C.

Date 3/16

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The advance sale of seats for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Congregational Church has been very large, and but few seats remain unsold. The programme is an attractive one, both for the orchestra and for Eugene d'Albert, the eminent pianist, who will be the soloist.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 19, 1892.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra performed the following program at Chickering Hall, on Tuesday evening, when Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was the soloist: 1. Beethoven, Symphony No. VII.; 2. Nicode, "Fata Morgana," for Soprano and Orchestra, from Symphonic Poem, "The Sea;" 3. Tschaikowsky, Ouverture-Fantaisie, "Hamlet;" 4. Songs, with Piano; a, Richard Strauss, Staendchen, b, Chopin, "Das Ringelein," c, Schumann, "Auftraege," 5. Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

It is satisfactory to learn that the past season has been far more successful than any other which Mr. Henschel has hitherto directed. Indeed the result is so gratifying that Mr. Henschel has resolved to give an increased number of performances next winter. The moral will not be lost upon Sir Charles Halle, for that veteran sought to economize by refraining from engaging good vocalists and instrumental soloists. Mr. Henschel adopted the better plan, and enterprise has had its reward.

D'ALBERT was so tremendously applauded after his grand rendition of the Fifth Beethoven Concerto, at the 19th Symphony Concert, that he was finally compelled to come back and play a lovely and simple encore. Indeed, the girls were saying, "It'll be mean if he don't play again!" Every tone of the Knabe could be heard in the farthest corner of the house. The preceding overture was the Second Leonore. As the customary version of the Fourth Schumann Symphony had been played the week before, we now had the pleasure (and it was a pleasure!) of listening to the original version for the first time in Boston. "How happy could I be with either, were t'other dear charmer away!" The Symphony programs are now ornamented with heads of the composers, and the descriptions are far more to the point than they were a few weeks ago.

MME. JOACHIM'S BOSTON DEBUT. NOVACEK'S QUARTET.

THE very perfection of art, in the string quartet line, was the March Kneisel Concert, in Christian Union Hall.

The established classic school was represented by two Beethoven selections, the moving Variations from his Quartet, op. 18, and his exquisitely tender Quartet in E-flat, op. 74.

The modern school was represented by the production, for the first time in America, of Ettokar Novacek's E-minor Quartet, with its four quaintly delightful movements, brisk, brief, and bracing,—Allegro, Adagio, Prestissimo, Allegro molto agitato. The work is replete with instrumental humor, and a repetition of the Prestissimo was loudly demanded.

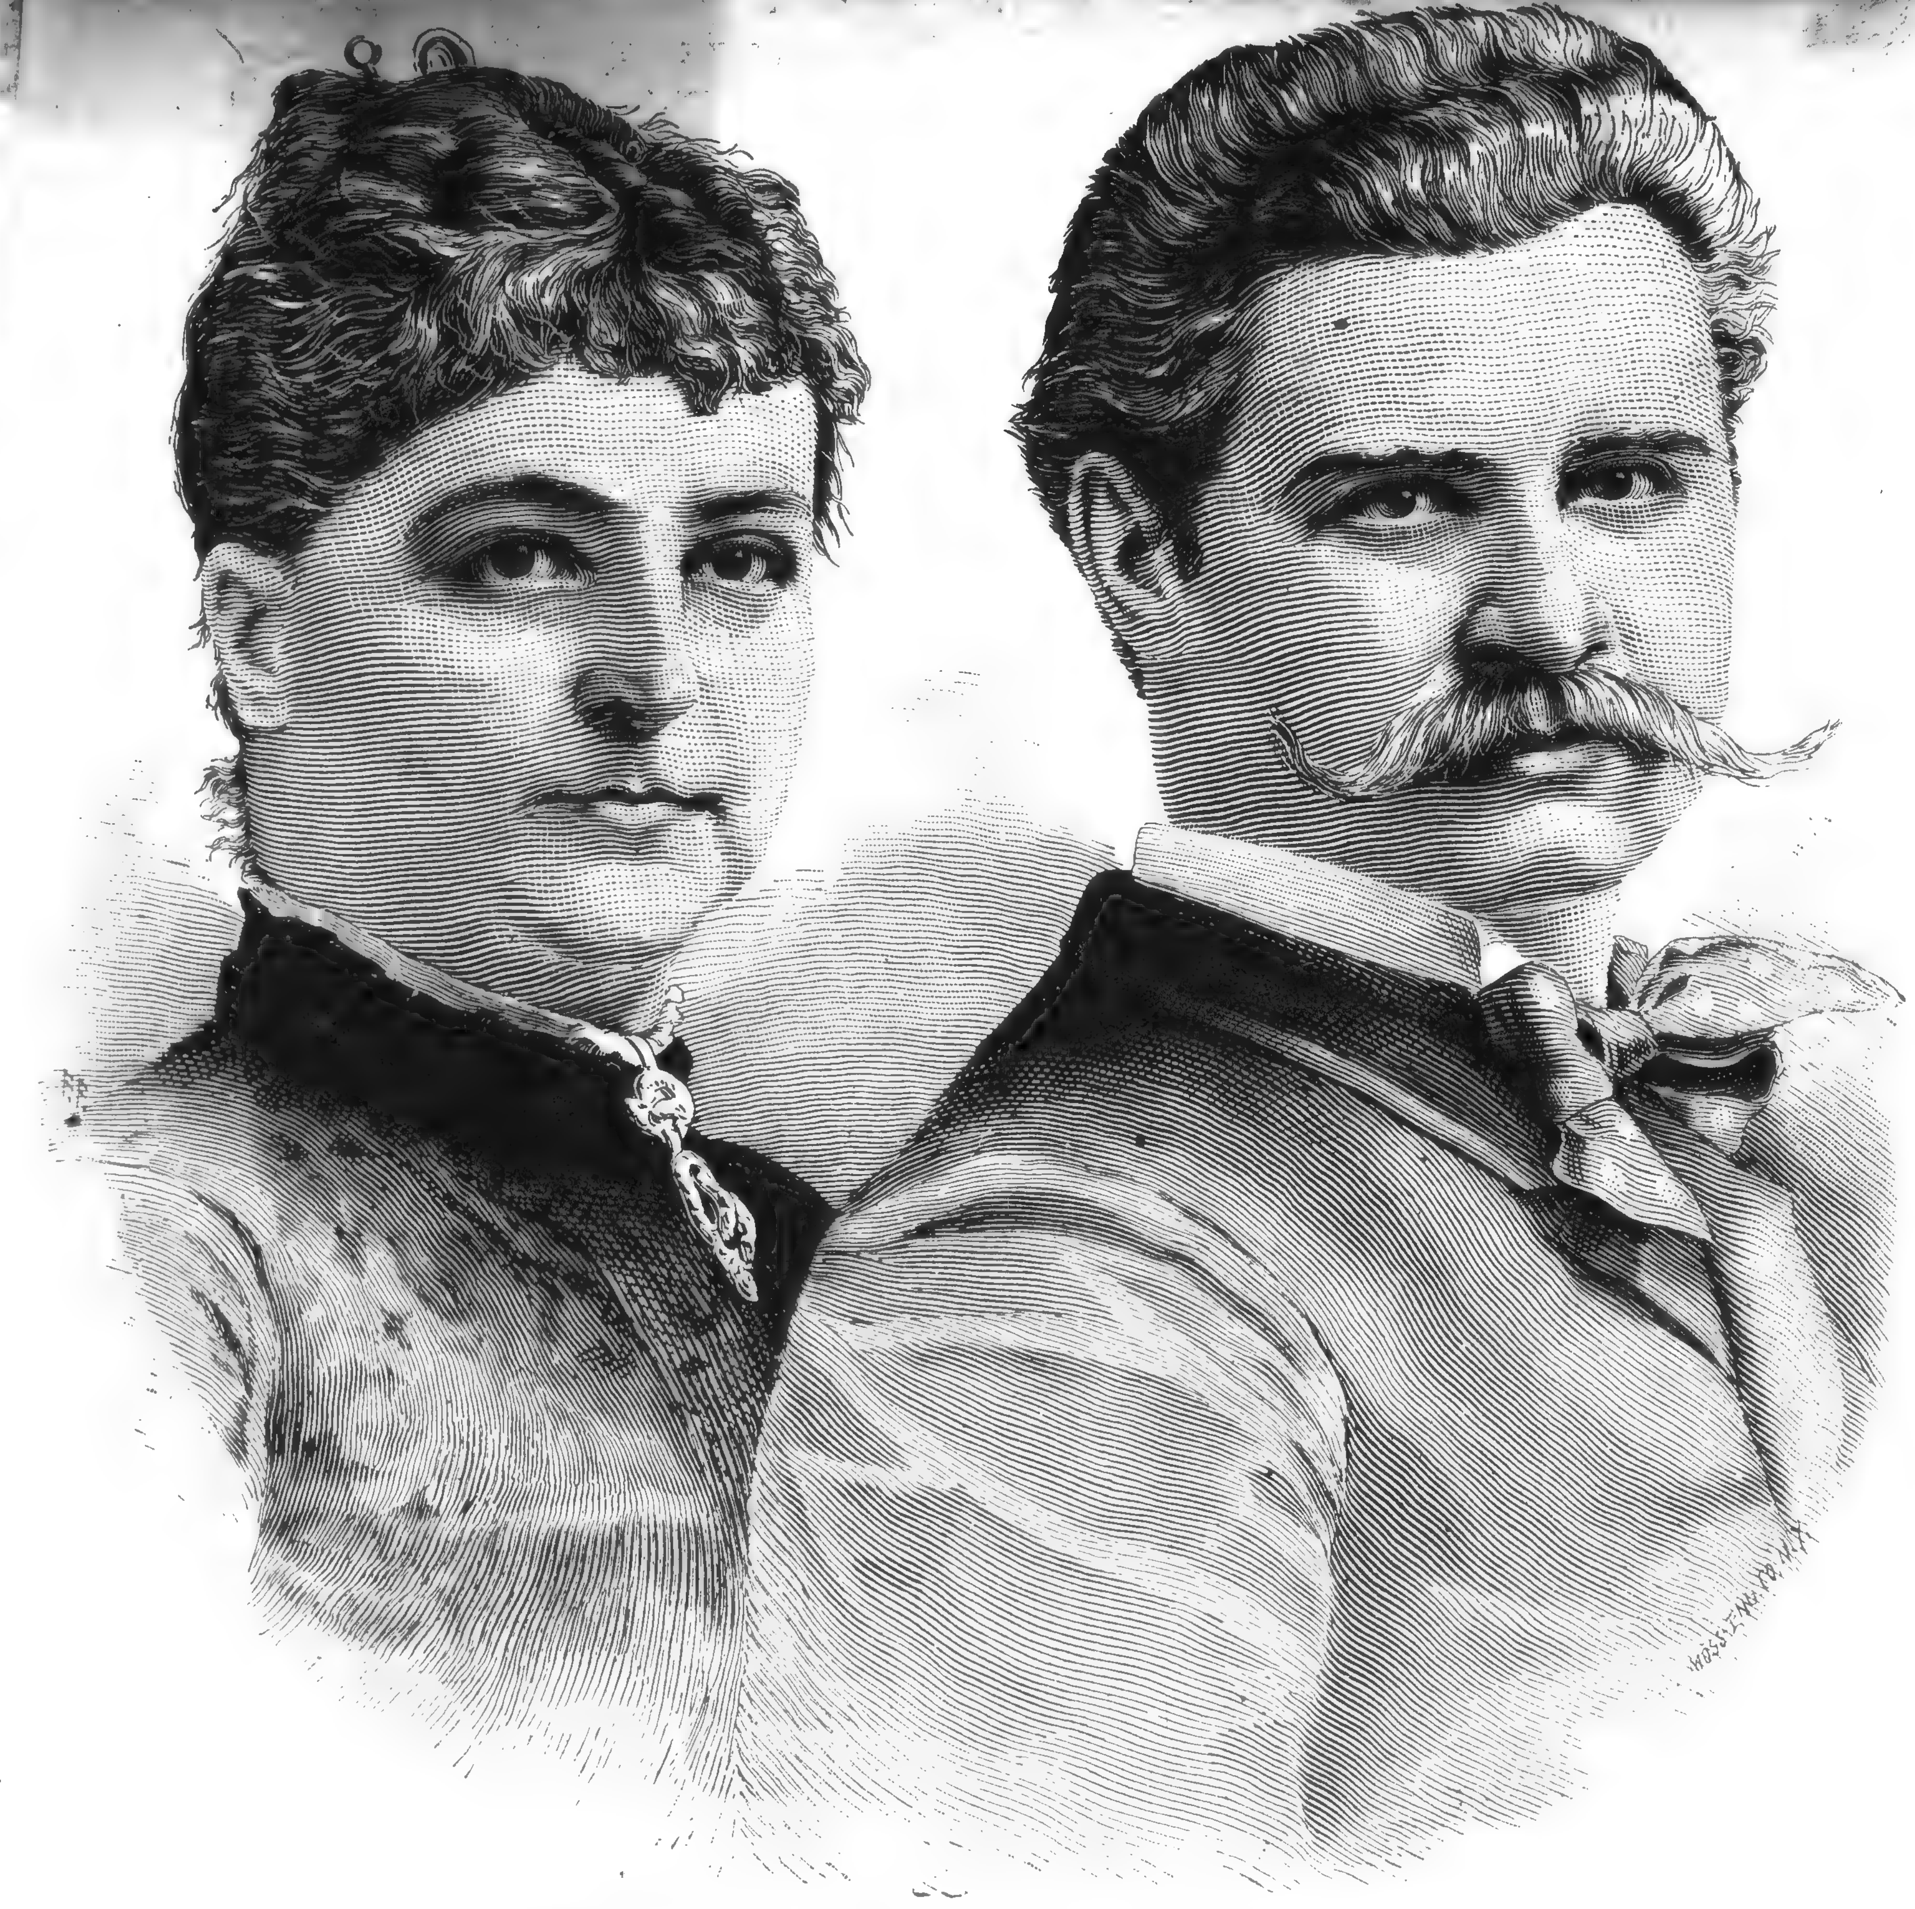
This quartet was the more interesting, because Mr. Novacek lives among us, where we can shake hands with him, as a new member of the Symphony Orchestra. If such a work must come, as some aver, from a man who is either a crank or a genius (like the discovery of the cure for radical hernia, made by Dr. George Heaton away back in the forties). I should say, that in Mr. Novacek's case there is no need to resort to the crank hypothesis. Genius carries the day sometimes, and original thinkers in music are not all past and gone; or, if they are, we may say, with the old hymn, "The Evening Shades Appear." We might add, with Blanco White, that glories are hidden by the daylight, and declare with Hiawatha:

> But I like the starlight better,
> Better do I like the moonlight!

Nearly every musical celebrity in Boston was on hand to welcome Madame Joachim, the distinguished wife of a distinguished husband. In demeanor and "the art of putting things" she is, as she has so long been, a mistress of the concert stage. She made her Boston bow in seven songs and an encore, from Haydn, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert. She drew upon Johann Abraham Peter Schulz (who died with the beginning of our century) for his Sagt wo sind die Veilchen hin. She even went back to Johann Rudolph Ahle (a church writer, born about the time of our Pilgrim immigration) for his Advent Dialogue.

In connection with her impending personal recitals, more must be said later about Mrs. Joachim. For this writing it must suffice to say that she has a magnificent presence and a glorious voice, which she handles grandly, though in spots it shows the effects of long and arduous use. Her closing notes are sustained like the blast of an organ pipe, yet her Brahms Good Night was soft and domestic. She is a singer to jump one from his feet, and was enthusiastically received.

A queer blunder on the bill was the transformation of Heidenröslein into Haideraskin.



MME. LILLI LEHMANN AND HERR PAUL KALISCH.

THE · PRESTO.

EVERY THURSDAY.

MARCH 17, 1892

A WEEKLY MUSIC JOURNAL OF THE TIMES.

The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently presented Conductor Arthur Nikisch with a magnificent French clock in gold and enamel engraved with the words "In gratitude and admiration."

Mme. Joachim, the famous lieder singer, made her first appearance in this country at the Kneisel concert in Boston last week. A distinguished audience of musicians was present to greet the famous singer.

EUGEN D'ALBERT made his re-appearance in Boston on Friday last, playing Beethoven's E flat Concerto No. 5 with the Beethoven Symphony Orchestra. His work was most enthusiastically received. He impressed the large audience present with his thorough earnestness, breadth of interpretation and superb technic.

Eugen D'Albert's first piano recital will be given at Central Music Hall next Thursday evening.

TIMES, New York, N. Y.

Date 3-19

BROOKLYN PHILHARMONIC.

The feature of the fifth public rehearsal of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society at the Brooklyn Academy of Music yesterday was the reappearance in the neighborhood of New-York of the famous pianist Eugen d'Albert. Since his departure from these shores two years ago the little giant of the pianoforte has been playing with increasing success on the Continent of Europe, and his return here at this time is especially interesting, in view of the dispute which has arisen in regard to Beethoven playing.

Mr. Rummel at the last Symphony Society concert made a powerful argument in favor of Beethoven's music, and yesterday Mr. d'Albert made another through the composer's E flat concerto. It will be time enough to discuss d'Albert's work in detail when he comes to New-York. All that is necessary to say at the present time is that he fully sustained his great reputation yesterday by a broad, noble, and beautifully eloquent performance of a supremely beautiful composition. His work was swiftly and warmly recognized by the audience, and he was recalled several times. Later in the afternoon he played several solos in which his splendid technic was fully displayed.

The orchestra under Mr. Nikisch played Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, Saint-Saëns's "Rouet d'Omphale," and Liszt's "Les Préludes." Franz Kneisel repeated his admirable performance of the viola obligato in the Berlioz work, already heard in this city.

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3/19

It is reported that Colonel Henry L. Higginson, the patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has added a codicil to his will that leaves an investment of $1,000,000 as an endowment fund, the interest of which is to be used for the permanent maintenance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 30.

SUNDAY, MARCH 20, 1892.

THE HENSCHELS' RECITAL.

Gotham Music Lovers Experience an Afternoon of Rare Delight.

[Special Dispatch to the Sunday Herald.]

NEW YORK, March 19, 1892. An afternoon of pure and unmitigated enjoyment was offered to music lovers today by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

From former delightful experiences of the performances of these two cultivated artists the public knows what to expect when their song recitals are announced, and, consequently, Chickering Hall overflowed this afternoon with a fashionable audience.

Georg Henschel handles music with such familiarity and ease that it seems fairly to grow, as if by magic, from under his fingers.

To hear him sing "Five Songs from Schubert's 'Cyclus die Winter-Reise,'" was today a magnificent exposition of that great master's deep poetic feeling, which Henshel caught in its fulness and translated. How rare and refreshing in their genial jollity were the two merry songs by Beethoven and Mozart, from "Claudine von Villa Bella" and "Il Seraglio."

But, for the most part, though Mr. Henschel sings genial songs with a peculiarly unctuous manner, he leaves the lightness and beauty and gayety of the programme to his fair wife, being content to furnish for her a serious, sombre background.

Mrs. Henschel was particularly attractive today in her two first airs by Handel, which she sang with absolute repose and with beautiful finish of execution, and in three light songs, two settings of Irish poems and one exquisite spring song.

Her voice is much more flexible than of old, while it has lost none of its first fresh sweetness.

The second recital follows on Saturday, March 26.

THE HENSCHEL RECITALS.

The return to Boston of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will be awaited with eager interest by the large circle of friends and admirers of their artistic career here in the early years of the Boston Symphony orchestra. They are already safely landed, and on Tuesday evening, the 29th inst., at the Meionaon, they are to give the first of four vocal recitals arranged upon the same lines as those in which they have appeared here to so much advantage in former years. The first programme is:

Duet, "Quel onda che rovina" .... Padre Martini
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Aria, "Oh, Sleep," from "Semele"
Aria, "Qual farfaletta," from "Partenope" } Handel
Mrs. Henschel.
Aria from "Il Maestro di Musica" .... Pergolesi
Aria buffa from "Calandrino" .... Cimarosa
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's song .... Beethoven
"Auf Flugeln des Gesanges" .... Mendelssohn
"In the Woods" .... Franz
Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Doppelzanger"
"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus"
"Der Schiffer" } .... Schubert
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from the "Taming of the Shrew" .... Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Romance,
"Morgens als Lerche"
"Der Bote" } New .... Henschel
Mrs. Henschel.
The Czar's song, from "Czar and Carpenter," Lortzing
Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philemon et Baucis," Gounod
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village," Boieldieu
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

The other recitals will be given on Thursday afternoon, March 31, Tuesday afternoon, April 5, and Saturday afternoon, April 9. Season tickets go on sale tomorrow morning at Music Hall.

The programme of the Symphony rehearsal and concert of Friday and Saturday, the 25th and 26th, is as follows: "Tragic" overture, Brahmus; ballet music from Gluck's "Orpheus"; Beethoven's Symphony, No. 8. Mrs. Amalie Joachim will sing an aria from Gluck's "Orpheus," and three songs with pianoforte accompaniment; Schubert's "Liebesbotschaft," and "Erlkoenig," and Schumann's "Schoene Wiege."

Clipping from [illegible]

Date 3-17

"An error in the date of the advertisement placed the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Portland one week ahead of time. The date will be March 29th. Mrs. Nikisch will be vocal soloist. Good evening seats can be obtained at Stockbridge's."—Portland Press.

about Rossini, appropriate to his centennial year. One of them is to the effect that during a conversation some one spoke of a sonata by Hadyn which was little known. Rossini recollected that he had heard it twenty years before and he sat down and played it on the piano in a marvelous manner, the piece containing twenty pages.

[illegible], N. Y.

Date 3/18

To-morrow evening the fifth concert by the matchless Boston symphony orchestra will be given at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The "Harold in Italy" symphony, and symphonic poems by Saint Saens and Liszt will be played, while Eugen D'Albert will give three solos and will appear in Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto.

Ignaz Paderewski will make his last appearance in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music on Monday night. As he will sail for Europe in a few days, this will be the last opportunity to hear the most wonderful pianist who has visited these shores.

Clipping from Com. Advertiser
~~STAR~~, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/19

Nikisch and his Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their fifth rehearsal in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon. D'Albert was the soloist. The concert will be given this evening. Paderewski's farewell recital will be heard at the Academy on Monday night.

Post, Washington, D.C.

Date 3/16

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

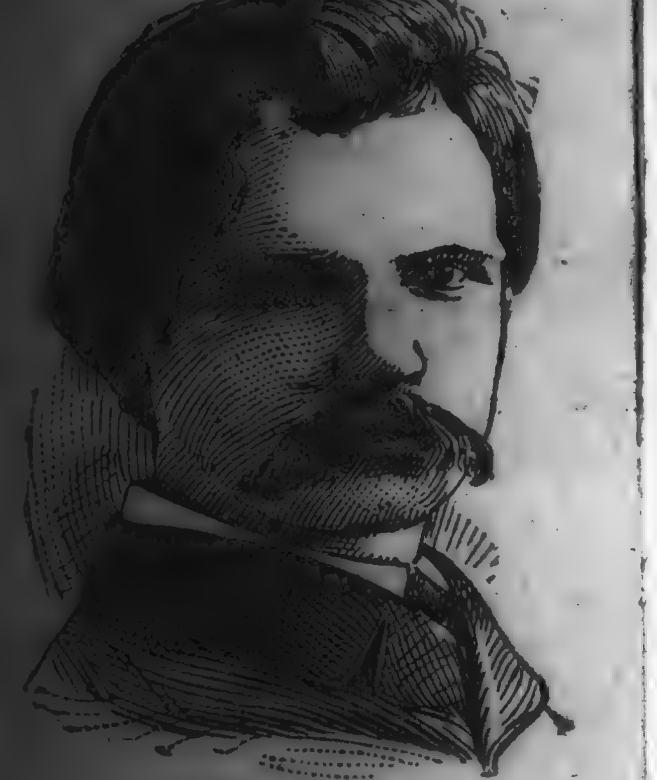
The advance sale of seats for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Congregational Church has been very large, and but few seats remain unsold. The programme is an attractive one, both for the orchestra and for Eugene d'Albert, the eminent pianist, who will be the soloist.

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 3 / 5

Eugen D'Albert.

Among the pianists of Europe Eugen D'Albert is now regarded as one of the greatest who has ever been heard there, especially as an interpreter of Beethoven, and the eminent critic, H. Ehrlich, in writing of him last January, said: "He is the foremost of pianists. His performance of the Beethoven concerto was incomparable and one not to be forgotten." This famous pianist has been brought to America by the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra more especially to play at their concerts, and to afford us an opportunity to hear the great concertos of Beethoven and others at their best.



EUGEN D'ALBERT.

He was in this country once before, when he made a concert tour with the violinist Sarasati—a tour which will long be memorable and which awakened almost as much interest as that of Rubinstein. Many will remember D'Albert—his small stature, large head, surmounted with a shock of dark brown hair; round, boyish face, and his unassuming manners. He has grown stouter since then, but is not otherwise much changed in appearance, and the accompanying cut is a good likeness of him. His technique, even at the age of 16, caused Liszt to call him "a second Tausig," and three years after he had developed so far as to cause Von Bulow to assert his right to rank with Rubinstein and himself. So far on this tour he has played at three concerts with the Boston Orchestra, and Dr. Lambdin of the Philadelphia "Times" epitomizes what all others say of his wondrous playing. He said of last Tuesday's concert:

"Following immediately upon this came the glorious E flat concerto of Beethoven, with D'Albert at the piano. Of all the pianists we have lately heard, there is none whose style is at once so fine and so large and noble. There is no affectation of novelty or parade of personal peculiarities, but just a big, firm, full and splendid execution of one of the greatest of all piano compositions. The power of the man is prodigious and the skill consummate, but power and skill are held in absolute mastery and applied to the intellectual interpretation of the music with a [illegible] dignity that made this noble concerto an unalloyed delight. The orchestra seemed to gain inspiration from the piano. It has never been played with greater fervor and rarely with so magnificent a tone."

This concerto will be performed at the concerts to-morrow and Saturday next at the Academy of Music.

BULLETIN, Haverhill, Mass.

Date 3/18

The Boston Symphony orchestra is delighting the people of New York who can boast of no such organization. The music lovers of the commonwealth truly owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Higginson for his maintainance of the Symphony orchestra which they never can repay. It is truly unique and is unquestionably the most notable aggregation of its kind in the United States if not in the world.

PRESS, Portland, Me.

Date 3/16

The Symphony Orchestra.

The grand concert to be given as the eighth entertainment in the Stockbridge course on Tuesday next, by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra of 60 musicians, will occur at City Hall, and those who have not course tickets should secure good seats for the evening at once. Mrs. Nikisch, the wife of the accomplished conductor, will be the soloist of the evening. She has a lovely voice and is a great pet of the symphony audiences of Boston. A fine programme will be arranged for the evening.

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.

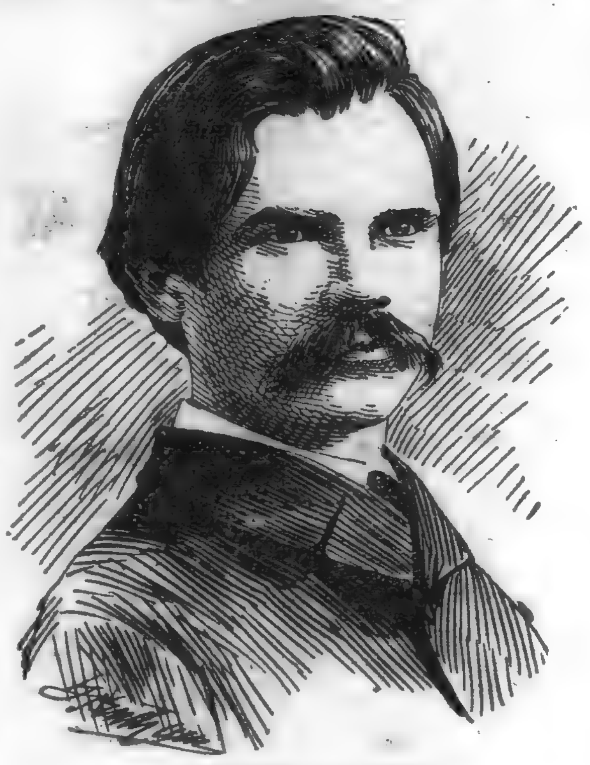
Date 3/19

[illegible] C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged for two song recitals [illegible] Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel at the [illegible] Opera House on Tuesday and Friday [illegible] beginning at 2.30. The [illegible]

Chicago Post
March 17 3/17

The two piano recitals to be given by Eugene D'Albert, under the management of F. Wight Neumann, at Central Music Hall on Thursday evening, March 24, and the Saturday afternoon following will be among the most important musical events of the season. D'Albert made his debut on his second visit to the United States last Friday afternoon at the Boston Music Hall as the soloist at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A genuine ovation was tendered to him, worthy of the pianist who by the German critics is regarded as the greatest living interpreter of Beethoven's music next to Rubinstein, many eminent critics ranking him as Rubinstein's equal in every way.

D'Albert is a Scotchman by birth, but a Frenchman by nature. He is the only son of the French composer, Charles D'Albert. His father directed the musical gifts of the son, which were displayed at a very early age. Ernest Pauer, Dr. Stainer, Ebenezer Prout and Arthur Sullivan were later instructors, Pauer being his pianoforte teacher; Stainer, harmony; Prout, orchestration, and Sullivan, composition. Hans Richter and Franz Liszt gave the finishing touches to his carefully matured genius. He soon won the title "a second Tausig" because of his extraordinary technique.



EUGENE D'ALBERT.

As a composer he ranks high. At the age of fifteen he wrote an overture which was performed at a St. James Hall concert in London. In 1882 he was made court pianist to the grand duke of Weimar—the youngest who had ever been selected for the position. His admirers call him "the greatest pianistic talent after Liszt," and it is related that Von Bulow once said after hearing him play: "There are but three great pianists in the world: Rubinstein, myself and D'Albert; but the latter is yet young and bids fair to surpass us all."

The members of Arthur Nikisch's orchestra recently presented the conductor with a handsome French clock. Some one remarks that such a presentation looks like a reflection on Nikisch's tempo rubato.

[illegible] Philadelphia

Date 3/19 13

—Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged for two song recitals to be given by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel at the Chestnut Street Opera House on the Tuesday and Friday afternoons of next week. The programme for the first concert contains eighteen numbers, songs and duets, by fifteen composers, ranging chronologically from Cimarosa to Massenet. Schumann's "Two Grenadiers," Handel's air from Semele, "Oh! Sleep," and Henschel's duet, "Gondoliera," are on the list.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, MARCH 21, 1892.

THE HENSCHEL RECITALS.

The first of the vocal recitals of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will be given Tuesday evening, the 29th, in the Meionaon. The programme is as follows:

Duet, "Quel onda che rovina" .... Padre Martini
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Aria, "Oh, Sleep," from "Semele" } .... Handel
Aria, "Qual farfaletta," from "Partenope" }
Mrs. Henschel.
Aria from "Il Maestro di Musicae" .... Pergolesi
Aria buffa from "Calandrino" .... Cimarosa
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's song .... Beethoven
"Auf Flugeln des Gesanges" .... Mendelssohn
"In the Woods" .... Franz
Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Doppelganger" }
"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" } .... Schubert
"Der Schiffer" }
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from the "Taming of the Shrew" .... Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Romance. }
"Morgens als Lerche" } New .... Henschel
"Der Bote" }
Mrs. Henschel.
The Czar's song, from "Czar and Carpenter" .... Lortzing
Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philemon et Baucis." Gounod
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village," Boieldieu
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

The other recitals will be given Thursday afternoon, March 31, Tuesday afternoon, April 5, and Saturday afternoon, April 9. Season tickets may now be obtained at Music Hall.

The Kneisel Quartette will give three concerts in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, on the evenings of March 22, 30 and April 19. They will have the assistance of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. [illegible]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 21, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartet will give concerts of chamber music at Brattle Hall, Cambridge, on the evenings of Tuesday, March 22, Wednesday, March 30 and Tuesday, April 19. Course and single tickets for sale at the University Bookstore.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the seventh concert in the Sanders Theatre series on Thursday night. The twenty-fifth public rehearsal and concert at the Music Hall will be given on Friday afternoon and Saturday night. Mrs. Amalie Joachim will be the solo artist of the occasion.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will give concerts of songs at the Meionian on Tuesday evening, March 29, and on the afternoons of Thursday, March 31, Tuesday, April 5, and Saturday, April 9. Course tickets are for sale at the office in Music Hall.

TIMES, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 3-16

The Philharmonic.

Eugene D'Albert, the pianist, who is to play next Friday and Saturday at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society, in the Academy of Music, is the player who produced so profound an impression on the musical public two years ago, when he made a tour of the country with the violinist Sarasate, and whom our musical writers could compare with no one except Rubinstein. German critics have for several years spoken of him as a player before whom "the severest critic must lay down his lance and render him only undivided attention and recognition," and "unequaled as an interpreter of Beethoven." D'Albert has not the grand presence of a Liszt or Rubinstein. He has a very large head set on a small body and much resembles Tausig in appearance. But at the piano he is a giant. His three concerts with this orchestra have repeated the successes of his memorable appearances in New York two years ago.

Eagle [illegible] Y.

Date 3-16

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Nikisch and his Boston orchestra gave the fifth concert of their New York series at Chickering hall last night. The opening and closing numbers of the programme were entirely familiar—Beethoven's seventh symphony and Liszt's "Preludes," of which the latter will be repeated at the forthcoming Brooklyn Philharmonic concerts. Between these pieces were a soprano and orchestral section, "Fata Morgana," from Nicode's symphonic poem, "The Sea," a broad and effective composition, Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" overture, and songs of Richard Strauss, Chopin and Schumann. The band was in excellent shape, a condition which this permanent and, therefore, constantly and consistently disciplined organization is seldom in danger of missing. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was the vocalist and sang with fine spirit. The orchestra, in company with Eugen D'Albert, the pianist, will play in Brooklyn on Friday afternoon and Saturday night of this week.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MARCH 19.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel are again with us. They arrived last Thursday and began their tour of recitals yesterday afternoon at Chickering Hall, New York. Their Boston dates are Tuesday evening, March 29, and the afternoons of March 31, April 5 and 9, at the Meionaon. When the Henschels were residents of Boston these entertainments were among the most enjoyable that were given here, in fact it would be difficult to overestimate their fascinating character, and since then all Europe has become patrons of these remarkable artists. The sale of subscription tickets for this series of four recitals opens Monday at Music Hall.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3/23

Mr. and Mr. Georg Henschel at the Chestnut-street Opera House.

There was a large and cultured audience at the Chestnut-street Opera House yesterday afternoon, when Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave one of those song recitals for which they have won artistic distinction on both sides of the Atlantic. These concerts of theirs, of which that of yesterday was the first ever given in Philadelphia, are unique. There is nothing else quite like them in the whole range of musical entertainment, and this because no other two artists of equal standing so closely and admirably supplement and complete and harmonize with each other. Their voices blend perfectly, they understand each other completely, and are in absolute sympathy artistically and emotionally with each other. Given these conditions, together with vocal ability of a high order in each instance, and the charm of the ensemble work can readily be imagined. The only criticism that can be passed on yesterday's concert is that Mr. Henschel did not always accurately estimate the auditorium, but inclined to sing as though in a drawing-room. Apart from this the concert was one of consummate excellence. Merely to hear Mr. Henschel play accompaniments is a liberal education in that difficult and neglected art. They will give another recital at the Opera House on Friday next at 2.30.

Stadt Baltimore.

Freitag, 18. März 1892.

Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſter. — Da die Saiſon zu Ende geht und das Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſter nur noch einmal auftritt, ſo kann man mit Recht das geſtrige Conzert als das Beſte bezeichnen, was bisher geliefert wurde. Ein vollſtändiges Orcheſter von lauter Künſtlern zu hören, an deſſen Spitze ein genialer Leiter ſteht, iſt ein Hochgenuß, der nicht genügend gewürdigt werden kann. Es iſt in der That eine ſchwere Aufgabe in wenigen Worten das zu ſichten was geboten wurde und in verſtändlicher Weiſe zu beſprechen. Altbekannte und oft gehörte Sachen werden durch Herrn Nikiſch's eigenartige Auffaſſung und Ausarbeitung in ein ſo neues, intereſſantes Licht gerückt, daß man im Augenblicke des Hörens von der Richtigkeit ſeiner Auffaſſung überzeugt iſt, er verſchmäht jedes ſchablonenhafte, künſtleriſche Empfinden, ſeine Aufführungen ſind Genialität.

Das Programm war wohl eines der intereſſanteſten, das je hier zur Ausführung gelangte. Die erſte Nummer war eine Fantaſie-Ouvertüre „Hamlet" von dem ruſſiſchen Componiſten Tſchaikowsky. Wenn man nicht den Namen Hamlet auf dem Programm ſtehen hätte, ſo hätte gewiß mancher mit etwas muſikaliſcher Empfindung der Ouverture einen andern Namen gegeben, etwa „Ein Nothſchrei der Hungernden!" Dieſes Flehen und Ringen, dieſes eindringliche Bitten der Flöten und Blasinſtrumente, das ſich in einer Stelle auf 16 Takte und zwar denſelben Ton ausdehnt, iſt großartig gedacht, dieſe kecke, freche, zurückweiſende Erwiderung der Streichinſtrumente auf das innige Flehen, muß man hören, Worte reichen hier nicht aus. Die beiden andern Orcheſter-Nummern waren „eine Gedicht - Symphonie" von Saint Saens, dem großen franzöſiſchen Meiſter, und die hier zum erſten Male gehörte Symphonie Nr. 4 in G-Dur von Dvorak. Dieſes Werk bietet des Intereſſanten zu viel, der Eindruck iſt ein zu überwältigender, als daß man nach einmaligem Hören, ein definitives Urtheil abgeben könnte. Die Palme des Abends trug aber unſtreitig der geniale Klaviervirtuoſe Eugen D'Albert davon. Schon vor 10 und 15 Jahren entzückte der damals noch jugendliche Künſtler durch ſein feuriges Spiel das deutſche Publikum. Dieſes wilde Auflodern hat ſich jetzt eingedämmt in die Grenzen des echten Genius, der die Werke der Meiſter ſo wieder giebt, wie ſie geſchaffen, wie ſie gedacht wurden, frei von allem eigenen Empfinden und eben darin lag der rieſige Erfolg den ſich D'Albert geſtern Abend erwarb.

Man glaubte nicht, einen fremden anmaßenden Künſtler zu hören, ſondern Chopin ſelbſt, wie er lebte, das waren ſeine Gedanken, das waren ſeine Gefühle, ſo hatte er gedacht, als er das großartige E-Moll-Conzert ſchrieb. Dieſes „Durch Nacht zum Licht" in dem erſten "Maestoso."Satze iſt eine großartige Leiſtung, und wie innig ſich die beiden Künſtler D'Albert und Nikiſch verſtanden, es fehlte auch nicht das Kleinſte, ein Blick, ein Wink, und ſie hatten ſich verſtanden. Es iſt kaum glaublich, daß das „Larghetto" jemals ſchöner gegeben wurde, als geſtern. Es war ein vollendetes Zuſammenſpiel. Kein Wunder, daß das Publikum den Virtuoſen ſechs Mal herausrief. Der Beifall wollte gar kein Ende nehmen. Das Publikum ſah in dem Künſtler nicht nur den Virtuoſen, ſondern den echten Dolmetſcher der muſikaliſchen Gedanken Chopin's. Chopin hat ſich in dieſem Conzert ſein Monument geſetzt, das iſt echt menſchlich und doch wieder göttlich, ein Sterben und ein Auferſtehen. Mit den übrigen Nummern erntete D'Albert denſelben Beifall. Mit Spannung ſehen wir dem 6. Conzerte entgegen.

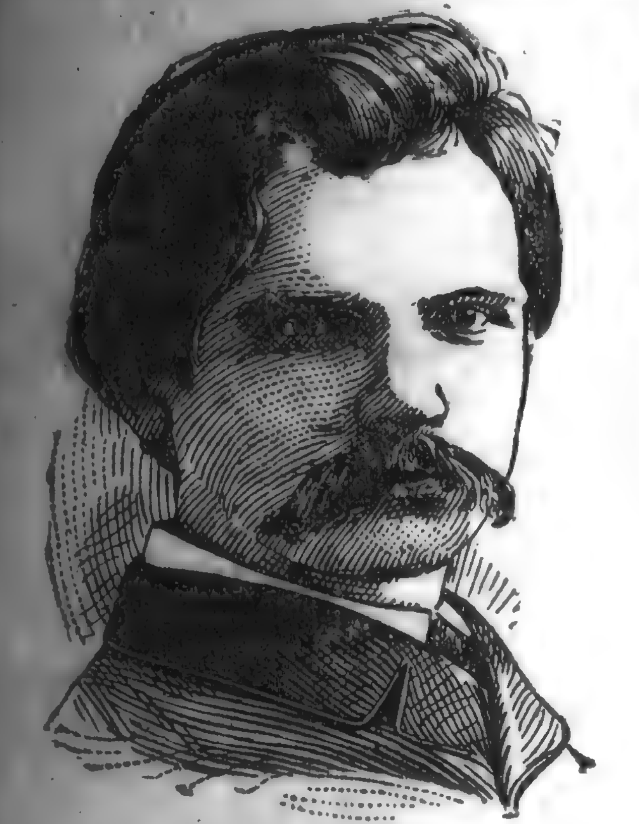
[157]

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 3/5

Eugen D'Albert.

Among the pianists of Europe Eugen D'Albert is now regarded as one of the greatest who has ever been heard there, especially as an interpreter of Beethoven, and the eminent critic, H. Ehrlich, in writing of him last January, said: "He is the foremost of pianists. His performance of the Beethoven concerto was incomparable and one not to be forgotten." This famous pianist has been brought to America by the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra more especially to play at their concerts, and to afford us an opportunity to hear the great concertos of Beethoven and others at their best.



EUGEN D'ALBERT.

He was in this country once before, when he made a concert tour with the violinist Sarasati—a tour which will long be memorable and which awakened almost as much interest as that of Rubinstein. Many will remember D'Albert—his small stature, large head, surmounted with a shock of dark brown hair; round, boyish face, and his unassuming manners. He has grown stouter since then, but is not otherwise much changed in appearance, and the accompanying cut is a good likeness of him. His technique, even at the age of 16, caused Liszt to call him "a second Tausig," and three years after he had developed so far as to cause Von Bulow to assert his right to rank with Rubinstein and himself. So far on this tour he has played at three concerts with the Boston Orchestra, and Dr. Lambdin of the Philadelphia "Times" epitomizes what all others say of his wondrous playing. He said of last Tuesday's concert:

"Following immediately upon this came the glorious E flat concerto of Beethoven, with D'Albert at the piano. Of all the pianists we have lately heard, there is none whose style is at once so fine and so large and noble. There is no affectation of novelty or parade of personal peculiarities, but just a big, firm, full and splendid execution of one of the greatest of all piano compositions. The power of the man is prodigious and the skill consummate, but power and skill are held in absolute mastery and applied to the intellectual interpretation of the music with a classic dignity that made this noble concerto an unalloyed delight. The orchestra seemed to gain inspiration from the piano. It has never been played with greater fervor and rarely with so magnificent a tone."

This concerto will be performed at the concerts to-morrow and Saturday next at the Academy of Music.

BULLETIN, Haverhill, Mass.

Date 16

The Boston Symphony orchestra is delighting the people of New York who can boast of no such organization. The music lovers of the commonwealth truly owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Higginson for his maintainance of the Symphony orchestra which they never can repay. It is truly unique and is unquestionably the most notable aggregation of its kind in the United States if not in the world.

PRESS, Portland, Me.

Date 3/16

The Symphony Orchestra.

The grand concert to be given as the eighth entertainment in the Stockbridge course on Tuesday next, by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra of 60 musicians, will occur at City Hall, and those who have not course tickets should secure good seats for the evening at once. Mrs. Nikisch, the wife of the accomplished conductor, will be the soloist of the evening. She has a lovely voice and is a great pet of the symphony audiences of Boston. A fine programme will be arranged for the evening.

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.

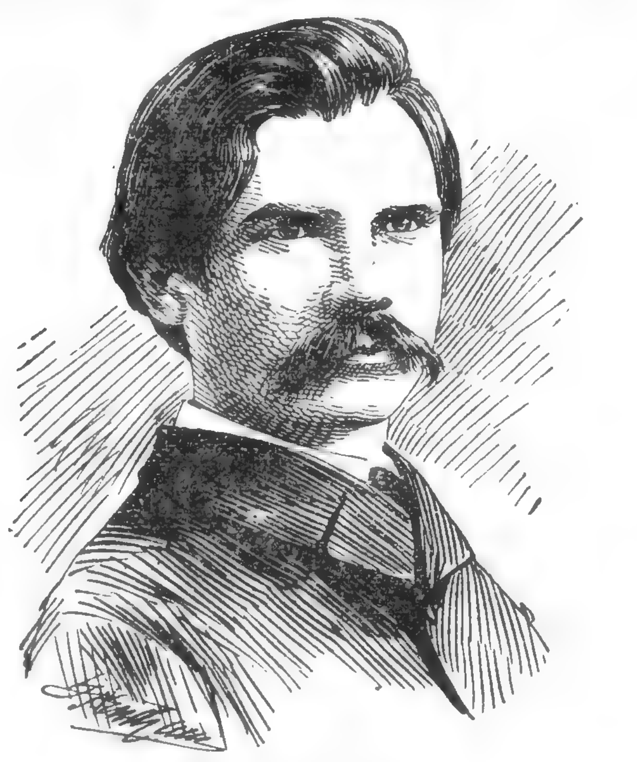
Date 3/19

Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged for two song recitals to be given by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel at the Chestnut Street Opera House on Tuesday and Friday afternoons of next week, beginning at 2.30. The programme for the first contains eighteen numbers, [illegible] duets, by fifteen composers, ranging chronologically from Cimarosa and Pergolesi to Goring [illegible] Massenet. Schumann's "Two Grenadiers," [illegible] from Semele, "Oh! Sleep," and [illegible] are on the list. Seats [illegible] Chestnut street.

Chicago Post
March 17 3/17

The two piano recitals to be given by Eugene D'Albert, under the management of F. Wight Neumann, at Central Music Hall on Thursday evening, March 24, and the Saturday afternoon following will be among the most important musical events of the season. D'Albert made his debut on his second visit to the United States last Friday afternoon at the Boston Music Hall as the soloist at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A genuine ovation was tendered to him, worthy of the pianist who by the German critics is regarded as the greatest living interpreter of Beethoven's music next to Rubinstein, many eminent critics ranking him as Rubinstein's equal in every way.

D'Albert is a Scotchman by birth, but a Frenchman by nature. He is the only son of the French composer, Charles D'Albert. His father directed the musical gifts of the son, which were displayed at a very early age. Ernest Pauer, Dr. Stainer, Ebenezer Prout and Arthur Sullivan were later instructors, Pauer being his pianoforte teacher; Stainer, harmony; Prout, orchestration, and Sullivan, composition. Hans Richter and Franz Liszt gave the finishing touches to his carefully matured genius. He soon won the title "a second Tausig" because of his extraordinary technique.



EUGENE D'ALBERT.

As a composer he ranks high. At the age of fifteen he wrote an overture which was performed at a St. James Hall concert in London. In 1882 he was made court pianist to the grand duke of Weimar—the youngest who had ever been selected for the position. His admirers call him "the greatest pianistic talent after Liszt," and it is related that Von Bulow once said after hearing him play: "There are but three great pianists in the world: Rubinstein, myself and D'Albert; but the latter is yet young and bids fair to surpass us all."

The members of Arthur Nikisch's orchestra recently presented the conductor with a handsome French clock. Some one remarks that such a presentation looks like a reflection on Nikisch's tempo rubato.

Date 3/17

—Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged for two song recitals to be given by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel at the Chestnut Street Opera House on the Tuesday and Friday afternoons of next week. The programme for the first concert contains eighteen numbers, songs and duets, by fifteen composers, ranging chronologically from Cimarosa to Massenet. Schumann's "Two Grenadiers," Handel's air from Semele, "Oh! Sleep," and Henschel's duet, "Gondoliera," are on the list.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, MARCH 21, 1892.

THE HENSCHEL RECITALS.

The first of the vocal recitals of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will be given Tuesday evening, the 29th, in the Meionaon. The programme is as follows:

Duet, "Quel onda che rovina"..............Padre Martini
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Aria, "Oh, Sleep," from "Semele"
Aria, "Qual farfaletta," from "Partenope" }....Handel
Mrs. Henschel.
Aria from "Il Maestro di Musicae"..............Pergolesi
Aria buffa from "Calandrino"..............Cimarosa
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's song..............Beethoven
"Auf Flugeln des Gesanges"..............Mendelssohn
"In the Woods"..............Franz
Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Doppelganger"
"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" }..............Schubert
"Der Schiffer"
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from the "Taming of the Shrew"..............Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Romance.
"Morgens als Lerche" } New..............Henschel
"Der Bote"
Mrs. Henschel.
The Czar's song, from "Czar and Carpenter"....Lortzing
Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philemon et Baucis," Gounod
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village," Boieldieu
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

The other recitals will be given Thursday afternoon, March 31, Tuesday afternoon, April 5, and Saturday afternoon, April 9. Season tickets may now be obtained at Music Hall.

The Kneisel Quartette will give three concerts in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, on the evenings of March 22, 30 and April 19. They will have the assistance of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. Busoni.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 21, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartet will give concerts of chamber music at Brattle Hall, Cambridge, on the evenings of Tuesday, March 22, Wednesday, March 30 and Tuesday, April 19. Course and single tickets for sale at the University Bookstore.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the seventh concert in the Sanders Theatre series on Thursday night. The twenty-fifth public rehearsal and concert at the Music Hall will be given on Friday afternoon and Saturday night. Mrs. Amalie Joachim will be the solo artist of the occasion.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will give concerts of songs at the Meionian on Tuesday evening, March 29, and on the afternoons of Thursday, March 31, Tuesday, April 5, and Saturday, April 9. Course tickets are for sale at the office in Music Hall.

Date [illegible]MES, Brooklyn, N. Y.

3/16

The Philharmonic.

Eugene D'Albert, the pianist, who is to play next Friday and Saturday at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society, in the Academy of Music, is the player who produced so profound an impression on the musical public two years ago, when he made a tour of the country with the violinist Sarasate, and whom our musical writers could compare with no one except Rubinstein. German critics have for several years spoken of him as a player before whom "the severest critic must lay down his lance and render him only undivided attention and recognition," and "unequaled as an interpreter of Beethoven." D'Albert has not the grand presence of a Liszt or Rubinstein. He has a very large head set on a small body and much resembles Tausig in appearance. But at the piano he is a giant. His three concerts with this orchestra have repeated the successes of his memorable appearances in New York two years ago.

Date 3-14

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Nikisch and his Boston orchestra gave the fifth concert of their New York series at Chickering hall last night. The opening and closing numbers of the programme were entirely familiar—Beethoven's seventh symphony and Liszt's "Preludes," of which the latter will be repeated at the forthcoming Brooklyn Philharmonic concerts. Between these pieces were a soprano and orchestral section, "Fata Morgana," from Nicode's symphonic poem, "The Sea," a broad and effective composition, Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" overture, and songs of Richard Strauss, Chopin and Schumann. The band was in excellent shape, a condition which this permanent and, therefore, constantly and consistently disciplined organization is seldom in danger of missing. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was the vocalist and sang with fine spirit. The orchestra, in company with Eugen D'Albert, the pianist, will play in Brooklyn on Friday afternoon and Saturday night of this week.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MARCH 19.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel are again with us. They arrived last Thursday and began their tour of recitals yesterday afternoon at Chickering Hall, New York. Their Boston dates are Tuesday evening, March 29, and the afternoons of March 31, April 5 and 9, at the Meionaon. When the Henschels were residents of Boston these entertainments were among the most enjoyable that were given here, in fact it would be difficult to overestimate their fascinating character, and since then all Europe has become patrons of these remarkable artists. The sale of subscription tickets for this series of four recitals opens Monday at Music Hall.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Pa.

3

Date

Mr. and Mr. Georg Henschel at the Chestnut-street Opera House.

There was a large and cultured audience at the Chestnut-street Opera House yesterday afternoon, when Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave one of those song recitals for which they have won artistic distinction on both sides of the Atlantic. These concerts of theirs, of which that of yesterday was the first ever given in Philadelphia, are unique. There is nothing else quite like them in the whole range of musical entertainment, and this because no other two artists of equal standing so closely and admirably supplement and complete and harmonize with each other. Their voices blend perfectly, they understand each other completely, and are in absolute sympathy artistically and emotionally with each other. Given these conditions, together with vocal ability of a high order in each instance, and the charm of the ensemble work can readily be imagined. The only criticism that can be passed on yesterday's concert is that Mr. Henschel did not always accurately estimate the auditorium, but inclined to sing as though in a drawing-room. Apart from this the concert was one of consummate excellence. Merely to hear Mr. Henschel play accompaniments is a liberal education in that difficult and neglected art. They will give another recital at the Opera House on Friday next at 2.30.

Stadt Baltimore.

Freitag, 18. März 1892.

Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſter. — Da die Saiſon zu Ende geht und das Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſter nur noch einmal auftritt, ſo kann man mit Recht das geſtrige Conzert als das Beſte bezeichnen, was bisher geliefert wurde. Ein vollſtändiges Orcheſter von lauter Künſtlern zu hören, an deſſen Spitze ein genialer Leiter ſteht, iſt ein Hochgenuß, der nicht genügend gewürdigt werden kann. Es iſt in der That eine ſchwere Aufgabe in wenigen Worten das zu ſichten was geboten wurde und in verſtändlicher Weiſe zu beſprechen. Altbekannte und oft gehörte Sachen werden durch Herrn Nikiſch's eigenartige Auffaſſung und Ausarbeitung in ein ſo neues, intereſſantes Licht gerückt, daß man im Augenblicke des Hörens von der Richtigkeit ſeiner Auffaſſung überzeugt iſt, er verſchmäht jedes ſchablonenhafte, künſtleriſche Empfinden, ſeine Aufführungen ſind Genialität.

Das Programm war wohl eines der intereſſanteſten, das je hier zur Ausführung gelangte. Die erſte Nummer war eine Fantaſie-Ouvertüre „Hamlet" von dem ruſſiſchen Componiſten Tſchaikowsky. Wenn man nicht den Namen Hamlet auf dem Programm ſtehen hätte, ſo hätte gewiß mancher mit etwas muſikaliſcher Empfindung der Ouverture einen andern Namen gegeben, etwa „Ein Nothſchrei der Hungernden!" Dieſes Flehen und Ringen, dieſes eindringliche Bitten der Flöten und Blasinſtrumente, das ſich in einer Stelle auf 16 Takte und zwar denſelben Ton ausdehnt, iſt großartig gedacht, dieſe kecke, freche, zurückweiſende Erwiderung der Streichinſtrumente auf das innige Flehen, muß man hören, Worte reichen hier nicht aus. Die beiden andern Orcheſter-Nummern waren „eine Gedicht-Symphonie" von Saint Saens, dem großen franzöſiſchen Meiſter, und die hier zum erſten Male gehörte Symphonie Nr. 4 in G-Dur von Dvorak. Dieſes Werk bietet des Intereſſanten zu viel, der Eindruck iſt ein zu überwältigender, als daß man nach einmaligem Hören, ein definitives Urtheil abgeben könnte. Die Palme des Abends trug aber unſtreitig der geniale Klaviervirtuoſe Eugen D'Albert davon. Schon vor 10 und 15 Jahren entzückte der damals noch jugendliche Künſtler durch ſein feuriges Spiel das deutſche Publikum. Dieſes wilde Auflodern hat ſich jetzt eingedämmt in die Grenzen des echten Genius, der die Werke der Meiſter ſo wieder giebt, wie ſie geſchaffen, wie ſie gedacht wurden, frei von allem eigenen Empfinden und eben darin lag der rieſige Erfolg den ſich D'Albert geſtern Abend erwarb.

Man glaubte nicht, einen fremden anmaßenden Künſtler zu hören, ſondern Chopin ſelbſt, wie er lebte, das waren ſeine Gedanken, das waren ſeine Gefühle, ſo hatte er gedacht, als er das großartige E-Moll-Conzert ſchrieb. Dieſes „Durch Nacht zum Licht" in dem erſten "Maestoso-"Satze iſt eine großartige Leiſtung, und wie innig ſich die beiden Künſtler D'Albert und Nikiſch verſtanden, es fehlte auch nicht das Kleinſte, ein Blick, ein Wink, und ſie hatten ſich verſtanden. Es iſt kaum glaublich, daß das „Larghetto" jemals ſchöner gegeben wurde, als geſtern. Es war ein vollendetes Zuſammenſpiel. Kein Wunder, daß das Publikum den Virtuoſen ſechs Mal herausrief. Der Beifall wollte gar kein Ende nehmen. Das Publikum ſah in dem Künſtler nicht nur den Virtuoſen, ſondern den echten Dolmetſcher der muſikaliſchen Gedanken Chopin's. Chopin hat ſich in dieſem Conzert ſein Monument geſetzt, das iſt echt menſchlich und doch wieder göttlich, ein Sterben und ein Auferſtehen. Mit den übrigen Nummern erntete D'Albert denſelben Beifall. Mit Spannung ſehen wir dem 6. Conzerte entgegen.

BRATTLE HALL, CAMBRIDGE.

1892

Tuesday Evening, March 22,
Wednesday Evening, March 30.
Tuesday Evening, April 19.

THREE CONCERTS

BY THE

KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Mr. L. SVECENSKI,
Mr. OTTO ROTH, Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

ASSISTING ARTISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.
MR. F. BUSONI.

Tickets, with reserved seats for the remaining Concerts, may be obtained at the University Bookstore, Cambridge.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

ELEVENTH SEASON,—1891–92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 22, AT 7.45.

PROGRAMME.

IN MEMORY OF
JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

SCHUMANN.	OVERTURE. "Manfred."
SCHUBERT.	SYMPHONY No. 8, in B minor. (Unfinished.) Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor. Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto.— Allegro (Scherzo).—Allegro (Finale.)

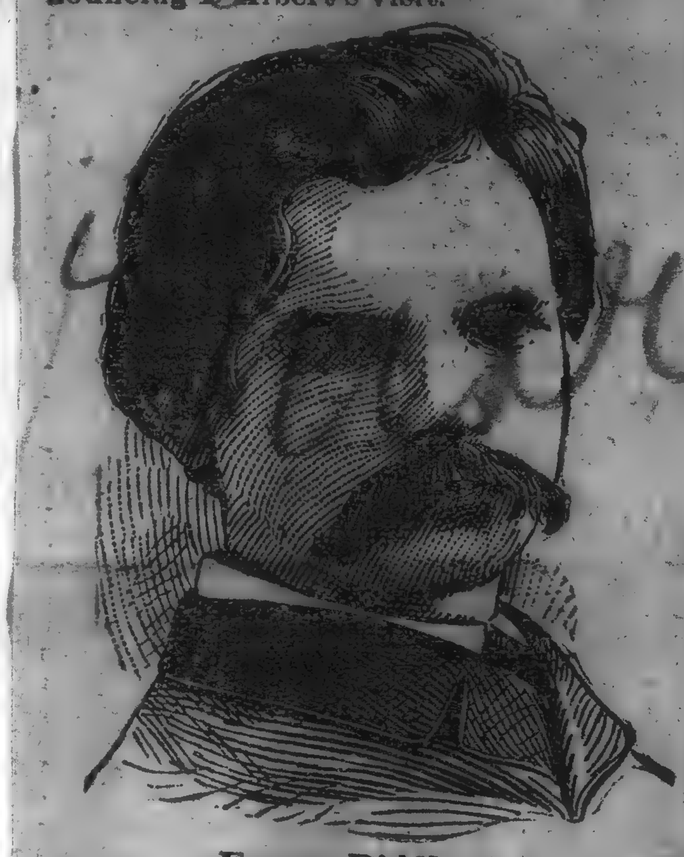
Ledger Pitsbg.

THE ART DIVINE.

Eugene D'Albert's Recital in Old City Hall To-Morrow Night.

Sketch of the Famous Young Pianist. Two Concerts to be Given by the Marine Band in Pittsburg in May—The Grunfeld Concert—Novel Experiment to be Made by Mr. Simeon Bissell on Behalf of Perfect Enunciation in Singing—Doings of Local Musicians.

Eugen D'Albert's visit to Pittsburg to-morrow night will be one of the few important musical events of this season. The large audience which this great pianist ought to draw to Old City hall will have a chance to hear a wonderful young artist who is compared to the greatest musicians of the age. This interesting sketch is taken from a circular announcing D'Albert's visit.



Eugen D'Albert,

Only son of the French composer, Charles D'Albert, was born in Glasgow in 1864, his parents having emigrated there from France. His evident musical genius was fostered by his father, under whose training he developed rapidly; and in 1876, obtaining a free scholarship in the National Training school, London, he studied the pianoforte under Ernest Pauer, harmony under Dr. Stainer, orchestation under Ebenezer Prout, and composition under Arthur Sullivan, thus thoroughly developing his many-sided genius. Here Hans Richter met him, and, recognizing the youth's extraordinary gifts, took D'Albert to his own house, in Vienna, and taught him for a year, in order to bring him, properly prepared, to Franz Liszt, in whom he found a wise teacher and benefactor. The progress made in the next five months was astonishing even to the great master, who called him "a second Tausig," because of his extraordinary technique. A writer at that time said of him: "His ability does not seem so much the result of study as of the genius of music using him as its instrument." At the age of 15 he composed an overture which was performed in St. James hall, London; and his compositions number many fine works for orchestra and for piano, besides a grand opera, just completed. His first public appearance was at the Philharmonic concerts in Vienna, where he played his own compositions, repeating them afterward at the Richter concerts in London. Later on he played repeatedly in Weimar; and, in 1882, as a result of his superb work, he was appointed by the Grand Duke of Weimar as court pianist—a distinction remarkable in that it had never before been granted to so youthful an artist. It was as a pianist and interpreter of master works that his genius shone brightest; and his subsequent concerts in Dresden, Vienna, Leipzig and other cities have been unparalleled successes, continuing without a break to the present. He is called "the greatest pianistic artist after Liszt," and has made good his youthful promise, as predicted by Von Bulow, who said, "There are but three great pianists in the world, Rubinstein, myself and D'Albert: but the latter is yet young, and bids fair to surpass us all."

In speaking of a recent Boston symphony orchestral concert, in which Beethoven's concerto in E flat, No. 5, was played, D'Albert being the pianist, a Boston critic says:

Every seat in the hall was occupied, and all the available space in the outside aisles was taken up by the many who were not regular attendants, but had been attracted by the prospect of an unusually fine performance by the pianist whom all Europe unites in calling the greatest living exponent of piano music. As an interpreter of Beethoven he probably has no equal, and Saturday night's concert fully sustained the judgment passed upon him by foreign critics and those of our own country during his visit two years ago.

D'Albert's treatment of the opening allegro was broad and masterly, and characterized by remarkable clearness and purity of tone. His easy mastery of the prodigious technical difficulties commanded the instant admiration of the audience.

The second movement, adagio, was beautifully rendered, the theme distinctly traceable and admirably disclosing his delicacy of touch, his taste and conception of technical finish, while the final movement brought forth the heartiest applause from the audience and the members of the orchestra as well.

Following is the program for to-morrow night's recital:

Prelude and Fugue—D maj....Bach—D'Albert
Sonata—C maj., op. 53................Beethoven
  Allegro con brio;
  Introduzione e Rondo.
Berceuse—op. 57 }
Valse—op. 42 } ....Chopin
Sonata—op. 58..........................Chopin Allegro;
  Scherzo;
  [illegible]
  Finale.
Impromptu No. 3—op. 90............Schubert
[illegible] Impromptu. }
[illegible] "Napoli." } ....L[illegible]

[illegible]

Date........

them [illegible]y."

The Philharmonic Rehearsal.

The fifth of the Nikisch rehearsals, [illegible] last, presented some interesting features. Eugen d'Albert, the great pianist, played for the first time in Brooklyn, and Berlioz's Symphony, "Harold in Italy," was given. This composition has not been heard recently in Brooklyn, if at all. It is difficult to judge of a work at a first hearing, but an impression may at least be given. The most striking thing about the symphony is the richness of the orchestral arrangement. This is not strange when we remember that Berlioz stands at the head of all the daring modern composers. His combinations are unique, though frequently incomprehensible to the untrained listener. The first movement of the symphony is called "Harold in the Mountains," and portrays in an adagio and allegro scenes of melancholy, happiness and joy. The movement is rich in melodies, somewhat fragmentary and unconnected. Mr. Franz Kneisel, the first violinist, played with great skill and taste the viola obligato which is probably intended to suggest the individual reflections of Harold. The "March of the Pilgrims" (singing the evening prayer) is a movement difficult to appreciate. The imitation of church bells seemed somewhat flippant and detracted from the unity of the effect of the sturdy march movement, though the bell finale gave Mr. Kneisel a fine opportunity to display his command over the instrument in the closing harmonic passages. The third movement, "The Serenade of a Mountaineer," allegro assai, allegretto, is the most pleasing of the four, and was apparently intended to be bright and genial. As Mr. Nikisch gave it it was rather too melancholy. In the fourth movement the previous motives all appear again in the "Orgy of the Brigands" (allegro frenetico), and the symphony closes with a grand crash of all the instruments.

D'Albert is not an attractive looking man. He is small, his body and arms are absurdly short, and only his enormously developed hands seem full-grown and mature. His playing is of a nature to grow upon one. Though not lacking in feeling, it has little of the emotional quality which made Paderewski leap into public favor. D'Albert is more of a player for musicians than for the populace. Some competent judges consider his technique finer than Paderewski's, while in Vienna, the home of Von Bulow and Leschetitsky, D'Albert is considered the first living pianist. The ease of his work is misleading. He sweeps over difficult passages with so little apparent effort, and his handling is so broad, so entirely without sensationalism, that the greatness of his work is apt to escape one.

This was the case with the audience Friday, through the first movement of Beethoven's noble E flat concerto, for which D'Albert received very gentle applause. In the course of the next two movements, however, he developed such unexpected resources that he surprised his hearers into enthusiasm. His solo numbers were Chopin's "Berceuse," a Schubert impromptu, and the brilliant Strauss-Tausig waltz "Man Lebt Nur Einmal." For an encore he gave one of the well-known Chopin waltzes.

Saint-Saens symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," is very familiar to Brooklynites, through Mr. Seidl's Brighton Beach interpretations. Mr. Nikisch's rendering of it was dainty and careful. The tempo was a trifle slower than that to which we are accustomed. The symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," by Liszt, is another thing familiar to Seidl audiences. It is by far the most beautiful of the series of symphonic poems, and it gains with every repetition. Mr. Nikisch does not handle it in the broad and massive style of Seidl, though he is attentive to every part of it. It would bear heavier brass than that of the Nikisch orchestra, being in this respect like Wagner's music.

Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel will be the soloists at the last rehearsal and concert, April 29 and 30.

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3-23

The Henschel Recitals.

Rarely has there been a more charming musical treat than that of the Song Recital of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel at the Chestnut Street Opera House yesterday afternoon. The programme included songs in German, English, French and Italian, of remote and of recent dates, thus illustrating the history of such composition for a century or two. Mr. Henschel's endowments of voice and culture have long been known. He is most ably seconded by Mrs. Henschel, whose voice is pure and sympathetic, while her manner expresses real dramatic feeling without ever descending to theatrical. There were twelve or fifteen songs—solos or duos—and, of course, there can be little more than a general notice. The two artists are so nicely trained to singing together that there is never an imperfection. Mr. Henschel's manly baritone blends with his wife's mezzo-soprano voice with the finest accord, and his elegant accompaniments perfect the unity.

Herald [illegible]

Date 3-22

PADEREWSKI TO WASHINGTON.

As a testimonial of his warm appreciation of [illegible] hospitality he has received in America M. Paderewski has resolved to give on his own responsibility a farewell concert entirely for the benefit of the Washington Arch fund. This action on the part of the great pianist is unsolicited.

For this concert, positively his last public appearance in America, M. Paderewski has engaged the Metropolitan Opera House for [illegible] evening next. The event will be a [illegible] one musically, for the services of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Nikisch, conductor, [illegible] been offered by Colonel Henry Higginson [illegible] occasion, and in the course of the concert [illegible] concertos will be played by M. Paderewski.

The boxes will be $50 and $[illegible] each, and the seats will range from $1 50 to $3. Tickets are for [illegible] at Schuberth's, 23 Union square.

[158]

BRATTLE HALL, CAMBRIDGE.

·○·1892·○·

Tuesday Evening, March 22,
Wednesday Evening, March 30.
Tuesday Evening, April 19.

……

THREE CONCERTS

BY THE

KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Mr. L. SVECENSKI,
Mr. OTTO ROTH, Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

……

ASSISTING ARTISTS

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH

[illegible]

……

[illegible]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

ELEVENTH SEASON,—1891--92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 22, AT 7.45.

PROGRAMME.

IN MEMORY OF
JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

SCHUMANN.	OVERTURE. "Manfred."
SCHUBERT.	SYMPHONY No. 8, in B minor. (Unfinished.) Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor. Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto.— Allegro (Scherzo).—Allegro (Finale.)

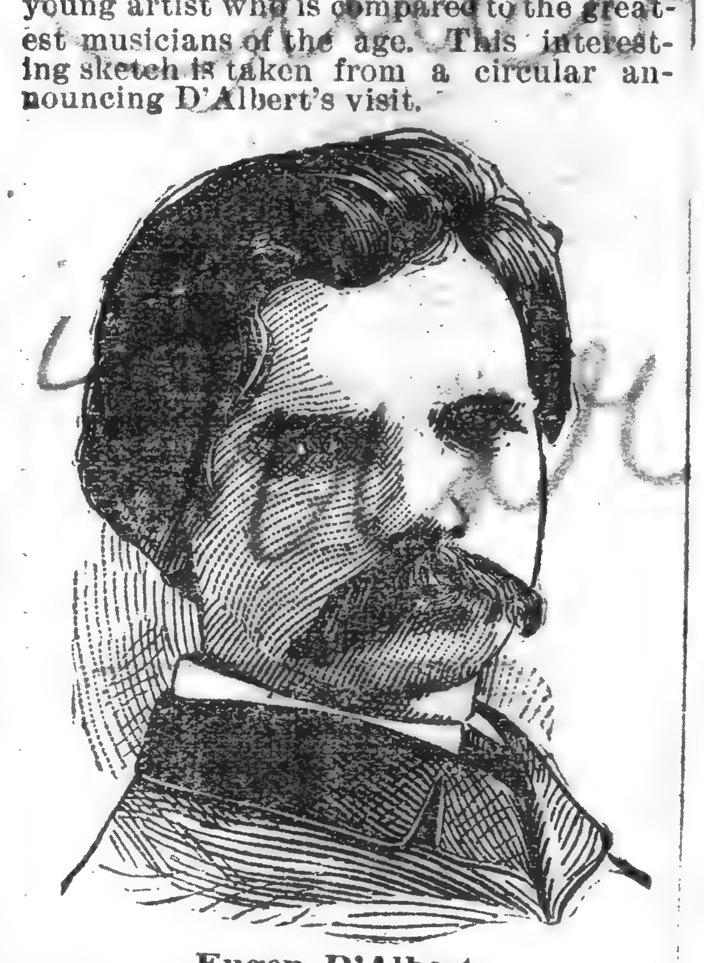
Ledger Pitsburg.

THE ART DIVINE.

Eugene D'Albert's Recital in Old City Hall To-Morrow Night.

Sketch of the Famous Young Pianist. Two Concerts to be Given by the Marine Band in Pittsburg in May—The Grunfeld Concert—Novel Experiment to be Made by Mr. Simeon Bissell on Behalf of Perfect Enunciation in Singing—Doings of Local Musicians.

Eugen D'Albert's visit to Pittsburg tomorrow night will be one of the few important musical events of this season. The large audience which this great pianist ought to draw to Old City hall will have a chance to hear a wonderful young artist who is compared to the greatest musicians of the age. This interesting sketch is taken from a circular announcing D'Albert's visit.



Eugen D'Albert,

Only son of the French composer, Charles D'Albert, was born in Glasgow in 1864, his parents having emigrated there from France. His evident musical genius was fostered by his father, under whose training he developed rapidly; and in 1876, obtaining a free scholarship in the National Training school, London, he studied the pianoforte under Ernest Pauer, harmony under Dr. Stainer, orchestation under Ebenezer Prout, and composition under Arthur Sullivan, thus thoroughly developing his many-sided genius. Here Hans Richter met him, and, recognizing the youth's extraordinary gifts, took D'Albert to his own house, in Vienna, and taught him for a year, in order to bring him, properly prepared, to Franz Liszt, in whom he found a wise teacher and benefactor. The progress made in the next five months was astonishing even to the great master, who called him "a second Tausig," because of his extraordinary technique. A writer at that time said of him: "His ability does not seem so much the result of study as of the genius of music using him as its instrument." At the age of 15 he composed an overture which was performed in St. James hall, London; and his compositions number many fine works for orchestra and for piano, besides a grand opera, just completed. His first public appearance was at the Philharmonic concerts in Vienna, where he played his own compositions, repeating them afterward at the Richter concerts in London. Later on he played repeatedly in Weimar; and, in 1882, as a result of his superb work, he was appointed by the Grand Duke of Weimar as court pianist—a distinction remarkable in that it had never before been granted to so youthful an artist. It was as a pianist and interpreter of master works that his genius shone brightest; and his subsequent concerts in Dresden, Vienna, Leipzig and other cities have been unparalleled successes, continuing without a break to the present. He is called "the greatest pianistic artist after Liszt," and has made good his youthful promise, as predicted by Von Bulow, who said, "There are but three great pianists in the world, Rubinstein, myself and D'Albert: but the latter is yet young, and bids fair to surpass us all."

In speaking of a recent Boston symphony orchestral concert, in which Beethoven's concerto in E flat, No. 5, was played, D'Albert being the pianist, a Boston critic says:

Every seat in the hall was occupied, and all the available space in the outside aisles was taken up by the many who were not regular attendants, but had been attracted by the prospect of an unusually fine performance by the pianist whom all Europe unites in calling the greatest living exponent of piano music. As an interpreter of Beethoven he probably has no equal, and Saturday night's concert fully sustained the judgment passed upon him by foreign critics and those of our own country during his visit two years ago.

D'Albert's treatment of the opening allegro was broad and masterly, and characterized by remarkable clearness and purity of tone. His easy mastery of the prodigious technical difficulties commanded the instant admiration of the audience.

The second movement, adagio, was beautifully rendered, the theme distinctly traceable and admirably disclosing his delicacy of touch, his taste and conception of technical finish, while the final movement brought forth the heartiest applause from the audience and the members of the orchestra as well.

Following is the program for to-morrow night's recital:

Prelude and Fugue—D maj....Bach—D'Albert
Sonata—C maj., op. 53..............Beethoven
  Allegro con brio;
  Introduzione e Rondo.
Berceuse—op. 57 }
Valse—op. 42. }......................Chopin
Sonata—op. 58.............................Chopin Allegro;
  Scherzo;
  Largo;
  Finale.
Impromptu No. 3—op. 90..............Schubert
Valse—Impromptu. }
Tarantelle—"Napoli." }....................Liszt

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 3-21

them safely."

The Philharmonic Rehearsal.

The fifth of the Nikisch rehearsals, Friday last, presented some interesting features. Eugen d'Albert, the great pianist, played for the first time in Brooklyn, and Berlioz's Symphony, "Harold in Italy," was given. This composition has not been heard recently in Brooklyn, if at all. It is difficult to judge of a work at a first hearing, but an impression may at least be given. The most striking thing about the symphony is the richness of the orchestral arrangement. This is not strange when we remember that Berlioz stands at the head of all the daring modern composers. His combinations are unique, though frequently incomprehensible to the untrained listener. The first movement of the symphony is called "Harold in the Mountains," and portrays in an adagio and allegro scenes of melancholy, happiness and joy. The movement is rich in melodies, somewhat fragmentary and unconnected. Mr. Franz Kneisel, the first violinist, played with great skill and taste the viola obligato which is probably intended to suggest the individual reflections of Harold. The "March of the Pilgrims" (singing the evening prayer) is a movement difficult to appreciate. The imitation of church bells seemed somewhat flippant and detracted from the unity of the effect of the sturdy march movement, though the bell finale gave Mr. Kneisel a fine opportunity to display his command over the instrument in the closing harmonic passages. The third movement, "The Serenade of a Mountaineer," allegro assai, allegretto, is the most pleasing of the four, and was apparently intended to be bright and genial. As Mr. Nikisch gave it it was rather too melancholy. In the fourth movement the previous motives all appear again in the "Orgy of the Brigands" (allegro frenetico), and the symphony closes with a grand crash of all the instruments.

D'Albert is not an attractive looking man. He is small, his body and arms are absurdly short, and only his enormously developed hands seem full-grown and mature. His playing is of a nature to grow upon one. Though not lacking in feeling, it has little of the emotional quality which made Paderewski leap into public favor. D'Albert is more of a player for musicians than for the populace. Some competent judges consider his technique finer than Paderewski's, while in Vienna, the home of Von Bulow and Leschetitsky, D'Albert is considered the first living pianist. The ease of his work is misleading. He sweeps over difficult passages with so little apparent effort, and his handling is so broad, so entirely without sensationalism, that the greatness of his work is apt to escape one.

This was the case with the audience Friday, through the first movement of Beethoven's noble E flat concerto, for which D'Albert received very gentle applause. In the course of the next two movements, however, he developed such unexpected resources that he surprised his hearers into enthusiasm. His solo numbers were Chopin's "Berceuse," a Schubert impromptu, and the brilliant Strauss-Tausig waltz "Man Lebt Nur Einmal." For an encore he gave one of the well-known Chopin waltzes.

Saint-Saens symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," is very familiar to Brooklynites, through Mr. Seidl's Brighton Beach interpretations. Mr. Nikisch's rendering of it was dainty and careful. The tempo was a trifle slower than that to which we are accustomed. The symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," by Liszt, is another thing familiar to Seidl audiences. It is by far the most beautiful of the series of symphonic poems, and it gains with every repetition. Mr. Nikisch does not handle it in the broad and massive style of Seidl, though he is attentive to every part of it. It would bear heavier brass than that of the Nikisch orchestra, being in this respect like Wagner's music.

Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel will be the soloists at the last rehearsal and concert, April 29 and 30.

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3-23

The Henschel Recitals.

Rarely has there been a more charming musical treat than that of the Song Recital of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel at the Chestnut Street Opera House yesterday afternoon. The programme included songs in German, English, French and Italian, of remote and of recent dates, thus illustrating the history of such composition for a century or two. Mr. Henschel's endowments of voice and culture have long been known. He is most ably seconded by Mrs. Henschel, whose voice is pure and sympathetic, while her manner expresses real dramatic feeling without ever descending to theatrical. There were twelve or fifteen songs—solos or duos—and, of course, there can be little more than a general notice. The two artists are so nicely trained to singing together that there is never an imperfection. Mr. Henschel's manly baritone blends with his wife's mezzo-soprano voice with the finest accord, and his elegant accompaniments perfect the unity.

Date 3-22

PADEREWSKI TO WASHINGTON.

As a testimonial of his warm appreciation of the hospitality he has received in America M. Paderewski has resolved to give on his own responsibility a farewell concert entirely for the benefit of the Washington Arch fund. This action on the part of the great pianist is unsolicited.

For this concert, positively his last public appearance in America, M. Paderewski has engaged the Metropolitan Opera House for Sunday evening next. The event will be a memorable one musically, for the services of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Nikisch, conductor, have been offered by Colonel Henry Higginson for the occasion, and in the course of the concert two concertos will be played by M. Paderewski.

The boxes will be $50 and $30 each, and the seats will range from $1 50 to $3. Tickets are for sale at Schuberth's, 23 Union square.

[158]

FIRST CONCERT.

TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 22, AT 8.

KNEISEL QUARTET,

ASSISTED BY

Mr. FERRUCCIO BUSONI.

Programme.

HAYDN.	QUARTET in D major. ALLEGRO MODERATO.—ADAGIO CANTABILE.— MINUETTO.—FINALE (PRESTO).
SCHUMANN.	QUARTET in A major. ANDANTE ESPRESSIVO. ALLEGRO MOLTO MODERATO.— ASSAI AGITATO.—ADAGIO MOLTO.— ALLEGRO MOLTO VIVACE.
SINDING.	QUINTET for Piano and Strings in E minor. ALLEGRO MA NON TROPPO.—ANDANTE.— SCHERZO (PRESTISSIMO).—FINALE (ALLEGRO VIVACE.)

The Piano used is a Steinway.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

ELEVENTH SEASON,—1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 22, AT 7.45.

PROGRAMME.

IN MEMORY OF
JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

SCHUMANN.	OVERTURE. "Manfred."
SCHUBERT.	SYMPHONY No. 8, in B minor. (Unfinished.) Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor. Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto.— Allegro (Scherzo).—Allegro (Finale.)

THE ART DIVINE.

Eugene D'Albert's Recital in Old C
To-Morrow Night.

Sketch of the Famous Young P
Two Concerts to be Given by rine Band in Pittsburg in Ha Grunfeld Concert—Novel E
ment to Be Made by Mr. Simec sell on Behalf of Perfect in Singing—Doings of Loca sicians.

Eugen D'Albert's visit to Pittsbu morrow night will be one of the f portant musical events of this
The large audience which this pianist ought to draw to Old City ha have a chance to hear a won young artist who is compared to the est musicians of the age. This in ing sketch is taken from a circula nouncing D'Albert's visit.

Eugen D'Albert,

Only son of the French composer, Ch D'Albert, was born in Glasgow in his parents having emigrated there France. His evident musical genius fostered by his father, under whose tr
ing he developed rapidly; and in 1876 taining a free scholarship in the Nati Training school, London, he studied pianoforte under Ernest Pauer, harm under Dr. Stainer, orchestation u
Ebenezer Prout, and composition u
Arthur Sullivan, thus thoroughly veloping his many-sided genius. H
Hans Richter met him, and, recogniz the youth's extraordinary gifts, t D'Albert to his own house, in Vienna, taught him for a year, in order to br him, properly prepared, to Franz Li in whom he found a wise teac and benefactor. The progress m in the next five months astonishing even to the great master, w called him "a second Tausig," becaus his extraordinary technique. A writer that time said of him: "His ability d not seem so much the result of study as the genius of music using him as its strument." At the age of 15 he compos an overture which was performed in James hall, London; and his compositio number many fine works for orchestra a for piano, besides a grand opera, just co pleted. His first public appearance w at the Philharmonic concerts in Vienn where he played his own composition repeating them afterward at the Richt concerts in London. Later on played repeatedly in Weimar; and, 1882, as a result of his superb wor
he was appointed by the Grand Duke Weimar as court pianist—a distinctio remarkable in that it had never befo been granted to so youthful an artist.
was as a pianist and interpreter of maste works that his genius shone brightest and his subsequent concerts in Dresde Vienna, Leipzig and other cities hav been unparalleled successes, continuin without a break to the present. He i called "the greatest pianistic artist afte Liszt," and has made good his youthfu promise, as predicted by Von Bulow, wh said, "There are but three great pianist in the world, Rubinstein, myself an D'Albert: but the latter is yet young, and bids fair to surpass us all."

In speaking of a recent Boston symphony orchestral concert, in which Beethoven's concerto in E flat, No. 5, was played, D'Albert being the pianist, a Boston critic says:

Every seat in the hall was occupied, and all the available space in the outside aisles was taken up by the many who were not regular attendants, but had been attracted by the prospect of an unusually fine performance by the pianist whom all Europe unites in calling the greatest living exponent of piano music. As an interpreter of Beethoven he probably has no equal, and Saturday night's concert fully sustained the judgment passed upon him by foreign critics and those of our own country during his visit two years ago.

D'Albert's treatment of the opening allegro was broad and masterly, and characterized by remarkable clearness and purity of tone. His easy mastery of the prodigious technical difficulties commanded the instant admiration of the audience.

The second movement, adagio, was beautifully rendered, the theme distinctly traceable and admirably disclosing his delicacy of touch, his taste and conception of technical finish, while the final movement brought forth the heartiest applause from the audience and the members of the orchestra as well.

Following is the program for to-morrow night's recital:

Prelude and Fugue—D maj....Bach—D'Albert
Sonata—C maj., op. 53..............Beethoven
Allegro con brio:
Introduzione e Rondo.
Berceuse—op. 57 }
Valse—op. 42. }......................Chopin
Sonata—op. 58............................Chopin Allegro;
Scherzo;
[illegible]
Impromptu No. 2—op. 90..............[illegible]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 23, 1892.

This is what Louis Elson says of Eugen d'Albert and could it be said more happily? "Which is the bolder, a lion or a tiger? Which has the more delicious flavor, Johannisberger or Lacryma Christi? Answer these questions authoritatively, and I can tell whether d'Albert eclipsed Paderewski or no. I can only compare d'Albert with d'Albert. In doing this I found the tone less resonant than heretofore and perhaps a trifle less sympathetic, but the performance of the 'Emperor' concerto was one beyond and above criticism."

That is about the size of the discussion; d'Albert can only be compared with d'Albert, but I dearly wish the young lion would have his claws clipped betimes. He plays like a lion with surge and fury, irresistible force and audacity, but could he not conceal his art more? The concealment of the inner mechanism of art is to reach the highest art and gentle Eugen shows too much how the thing is done; too much effort is made; too much work and not enough play. I fully comprehend the serious noble side of the young man and how he must despise the dilettantish (to use a vile expression) trifling of some pianists, but why rub all the bloom off his touch in his attempt to be sincere? All warmth and color should not be dispensed with because of the lofty idealism of his art. I fear d'Albert is treading too much in the footsteps of Bülow, who in his efforts to be free from subjective "sensationalism" ended up by being sensationally dry. Rubinstein plays Beethoven and Bach superbly, and with what a touch and with what a rich organ tone!

Must the voice become harsh and strident the moment the classics are approached? Do nobility and dignity of conception preclude all external beauty of tone? If so, give me the most luscious Sclavonic touch that ever emanated from Sclavland in preference to the dry, pedantic finger blow of the man who is bitten by the North German notion of objectivity in interpretation. Now the gist of all this is that d'Albert played the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto last week in Brooklyn so as to make my hair stand on end. It was glorious (and incidentally, I suppose, Beethoven) playing. It was sensational in the highest degree, inasmuch as it thrilled my ancient and sound weary aural hide, and to do that with a Beethoven concerto a man must be a d'Albert, for I'm sick unto musical megrims with Beethoven concerti. Therefore, if I talk about d'Albert, I'm only indicating a tendency in the gifted young artist, a drift, a trend in his development that appears to be Bülowwards. That means stern self repression, no individuality but a dry one, and in the end colorless, machine-like playing.

You know what Weitzmann said about Tausig's latter days. Of course that great artist was overtrained, mentally and physically. He grew weary of display, as all great men must, but in the effort to dig up the spiritual meanings of the great musical gospel he failed to remember that man cannot live by bread alone. Grace, beauty, sweetness, light, all play an important part in music, particularly in piano music, for the piano has no such sensuous tone as the voice, violin or 'cello. I'm for beauty first, interpretation next, or put it the other way if you wish, so you get the beauty in somewhere.

⁂

D'Albert is still full of young blood. Just listen to the way he plays Liszt's tremendous etude, "Feu Follet." He makes it something very exciting and of course masterful. He is always that or nothing. I wish nature had endowed him with his wife's (Teresa Carreño's) touch, but nature always stops short somewhere.

⁂

The d'Albert Recitals.—Mr. Eugen d'Albert will give three recitals of piano music at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall on the afternoons of April 5, 7 and 9 proximo. The first of his programs is devoted to Beethoven, its numbers being variations in C minor, sonata in C major, op. 53; sonata in E minor, op. 90; sonata in E major, op. 109; sonata in A flat major, op. 110. Program No. 2 draws upon Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Tausig and Liszt, and program No. 3 upon Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubinstein and Liszt.

Paderewski to Play for the Fund.—Paderewski, the great pianist, will play for the benefit of the Washington Memorial Arch next Sunday evening at the Metropolitan Opera House. The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Nikisch, will participate. Mr. Paderewski will play the Schumann and Paderewski concertos. All patriotic music lovers should be present at this concert, the purpose of which is a most laudable one. It is Paderewski's last appearance this season. He sails for Paris on Tuesday and will return here in November next.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Concert.

THE fifth Brooklyn Philharmonic public rehearsal and concert took place last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, respectively, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The program consisted of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," the viola solo obligato of which was beautifully played by Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Saint-Saëns' symphonic poem, "Rouet d'Omphale," and Liszt's "Les Préludes." It goes without saying that under Mr. Nikisch's baton these and the accompaniment to Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto were artistically given. Eugen d'Albert was the pianist and played the solo part of the concerto in a most masterly manner. He is a great Beethoven interpreter. His later solos by Chopin (the berceuse and A flat valse, op. 42) and the Strauss-Tausig valse "Man lebt nur einmal" were also delivered in a surprising fashion. His breadth and intensity are even more marked than of yore.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, took place Tuesday evening of last week at Chickering Hall before the usual large and enthusiastic audience. The scheme of the evening was as follows:

Symphony in A, No. 7.......Beethoven
Poco sostenuto; vivace.
Allegretto.
Presto; assai meno presto; tempo primo.
Allegro con brio.
"Fata Morgana," for soprano and orchestra, from symphonic poem, "The Sea".......Nicodé
Overture fantaisie, "Hamlet".......Tschaikowsky
Songs with piano—
"Staendchen".......Richard Strauss
"Das Ringelein".......Chopin
"Auftraege".......Schumann
Symphonic poem, "Les Préludes".......Liszt
Soloist, Mrs Arthur Nikisch.

Mr. Nikisch read the Beethoven symphony in a manner all his own, not departing widely, however, from traditional tempi or phrasing. That it was interesting cannot be gainsaid; that it would receive the commendation of the conservative Beethovenists is greatly to be doubted. One thing is certain, all that Mr. Nikisch does is clear; he leaves one in no doubt as to his intentions, even when they are not the commonly accepted intentions of the composer being discussed. There could, however, be no dissentient voice as to the interpretation of the "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky's modern and powerfully scored overture fantasia. It has never before been given in this city with such dramatic effect; never before has its numerous possibilities of changeful rhythms, dynamics and tone coloring been revealed. Its performance was a genuine tour de force.

Mrs. Nikisch, whose artistic singing has been commented upon before in these columns, sang the broad measures of Nicodé's "Fata Morgana" in a most interesting fashion, her phrasing being intelligent and artistic. The number is an excerpt from the symphonic poem "The Sea," of Nicodé, several of which New York has already heard earlier in the season at a Philharmonic concert. In the group of songs later Mrs. Nikisch sang delightfully with her husband's finished accompaniments, and to an overwhelming encore gave Brahms' "Vergebliche's Staenchen." The evening finished with a brilliant performance of Liszt's "Les Préludes."

The Henschel Recital.

THE first song recital of those accomplished and refined artists, Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, took place at Chickering Hall on last Saturday afternoon and proved that, although absent in England for several years, this musical couple has not been forgotten here. The hall was well filled and great and genuine enthusiasm prevailed. Mrs. Henschel has lost none of her consummate art in handling her small but sympathetic voice, and her singing in this respect must have proved a lesson to every vocalist present in the audience. Her phrasing and pronunciation were as distinct and musicianly as the whole delivery was charming, intelligent and artistic. She was heard in two Händel arias, two Irish songs by Villiers Stanford and a particularly delightful "May Song," by A. Hervey; three songs of her husband, which are musical, but a little forced, and in conjunction with him in duets by Padre Martini, Hermann Goetz's from "The Taming of the Shrew," and Donizetti's buffo duet from "Don Pasquale." Moreover she was encored.

Mr. Henschel's soli were the song of the harem keeper, from Mozart's "Seraglio;" Crugantino's song, by Beethoven; five Lieder from Schubert's elegiac, but ever so beautiful, cyclus "Die Winterreise;" "Gelb rollt mir zu Füssen," by Rubinstein and an aria from Massenet's "Roi de Lahore." Mr. Henschel's command over his vocal organ and the artistic effects he is able to produce put him all the higher in the estimation of connoisseurs, as his baritone voice is not naturally of the most agreeable timbre or most wieldy flexibility. But he sings like a master and his qualities as a thinking musician are of the most admirable kind. They shone forth most brightly also in his accompaniments.

A second and last recital will be given on Saturday afternoon.

BALTIMORE, March 20, 1892.

AN attack of hayseed fever has prevented me from attending musical affairs for months past, but the bracing atmosphere of the past weeks and the money I saved during my temporary withdrawal from the musical world have enabled me to find opportunities during recent events here to visit the most important, and I again start in to make new enemies by telling the truth about music in this here town.

Always ahead of everything in music here are the periodical concerts of the Boston Symphony concerts under Nikisch, the one of Thursday last introducing a number of novelties. The G major Dvorak Symphony was one of these and what you have said about it in reviewing its performance by your Philharmonic had been read by me and impressed me as wonderfully apt and correct. Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" and Saint-Saens' "Rouet d'Omphale" completed the purely orchestral part of the program.

Eugen d'Albert played Chopin's E minor concerto, Schubert's impromptu, op. 90, No. 3, and some Liszt numbers, including our old friends from Venezia e Napoli. The critic of the "American" tells us that this was D'Albert's first appearance in this city, but the facts, as usual, are against that critic. However, that does not matter, as musical people here take no stock in the notices published in daily papers. Musical criticism in this town has reached the very lowest ebb, and for stupidity and dense ignorance is not equaled in any city of this size on the face of this globe. D'Albert played superbly, although not infallibly, from a technical point of view. But this means more breadth and freedom, and that is just what is wanted. Unquestionably he is one of the greatest living expounders of piano playing and is intellectually superior to most of his contemporaries. I shall make no comparisons with others, believing that every great artist in order to be great represents an individuality that brooks no comparison, and so it is with D'Albert. It is hoped that he will play here soon again.

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3/21

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will give song recitals on Tuesday and Friday afternoons at 2.30 in the Chestnut Street Opera House. These distinguished singers have not appeared together in Philadelphia before, and there is a great desire to hear them.

WORLD, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/23

Next Sunday evening M. Paderewski will make his last appearance before his return home. It will be at the Metropolitan Opera House and will be a generous contribution of his talents to the Washington Arch Fund. He will be assisted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, as is announced in the advertisement, has been "generously offered to M. Paderewski for this occasion by Col. Higginson."

INQUIRER, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3/23

43

THE HENSCHELS' RECITAL.

An Interesting Concert at the Chestnut Street Opera House.

It is a great pity that the people of Philadelphia are so slow to appreciate good events in music. When appreciation comes it is liberal enough, but it is too slow in materializing. The small audience at the Chestnut Street Opera House yesterday afternoon was another exemplification of this fact. The work of these ballad singers is delightful. Mr. Henschel's voice has suffered somewhat from his advancing years, but he sings with rare sweetness and his methods are delightful.

Ballad singing is less appreciated in this country than it should be. It may not be the highest type of vocal art but it is certainly very delightful.

The Henschels sang excellently yesterday. The program heretofore published was given in a thoroughly artistic manner. No two persons sing more perfectly together. The audience was delighted with both, and every number had its own particular charm. It is to be hoped the house will be crowded Friday afternoon.

WORLD, New York, N. Y.

Date 3-22

FOR THE WASHINGTON ARCH.

Paderewski and the Boston Symphony Will Give a Benefit for the Fund.

As a testimonial of his appreciation of the hospitality he has received in America, M. Paderewski has resolved to give, on his own responsibility, a farewell concert for the benefit of the Washington Arch fund. In selecting an object for his final concert Paderewski intentionally chose one having a national sentiment.

For this concert, which will be his last public appearance in America, Paderewski has engaged the Metropolitan Opera-House for Sunday evening next. The services of the Boston Symphony, Mr. Nikisch, conductor, have been offered by Col. Henry Higginson for the occasion, and in the course of the concert two concertos will be given by Paderewski in connection with this orchestra. The boxes will be $50 and $30 each, and the seats will range from $1.50 to $3. Tickets are now for sale at Schuberth's, 23 Union square.

TIMES-STAR, Cincinnati, O.

Date 3-21

Next Wednesday afternoon at 3 o'clock at Pike's Opera House D' Albert will give his only piano recital in this city. Much has been said about this famous pianist, and that the great Russian is the only one with whom he can be compared is held to be absolutely true by a many. The New York Times says that Eugen D' Albert is probably the greatest living pianist.

Herald, Boston, Mass.

Date 3/24

PADEREWSKI's positively final farewell appearance in this country will be in the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, Saturday evening, when he will appear for the benefit of the Washington Arch fund, assisted by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which, according to the advertisement, is generously offered to M. Paderewski for the occasion by Col. Higginson.

Clipping from

Record, Philadelphia, Pa

Date 3/20

—A pleasing programme of songs was given by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel at the CHESTNUT STREET OPERA HOUSE yesterday afternoon. The finished method of the singers delighted the audience, which was lavish of applause. Another recital will be given at the same house by these artists on Friday afternoon.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3/21

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give two song recitals at the Chestnut-street Opera House this week, one to-morrow afternoon and the other on Friday, both beginning at 2.30. To-morrow's programme is as follows: Duet from "Giannina e Bernadone," Cimarosa, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel; (a) Air, "Oh, Sleep," from "Semele," Handel, Mrs. Henschel; (b) Crugantino's Song from Goethe's "Claudine von Villa Bella" (1790), Beethoven, (c) "The Erl-king," Loewe, Mr. Henschel; (b) "Midi au Village," Goring-Thomas, (c) "Serenade du Passant," Massenet, Mrs. Henschel; Duet, Gondoliera, Henschel, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel; (a) "It was a Lover and His Lass," (Old English), Mrs. Henschel; Duetto Buffo from "Don Pasquale," Donizetti, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

The Adamowski Quartet will give its fifth and last concert for the season at the Haseltine Galleries to-morrow afternoon at 2.30. The programme will include Beethoven's quartet, op. 18, No. 4, and Greig's quartet in G minor.

Clipping from [illegible] STAR, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/21

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening last at the Brooklyn Academy of Music was one of unparalleled richness. Mr. Nikisch seems to have searched the whole field of orchestral composition and gathered into one programme the masterpieces of the greatest geniuses of the world. The Berlioz Symphony was magnificently played throughout, and was, perhaps, as interesting as anything on the programme. It is always a delight to hear Mr. Kneisel play, and it is not often that we have the opportunity of hearing him play the viola. He showed himself on this occasion, as always, past master of his art. His playing has the repose which marks the true artist. "The March of the Pilgrims" is a movement of particular charm, deeply religious in character, suggestive of the restfulness of the twilight hour—a spiritual uplifting to which the faint closing notes of the angelus give voice.

Not less charming in another way is the rustic simplicity of "The Mountaineer Serenade," with its quaint imitation of shepherds' pipes, a very naive bit of composition. The closing movement of the symphony, the "Orgy of the Brigands," is, as the name implies, descriptive of the maddest kind of intoxicated revels, which almost leaves one breathless.

The Saint-Saens symphonic poem was exquisitely played with great delicacy of shading. The spinning wheel motion is one that is always attractive. We know of no composition in which it is used to better advantage than in this.

The Liszt number was given nobly. It is a thrilling work; one which carries the hearer up to its own heights of inspiration.

Three symphonic works in one programme, each of a marvellously high character! Of D'Albert's playing one can only use superlatives. A genius of the piano to whom ordinary epithets cannot be applied. It was fitting that to this programme he should bring the noblest conception of Beethoven. Of its rendering we can only speak with reverence, as is due to the performer. A completely satisfactory rendition, than which we can give no higher praise.

The solo numbers for piano were eminently pleasing, the Schubert Impromptu in particular.

To the Strauss-Tausig Waltz the applause was so tumultuous that Mr. D'Albert was obliged to respond to the encore, playing the extremely difficult C Major Staccato Etude of Rubinstein. The adjective "difficult" can hardly be used in connection with D'Albert, as there is nothing difficult to him. He seems capable of expressing the intentions of any composer without obtruding his own personality. Not that his playing lacks individuality, however. A marked feature of his playing is the variation of force almost entirely by the fingers and wrist. There is at no time a high raising of the hands from the keyboard.

For the next concert a treat is in store in the persons of the Henschels, artists from whom one can never hear enough.

DEMOCRAT, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Date 3/20

Gave a Highly Successful Concert--Many Tickets Sold for the Boston Symphony Orchestra--Local Amusement Notes.

Over 300 tickets have already been sold, or rather subscribed for, against the coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra, whose concert is to take place May 9, in Hartman's hall. In the last issue of the New York Courier extended notices and critical reports concerning the excellence of their performances, have been published. It is the unqualified opinion of all the critical musical experts that this magnificent orchestra of eighty performers is absolutely unsurpassed in orchestral work of the present day. Eugene d'Albert played Beethoven's fifth concerto in connection with the entire orchestra and was recalled five times.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3/22

MR. AND MRS. GEORG HENSCHEL'S RECITAL.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will give one of those song recitals for which they are famous at the Chestnut-street Opera House this afternoon at 2.30. The programme, published in full in our advertising columns this morning, consists of songs and duets by Cimarosa, Pergolesi, Handel, Beethoven, Schumann, Donizetti, Massinet and other composers. As singers of songs the Henschels are unrivalled, and they give an entertainment no less charming than unique. In London, Boston and New York, where they are better known than they are here, they have long been reigning favorites with people of refined musical taste.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 23, 1892.

This is what Louis Elson says of Eugen d'Albert and could it be said more happily? "Which is the bolder, a lion or a tiger? Which has the more delicious flavor, Johannisberger or Lacryma Christi? Answer these questions authoritatively, and I can tell whether d'Albert eclipsed Paderewski or no. I can only compare d'Albert with d'Albert. In doing this I found the tone less resonant than heretofore and perhaps a trifle less sympathetic, but the performance of the 'Emperor' concerto was one beyond and above criticism."

That is about the size of the discussion; d'Albert can only be compared with d'Albert, but I dearly wish the young lion would have his claws clipped betimes. He plays like a lion with surge and fury, irresistible force and audacity, but could he not conceal his art more? The concealment of the inner mechanism of art is to reach the highest art and gentle Eugen shows too much how the thing is done; too much effort is made; too much work and not enough play. I fully comprehend the serious noble side of the young man and how he must despise the dilettantish (to use a vile expression) trifling of some pianists, but why rub all the bloom off his touch in his attempt to be sincere? All warmth and color should not be dispensed with because of the lofty idealism of his art. I fear d'Albert is treading too much in the footsteps of Bülow, who in his efforts to be free from subjective "sensationalism" ended up by being sensationally dry. Rubinstein plays Beethoven and Bach superbly, and with what a touch and with what a rich organ tone!

Must the voice become harsh and strident the moment the classics are approached? Do nobility and dignity of conception preclude all external beauty of tone? If so, give me the most luscious Sclavonic touch that ever emanated from Sclavland in preference to the dry, pedantic finger blow of the man who is bitten by the North German notion of objectivity in interpretation. Now the gist of all this is that d'Albert played the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto last week in Brooklyn so as to make my hair stand on end. It was glorious (and incidentally, I suppose, Beethoven) playing. It was sensational in the highest degree, inasmuch as it thrilled my ancient and sound weary aural hide, and to do that with a Beethoven concerto a man must be a d'Albert, for I'm sick unto musical megrims with Beethoven concerti. Therefore, if I talk about d'Albert, I'm only indicating a tendency in the gifted young artist, a drift, a trend in his development that appears to be Bülowwards. That means stern self repression, no individuality but a dry one, and in the end colorless, machine-like playing.

You know what Weitzmann said about Tausig's latter days. Of course that great artist was overtrained, mentally and physically. He grew weary of display, as all great men must, but in the effort to dig up the spiritual meanings of the great musical gospel he failed to remember that man cannot live by bread alone. Grace, beauty, sweetness, light, all play an important part in music, particularly in piano music, for the piano has no such sensuous tone as the voice, violin or 'cello. I'm for beauty first, interpretation next, or put it the other way if you wish, so you get the beauty in somewhere.

⁂

D'Albert is still full of young blood. Just listen to the way he plays Liszt's tremendous etude, "Feu Follet." He makes it something very exciting and of course masterful. He is always that or nothing. I wish nature had endowed him with his wife's (Teresa Carreño's) touch, but nature always stops short somewhere.

⁂

The d'Albert Recitals.—Mr. Eugen d'Albert will give three recitals of piano music at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall on the afternoons of April 5, 7 and 9 proximo. The first of his programs is devoted to Beethoven, its numbers being variations in C minor, sonata in C major, op. 53; sonata in E minor, op. 90; sonata in E major, op. 109; sonata in A flat major, op. 110. Program No. 2 draws upon Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Tausig and Liszt, and program No. 3 upon Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubinstein and Liszt.

Paderewski to Play for the Fund.—Paderewski, the great pianist, will play for the benefit of the Washington Memorial Arch next Sunday evening at the Metropolitan Opera House. The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Nikisch, will participate. Mr. Paderewski will play the Schumann and Paderewski concertos. All patriotic music lovers should be present at this concert, the purpose of which is a most laudable one. It is Paderewski's last appearance this season. He sails for Paris on Tuesday and will return here in November next.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Concert.

THE fifth Brooklyn Philharmonic public rehearsal and concert took place last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, respectively, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The program consisted of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," the viola solo obligato of which was beautifully played by Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Saint-Saëns' symphonic poem, "Rouet d'Omphale," and Liszt's "Les Préludes." It goes without saying that under Mr. Nikisch's baton these and the accompaniment to Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto were artistically given. Eugen d'Albert was the pianist and played the solo part of the concerto in a most masterly manner. He is a great Beethoven interpreter. His later solos by Chopin (the berceuse and A flat valse, op. 42) and the Strauss-Tausig valse "Man lebt nur einmal" were also delivered in a surprising fashion. His breadth and intensity are even more marked than of yore.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, took place Tuesday evening of last week at Chickering Hall before the usual large and enthusiastic audience. The scheme of the evening was as follows:

Symphony in A, No. 7..Beethoven
Poco sostenuto; vivace.
Allegretto.
Presto; assai meno presto; tempo primo.
Allegro con brio.
"Fata Morgana," for soprano and orchestra, from symphonic poem, "The Sea"..Nicodé
Overture fantaisie, "Hamlet"..Tschaikowsky
Songs with piano—
"Staendchen"..Richard Strauss
"Das Ringelein"..Chopin
"Auftraege"..Schumann
Symphonic poem, "Les Préludes"..Liszt
Soloist, Mrs Arthur Nikisch.

Mr. Nikisch read the Beethoven symphony in a manner all his own, not departing widely, however, from traditional tempi or phrasing. That it was interesting cannot be gainsaid; that it would receive the commendation of the conservative Beethovenists is greatly to be doubted. One thing is certain, all that Mr. Nikisch does is clear; he leaves one in no doubt as to his intentions, even when they are not the commonly accepted intentions of the composer being discussed. There could, however, be no dissentient voice as to the interpretation of the "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky's modern and powerfully scored overture fantasia. It has never before been given in this city with such dramatic effect; never before has its numerous possibilities of changeful rhythms, dynamics and tone coloring been revealed. Its performance was a genuine tour de force.

Mrs. Nikisch, whose artistic singing has been commented upon before in these columns, sang the broad measures of Nicodé's "Fata Morgana" in a most interesting fashion, her phrasing being intelligent and artistic. The number is an excerpt from the symphonic poem "The Sea," of Nicodé, several of which New York has already heard earlier in the season at a Philharmonic concert. In the group of songs later Mrs. Nikisch sang delightfully with her husband's finished accompaniments, and to an overwhelming encore gave Brahms' "Vergebliche's Staenchen." The evening finished with a brilliant performance of Liszt's "Les Préludes."

The Henschel Recital.

THE first song recital of those accomplished and refined artists, Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, took place at Chickering Hall on last Saturday afternoon and proved that, although absent in England for several years, this musical couple has not been forgotten here. The hall was well filled and great and genuine enthusiasm prevailed. Mrs. Henschel has lost none of her consummate art in handling her small but sympathetic voice, and her singing in this respect must have proved a lesson to every vocalist present in the audience. Her phrasing and pronunciation were as distinct and musicianly as the whole delivery was charming, intelligent and artistic. She was heard in two Händel arias, two Irish songs by Villiers Stanford and a particularly delightful "May Song," by A. Hervey; three songs of her husband, which are musical, but a little forced, and in conjunction with him in duets by Padre Martini, Hermann Goetz's from "The Taming of the Shrew," and Donizetti's buffo duet from "Don Pasquale." Moreover she was encored.

Mr. Henschel's soli were the song of the harem keeper, from Mozart's "Seraglio;" Crugantino's song, by Beethoven; five Lieder from Schubert's elegiac, but ever so beautiful, cyclus "Die Winterreise;" "Gelb rollt mir zu Füssen," by Rubinstein and an aria from Massenet's "Roi de Lahore." Mr. Henschel's command over his vocal organ and the artistic effects he is able to produce put him all the higher in the estimation of connoisseurs, as his baritone voice is not naturally of the most agreeable timbre or most wieldy flexibility. But he sings like a master and his qualities as a thinking musician are of the most admirable kind. They shone forth most brightly also in his accompaniments.

A second and last recital will be given on Saturday afternoon.

BALTIMORE, March 20, 1892.

AN attack of hayseed fever has prevented me from attending musical affairs for months past, but the bracing atmosphere of the past weeks and the money I saved during my temporary withdrawal from the musical world have enabled me to find opportunities during recent events here to visit the most important, and I again start in to make new enemies by telling the truth about music in this here town.

Always ahead of everything in music here are the periodical concerts of the Boston Symphony concerts under Nikisch, the one of Thursday last introducing a number of novelties. The G major Dvorak Symphony was one of these and what you have said about it in reviewing its performance by your Philharmonic had been read by me and impressed me as wonderfully apt and correct. Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" and Saint-Saens' "Rouet d'Omphale" completed the purely orchestral part of the program.

Eugen d'Albert played Chopin's E minor concerto, Schubert's impromptu, op. 90, No. 3, and some Liszt numbers, including our old friends from Venezia e Napoli. The critic of the "American" tells us that this was D'Albert's first appearance in this city, but the facts, as usual, are against that critic. However, that does not matter, as musical people here take no stock in the notices published in daily papers. Musical criticism in this town has reached the very lowest ebb, and for stupidity and dense ignorance is not equaled in any city of this size on the face of this globe. D'Albert played superbly, although not infallibly, from a technical point of view. But this means more breadth and freedom, and that is just what is wanted. Unquestionably he is one of the greatest living expounders of piano playing and is intellectually superior to most of his contemporaries. I shall make no comparisons with others, believing that every great artist in order to be great represents an individuality that brooks no comparison, and so it is with D'Albert. It is hoped that he will play here soon again.

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3/21

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will give song recitals on Tuesday and Friday afternoons at 2.30 in the Chestnut Street Opera House. These distinguished singers have not appeared together in Philadelphia before, and there is a great desire to hear them.

WORLD, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/23

Next Sunday evening M. Paderewski will make his last appearance before his return home. It will be at the Metropolitan Opera-House and will be a generous contribution of his talents to the Washington Arch Fund. He will be assisted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, as is announced in the advertisement, has been "generously offered to M. Paderewski for this occasion by Col. Higginson."

INQUIRER, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3/23

43

THE HENSCHELS' RECITAL.

An Interesting Concert at the Chestnut Street Opera House.

It is a great pity that the people of Philadelphia are so slow to appreciate good events in music. When appreciation comes it is liberal enough, but it is too slow in materializing. The small audience at the Chestnut Street Opera House yesterday afternoon was another exemplification of this fact. The work of these ballad singers is delightful. Mr. Henschel's voice has suffered somewhat from his advancing years, but he sings with rare sweetness and his methods are delightful.

Ballad singing is less appreciated in this country than it should be. It may not be the highest type of vocal art but it is certainly very delightful.

The Henschels sang excellently yesterday. The program heretofore published was given in a thoroughly artistic manner. No two persons sing more perfectly together. The audience was delighted with both, and every number had its own particular charm. It is to be hoped the house will be crowded Friday afternoon.

WORLD, New York, N. Y.

Date 3-23

FOR THE WASHINGTON ARCH.

Paderewski and the Boston Symphony Will Give a Benefit for the Fund.

As a testimonial of his appreciation of the hospitality he has received in America, M. Paderewski has resolved to give, on his own responsibility, a farewell concert for the benefit of the Washington Arch fund. In selecting an object for his final concert Paderewski intentionally chose one having a national sentiment.

For this concert, which will be his last public appearance in America, Paderewski has engaged the Metropolitan Opera-House for Sunday evening next. The services of the Boston Symphony, Mr. Nikisch, conductor, have been offered by Col. Henry Higginson for the occasion, and in the course of the concert two concertos will be given by Paderewski in connection with this orchestra. The boxes will be $50 and $30 each, and the seats will range from $1.50 to $3. Tickets are now for sale at Schuberth's, 23 Union square.

TIMES-STAR, Cincinnati, O.

Date

Next Wednesday afternoon at 3 o'clock at Pike's Opera House D' Albert will give his only piano recital in this city. Much has been said about this famous pianist, and that the great Russian is the only one with whom he can be compared is held to be absolutely true by a many. The New York Times says that Eugen D' Albert is probably the greatest living pianist.

Herald, Boston, Mass.

Date

PADEREWSKI'S positively final farewell appearance in this country will be in the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, Saturday evening, when he will appear for the benefit of the Washington Arch fund, assisted by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which, according to the advertisement, is generously offered to M. Paderewski for the occasion by Col. Higginson.

Clipping from Record, Philadelphia, Pa

Date 3/23

—A pleasing programme of songs was given by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel at the CHESTNUT STREET OPERA HOUSE yesterday afternoon. The finished method of the singers delighted the audience, which was lavish of applause. Another recital will be given at the same house by these artists on Friday afternoon.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3/21

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give two song recitals at the Chestnut-street Opera House this week, one to-morrow afternoon and the other on Friday, both beginning at 2.30. To-morrow's programme is as follows: Duet from "Giannina e Bernadone," Cimarosa, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel; (a) Air, "Oh, Sleep," from "Semele," Handel, Mrs. Henschel; (b) Crugantino's Song from Goethe's "Claudine von Villa Bella" (1790), Beethoven, (c) "The Erl-king," Loewe, Mr. Henschel; (b) "Midi au Village," Goring-Thomas, (c) "Serenade du Passant," Massenet, Mrs. Henschel; Duet, Gondoliera, Henschel, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel; (a) "It was a Lover and His Lass," (Old English), Mrs. Henschel; Duetto Buffo from "Don Pasquale," Donizetti, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

The Adamowski Quartet will give its fifth and last concert for the season at the Haseltine Galleries to-morrow afternoon at 2.30. The programme will include Beethoven's quartet, op. 18, No. 4, and Greig's quartet in G minor. Mrs. Spencer Ervin will sing.

Clipping from Com. Advertiser
~~STAR~~, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/21

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening last at the Brooklyn Academy of Music was one of unparalleled richness. Mr. Nikisch seems to have searched the whole field of orchestral composition and gathered into one programme the masterpieces of the greatest geniuses of the world. The Berlioz Symphony was magnificently played throughout, and was, perhaps, as interesting as anything on the programme. It is always a delight to hear Mr. Kneisel play, and it is not often that we have the opportunity of hearing him play the viola. He showed himself on this occasion, as always, past master of his art. His playing has the repose which marks the true artist. "The March of the Pilgrims" is a movement of particular charm, deeply religious in character, suggestive of the restfulness of the twilight hour—a spiritual uplifting to which the faint closing notes of the angelus give voice.

Not less charming in another way is the rustic simplicity of "The Mountaineer Serenade," with its quaint imitation of shepherds' pipes, a very naive bit of composition. The closing movement of the symphony, the "Orgy of the Brigands," is, as the name implies, descriptive of the maddest kind of intoxicated revels, which almost leaves one breathless.

The Saint-Saens symphonic poem was exquisitely played with great delicacy of shading. The spinning wheel motion is one that is always attractive. We know of no composition in which it is used to better advantage than in this.

The Liszt number was given nobly. It is a thrilling work; one which carries the hearer up to its own heights of inspiration.

Three symphonic works in one programme, each of a marvellously high character! Of D'Albert's playing one can only use superlatives. A genius of the piano to whom ordinary epithets cannot be applied. It was fitting that to this programme he should bring the noblest conception of Beethoven. Of its rendering we can only speak with reverence, as is due to the performer. A completely satisfactory rendition, than which we can give no higher praise.

The solo numbers for piano were eminently pleasing, the Schubert Impromptu in particular.

To the Strauss-Tausig Waltz the applause was so tumultuous that Mr. D'Albert was obliged to respond to the encore, playing the extremely difficult C Major Staccato Etude of Rubinstein. The adjective "difficult" can hardly be used in connection with D'Albert, as there is nothing difficult to him. He seems capable of expressing the intentions of any composer without obtruding his own personality. Not that his playing lacks individuality, however. A marked feature of his playing is the variation of force almost entirely by the fingers and wrist. There is at no time a high raising of the hands from the keyboard.

For the next concert a treat is in store in the persons of the Henschels, artists from whom one can never hear enough.

DEMOCRAT, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Date

Gave a Highly Successful Concert--Many Tickets Sold for the Boston Symphony Orchestra--Local Amusement Notes.

Over 300 tickets have already been sold, or rather subscribed for, against the coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra, whose concert is to take place May 9, in Hartman's hall. In the last issue of the New York Courier extended notices and critical reports concerning the excellence of their performances, have been published. It is the unqualified opinion of all the critical musical experts that this magnificent orchestra of eighty performers is absolutely unsurpassed in orchestral work of the present day. Eugene d'Albert played Beethoven's fifth concerto in connection with the entire orchestra and was recalled five times. Their

---

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3/22

MR. AND MRS. GEORG HENSCHEL'S RECITAL.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will give one of those song recitals for which they are famous at the Chestnut-street Opera House this afternoon at 2.30. The programme, published in full in our advertising columns this morning, consists of songs and duets by Cimarosa, Pergolesi, Handel, Beethoven, Schumann, Donizetti, Massinet and other composers. As singers of songs the Henschels are unrivalled, and they give an entertainment no less charming than unique. In London, Boston and New York, where they are better known than they are here, they have long been reigning favorites with people of refined musical taste.

[159]

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/21

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel's Song Recitals at Chickering Hall—Concerts to Come.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were greeted by a large and highly appreciative audience in Chickering Hall on Saturday afternoon, when the first of the two song recitals of these accomplished artists was given. No singers before the public in their special department of vocal art are more justly welcome.

Mrs. Henschel's selections in the programme included several songs which she already has made agreeably familiar and which it is a pleasure to hear once more, and some which she sang for the first time here on Saturday. Among the latter were a "May Song," by A. Herney, and two pretty Irish songs set by C. Villiers Stanford. All of these compositions were sung with sympathetic voice and in finished style, chastely, simply and with true feeling. In two selections from Handel's operas and in three strikingly effective compositions by Mr. Henschel, the beauty of the singer's voice, the fineness of her vocal art, her warmth of feeling and her admirable power of expression were delightfully manifest.

Mr. Henschel sang a number of selections to which his fine artistic taste as well as his vocal art gave notable effect. Among these were a song from Mozart's "Il Seraglio" and five songs from Schubert's cyclus, "Die Winterreise." Several duets included in the programme also gave great pleasure to the audience. In the next and last recital on Saturday afternoon, the programme will embrace numbers by Gretry, Handel, Cimarosa, Dr. Arne, Rubinstein, Loewe, Henschel, Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Boieldieu, Gounod, Thomas, Saint-Saens and Bizet.

NOTES.

M. Eugen d'Albert's three recitals of pianoforte music will be given at Madison Square Garden Concert Hall on the afternoons of April 5, 7 and 9. The first of his programmes is devoted to Beethoven, its numbers being variations in C minor; sonata in C major, op. 53; sonata in E minor, op. 90; sonata in E major, op. 109, and sonata in A flat major, op. 110. The second programme draws upon Bach, Beethoven, Mendelsshon, Raff, Tausig and Liszt, and programme No. 3 upon Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubinstein and Liszt.

Journal, Chicago, Ill.

Date 3/19

* * *

Eugene D'Albert made his initial appearance on his second visit to the United States at Boston on Friday afternoon and received a reception befitting the greatest living pianist and most intelligent and artistic interpreter of Beethoven. D'Albert will give two recitals in Chicago—Thursday evening, March 24, and Saturday afternoon, March 26. His splendid reception at Boston will doubtless be repeated here, as D'Albert is a universal favorite, and his genius is recognized and fully appreciated by music-loving Chicago.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/21

The fifth of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts took place at the Academy of Music Saturday evening. Brooklyn society turned out in force.

Boston Post

MOTTO:

With a Mission

—AND—

Without a Muzzle.

FRIDAY MORNING, MAR. 25, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The memory of James Russell Lowell was honored at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, by one of the strongest programmes the Boston Symphony Orchestra could give. Schumann's overture, "Manfred," Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor and Beethoven's fifth symphony in C minor, formed a combination rarely heard at one performance; all three are favorite compositions with true lovers of music, but only a leader like Mr. Nikisch and an orchestra of superior excellence can render them with full musical effect.

The "Manfred" overture was distinguished by brilliant effects, fine coloring and precision of tone; but the perfect mastery of the art of shading, the strong crescendo effects, the delicacy of the pianissimo passages, was more noticeable in Schubert's beautiful symphony. The 'cello solo parts were exquisite in tone and finish.

The first and second movements of the Beethoven symphony were admirably rendered, but the tone of the wood wind instruments marred somewhat the beauty of the scherzo. The purity of tone in the violins was marked throughout the evening.

The acoustic properties of the theatre are such as bring out strongly small defects in orchestration that might pass unnoticed in other halls, but there is compensation in the fact that the beauty of shading, the wonderful balance of tone and the finished phrasing is accentuated, and the pleasure is, in consequence, greatly increased.

The audience was large and appreciative, without being demonstrative.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, MARCH 25, 1892.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel came back to America once more last week, and this time began their recitals, not in Boston, but in New York. Personally they are little changed. Mrs. Henschel is as fresh and delicate of voice, and as pleasant to look upon as ever, and Mr. Henschel is as bright-eyed and kindly of face as of old, with the familiar ring in his voice and his approved skill in accompaniments. It would be hard to find more delightful concerts of vocal music than those that the pair give, and New York has come, only a little later than Boston, to know and appreciate them. There was the old catholicity in their programme of airs, songs and duets, ranging from Padre Martini, Mozart and Handel, through Beethoven, Schubert and Donizetti down to Rubinstein, Massenet and Villiers Stanford. Their art, indeed, has its limitations, but in its kind it seems wholly admirable, and from year to year they have given us many opportunities to hear undeservedly neglected music. Mrs. Henschel was at her best in delicacy of tone and sympathetic interpretation in a group of Irish songs set by Mr. Stanford; and her husband's singing of Rubinstein's "Persisches Lied" and of five songs from Schubert's "Winter Journey" was full of fine dramatic power. But Boston already knows their skill and is soon to hear them.

The programme for the concert, tomorrow night, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall is as follows: Brahms, Tragic Overture; Gluck, air, dance of spirits and dance of furies, "Orpheus"; songs with pianoforte; Beethoven, eighth symphony. Mrs. Amalie Joachim will be the singer.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 26, 1892.

THE HENSCHEL RECITALS.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel are to be welcomed home next week; for, wherever they may choose to live and however long they may be absent, Boston will always consider them as belonging to her and receive them as dear estrays when they return from time to time to visit and to sing. Many singers come and go, but none bring just what they bring of the expressiveness, right feeling, unobtrusive power, unassuming grace and perfectly proportioned art. Their short concert series, which is to be directed by Mr. C. A. Ellis, is to begin on Tuesday evening next, in the Meionaon, where they so like to sing and where all can hear them to advantage. There will be three afternoon recitals to follow, the dates being March 31 and April 5 and 9. The programmes, which can be all had—the tickets also—at Music Hall, name a fascinating array of songs and duets, in which "the grand old masters" have as eminent a representation as contemporary writers of lied, ballad and chanson, and the unknown authors of ancient popular airs will not be forgotten. The arrangement of these programmes appears to be perfect in its light and shade, and unalloyed enjoyment is to be expected from a hearing of them. Mr. Henchel will of course play all the accompaniments, and we surely do not need to explain what that means.

* * *

The programme of the Symphony Concert of this evening is as follows: "Tragic" overture, Brahms; ballet music from Gluck's "Orpheus"; Beethoven's Symphony, No. 8. Frau Amalie Joachim will sing an aria from Gluck's "Orpheus," and three songs with pianoforte accompaniment; Schubert's "Liebeabotschaft," and "Erlkönig," and Schumann's "Schöne Wiege."

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MARCH 26,

The Henschels' first recital in this city comes on March 29th. The date can be remembered by bearing in mind that this is the day which Prof. Totten has set for the beginning of Judgment. If it is all as pleasant as this promises to be, the millenium will be welcomed.

The new opera by D'Albert is based upon a fairy story, and is comical rather than tragical. D'Albert says that it will be produced either at Berlin or Carlsruhe.

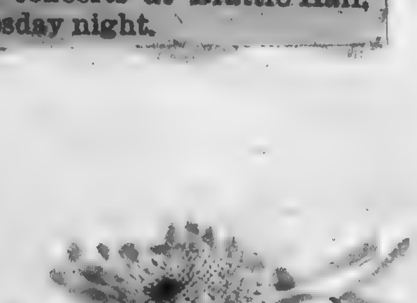
Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel of London are the guests of Mrs. Charles R. Hayden of 29 Brimmer street while in this city.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, MARCH 26, 1892.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will give concerts of songs at the Meionaon on Tuesday evening and Thursday afternoon of next week. The series also includes concerts on the afternoons of April 5 and 9. The programme for next Tuesday afternoon includes songs of the old Italian and modern German schools, with examples of light opera and a group by Mr. Henschel which Mrs. Henschel will sing. Programmes and tickets at the Music Hall.

The Kneisel Quartet will give the second of its series of chamber concerts at Brattle Hall, Cambridge, next Tuesday night.



THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 27, 1892.

THE HENSCHEL VOCAL RECITALS.

The four vocal recitals to be given by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will be among the most enjoyable musical treats of the spring. They will be given in the Meionaon (Tremont Temple), on next Tuesday evening, March 29, and on the afternoons of Thursday, March 31, Tuesday, April 5, and Saturday, April 9. Course tickets are now on sale at Music hall.

The programme for next Tuesday evening will be:

Duet, "Quel onda che rovina"	Padre Martini
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Aria, "Oh, Sleep," ("Semele") Aria, "Qual farfaletta," ("Partenope")	Handel
Mrs. Henschel.
Aria from "Il Maestro di Musica"	Pergolesi
Aria buffa from "Calandrino"	Cimarosa
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's song	Beethoven
"Auf Flugeln des Gesanges"	Mendelssohn
"In the Woods"	Franz
Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Doppelzanger" "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" "Der Schiffer"	Schubert
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Taming of the Shrew"	Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Romance "Morgens als Lerche" "Der Bote"	(New) Henschel
Mrs. Henschel.
The Czar's song, from "Czar and Carpenter"	Lortzing
Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philemon et Baucis"	Gounod
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village"	Boieldieu
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

THIRD JOACHIM-WHITE RECITAL.

The third and last of the Joachim-White song recitals at Steinert hall occurred last Monday afternoon. This was the programme:

Die Meere, Die Boten der Liebe, Die Schwestern,	Brahms
Miss White and Mrs. Joachim.
Der Lindenbaum. b. Auf dem Flusse. c. Fruhlingstraum. d. Im Dorfe. e. Der Wegweiser. f. Der Leermann.	Schubert
Mrs. Joachim.
Gretchen am Spinnrade	Schubert
Der Mond	Mendelssohn
In der Fremde	Taubert
Miss Villa W. White.
Feldeinsamkeit	Brahms
Nur ein Ton	Cornelius
Wieder mocht ich dir begegnen	Liszt
Fruhlingsliebe. Mein Schatz ist auf der Wanderschaft	Franz
Mrs. Joachim.
Three duets	Dvorak

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 27.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the twentieth Symphony Concert in Music Hall, last night, was: Tragic Overture, Brahms; "Che faro senza Euridice," Gluck; selections from the ballet music of "Orpheus," Gluck; "Liebotschaft," Schubert; "Schöne Wiege Meiner Leiden," Schumann, and "Erlkoenig," Schubert; Symphony No. 8 in F, Beethoven. The work of the orchestra was excellent throughout. The Brahms overture was clearly and impressively read and effectively played; and the Gluck ballet music was interpreted in a wholly sympathetic spirit and admirably performed. The symphony was given without any important innovations on the traditional reading and with a frank simplicity and a graceful flexibility that may be heartily commended. The soloist was Mme. Amalie Joachim. Her singing was often painfully false in intonation, and this fault, which seems to be a radical one with the artist, overtops whatever may be praiseworthy in her work. Purity of intonation is the first requisite in a vocalist, and the lack of it cannot be condoned, without setting a bad example to young singers and proving unfaithful to the best interests of vocal art. To encourage it at the Symphony concerts is to assist in lowering the standard that should prevail there. Not having heard Mme. Joachim in the meridian of her powers, we cannot tell what she has been; we can only know what she is, and, unpleasing as it is, to write thus harshly of an artist of her repute, we do not feel that it is just to pass by in her that which we would condemn severely in a less noted artist. Her singing last evening had little in it that can be honestly commended, and though it may have shown traces of an excellence that has passed away, it was scarcely worthy of a hearing at these concerts. However, the audience evidently thought otherwise, for it recalled her twice after the Gluck aria, and after the group of Schubert and Schumann songs it broke forth in a rapture of delight and recalled her five times. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony, A-minor, Mendelssohn; Concerto for flute and harp, Mozart; Serenade for strings, Volkmann; and "Wotan's Farewell" and "The Fire Charm," Wagner. The soloists will be: Messrs. H. Meyn, C. Molé and H. Schuecker.

The first in the series of four vocal recitals by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel in the Meionaon, will be given on Tuesday evening, when the artists will be heard in songs by Handel, Pegolese, Cimarosa, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Franz, Schubert, Lortzing, Gounod and Henschel, and in duets by Martini, Goetz and Boieldieu. The second Recital will take place on Thursday afternoon when the programme will include music by Bach, Handel, Paesiello, Arne, Beethoven, Schumann, Loewe, Brahms, Liszt, Tschaikowsky, Massenet, Sgambati, Paderewski and A. Thomas.

The second in the series of three concerts in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, will be given by the Kneisel Quartet on Tuesday evening. Mrs. Nikisch is to be the soloist.

[illegible]

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 87.

SUNDAY, MARCH 27, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The appearance of Mme. Amalia Joachim, the contralto whose vocal recitals have attracted so much attention, made one of the interesting features of last evening's symphony concert, the complete programme of which was as follows:

Tragic Overture	Brahms
Aria from "Orpheus"	Gluck
Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien	Gluck
Tanz from "Orpheus"	———
Songs with piano	———
"Liebesbotschaft (a)	Schubert
"Schoene Weige meiner Leiden" (b)	Schumann
"Erlkoenig" (c)	Schubert
Symphony No. 8, in F major	Beethoven

Mme. Joachim's delivery of the familiar aria from "Orpheus" displayed the rich sympathetic tones of her voice to fine advantage, and her singing of the selection was marked by a degree of dramatic strength and sentiment which quite realized all its beauties, and she honestly won the commendation which was awarded her at the conclusion. In the group of songs at the piano she again displayed her rare gifts as a vocalist and won especial favor by the intelligent and artistic fashion in which she gave the Schubert songs.

The strong contrast afforded by introducing the old-time music of Gluck with the modern mysteries of a Brahm's overture heightened the effect of both these styles of composition and added largely to the enjoyment of the older forms from the "Orpheus."

No better flute playing has ever been heard here than that of M. Mole in the theme of the first movement of the Orpheus music, for it was sung upon the instrument with faultless taste and such skill that the player was compelled to repeatedly bow his acknowledgments from his seat in the orchestra at its conclusion.

The dance of the furies was splendidly given by Mr. Nikisch, who also made intelligible the intentions of the composer of the "Tragic" overture. An admirable reading of the eigth symphony greatly pleased the audience.

Next Saturday evening the soloists will be Mr. Heinrich Meyn, baritone, Mr. Charles Mòle, flute, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker, harp; the programme including Mendelssohn's symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch"; Mozart's concerto for flute and harp; Volkmann's serenade for string orchestra, in F major, and Wagner's "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkuere."

THE HENSCHELS' VISIT.

The visit of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel to this city will be a welcome event to the many who have enjoyed their artistic and social acquaintance in years past, and the series of vocal recitals to be given by these accomplished singers will, quite likely, take on the character of a reunion of the admirers of these admirable artists.

In chatting about his return to Boston a few days ago, during his stay in Philadelphia, Mr. Henschel spoke with great feeling of his pleasant associations with the Boston public in the past, and especially of the value of his experiences here while directing the Boston Symphony orchestra during the first three seasons of its existence. He said that his London orchestral concerts were suggested by, and modelled upon, those given under his direction by the Boston orchestra. He spoke with pardonable pride of the fact that, after a struggle of five seasons for financial support, caused by the novelty of the scheme and the fact that orchestral concerts during the winter months had never had the favor of influential patrons, he has at last seen the turn of the tide, and has felt justified in announcing a grander scheme for next season.

He expressed much satisfaction with the attention paid his music for the recent "Hamlet" production in London, and said that he should probably direct its performance in this country, or, rather, a concert arrangement of it, before his return to London.

When asked as to the comparative standing of American students abroad, he smiled, and, while admitting an admiration for American singers and their rare gifts in many cases, said that he had found many good voices among his London pupils who were not born under the stars and stripes.

The conversation happening to turn upon the recent opera season here, Mr. Henschel expressed some of the pronounced opinions which were heard with so much interest at the recent distribution of prizes in the Birmingham school of music, England, when he said in a satirical allusion to the "Cavalleria Rusticana" performances:

"Now as an example of how much more is thought of money than of art by many of those who profess to deal, so to speak, with art, a short opera—let us call it 'Artineria di Marina'—has met with tremendous and universal success. It must be given, but it does not fill the evening. What do we consequently read in the advertisements—and don't think I have made this up—'Tonight, the successful opera 'Artineria di Marina' will be followed, or preceded by Gluck's 'Orfeo,' ending with 'Che Faro.' Now says Hamlet, in one of his most lucid moments, 'that's villainous.' Just fancy a modern English playwright having written a very successful one-act play, which draws crowded houses, but does not fill the evening. The manager therefore advertises: 'Mr. So-and-So's successful play will be given tonight, followed or preceded by Shakespeare's "Hamlet," ending with "To be or not to be!"' Now, this certainly ought not to be, and those young people who enter upon a professional career, whether they are to become productive or reproductive artists, ought to do all in their power to decry this chase for money at the expense of art."

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will arrive in Boston today and on Tuesday evening will give the first of the series of four vocal recitals announced at the Meionaon. Mr. Henschel's well known catholicity in programme making is shown by the composers represented on Tuesday's list which includes the names of Padre Martini, Handel, Pergolesi, Cimarosa, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Franz, Schubert, Goetz, Henschel, Lortzing, Gounod and Boieldieu.

The remaining concerts of the series will be given on Thursday afternoon, March 31, Tuesday afternoon, April 5, Saturday afternoon, April 9.

Paderewski and the Boston Symphony orchestra are to give that Washington arch fund in New York a lift tonight by playing at the Metropolitan Opera House in that city. The pianist and all the musicians volunteer their services. Much might be said about the Boston orchestra being chosen by the pianist, instead of those in New York, but the musical public of the metropolis might take offence. The programme includes the "Tannhauser" and "Benvenuto Cellini" overtures, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," concertos by Schumann and Paderewski and a Liszt "Hungarian Rhapsody." About every seat for the concert was sold the day they were offered at the box office.

The pleasant farewell banquet which Paderewski gave on Tuesday numbered among its guests Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote, Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, Mr. Clayton Johns, the Adamowskis and Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Apthorp.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 3/21

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel's Song Recitals at Chickering Hall—Concerts to Come.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were greeted by a large and highly appreciative audience in Chickering Hall on Saturday afternoon, when the first of the two song recitals of these accomplished artists was given. No singers before the public in their special department of vocal art are more justly welcome.

Mrs. Henschel's selections in the programme included several songs which she already has made agreeably familiar and which it is a pleasure to hear once more, and some which she sang for the first time here on Saturday. Among the latter were a "May Song," by A. Herney, and two pretty Irish songs set by C. Villiers Stanford. All of these compositions were sung with sympathetic voice and in finished style, chastely, simply and with true feeling. In two selections from Handel's operas and in three strikingly effective compositions by Mr. Henschel, the beauty of the singer's voice, the fineness of her vocal art, her warmth of feeling and her admirable power of expression were delightfully manifest.

Mr. Henschel sang a number of selections to which his fine artistic taste as well as his vocal art gave notable effect. Among these were a song from Mozart's "Il Seraglio" and five songs from Schubert's cyclus, "Die Winterreise." Several duets included in the programme also gave great pleasure to the audience. In the next and last recital on Saturday afternoon, the programme will embrace numbers by Gretry, Handel, Cimarosa, Dr. Arne, Rubinstein, Loewe, Henschel, Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Boieldieu. Gounod, Thomas, Saint-Saens and Bizet.

NOTES.

M. Eugen d'Albert's three recitals of pianoforte music will be given at Madison Square Garden Concert Hall on the afternoons of April 5, 7 and 9. The first of his programmes is devoted to Beethoven, its numbers being variations in C minor; sonata in C major, op. 53; sonata in E minor, op. 90; sonata in E major, op. 109, and sonata in A flat major, op. 110. The second programme draws upon Bach, Beethoven, Mendelsshon, Raff, Tausig and Liszt, and programme No. 3 upon Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubinstein and Liszt.

Journal, Chicago, Ill.

Date 3

* * *

Eugene D'Albert made his initial appearance on his second visit to the United States at Boston on Friday afternoon and received a reception befitting the greatest living pianist and most intelligent and artistic interpreter of Beethoven. D'Albert will give two recitals in Chicago—Thursday evening, March 24, and Saturday afternoon, March 26. His splendid reception at Boston will doubtless be repeated here, as D'Albert is a universal favorite, and his genius is recognized and fully appreciated by music-loving Chicago.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date

The fifth of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts took place at the Academy of Music Saturday evening. Brooklyn society turned out in force.

Boston Post

MOTTO:

With a Mission

—AND—

Without a Muzzle.

FRIDAY MORNING, MAR. 25, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The memory of James Russell Lowell was honored at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, by one of the strongest programmes the Boston Symphony Orchestra could give. Schumann's overture, "Manfred," Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor and Beethoven's fifth symphony in C minor, formed a combination rarely heard at one performance; all three are favorite compositions with true lovers of music, but only a leader like Mr. Nikisch and an orchestra of superior excellence can render them with full musical effect.

The "Manfred" overture was distinguished by brilliant effects, fine coloring and precision of tone; but the perfect mastery of the art of shading, the strong crescendo effects, the delicacy of the pianissimo passages, was more noticeable in Schubert's beautiful symphony. The 'cello solo parts were exquisite in tone and finish.

The first and second movements of the Beethoven symphony were admirably rendered, but the tone of the wood wind instruments marred somewhat the beauty of the scherzo. The purity of tone in the violins was marked throughout the evening.

The acoustic properties of the theatre are such as bring out strongly small defects in orchestration that might pass unnoticed in other halls, but there is compensation in the fact that the beauty of shading, the wonderful balance of tone and the finished phrasing is accentuated, and the pleasure is, in consequence, greatly increased.

The audience was large and appreciative, without being demonstrative.

[160]

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, MARCH 25, 1892.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel came back to America once more last week, and this time began their recitals, not in Boston, but in New York. Personally they are little changed. Mrs. Henschel is as fresh and delicate of voice, and as pleasant to look upon as ever, and Mr. Henschel is as bright-eyed and kindly of face as of old, with the familiar ring in his voice and his approved skill in accompaniments. It would be hard to find more delightful concerts of vocal music than those that the pair give, and New York has come, only a little later than Boston, to know and appreciate them. There was the old catholicity in their programme of airs, songs and duets, ranging from Padre Martini, Mozart and Handel, through Beethoven, Schubert and Donizetti down to Rubinstein, Massenet and Villiers Stanford. Their art, indeed, has its limitations, but in its kind it seems wholly admirable, and from year to year they have given us many opportunities to hear undeservedly neglected music. Mrs. Henschel was at her best in delicacy of tone and sympathetic interpretation in a group of Irish songs set by Mr. Stanford; and her husband's singing of Rubinstein's "Persisches Lied" and of five songs from Schubert's "Winter Journey" was full of fine dramatic power. But Boston already knows their skill and is soon to hear them.

The programme for the concert, tomorrow night, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall is as follows: Brahms, Tragic Overture; Gluck, air, dance of spirits and dance of furies, "Orpheus"; songs with pianoforte; Beethoven, eighth symphony. Mrs. Amalie Joachim will be the singer.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 26, 1892.

THE HENSCHEL RECITALS.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel are to be welcomed home next week; for, wherever they may choose to live and however long they may be absent, Boston will always consider them as belonging to her and receive them as dear estrays when they return from time to time to visit and to sing. Many singers come and go, but none bring just what they bring of the expressiveness, right feeling, unobtrusive power, unassuming grace and perfectly proportioned art. Their short concert series, which is to be directed by Mr. C. A. Ellis, is to begin on Tuesday evening next, in the Meionaon, where they so like to sing and where all can hear them to advantage. There will be three afternoon recitals to follow, the dates being March 31 and April 5 and 9. The programmes, which can be all had—the tickets also—at Music Hall, name a fascinating array of songs and duets, in which "the grand old masters" have as eminent a representation as contemporary writers of lied, ballad and chanson, and the unknown authors of ancient popular airs will not be forgotten. The arrangement of these programmes appears to be perfect in its light and shade, and unalloyed enjoyment is to be expected from a hearing of them. Mr. Henchel will of course play all the accompaniments, and we surely do not need to explain what that means.

The programme of the Symphony Concert of this evening is as follows: "Tragic" overture, Brahms; ballet music from Gluck's "Orpheus"; Beethoven's Symphony, No. 8. Frau Amalie Joachim will sing an aria from Gluck's "Orpheus," and three songs with pianoforte accompaniment; Schubert's "Liebeabotschaft," and "Erlkönig," and Schumann's "Schöne Wiege."

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MARCH 26,

The Henschels' first recital in this city comes on March 29th. The date can be remembered by bearing in mind that this is the day which Prof. Totten has set for the beginning of Judgment. If it is all as pleasant as this promises to be, the millenium will be welcomed.

The new opera by D'Albert is based upon a fairy story, and is comical rather than tragical. D'Albert says that it will be produced either at Berlin or Carlsruhe.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel of London are the guests of Mrs. Charles R. Hayden of 29 Brimmer street while in this city.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, MARCH 26, 1892.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will give concerts of songs at the Meionaon on Tuesday evening and Thursday afternoon of next week. The series also includes concerts on the afternoons of April 5 and 9. The programme for next Tuesday afternoon includes songs of the old Italian and modern German schools, with examples of light opera and a group by Mr. Henschel which Mrs. Henschel will sing. Programmes and tickets at the Music Hall.

The Kneisel Quartet will give the second of its series of chamber concerts at Brattle Hall, Cambridge, next Tuesday night.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 27, 1892.

THE HENSCHEL VOCAL RECITALS.

The four vocal recitals to be given by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will be among the most enjoyable musical treats of the spring. They will be given in the Meionaon (Tremont Temple), on next Tuesday evening, March 29, and on the afternoons of Thursday, March 31, Tuesday, April 5, and Saturday, April 9. Course tickets are now on sale at Music hall.

The programme for next Tuesday evening will be:

Duet, "Quel onda che rovina"...Padre Martini
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Aria, "Oh, Sleep," ("Semele")......... } Handel
Aria, "Qual farfaletta," ("Partenope") }
Mrs. Henschel.
Aria from "Il Maestro di Musica".....Pergolesi
Aria buffa from "Calandrino".........Cimarosa
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's song.........................Beethoven
"Auf Flugeln des Gesanges".....Mendelssohn
"In the Woods"...............................Franz
Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Doppelzanger"................... }
"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus"......... } Schubert
"Der Schiffer"............................ }
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Taming of the Shrew".......Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Romance........................ }
"Morgens als Lerche"........ } (New) Henschel
"Der Bote"...................... }
Mrs. Henschel.
The Czar's song, from "Czar and Carpenter"...............................Lortzing
Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philemon et Baucis"..............................Gounod
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village"...............................Boieldieu
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

THIRD JOACHIM-WHITE RECITAL.

The third and last of the Joachim-White song recitals at Steinert hall occurred last Monday afternoon. This was the programme:

Die Meere, }
Die Boten der Liebe, } .... Brahms
Die Schwestern, }
Miss White and Mrs. Joachim.
Der Lindenbaum. b. Auf dem Flusse. }
c. Fruhlingstraum. d. Im Dorfe. e. } Schubert
Der Wegweiser. f. Der Leermann. }
Mrs. Joachim.
Gretchen am Spinnrade................Schubert
Der Mond..........................Mendelssohn
In der Fremde..............................Taubert
Miss Villa W. White.
Feldeinsamkeit ....Brahms
Nur ein Ton..............................Cornelius
Wieder mocht ich dir begegnen............Liszt
Fruhlingsliebe. }
Mein Schatz ist auf der Wanderschaft } Franz
Mrs. Joachim.
Three duets..................................Dvorak

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 27.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the twentieth Symphony Concert in Music Hall, last night, was: Tragic Overture, Brahms; "Che faro senza Euridice," Gluck; selections from the ballet music of "Orpheus," Gluck; "Liebotschaft," Schubert; "Schöne Wiege Meiner Leiden," Schumann, and "Erlkoenig," Schubert, Symphony No. 8 in F, Beethoven. The work of the orchestra was excellent throughout. The Brahms overture was clearly and impressively read and effectively played; and the Gluck ballet music was interpreted in a wholly sympathetic spirit and admirably performed. The symphony was given without any important innovations on the traditional reading and with a frank simplicity and a graceful flexibility that may be heartily commended. The soloist was Mme. Amalie Joachim. Her singing was often painfully false in intonation, and this fault, which seems to be a radical one with the artist, overtops whatever may be praiseworthy in her work. Purity of intonation is the first requisite in a vocalist, and the lack of it cannot be condoned, without setting a bad example to young singers and proving unfaithful to the best interests of vocal art. To encourage it at the Symphony concerts is to assist in lowering the standard that should prevail there. Not having heard Mme. Joachim in the meridian of her powers, we cannot tell what she has been; we can only know what she is, and, unpleasing as it is, to write thus harshly of an artist of her repute, we do not feel that it is just to pass by in her that which we would condemn severely in a less noted artist. Her singing last evening had little in it that can be honestly commended, and though it may have shown traces of an excellence that has passed away, it was scarcely worthy of a hearing at these concerts. However, the audience evidently thought otherwise, for it recalled her twice after the Gluck aria, and after the group of Schubert and Schumann songs it broke forth in a rapture of delight and recalled her five times. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony, A-minor, Mendelssohn; Concerto for flute and harp, Mozart; Serenade for strings, Volkmann; and "Wotan's Farewell" and "The Fire Charm," Wagner. The soloists will be: Messrs. H. Meyn, C. Molé and H. Schuecker.

The first in the series of four vocal recitals by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel in the Meionaon, will be given on Tuesday evening, when the artists will be heard in songs by Handel, Pegolese, Cimarosa, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Franz, Schubert, Lortzing, Gounod and Henschel, and in duets by Martini, Goetz and Boieldieu. The second Recital will take place on Thursday afternoon when the programme will include music by Bach, Handel, Paisiello, Arne, Beethoven, Schumann, Loewe, Brahms, Liszt, Tschaikowsky, Massenet, Sgambati, Paderewski and A. Thomas.

The second in the series of three concerts in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, will be given by the Kneisel Quartet on Tuesday evening. Mrs. Nikisch is to be the soloist.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 87.

SUNDAY, MARCH 27, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The appearance of Mme. Amalia Joachim, the contralto whose vocal recitals have attracted so much attention, made one of the interesting features of last evening's symphony concert, the complete programme of which was as follows:

Tragic Overture..................................Brahms
Aria from "Orpheus"..............................Gluck
Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien.........Gluck
Tanz from "Orpheus".............................——
Songs with piano....................................——
"Liebesbotschaft (a)........................Schubert
"Schoene Weige meiner Leiden" (b).....Schumann
"Erlkoenig" (c)...............................Schubert
Symphony No. 8, in F major............Beethoven

Mme. Joachim's delivery of the familiar aria from "Orpheus" displayed the rich sympathetic tones of her voice to fine advantage, and her singing of the selection was marked by a degree of dramatic strength and sentiment which quite realized all its beauties, and she honestly won the commendation which was awarded her at the conclusion. In the group of songs at the piano she again displayed her rare gifts as a vocalist and won especial favor by the intelligent and artistic fashion in which she gave the Schubert songs.

The strong contrast afforded by introducing the old-time music of Gluck with the modern mysteries of a Brahm's overture heightened the effect of both these styles of composition and added largely to the enjoyment of the older forms from the "Orpheus."

No better flute playing has ever been heard here than that of M. Mole in the theme of the first movement of the Orpheus music, for it was sung upon the instrument with faultless taste and such skill that the player was compelled to repeatedly bow his acknowledgments from his seat in the orchestra at its conclusion.

The dance of the furies was splendidly given by Mr. Nikisch, who also made intelligible the intentions of the composer of the "Tragic" overture. An admirable reading of the eigth symphony greatly pleased the audience.

Next Saturday evening the soloists will be Mr. Heinrich Meyn, baritone, Mr. Charles Mole, flute, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker, harp; the programme including Mendelssohn's symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch"; Mozart's concerto for flute and harp; Volkmann's serenade for string orchestra, in F major, and Wagner's "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkuere."

THE HENSCHELS' VISIT.

The visit of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel to this city will be a welcome event to the many who have enjoyed their artistic and social acquaintance in years past, and the series of vocal recitals to be given by these accomplished singers will, quite likely, take on the character of a reunion of the admirers of these admirable artists.

In chatting about his return to Boston a few days ago, during his stay in Philadelphia, Mr. Henschel spoke with great feeling of his pleasant associations with the Boston public in the past, and especially of the value of his experiences here while directing the Boston Symphony orchestra during the first three seasons of its existence. He said that his London orchestral concerts were suggested by, and modelled upon, those given under his direction by the Boston orchestra. He spoke with pardonable pride of the fact that, after a struggle of five seasons for financial support, caused by the novelty of the scheme and the fact that orchestral concerts during the winter months had never had the favor of influential patrons, he has at last seen the turn of the tide, and has felt justified in announcing a grander scheme for next season.

He expressed much satisfaction with the attention paid his music for the recent "Hamlet" production in London, and said that he should probably direct its performance in this country, or, rather, a concert arrangement of it, before his return to London.

When asked as to the comparative standing of American students abroad, he smiled, and, while admitting an admiration for American singers and their rare gifts in many cases, said that he had found many good voices among his London pupils who were not born under the stars and stripes.

The conversation happening to turn upon the recent opera season here, Mr. Henschel expressed some of the pronounced opinions which were heard with so much interest at the recent distribution of prizes in the Birmingham school of music, England, when he said in a satirical allusion to the "Cavalleria Rusticana" performances:

"Now as an example of how much more is thought of money than of art by many of those who profess to deal, so to speak, with art, a short opera—let us call it 'Artineria di Marina'—has met with tremendous and universal success. It must be given, but it does not fill the evening. What do we consequently read in the advertisements—and don't think I have made this up, for I have not—'Tonight, the successful opera 'Artineria di Marina' will be followed, or preceded by Gluck's 'Orfeo,' ending with 'Che Faro.' 'Now says Hamlet, in one of his most lucid moments, 'that's villanous.' Just fancy a modern English playwright having written a very successful one-act play, which draws crowded houses, but does not fill the evening. The manager therefore advertises: 'Mr. So-and-So's successful play will be given tonight, followed or preceded by Shakespeare's "Hamlet," ending with "To be or not to be!"' Now, this certainly ought not to be, and those young people who enter upon a professional career, whether they are to become productive or reproductive artists, ought to do all in their power to decry this chase for money at the expense of art."

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will arrive in Boston today and on Tuesday evening will give the first of the series of four vocal recitals announced at the Meionaon. Mr. Henschel's well known catholicity in programme making is shown by the composers represented on Tuesday's list which includes the names of Padre Martini, Handel, Pergolesi, Cimarosa, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Franz, Schubert, Goetz, Henschel, Lortzing, Gounod and Boieldieu.

The remaining concerts of the series will be given on Thursday afternoon, March 31, Tuesday afternoon, April 5, Saturday afternoon, April 9.

Paderewski and the Boston Symphony orchestra are to give that Washington arch fund in New York a lift tonight by playing at the Metropolitan Opera House in that city. The pianist and all the musicians volunteer their services. Much might be said about the Boston orchestra being chosen by the pianist, instead of those in New York, but the musical public of the metropolis might take offence. The programme includes the "Tannhauser" and "Bueventa Cellini" overtures, "Le Rouet d'Omphale" concertos for piano by Schumann and Paderewski, and a Liszt "Hungarian Rhapsody." About every seat for the concert was sold the day they were offered at the box office.

The pleasant farewell banquet which Paderewski gave on Tuesday numbered among its guests Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote, Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, Mr. Clayton Johns, the Adamowskis and Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Apthorp.

[illegible] MARCH 27, [illegible]

HENSCHEL VOCAL RECITALS.

Warm Welcome Assured the Gifted Couple on Their Return to Boston.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, the distinguished singers, will return to Boston this week, after an absence of three years. This gifted couple are so well known here that little need be said in praise of their splendid vocalism, which may well serve as a model for all concert singers.

The first of their series of four vocal recitals will be given at the Meionaon next Tuesday evening. The programme will be as follows:

Duet, Quel unda che rovina..........Padre Martini
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Aria, Oh, Sleep, from Semele. } ....Handel
Aria, Qual farfaletta, from Partenope. }
Mrs. Henschel.
Aria from Il Maestro di Musica............Pergolesi
Aria buffa from Calandrino..............Cimarosa
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's song..........................Beethoven
Auf Flügeln des Gesanges...........Mendelssohn
In the Woods...............................Franz
Mrs. Henschel.
Der Doppelganger. }
Gruppe aus dem Tartarus. } ....Schubert
Der Schiffer, }
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from the "Taming of the Shrew" ......Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Romance .... }
"Morgens als Lerche" } (new) ....Henschel
"Der Bote" .... }
Mrs. Henschel.
The Czar's song, from "Czar and Carpenter"
Lortzing
Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philemon et Baucis"
Gounod
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village"
Boieldieu
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

The dates of the three matinees are Thursday, March 31; Thursday, April 5, and Saturday, April 9. Tickets can be secured at Music Hall.

TWENTIETH SYMPHONY.

Mme. Amalie Joachim Receives a Flattering Reception.

The twentieth Symphony concert was given at Music Hall yesterday evening. The interest of the occasion was centred in Mme. Amalie Joachim, who has already made many friends in Boston. As she moved along to the front of the stage amidst a most cordial welcome, her manner had all the easy grace of the hostess receiving her friends. The reception accorded her was genuine and was justified by her subsequent work.

At her initial performance in Union Hall she labored under the disadvantage of a contracted auditorium, but yesterday at the Music Hall the conditions were much more favorable to her voice, which is not only acceptable in tone but of very considerable volume. She selected an aria from Orpheus as her opening number, accompanied by full orchestra, which she sang with admirable taste and skill. Her rich, round voice was fully equal to all demands made upon it.

In addition to the above she sang three songs, by Schubert, Liebesbotschaft and Erlkoenig, together with Schuman's "Schoene Wiege Meiner Leiden." She was accompanied on the piano by Mr. Nikisch with that grace and delicacy which has won so much praise for him.

Mme. Joachim was at her best in these songs, which she gave with extreme tenderness, and returned at the finish no less than three times to receive the flattering attention of the audience.

The instrumental portion of the rehearsal consisted of Brahm's "Tragic Overture," which met careful treatment at the hands of the orchestra, though we cannot help feeling the overture might be called an ode to melancholly.

The second number consisted of Gluck's "Reigen Seliger Geister and Furien Tanz," from "Orpheus." Symphony No. 8, in F major, Beethoven, was selected for the occasion, sometimes known as the little symphony. This cheery and refreshing music was charmingly played. The scherzo work

Its merry measures delighted the audience into applause at its termination, and it is fair to say the little symphony will not soon lose its place amongst the pleasant musical memories of these delightful concerts.

The next rehearsals and concert will be given April 1 and 2.

——The last Paderewski recital was a perfect crush, and emphasized the fact that, whatever chances, this wonderful performer will always be sure of the warmest kind of welcome in Boston. Tonight he plays for the last time this season in New York, and gives the whole proceeds of the recital to a local charity. Not to be outdone, Mr. Higginson is sending his orchestra over to play at the same concert as his share in the good work, and in return for the courtesy shown by Paderewski when he so kindly offered his services at the recent benefit of the orchestra. After the concert the whole band of performers—with Manager Ellis and his assistant, Mr. Comee—are to be given an elaborate supper at Sherry's by Paderewski as his farewell offering to the orchestra which has served him so well. He sails Tuesday.

——Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, who have been the recipients in New York all the week of much distinguished attention from society, were the centre of attraction at Mrs. ex-Secretary Whitney's musicale last Saturday afternoon, when Mrs. Nikisch sang with the Adamowski quartet. On Thursday night, when Paderewski played at Mrs. Whitney's, she gave a dinner for 24 previous to the entertainment.

——Mme. Lilian Nordica's Boston friends will be glad to hear that she has been enjoying a great social as well as an artistic triumph in Dublin. She was entertained at the Viceregal Lodge, the Mansion House, and many private houses, and her departure from Westland Row railway station in a special saloon carriage, decorated with choice exotics and many huge bouquets, was quite a little ceremony. There were over 4000 people at the Leinster Hall when she sang there last Monday night.

——The Henschels, whose recitals this week are eagerly anticipated, have lost none of their excellence during their long term of absence, and, seemingly, no ground in public favor, to judge by their New York reception the other night. When they sing together the effect of their perfect vocal [illegible] and of Mr. Henschel's admirable accompaniments is irresistible, and the [illegible] of Mrs. Henschel's singing with her [illegible] aid at the piano is even greater. [illegible] would be hard to find a vocalist that [illegible] agreeable soprano voice with [illegible] and fascinating art. Mr. [illegible] as a [illegible] singer [illegible] feel- [illegible]

Boston Journal.
MONDAY, MARCH 28, 1892.

Mrs. Joachim Sings at the Symphony Concert.

A Digression Concerning "Intellectuality" in Song.

The twentieth Symphony concert was given Saturday evening in Music Hall. The programme was as follows:

Tragic Overture...................................Brahms
Aria from "Orpheus".................................Gluck
Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien Tanz, from "Orpheus"..Gluck
Songs with Piano.
"Liebesbotschaft"..............................Schubert
"Schoene Wiege meiner Leiden"............Schumann
"Erlkoenig"....................................Schubert
Symphony No. 8, in F Major.................Beethoven

Mrs. Amalie Joachim was the singer.

The orchestral numbers are familiar, and they require no words of explanation or criticism. The work of the orchestra was excellent. Mr. Nikisch gave a sane and manly reading of the Beethoven symphony. It was free from the caprices, the mannerisms and the theatrical spirit that on former occasions have often disfigured the performance of the compositions of Beethoven as conducted by him. The ballet music from "Orpheus" was effective, and the effects were due to the fact that Mr. Nikisch was in sympathy with the old writer of operas. There was no attempt at modernization. The pure, almost severe, simplicity of Gluck was reverently preserved. The flute solo in the ballet music was played in a delightful manner. All in all, the concert was worthy of the high reputation of the orchestra.

⁂

Mrs. Joachim appears in certain respects to better advantage, as a singer, in Music Hall than in a room of small dimensions. For the full exhibition of the breadth of her style she needs space and freedom. Saturday evening she displayed passionate power and dramatic intelligence. But the same faults were seen in this concert and in her three recitals. There is no need, perhaps, of dwelling on them, but two are grievous and not to be excused. Her intonation is often false, and in her attack she frequently strikes under and slides up to the desired tone. Now, the Symphony concerts are supposed to serve an educational purpose. When a singer comes before a Symphony audience, the student should be able to profit by the hearing. When the student finds that vocal offences are quickly forgiven, she may well question the wisdom of her teacher, who finds fault with her for similar omissions and commissions.

⁂

It is true that the curiosity to hear famous singers of other lands is legitimate, even when they have passed the zenith of their glory. Applause is often justly given as a tribute paid the glorious past. The intelligence displayed by Mrs. Joachim is admirable, worthy of all praise. Even now there are excellent points in the mechanical means employed to convey this mental intelligence. There is a danger, however, in the unqualified acceptance of her art, and the danger is this: That students hearing her and knowing her reputation may be induced to regard the rudiments of the science of song as things of little moment, and to seek only the expression of emotions without providing themselves with the means of full expression. And there are many in these days who claim that the first thing required of a singer is intelligence. This intelligence is not vocal; it is vaguely described as "intellectuality." That is to say, a singer may have an unpleasant voice, he may sing habitually below or above the true pitch, he may show ignorance of important rudiments of the art of song; and he is promptly pardoned for his vocal ignorance or vocal inability, provided there is a rumor that he in some mysterious manner has caught the true spirit of the composer and will consent to serve as a medium between the composer and the hearer. When it is once announced that Mr. X or Mrs. Z sings with uncommon "intellectuality," the fortune of the singer is made for a season, and possibly for two seasons. There is a cult. Unfortunately for Mr. X or Mrs. Z, some one, whose "intellectuality" is said to be even more pronounced, raps at the stage door. The old shrine is hastily abandoned. For music is too often the sport of the constantly changing fashion.

⁂

PADERÉWSKI AND NIKISCH.

Together They Played $4300 Into the Washington Arch Fund.

Special Dispatch to The Boston Journal.

NEW YORK, March 27. Paderewski gave a farewell concert this evening at the Metropolitan Opera House for the benefit of the Washington Arch fund. Fortunately for the financial and artistic outcome of the undertaking, he found three men who were willing to aid him. Mr. Steinway, who paid all the local expenses of the concert; Mr. Higginson, who contributed the services of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and paid the cost of their visit, and Mr. Nikisch, who conducted the concert. As a result, the Arch fund has been increased about $4300.

Everything except the weather and a rather large number of empty boxes conspired to make the affair one of extreme brilliancy. The visiting orchestra was in close sympathy with Mr. Paderewski, and he with it, and the music which was played went with a good deal of spirit, especially the pianist's own concerto, the exquisite slow movement and brilliant finale of which aroused so much enthusiasm that Mr. Paderewski repeated the last movement. The repetition was a well-earned and neatly paid compliment to Mr. Nikisch and his men, with whom the pianist seemed extremely desirous to share the honors of the evening.

The concert was made a gala occasion for the concert goers; it wound up with speech-making.

PRESS, New York, N. Y.
Date 3-26

At the concert in aid of the Washington Arch Fund at the Metropolitan Opera House to-morrow evening the following programme will be given by M. Paderewski and the Boston Symphony Orchestra: Overture, "Tannhaeuser," ~~Richard Wagner~~; concerto, A minor, Schumann; overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz; concerto, Paderewski; Le rouet d'Omphale, Saint Saens; Hungarian fantasie, Liszt.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING MAR. 28, 1892.

Saturday's Symphony Concert—Mme. Joachim, the Soloist, Appeared to Good Advantage—Her Dramatic Conceptions a Study in Themselves—Close of the Grand Opera Season.

Brahms' "Tragic Overture" began the programme. This work is not intended to represent any special plot, only presenting a strongly dramatic or tragic element as justification for its title. It opens with two ponderous chords, exactly as Beethoven's "Heroic Symphony" does, and it might as readily deserve the adjective "heroic" as that of "tragic." The chief defect of the work is its lack of contrast; it is almost constantly sombre or agitated. It was played with great spirit and unanimity, although the violins pushed their fury to the verge of harshness, and there was little intermediate shading between the extremely soft and the extremely loud passages.

Gluck's ballet music gained immensely by being performed in Music Hall; in Mechanics' Hall, last week, the opera of "Orpheus" seemed entirely out of place, the delicate touches were lost, and the simplicity could not charm. In this performance everything was restored to its proper balance and perspective. The flute solo (or obbligato) in the picture of the blest spirits, was finely performed by Mr. Molé, and the entire picture was given with commendable conservatism, only the 19th century ghosts would be apt to find such saccharine enjoyments as are here portrayed a trifle cloying. A few blurs towards the close of the "Dance of the Furies" may readily be condoned in view of the lack of exaggeration, which made the work a very acceptable representation of the beginning of dramatic music. In the performance of the eighth symphony by Beethoven, however, the first violins ruled the roost in their usual forcible manner, and the development of the first movement was so tumultuous that it might have pictured battle rather than a mere outburst of animal spirits. The whole symphony is the playful Beethoven, but this composer had rather a brusque humor, and his sport took him into the domains of the grotesque, rather than into the piquant and dainty as was the case with Mendelssohn. The bassoon was Beethoven's favorite instrument; that is, he generally used it when he was in a thoroughly good humor; and as he was in the best of spirits in the writing of this work (it might be called "the humorous symphony") we find plenty of comical bassoon work in its measures. All through the symphony the instrument was well played, and in the finale its odd octave figure with the kettle drum was charming. Next to the bassoon the contrabasses came into prominence and they were magnificently played. In fact, whenever these ponderous instruments have anything like obbligato phrases they give them in a most artistic manner; they are one of the most perfect departments of our orchestra. Yet I could have wished for more force in that exquisitely grotesque presentation of the chief figure in the finale. The chattering theme has become sweeter and sweeter, and finally is given to flutes and violins when, just as one is lulled into tranquillity,—presto! there is a leap from the garret into the cellar of the orchestra, and the contrabasses ferociously mock the sweeter instruments! It is all a practical joke, but it cannot have too much emphasis. One does not often have to call our conductor to account for lack of emphasis, and the symphony was in the main well done.

Madame Joachim was the soloist. She has never appeared to such good advantage since she has been in Boston. The large hall suited to her heavy voice far better than any smaller concert-room could possibly do, and if there was a slight flatting from pitch occasionally, it was far less perceptible than heretofore, and her undeniable wealth of dramatic expression was employed in the best possible way. "Che faro senza Euridice" was sung with great earnestness, although in the final appearance of the theme of this vocal rondo the singer took the tempo at a very rapid pace and the orchestra was often left far behind, for the conductor seemed not in accord with the artist's view.

I could not entirely agree with the overwhelming enthusiasm with which the public greeted the performance of the "Erl King," for there were unnecessary caprices of tempo, and of accompaniment too. The erl-king's "Willst feiner Knabe, du mit mir geh'n" was far quicker than Kreissmann or Schott used to take it, and the climax, "So brauch ich Gewalt," showed but little "Gewalt," for the singer was evidently tired, as was evinced both by huskiness and flatting a little from pitch. It seems odd to read in a Hanslick review of 20 years ago, that the singer charmed by a quiet reserve rather than by a vehement presentation of lieder; nous avons changé tout cela; there is now less reserve and more passion. Nevertheless, the work of Mme. Joachim must command respect. Her dramatic conceptions are in themselves a study, and she has fought a good fight for art through all her days.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

HERALD, Chicago, Ill.
Date 3/24

D'ALBERT'S PIANO RECITALS.

Eugene D'Albert, who will give two piano recitals in Central Music Hall, one this evening, the other Saturday afternoon, is called the greatest pianistic talent after Liszt, and will probably make good his youthful promise, as predicted by Von Bulow, who said: "There are but three great pianists in the world, Rubinstein, myself and D'Albert, but the latter is yet young and bids fair to surpass us all." These recitals will carry the musical season, already rich in celebrities and great performers, to a superb climax. The programme for this evening is as follows:

"Prelude and Fugue in D Minor"....Bach-D'Albert
"Sonata, op. 53"..........................Beethoven
"Suite in D Minor, op. 91"......................Raff
"Impromptu, op. 90, No. 3"................Schubert
"Valse Impromptu," }
"Sonette di Petrarca," } ....Liszt
"Rhapsodie Espagnole." }

Boston Post
MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 28, 1892.

MOTTO:

With a Mission

—AND—

Without a Muzzle.

Symphony Concert.

The twentieth concert of the course presented Mme. Amalie Joachim, the famous German lieder songstress, and a programme consisting of Brahms's "Tragic Overture"; aria from Gluck's "Orpheus," and "Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien Tanz," from the same work; three songs for piano—Schubert's "Liebesbotschaft," "Schoene Wiege Meiner Leiden," by Schumann, and Schubert's "Erlkoenig"; Beethoven's eighth symphony in F major.

As an interpreter of German songs, Mme. Joachim has few equals. She possesses a voice of unusual power with which she can secure wonderfully softened tones that are infinitely more pleasing than those of greater power. Her high tones were always admirable, but the quality of the lower register is not as good. This was the first opportunity she has had to sing in a hall which did not restrain her power. Her rendering added new beauty to the familiar "Orpheus" aria, and her delicate shading was shown to decided advantage in the charming group of songs with Mr. Nikisch for accompanist.

The orchestral numbers were well chosen, clearly showing Mr. Nikisch's keen perception of the value of contrast. The overture was splendidly treated by the orchestra, but the charming first movement of the Orpheus number called forth great enthusiasm, the lion's share of which was due to M. Mole's beautiful flute solo.

Beethoven's brightly colored eighth symphony was a fitting close to a carefully chosen programme. As the course nears its close the audience is beginning to appreciate the fact that this year the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given the public a quantity of rarely good music.

Next Saturday evening will bring a trio of soloists and a programme with Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony, No. 3, in A minor; Mozart's concerto for flute and harp; Volkmann's serenade for string orchestra, in F major; and "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm" from "Die Walkuere."

The second of the Cambridge series of Kneisel Quartet concerts will occur in Brattle Hall, Wednesday evening, March 30, and April 17 is announced as the date of the third.

The first Henschel recital will be given at the Meionaon tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock. The programme has already been given in these columns.

VIVIAN.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 27, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

The programme of the twentieth Symphony rehearsal and concert was made up of the "Tragic" overture of Brahms, two numbers of the ballet music from Gluck's "Orpheus," Beethoven's eighth Symphony, and solos by Mme. Amalie Joachim. The distinguished singer's first number was the aria, "Che faro, from "Orpheus," which she gave in a broad and dignified manner. Her powerful voice easily filled the hall and although her tones were wanting at times in color and fulness, her artistic conception and treatment went far toward making the aria one of the enjoyable features of the concert. Her second number consisted of two songs by Schubert and one by Schumann. Schubert's "Liebesbotschaft" was sung with much grace and delicacy, and in Schumann's "Schioene Wiege meiner Leider," Mme. Joachim attained a large degree of expression. Her rendering of the "Erlkoenig" was less satisfactory, lacking as it did in strength and passion. Applause of the heartiest description followed both numbers and after the last named song Mme. Joachim was recalled several times. Mr. Nikisch played the accompaniments beautifully. The work of the orchestra was generally fine throughout. The Gluck ballet music proved the most popular of the orchestral numbers; and Mr. Mole's flute playing in the first of these was so marvelous a display of virtuosity that the applause did not cease till he had bowed his acknowledgments.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will give concerts of songs at the Meionaon on Tuesday evening and Thursday afternoon of this week. The series also includes concerts on the afternoons of April 5 and 9. The programme for next Tuesday afternoon includes songs of the old Italian and modern German schools, with examples of light opera and a group by Mr. Henschel which Mrs. Henschel will sing. Programmes and tickets at the Music Hall.

The Kneisel Quartet will give a concert in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, Wednesday evening. The quartet will be assisted by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch. The following concert in Cambridge by this superior organization will be given Tuesday evening, April 19.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 27, 1892.

HENSCHEL VOCAL RECITALS.

Warm Welcome Assured the Gifted Couple on Their Return to Boston.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, the distinguished singers, will return to Boston this week, after an absence of three years.

This gifted couple are so well known here that little need be said in praise of their splendid vocalism, which may well serve as a model for all concert singers.

The first of their series of four vocal recitals will be given at the Meionaon next Tuesday evening. The programme will be as follows:

Duet, Qual onda che rovina........Padre Martini
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Aria, Oh, Sleep, from Semele.
Aria, Qual farfaletta, from Partenope. } ....Handel
Mrs. Henschel.
Aria from Il Maestro di Musica..........Pergolesi
Aria buffa from Galandrino...........Cimarosa
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's song...........................Beethoven
Auf Flugeln des Gesanges..........Mendelssohn
In the Woods.................................Franz
Mrs. Henschel.
Der Doppelzanger.
Gruppe aus dem Tartarus. } ....Schubert
Der Schiffer.
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from the "Taming of the Shrew" ......Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Romacce ....
"Morgens als Lerche" } (new) ....Henschel
"Der Bote" ....
Mrs. Henschel.
The Czar's song, from "Czar and Carpenter"
Lortzing
Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philemon et Baucis"
Gounod
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village"
Boieldieu
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

The dates of the three matinees are Thursday, March 31; Thursday, April 5, and Saturday, April 9. Tickets can be secured at Music Hall.

TWENTIETH SYMPHONY.

Mme. Amalie Joachim Receives a Flattering Reception.

The twentieth Symphony concert was given at Music Hall yesterday evening. The interest of the occasion was centred in Mme. Amalie Joachim, who has already made many friends in Boston. As she moved along to the front of the stage amidst a most cordial welcome, her manner had all the easy grace of the hostess receiving her friends. The reception accorded her was genuine and was justified by her subsequent work.

At her initial performance in Union Hall she labored under the disadvantage of a contracted auditorium, but yesterday at the Music Hall the conditions were much more favorable to her voice, which is not only acceptable in tone but of very considerable volume. She selected an aria from Orpheus as her opening number, accompanied by full orchestra, which she s ng with admirable taste and skill. Her rich, round voice was fully equal to all demands made upon it.

In addition to the above she sang three songs, by Schubert. Liebesbotschaft and Erlkoenig, together with Schuman's "Schoene Wiege Meiner Leiden." She was accompanied on the piano by Mr. Nikisch with that grace and delicacy which has won so much praise for him.

Mme. Joachim was at her best in these songs, which she gave with extreme tenderness, and returned at the finish no less than three times to receive the flattering attention of the audience.

The instrumental portion of the rehearsal consisted of Brahm's "Tragic Overture," which met careful treatment at the hands of the orchestra, though we cannot help feeling the overture might be called an ode to melancholly.

The second number consisted of Gluck's "Reigen Seliger Geister and Furien Tanz," from "Orpheus." Symphony No. 8, in F major, Beethoven, was selected for the occasion, sometimes known as the little symphony. This cheery and refreshing music was charmingly played. The scherzo work

Its merry measures delighted the audience into applause at its termination, and it is fair to say the little symphony will not soon lose its place amongst the pleasant musical memories of these delightful concerts.

The next rehearsals and concert will be given April 1 and 2.

—The last Paderewski recital was a perfect crush, and emphasized the fact that, whatever chances, this wonderful performer will always be sure of the warmest kind of welcome in Boston. Tonight he plays for the last time this season in New York, and gives the whole proceeds of the recital to a local charity. Not to be outdone, Mr. Higginson is sending his orchestra over to play at the same concert as his share in the good work, and in return for the courtesy shown by Paderewski when he so kindly offered his services at the recent benefit of the orchestra. After the concert the whole band of performers—with Manager Ellis and his assistant, Mr. Comee—are to be given an elaborate supper at Sherry's by Paderewski as his farewell offering to the orchestra which has served him so well. He sails Tuesday.

—Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, who have been the recipients in New York all the week of much distinguished attention from society, were the centre of attraction at Mrs. ex-Secretary Whitney's musicale last Saturday afteroon, when Mrs. Nikisch sang with the Adamowski quartet. On Thursday night, when Paderewski played at Mrs. Whitney's, she gave a dinner for 24 previous to the entertainment.

—Mme. Lilian Nordica's Boston friends will be glad to hear that she has been enjoying a great social as well as an artistic triumph in Dublin. She was entertained at the Viceregal Louge, the Mansion House, and many private houses, and her departure from Westland Row railway station in a special saloon carriage, decorated with choice exotics and many huge bouquets, was quite a little ceremony. There were over 4000 people at the Leinster Hall when she sang there last Monday night.

—The Henschels, whose recitals this week are eagerly anticipated, have lost none of their excellence during their long term of absence, and, seemingly, no ground in public favor, to judge by their New York reception the other night. When they sing together the effect of their perfect vocal unity and of Mr. Henschel's admirable accompaniments is irresistible, and the charm of Mrs. Henschel's singing with her husband's aid at the piano is even greater, for it would be hard to find a vocalist that manages an agreeable soprano voice with more consummate and fascinating art. Mr. Henschel has no equal as a leider singer, which demands the perfect accord of feeling and facile execution on the part of the [illegible] musicianly skill and sen-

---

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, MARCH 28, 1892.

Mrs. Joachim Sings at the Symphony Concert.

A Digression Concerning "Intellectuality" in Song.

The twentieth Symphony concert was given Saturday evening in Music Hall. The programme was as follows:

Tragic Overture..Brahms
Aria from "Orpheus"......................................Gluck
Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien Tanz, from "Orpheus"..Gluck
Songs with Piano.
"Liebesbotschaft"......................................Schubert
"Schoene Wiege meiner Leiden"...............Schumann
"Erlkoenig"..Schubert
Symphony No. 8, in F Major.......................Beethoven

Mrs. Amalie Joachin was the singer.

The orchestral numbers are familiar, and they require no words of explanation or criticism. The work of the orchestra was excellent. Mr. Nikisch gave a sane and manly reading of the Beethoven symphony. It was free from the caprices, the mannerisms and the theatrical spirit that on former occasions have often disfigured the performance of the compositions of Beethoven as conducted by him. The ballet music from "Orpheus" was effective, and the effects were due to the fact that Mr. Nikisch was in sympathy with the old writer of operas. There was no attempt at modernization. The pure, almost severe, simplicity of Gluck was reverently preserved. The flute solo in the ballet music was played in a delightful manner. All in all, the concert was worthy of the high reputation of the orchestra.

⁂

Mrs. Joachim appears in certain respects to better advantage, as a singer, in Music Hall than in a room of small dimensions. For the full exhibition of the breadth of her style she needs space and freedom. Saturday evening she displayed passionate power and dramatic intelligence. But the same faults were seen in this concert and in her three recitals. There is no need, perhaps, of dwelling on them, but two are grievous and not to be excused. Her intonation is often false, and in her attack she frequently strikes under and slides up to the desired tone. Now, the Symphony concerts are supposed to serve an educational purpose. When a singer comes before a Symphony audience, the student should be able to profit by the hearing. When the student finds that vocal offences are quickly forgiven, she may well question the wisdom of her teacher, who finds fault with her for similar omissions and commissions.

⁂

It is true that the curiosity to hear famous singers of other lands is legitimate, even when they have passed the zenith of their glory. Applause is often justly given as a tribute paid the glorious past. The intelligence displayed by Mrs. Joachim is admirable, worthy of all praise. Even now there are excellent points in the mechanical means employed to convey this mental intelligence. There is a danger, however, in the unqualified acceptance of her art, and the danger is this: That students hearing her and knowing her reputation may be induced to regard the rudiments of the science of song as things of little moment, and to seek only the expression of emotions without providing themselves with the means of full expression. And there are many in these days who claim that the first thing required of a singer is intelligence. This intelligence is not vocal; it is vaguely described as "intellectuality." That is to say, a singer may have an unpleasant voice, he may sing habitually below or above the true pitch, he may show ignorance of important rudiments of the art of song; and he is promptly pardoned for his vocal ignorance or vocal inability, provided there is a rumor that he in some mysterious manner has caught the true spirit of the composer and will consent to serve as a medium between the composer and the hearer. When it is once announced that Mr. X or Mrs. Z sings with uncommon "intellectuality," the fortune of the singer is made for a season, and possibly for two seasons. There is a cult. Unfortunately for Mr. X or Mrs. Z, some one, whose "intellectuality" is said to be even more pronounced, raps at the stage door. The old shrine is hastily abandoned. For music is too often the sport of the constantly changing fashion.

⁂

PADEREWSKI AND NIKISCH.

Together They Played $4300 Into the Washington Arch Fund.

Special Dispatch to The Boston Journal.

NEW YORK, March 27. Paderewski gave a farewell concert this evening at the Metropolitan Opera House for the benefit of the Washington Arch fund. Fortunately for the financial and artistic outcome of the undertaking, he found three men who were willing to aid him. Mr. Steinway, who paid all the local expenses of the concert; Mr. Higginson, who contributed the services of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and paid the cost of their visit, and Mr. Nikisch, who conducted the concert. As a result, the Arch fund has been increased about $4300.

Everything except the weather and a rather large number of empty boxes conspired to make the affair one of extreme brilliancy. The visiting orchestra was in close sympathy with Mr. Paderewski, and he with it, and the music which was played went with a good deal of spirit, especially the pianist's own concerto, the exquisite slow movement and brilliant finale of which aroused so much enthusiasm that Mr. Paderewski repeated the last movement. The repetition was a well-earned and neatly paid compliment to Mr. Nikisch and his men, with whom the pianist seemed extremely desirous to share the honors of the evening.

The concert was made a gala occasion for the concert goers; it wound up with speech-making.

PRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 3-26

At the concert in aid of the Washington Arch Fund at the Metropolitan Opera House to-morrow evening the following programme will be given by M. Paderewski and the Boston Symphony Orchestra: Overture, "Tannhaeuser," ~~Richard Wagner~~; concerto, A minor, Schumann; overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz; concerto, Paderewski; Le rouet d'Omphale, Saint Saens; Hungarian fantasie, Liszt.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING MAR. 28, 1892.

Saturday's Symphony Concert—Mme. Joachim, the Soloist, Appeared to Good Advantage—Her Dramatic Conceptions a Study in Themselves—Close of the Grand Opera Season.

Brahms' "Tragic Overture" began the programme. This work is not intended to represent any special plot, only presenting a strongly dramatic or tragic element as justification for its title. It opens with two ponderous chords, exactly as Beethoven's "Heroic Symphony" does, and it might as readily deserve the adjective "heroic" as that of "tragic." The chief defect of the work is its lack of contrast; it is almost constantly sombre or agitated. It was played with great spirit and unanimity, although the violins pushed their fury to the verge of harshness, and there was little intermediate shading between the extremely soft and the extremely loud passages.

Gluck's ballet music gained immensely by being performed in Music Hall; in Mechanics' Hall, last week, the opera of "Orpheus" seemed entirely out of place, the delicate touches were lost, and the simplicity could not charm. In this performance everything was restored to its proper balance and perspective. The flute solo (or obbligato) in the picture of the blest spirits, was finely performed by Mr. Molé, and the entire picture was given with commendable conservatism, only the 19th century ghosts would be apt to find such saccharine enjoyments as are here portrayed a trifle cloying. A few blurs towards the close of the "Dance of the Furies" may readily be condoned in view of the lack of exaggeration, which made the work a very acceptable representation of the beginning of dramatic music. In the performance of the eighth symphony by Beethoven, however, the first violins ruled the roost in their usual forcible manner, and the development of the first movement was so tumultuous that it might have pictured battle rather than a mere outburst of animal spirits. The whole symphony is the playful Beethoven, but this composer had rather a brusque humor, and his sport took him into the domains of the grotesque, rather than into the piquant and dainty as was the case with Mendelssohn. The bassoon was Beethoven's favorite instrument; that is, he generally used it when he was in a thoroughly good humor; and as he was in the best of spirits in the writing of this work (it might be called "the humorous symphony") we find plenty of comical bassoon work in its measures. All through the symphony the instrument was well played, and in the finale its odd octave figure with the kettle drum was charming. Next to the bassoon the contrabasses came into prominence and they were magnificently played. In fact, whenever these ponderous instruments have anything like obbligato phrases they give them in a most artistic manner; they are one of the most perfect departments of our orchestra. Yet I could have wished for more force in that exquisitely grotesque presentation of the chief figure in the finale. The chattering theme has become sweeter and sweeter, and finally is given to flutes and violins when, just as one is lulled into tranquillity,—presto! there is a leap from the garret into the cellar of the orchestra, and the contrabasses ferociously mock the sweeter instruments! It is all a practical joke, but it cannot have too much emphasis. One does not often have to call our conductor to account for lack of emphasis, and the symphony was in the main well done.

Madame Joachim was the soloist. She has never appeared to such good advantage since she has been in Boston. The large hall suited to her heavy voice far better than any smaller concert-room could possibly do, and if there was a slight flatting from pitch occasionally, it was far less perceptible than heretofore, and her undeniable wealth of dramatic expression was employed in the best possible way. "Che faro senza Euridice" was sung with great earnestness, although in the final appearance of the theme of this vocal rondo the singer took the tempo at a very rapid pace and the orchestra was often left far behind, for the conductor seemed not in accord with the artist's view.

I could not entirely agree with the overwhelming enthusiasm with which the public greeted the performance of the "Erl King," for there were unnecessary caprices of tempo, and of accompaniment too. The erl-king's "Willst feiner Knabe, du mit mir geh'n" was far quicker than Kreissmann or Schott used to take it, and the climax, "So brauch ich Gewalt," showed but little "Gewalt," for the singer was evidently tired, as was evinced both by huskiness and flatting a little from pitch. It seems odd to read in a Hanslick review of 20 years ago, that the singer charmed by a quiet reserve rather than by a vehement presentation of lieder; nous avons changé tout cela; there is now less reserve and more passion. Nevertheless, the work of Mme. Joachim must command respect. Her dramatic conceptions are in themselves a study, and she has fought a good fight for art through all her days.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[illegible] Chicago, Ill.

Date 3/24

D'ALBERT'S PIANO RECITALS.

Eugene D'Albert, who will give two piano recitals in Central Music Hall, one this evening, the other Saturday afternoon, is called the greatest pianistic talent after Liszt, and will probably make good his youthful promise, as predicted by Von Bulow, who said: "There are but three great pianists in the world, Rubinstein, myself and D'Albert, but the latter is yet young and bids fair to surpass us all." These recitals will carry the musical season, already rich in celebrities and great performers, to a superb climax. The programme for this evening is as follows:

"Prelude and Fugue in D Minor"....Bach-D'Albert
"Sonata, op. 53"................................Beethoven
"Suite in D Minor, op. 91"......................Raff
"Impromptu, op. 90, No. 3"................Schubert
"Valse Impromptu."
"Sonette di Petrarca," } ....Liszt
"Rhapsodie Espagnole."

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 28, 1892.

MOTTO:

With a Mission

—AND—

Without a Muzzle.

Symphony Concert.

The twentieth concert of the course presented Mme. Amalie Joachim, the famous German lieder songstress, and a programme consisting of Brahms's "Tragic Overture"; aria from Gluck's "Orpheus," and "Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien Tanz," from the same work; three songs for piano—Schubert's "Liebesbotschaft," "Schoene Wiege Meiner Leiden," by Schumann, and Schubert's "Erlkoenig"; Beethoven's eighth symphony in F major.

As an interpreter of German songs, Mme. Joachim has few equals. She possesses a voice of unusual power with which she can secure wonderfully softened tones that are infinitely more pleasing than those of greater power. Her high tones were always admirable, but the quality of the lower register is not as good. This was the first opportunity she has had to sing in a hall which did not restrain her power. Her rendering added new beauty to the familiar "Orpheus" aria, and her delicate shading was shown to decided advantage in the charming group of songs with Mr. Nikisch for accompanist.

The orchestral numbers were well chosen, clearly showing Mr. Nikisch's keen perception of the value of contrast. The overture was splendidly treated by the orchestra, but the charming first movement of the Orpheus number called forth great enthusiasm, the lion's share of which was due to M. Mole's beautiful flute solo.

Beethoven's brightly colored eighth symphony was a fitting close to a carefully chosen programme. As the course nears its close the audience is beginning to appreciate the fact that this year the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given the public a quantity of rarely good music.

Next Saturday evening will bring a trio of soloists and a programme with Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony, No. 3, in A minor; Mozart's concerto for flute and harp; Volkmann's serenade for string orchestra, in F major; and "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm" from "Die Walkuere."

Music Notices.

The second of the Cambridge series of Kneisel Quartet concerts will occur in Brattle Hall, Wednesday evening, March 30, and April 17 is announced as the date of the third.

The first Henschel recital will be given at the Meionaon tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock. The programme has already been given in these columns.

VIVIAN.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 27, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

The programme of the twentieth Symphony rehearsal and concert was made up of the "Tragic" overture of Brahms, two numbers of the ballet music from Gluck's "Orpheus," Beethoven's eighth Symphony, and solos by Mme. Amalie Joachim. The distinguished singer's first number was the aria, "Che faro, from "Orpheus," which she gave in a broad and dignified manner. Her powerful voice easily filled the hall and although her tones were wanting at times in color and fulness, her artistic conception and treatment went far toward making the aria one of the enjoyable features of the concert. Her second number consisted of two songs by Schubert and one by Schumann. Schubert's "Liebesbotschaft" was sung with much grace and delicacy, and in Schumann's "Schioene Wiege meiner Leider," Mme. Joachim attained a large degree of expression. Her rendering of the "Erlkoenig" was less satisfactory, lacking as it did in strength and passion. Applause of the heartiest description followed both numbers and after the last named song Mme. Joachim was recalled several times. Mr. Nikisch played the accompaniments beautifully. The work of the orchestra was generally fine throughout. The Gluck ballet music proved the most popular of the orchestral numbers; and Mr. Mole's flute playing in the first of these was so marvelous a display of virtuosity that the applause did not cease till he had bowed his acknowledgments.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will give concerts of songs at the Meionaon on Tuesday evening and Thursday afternoon of this week. The series also includes concerts on the afternoons of April 5 and 9. The programme for next Tuesday afternoon includes songs of the old Italian and modern German schools, with examples of light opera and a group by Mr. Henschel which Mrs. Henschel will sing. Programmes and tickets at the Music Hall.

The Kneisel Quartet will give a concert in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, Wednesday evening. The quartet will be assisted by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch. The following concert in Cambridge by this superior organization will be given Tuesday evening, April 19.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

Sunday Evening, March 27th, 1892,
AT 8.15 O'CLOCK.

FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE WASHINGTON ARCH FUND.

LAST APPEARANCE OF

PADEREWSKI,

(Leaving for Europe on March 29th, 1892,)

AND THE ENTIRE

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

GENEROUSLY OFFERED TO MR. PADEREWSKI FOR THIS OCCASION BY COL. HIGGINSON.

ARTHUR NIKISCH, ... Conductor.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE—Tannhäuser, ... RICHARD WAGNER
ORCHESTRA.

CONCERTO in A minor, ... ROBERT SCHUMANN
Allegro affettuoso. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso. Allegro Vivace.
PADEREWSKI.

OVERTURE—Benvenuto Cellini, ... HECTOR BERLIOZ
ORCHESTRA.

CONCERTO—Op. 17, ... PADEREWSKI
Allegro. Romanza. Allegro molto vivace.
PADEREWSKI.

POÈME SYMPHONIQUE—Le Rouet d'Omphale, ... CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS
ORCHESTRA.

HUNGARIAN FANTASIA, ... FRANZ LISZT
PADEREWSKI.

STEINWAY & SONS' PIANO USED AT THIS CONCERT.

BRATTLE HALL, CAMBRIDGE.

1892

WEDNESDAY EVENING, MARCH 30, AT 8.

SECOND CONCERT.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET,

ASSISTED BY

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

Programme.

CARL von DITTERSDORF. (1739-1799.)	QUARTET in E flat major. ALLEGRO.—ANDANTE.—MENUETTO NON TROPPO.—FINALE, ALLEGRO.
	SONGS with Piano.
De KOVEN.	INDIAN LOVE SONG.
BUNGERT.	VOLKSLIED.
RICHARD STRAUSS.	SERENADE.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	ANDANTE from Quartet in D major.
	SONGS with Piano.
SCHUMANN.	NUSSBAUM.
BRAHMS.	STÄNDCHEN.
HEUBERGER.	EIN BETTLERPÄRCHEN.
BEETHOVEN.	QUARTET in G major, op. 18. ALLEGRO ADAGIO CANTABILE.—SCHERZO (ALLEGRO).—ALLEGRO MOLTO, QUASI (PRESTO).

The Piano used is a Steinway.

Tickets now on sale at the University Bookstore.
Last Concert, Tuesday Evening, April 19.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.
FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.

WM. M. THOMS, Editor.

☞ The first and most important object the journalis should have in mind is to criticise productive and reproductive art with such discriminating care and honesty of purpose as to offer a safe guide to popular judgment rather than act as its echo, thus creating a demand for higher culture in artists.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 26, 1892.

Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel's Song Recitals.

The Henschels could not have doubted the warmth and sincerity of their welcome from the large and appreciative audience that assembled at Chickering Hall last Saturday afternoon upon the occasion of their first Song Recital. It is not often that one can enjoy such unalloyed musical pleasure as that afforded by two such thoroughly competent and congenial artists in their song recitals. Everything tends to promote a happy state of mind, both Mr. and Mrs. Henschel are musicians from the highest standpoint and while neither are gifted with exceptionally good voices, they show that musicianship and refined tastes united to the highest artistic cultivation, will elevate one higher in many cases than the mere endowment with superior natural voice. The Henschels are a good illustration of a great writer's definition of genius. "An infinite capacity for taking pains." A few years ago Mrs. Henschel had a rather pretty voice of sympathetic quality. At present her voice, largely increased in volume and greatly improved in every way, can give more pleasure to an audience than nine-tenths of the great singers of the day, and this is entirely due to the fact that every song she sings is a gem polished, refined and as perfect as the most critical and exacting taste could desire. The listener does not hear only the now lovely voice, but the magnetism of the singer makes him enter into the spirit of the song with the same rare sensitiveness and spirit that she does,

Mr. Henschel is as satisfactory as ever, and as he sits at the piano playing the most delightful of accompaniments and singing with his ringing baritone voice and in his inimitable and heartfelt style that is all soul and magnetism, one comes to the conclusion that all singers ought to play their own accompaniments, and that after all no voice is equal to that of a baritone. Then pretty little Mrs. Henschel comes tripping on in the most chic of costumes, gallantly escorted by her handsome husband, and upsets all previous conclusions and reducing her happy hearers to a point where they cannot tell which they most admire of the two. Mr. Henschel always plays the accompaniments, however, whether it be for his wife or himself, and they are models of perfection.

Their programme was long and varied and the text of their songs was given in full, another source of satisfaction to the audience. Among the most charming of Mrs. Henschel's members were "The Little Red Lark," by Stanford, a beautiful Irish song which she gave with great sweetness, A Romance, "Malgré l'eclat," by Mr. Henschel, and the Recitative and Aria from Handel's Alessandro. Mr. Henschel's best numbers were the Song of the Harem-Keeper from Mozart's "Il Seraglio," Schubert's "Die Krahe" and "Der Leiermann," the last being sung with exquisite sentiment, and the air from Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore." Mr. and Mrs. Henschel also gave some duets, the best being that from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew."

* * *

PADEREWSKI will play for the benefit of the Washington Memorial Arch on Sunday evening at the Metropolitan Opera House with the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Nikisch. Paderewski will play the Schumann and his own concerto. Paderewski sails for Paris on Tuesday next, and will return to New York in November.

EUGEN D'ALBERT will give three recitals of piano music at the Madison Square Garden concert hall on the afternoons of April 5, 7 and 9 prox. The first of his programs is devoted to Beethoven, its numbers being (1) Variations in C-minor; (2) Sonata in C-major, Op. 53; (3) Sonata in E-minor, Op. 90; (4) Sonata in E-major, Op. 109; (5) Sonata in A-flat major, Op. 110. Program No. 2 draws upon Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Tausig and Liszt, and Program No. 3 upon Bach, Mozart, Br.hms, Chopin, Rubinstein and Liszt.

MONDAY, MARCH [illegible]

Symphony Orchestra.

The twentieth concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall was given on Saturday night in accordance with this programme—

Brahms: Tragic Overture.
Gluck: Selections from "Orpheus," air "Che faro senza Eurydice;" Dance of Spirits; Dance of Furies.
Songs with pianoforte—
 Schubert: Liebesbotschaft.
 Schumann: Schöne Wiege meiner Leiden.
 Schubert: Die Erlkönig.
Beethoven: Symphony, No. 8, in F major.
 Mme. Amalie Joachim was the singer.

This was a noble programme, well balanced between old and new schools, but fresh throughout; short, but satisfactory; familiar, but not commonplace. The overture quickly commands attention by the virility that is early manifested, and holds it by the clearness that is an all-pervading quality. Mr. Nikisch treated it with sympathetic earnestness, making its more forceful moments tell with convincing power, and producing all the effect of contrast possible in the less gloomy passages. The ballet movements from "Orpheus," simple in form and modest in treatment, compared with modern manners in music, were played in a style that testified strongly to the conductor's purpose to give the composer as he is, and not as the conductor will have him. It was a satisfaction to see that the audience recognized and admired this purpose, though, of course, a good part of the applause that followed the performance was an expression of admiration for the very simplicity and comparative modesty of the compositions. Mr. Molé's flute solo in the first of these movements was deliciously played. The symphony went off with the heartiness and breezy out-door feeling that characterizes the work, for even the minuet sounds as though danced on the sward in the sunlight by gentle countryfolk, and not on a polished floor, beneath myriads of candles, by wigged and painted lords and ladies. There are many touches of humor in this symphony—the frequent assignment of figures to the bassoon, the unexpected changes of key, the sudden forte bursts after a piano passage, or actual silence.

Mme. Joachim's singing had much that was of distinct and peculiar interest. Her superb physical strength enabled her to sing the song of lament for Eurydice as if it were really a man that was mourning a lost wife, though without coarseness of effect, be it understood. The interpolation of a tone to give the feeling of a return to the original key after the modulation to the dominant was not pleasing, however. Let this sort of thing remain with our friends the minstrels. Her variations in time also were distracting and apparently mystified. Mme. Joachim's singing of the first Schubert song was an apt illustration that the strongest lungs can best sing pianissimo, provided, of course, the apparatus has been properly trained, and is directed by intelligence; as the biggest trip-hammer can be made to strike the gentlest blow; or as the most powerful locomotive will draw a train at a slow pace with the greatest steadiness, and least exhaustion of material. Schumann's song was aptly sung, and the audience was well satisfied with "The Erl King," though here and there the singer again disturbed some ears by her changes in time. Still, her strong dramatic style was exhibited in lights that fully justified the demonstration of favor on the part of the hearers.

The programme for this week's public rehearsal and concert, includes Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony," Mozart's concerto for flute and harp, Volkmann's serenade in F major for string orchestra, and Wotan's farewell and the fire chorus from "Die Walküre."

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will give concerts of songs at the Meionaon tomorrow night and Thursday. The series also includes concerts on the afternoons of April 5 and 9. The programme for tomorrow night includes songs of old Italian and modern German schools, examples of light opera and a group by Mr. Henschel, which Mrs. Henschel will sing. Programmes and tickets at the Music Hall.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

Sunday Evening, March 27th, 1892,

AT 8.15 O'CLOCK.

FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE WASHINGTON ARCH FUND.

LAST APPEARANCE OF

PADEREWSKI,

(Leaving for Europe on March 29th, 1892,)

AND THE ENTIRE

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

GENEROUSLY OFFERED TO MR. PADEREWSKI FOR THIS OCCASION BY COL. HIGGINSON.

ARTHUR NIKISCH, ... Conductor.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE—Tannhäuser,……………… RICHARD WAGNER

ORCHESTRA.

CONCERTO in A minor,……………… ROBERT SCHUMANN

Allegro affettuoso. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso. Allegro Vivace.

PADEREWSKI.

OVERTURE—Benvenuto Cellini,……………… HECTOR BERLIOZ

ORCHESTRA.

CONCERTO—Op. 17,……………… PADEREWSKI

Allegro. Romanza. Allegro molto vivace.

PADEREWSKI.

POËME SYMPHONIQUE—Le Rouet d'Omphale………… CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS

ORCHESTRA.

HUNGARIAN FANTASIA,……………… FRANZ LISZT

PADEREWSKI.

STEINWAY & SONS' PIANO USED AT THIS CONCERT.

BRATTLE HALL, CAMBRIDGE.

1892

WEDNESDAY EVENING, MARCH 30, AT 8.

SECOND CONCERT.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET,

ASSISTED BY

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

Programme.

CARL von DITTERSDORF. (1739-1799)	QUARTET in E flat major. ALLEGRO.—ANDANTE.—MENUETTO NON TROPPO.—FINALE, ALLEGRO.
	SONGS with Piano.
De KOVEN.	INDIAN LOVE SONG.
BUNGERT.	VOLKSLIED.
RICHARD STRAUSS.	SERENADE.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	ANDANTE from Quartet in D major.
	SONGS with Piano.
SCHUMANN.	NUSSBAUM.
BRAHMS.	STANDCHEN.
HEUBERGER.	EIN BETTLERPARCHEN.
BEETHOVEN.	QUARTET in G major, op. 18 ALLEGRO ADAGIO CANTABILE.—SCHERZO (ALLEGRO).—ALLEGRO MOLTO, QUASI (PRESTO).

The Piano used is a Steinway.

Tickets now on sale at the University Bookstore.
Last Concert, Tuesday Evening, April 19.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.

WM. M. THOMS, Editor.

☞ The first and most important object the journalis should have in mind is to criticise productive and reproductive art with such discriminating care and honesty of purpose as to offer a safe guide to popular judgment rather than act as its echo, thus creating a demand for higher culture in artists.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 26, 1892.

Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel's Song Recitals.

The Henschels could not have doubted the warmth and sincerity of their welcome from the large and appreciative audience that assembled at Chickering Hall last Saturday afternoon upon the occasion of their first Song Recital. It is not otten that one can enjoy such unalloyed musical pleasure as that afforded by two such thoroughly competent and congenial artists in their song recitals. Everything tends to promote a happy state of mind, both Mr. and Mrs. Henschel are musicians from the highest standpoint and while neither are gifted with exceptionally good voices, they show that musicianship and refined tastes united to the highest artistic cultivation, will elevate one higher in many cases than the mere endowment with superior natural voice. The Henschels are a good illustration of a great writer's definition of genius. "An infinite capacity for taking pains." A few years ago Mrs. Henschel had a rather pretty voice of sympathetic quality. At present her voice, largely increased in volume and greatly improved in every way, can give more pleasure to an audience than nine-tenths of the great singers of the day, and this is entirely due to the fact that every song she sings is a gem polished, refined and as perfect as the most critical and exacting taste could desire. The listener does not hear only the now lovely voice, but the magnetism of the singer makes him enter into the spirit of the song with the same rare sensitiveness and spirit that she does,

Mr. Henschel is as satisfactory as ever, and as he sits at the piano playing the most delightful of accompaniments and singing with his ringing baritone voice and in his inimitable and heartfelt style that is all soul and magnetism, one comes to the conclusion that all singers ought to play their own accompaniments, and that after all no voice is equal to that of a baritone. Then pretty little Mrs. Henschel comes tripping on in the most chic of costumes, gallantly escorted by her handsome husband, and upsets all previous conclusions and reducing her happy hearers to a point where they cannot tell which they most admire of the two. Mr. Henschel always plays the accompaniments, however, whether it be for his wife or himself, and they are models of perfection.

Their programme was long and varied and the text of their songs was given in full, another source of satisfaction to the audience. Among the most charming of Mrs. Henschel's members were "The Little Red Lark," by Stanford, a beautiful Irish song which she gave with great sweetness, A Romance, "Malgré l'eclat," by Mr. Henschel, and the Recitative and Aria from Handel's Alessandro. Mr. Henschel's best numbers were the Song of the Harem-Keeper from Mozart's "Il Seraglio," Schubert's "Die Krahe" and "Der Leiermann," the last being sung with exquisite sentiment, and the air from Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore." Mr. and Mrs. Henschel also gave some duets, the best being that from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew."

◆

PADEREWSKI will play for the benefit of the Washington Memorial Arch on Sunday evening at the Metropolitan Opera House with the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Nikisch. Paderewski will play the Schumann and his own concerto. Paderewski sails for Paris on Tuesday next, and will return to New York in November.

EUGEN D'ALBERT will give three recitals of piano music at the Madison Square Garden concert hall on the afternoons of April 5, 7 and 9 prox. The first of his programs is devoted to Beethoven, its numbers being (1) Variations in C-minor; (2) Sonata in C-major, Op. 53; (3) Sonata in E-minor, Op. 90; (4) Sonata in E-major, Op. 109; (5) Sonata in A-flat major, Op. 110. Program No. 2 draws upon Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Tausig and Liszt, and Program No. 3 upon Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubinstein and Liszt.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 28, 1892.

Symphony Orchestra.

The twentieth concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall was given on Saturday night in accordance with this programme—

Brahms: Tragic Overture.
Gluck: Selections from "Orpheus," air "Che faro senza Eurydice;" Dance of Spirts; Dance of Furies.
Songs with pianoforte—
  Schubert: Liebesbotschaft.
  Schumann: Schöne Wiege meiner Leiden.
  Schubert: Die Erlkönig.
Beethoven: Symphony, No. 8, in F major.
  Mme. Amalie Joachim was the singer.

This was a noble programme, well balanced between old and new schools, but fresh throughout; short, but satisfactory; familiar, but not commonplace. The overture quickly commands attention by the virility that is early manifested, and holds it by the clearness that is an all-pervading quality. Mr. Nikisch treated it with sympathetic earnestness, making its more forceful moments tell with convincing power, and producing all the effect of contrast possible in the less gloomy passages. The ballet movements from "Orpheus," simple in form and modest in treatment, compared with modern manners in music, were played in a style that testified strongly to the conductor's purpose to give the composer as he is, and not as the conductor will have him. It was a satisfaction to see that the audience recognized and admired this purpose, though, of course, a good part of the applause that followed the performance was an expression of admiration for the very simplicity and comparative modesty of the compositions. Mr. Molé's flute solo in the first of these movements was deliciously played. The symphony went off with the heartiness and breezy out-door feeling that characterizes the work, for even the minuet sounds as though danced on the sward in the sunlight by gentle countryfolk, and not on a polished floor, beneath myriads of candles, by wigged and painted lords and ladies. There are many touches of humor in this symphony—the frequent assignment of figures to the bassoon, the unexpected changes of key, the sudden forte bursts after a piano passage, or actual silence.

Mme. Joachim's singing had much that was of distinct and peculiar interest. Her superb physical strength enabled her to sing the song of lament for Eurydice as if it were really a man that was mourning a lost wife, though without coarseness of effect, be it understood. The interpolation of a tone to give the feeling of a return to the original key after the modulation to the dominant was not pleasing, however. Let this sort of thing remain with our friends the minstrels. Her variations in time also were distracting and apparently mystified. Mme. Joachim's singing of the first Schubert song was an apt illustration that the strongest lungs can best sing pianissimo, provided, of course, the apparatus has been properly trained, and is directed by intelligence; as the biggest trip-hammer can be made to strike the gentlest blow; or as the most powerful locomotive will draw a train at a slow pace with the greatest steadiness, and least exhaustion of material. Schumann's song was aptly sung, and the audience was well satisfied with "The Erl King," though here and there the singer again disturbed some ears by her changes in time. Still, her strong dramatic style was exhibited in lights that fully justified the demonstration of favor on the part of the hearers.

The programme for this week's public rehearsal and concert, includes Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony," Mozart's concerto for flute and harp, Volkmann's serenade in F major for string orchestra, and Wotan's farewell and the fire chorus from "Die Walküre."

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will give concerts of songs at the Meionaon tomorrow night and Thursday. The series also includes concerts on the afternoons of April 5 and 9. The programme for tomorrow night includes songs of old Italian and modern German schools, examples of light opera and a group by Mr. Henschel, which Mrs. Henschel will sing. Programmes and tickets at the Music Hall.

CENTRAL MUSIC HALL

THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 24
SATURDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 26

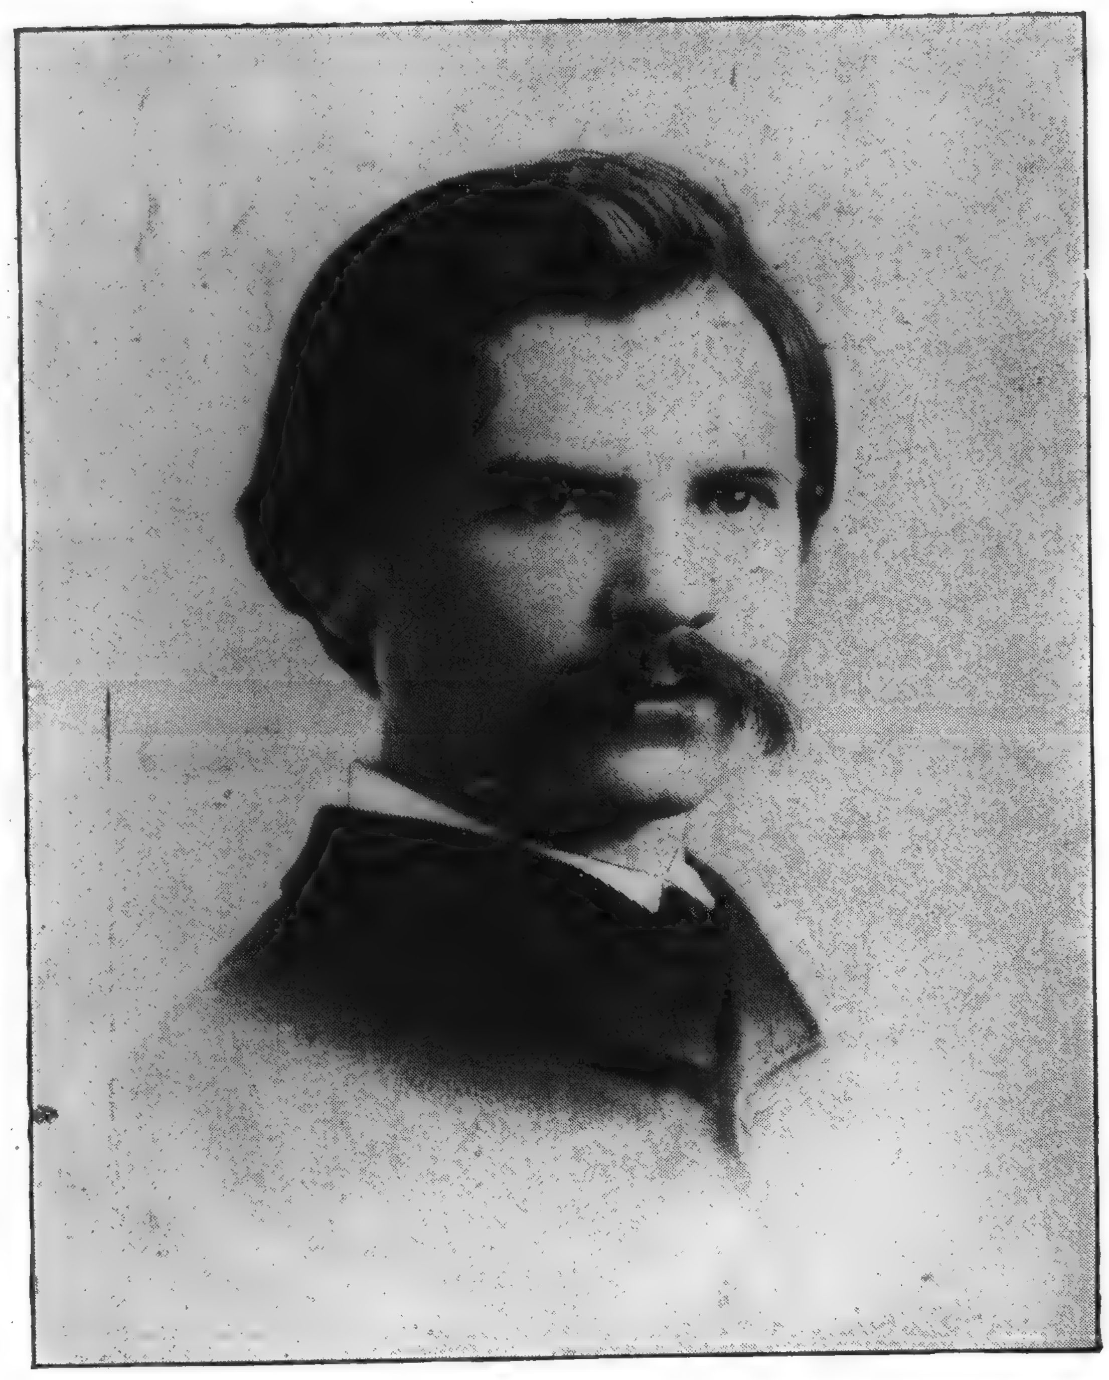
EVENING AT 8.15. AFTERNOON AT 2.30.

~ TWO PIANO RECITALS ~

....BY....

EUGEN D'ALBERT

UNDER THE DIRECTION OF THE
STAR LECTURE COURSE
F. WIGHT NEUMANN
MANAGER



EUGEN D'ALBERT.
Born 1864.

UNDER THE DIRECTION OF THE STAR LECTURE COURSE
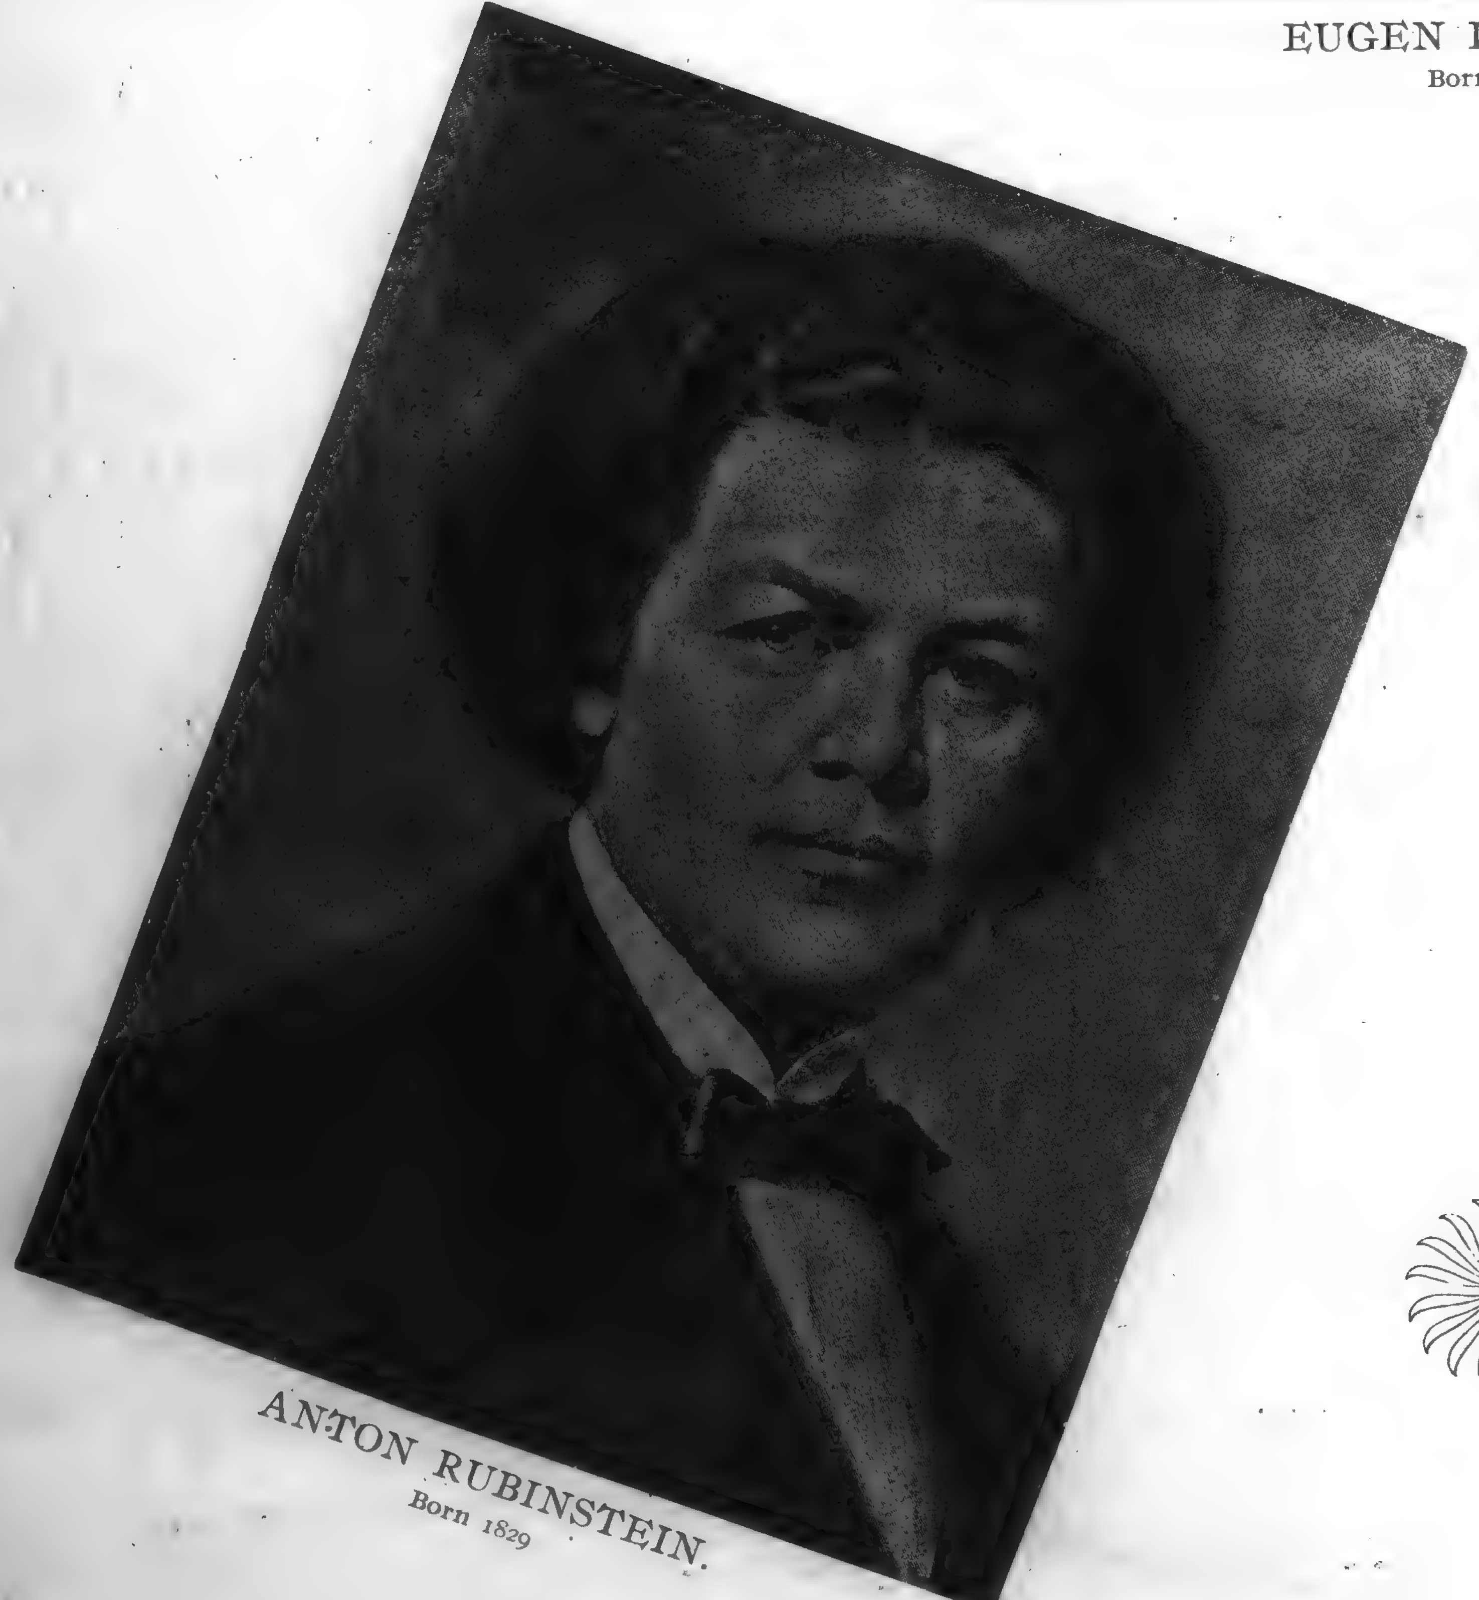
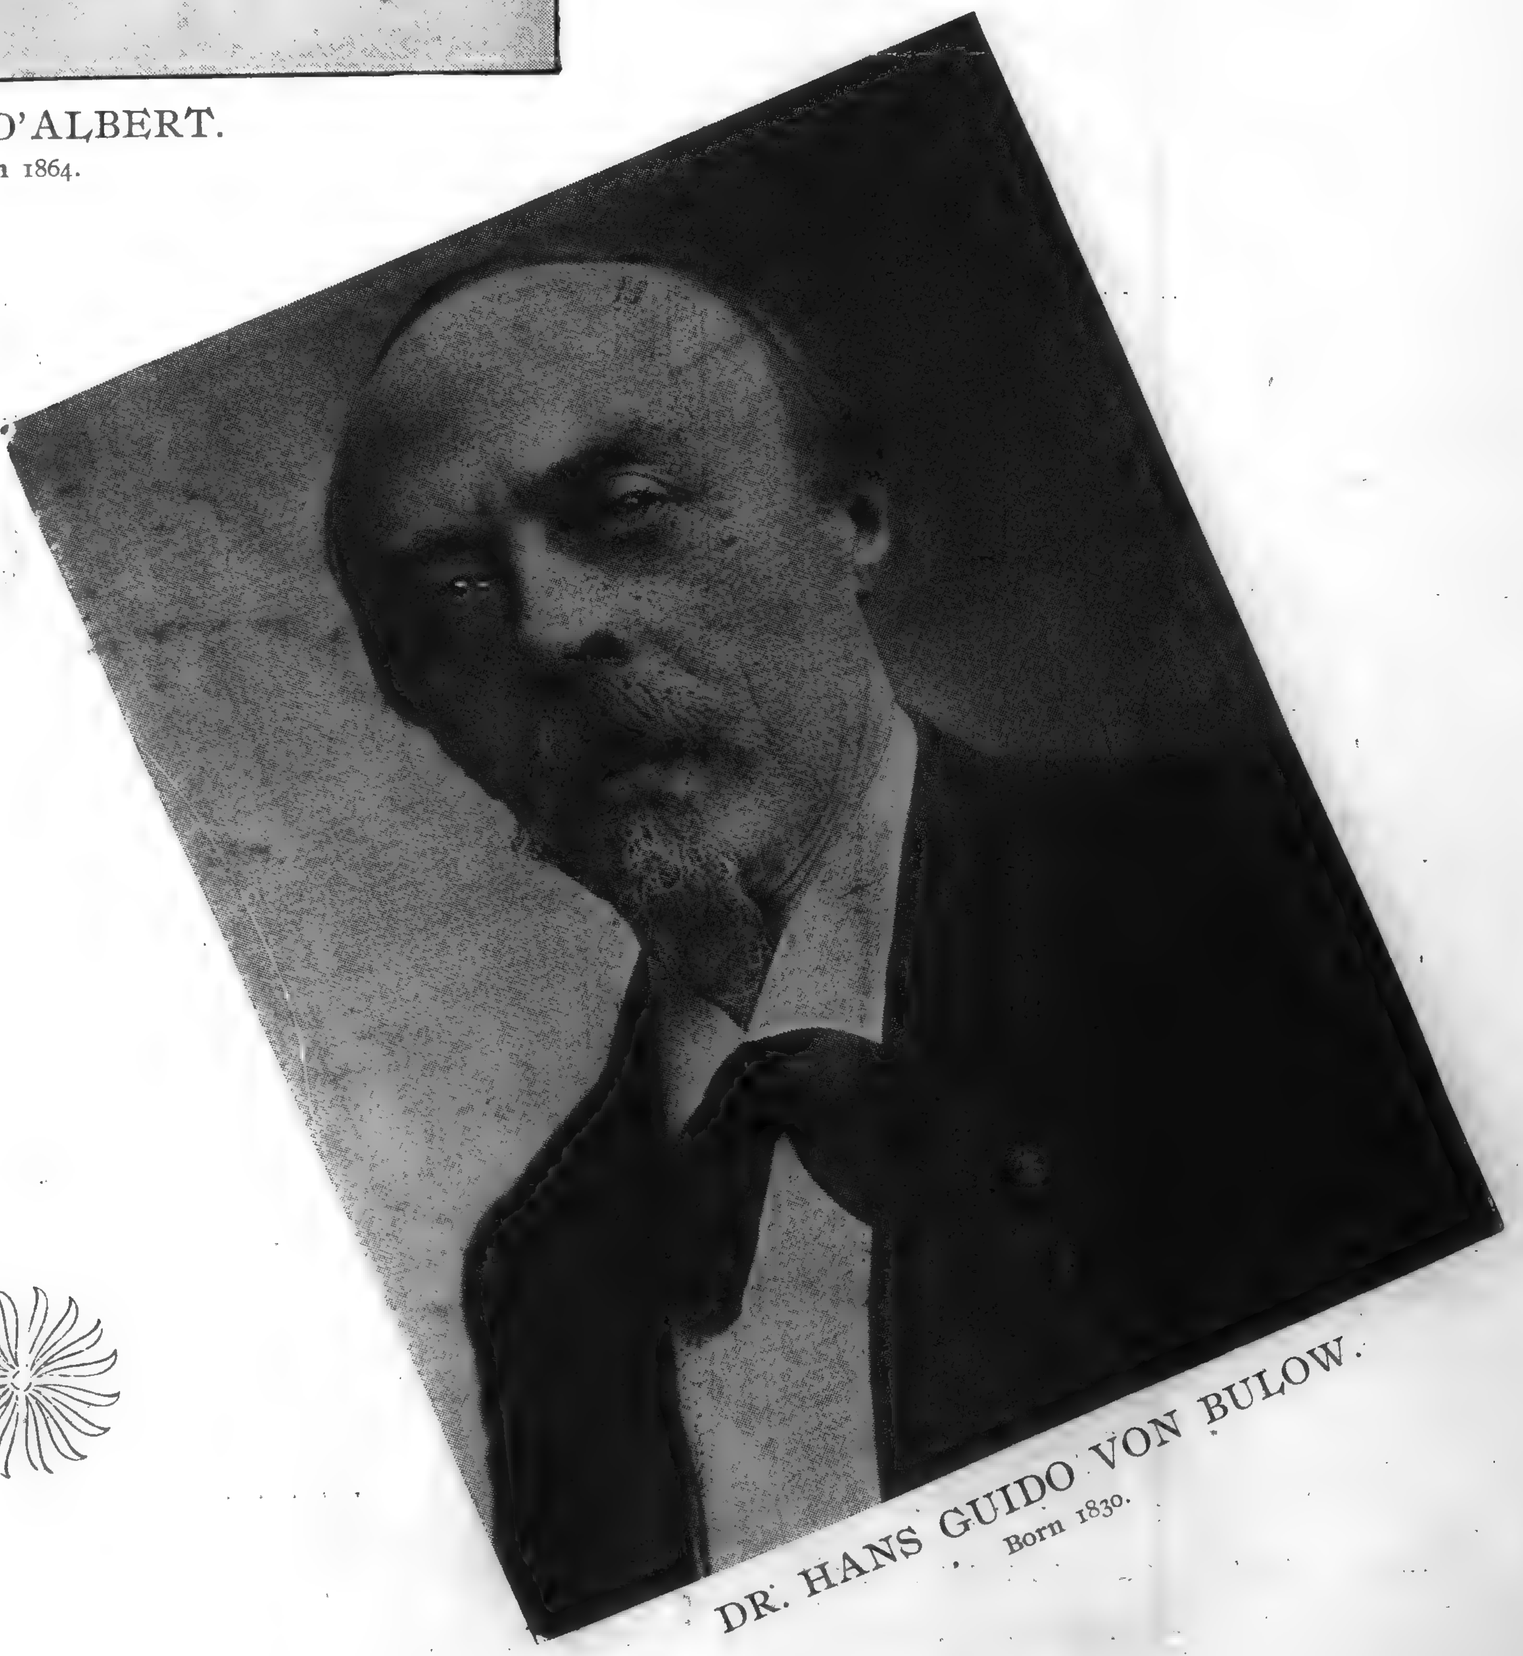
F. WIGHT NEUMANN
MANAGER



ANTON RUBINSTEIN.
Born 1829



DR. HANS GUIDO VON BULOW.
Born 1830.

THE THREE GREATEST LIVING PIANISTS

THE REHM, PIETSCH & WILSON CO., PRINTERS, 117-119 LAKE ST.

CENTRAL MUSIC HALL

THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 24
SATURDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 26

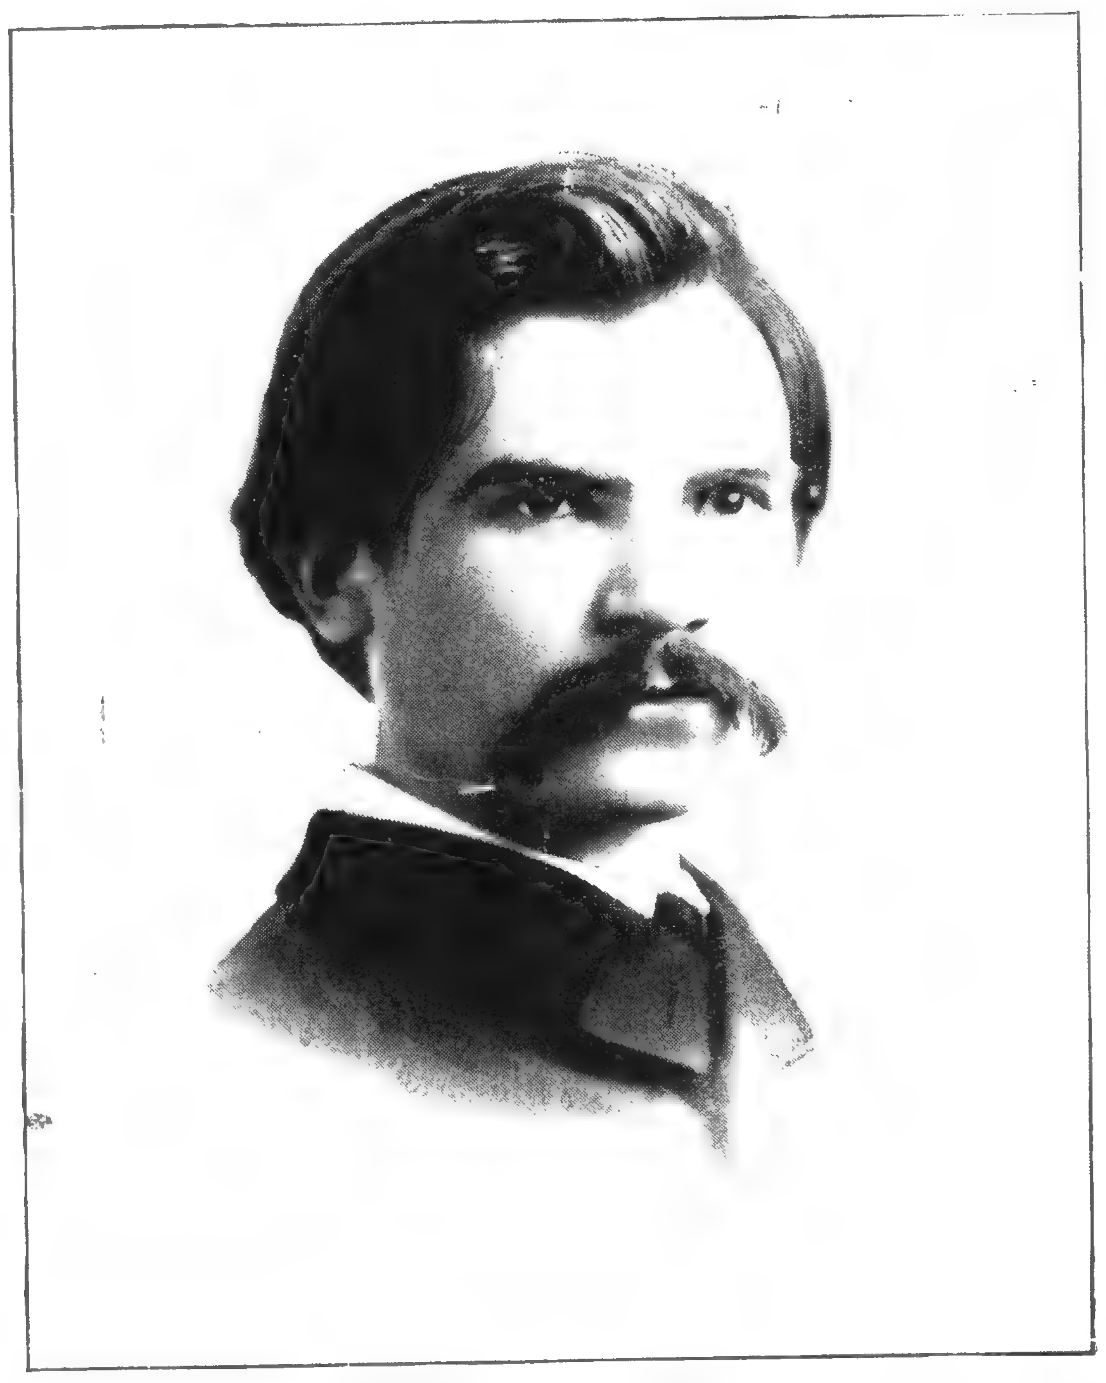
EVENING AT 8.15. AFTERNOON AT 2.30.

TWO PIANO RECITALS

....BY....

EUGEN D'ALBERT

UNDER THE DIRECTION OF THE
STAR LECTURE COURSE
F. WIGHT NEUMANN
MANAGER



EUGEN D'ALBERT.
Born 1864.

UNDER THE DIRECTION OF THE STAR LECTURE COURSE
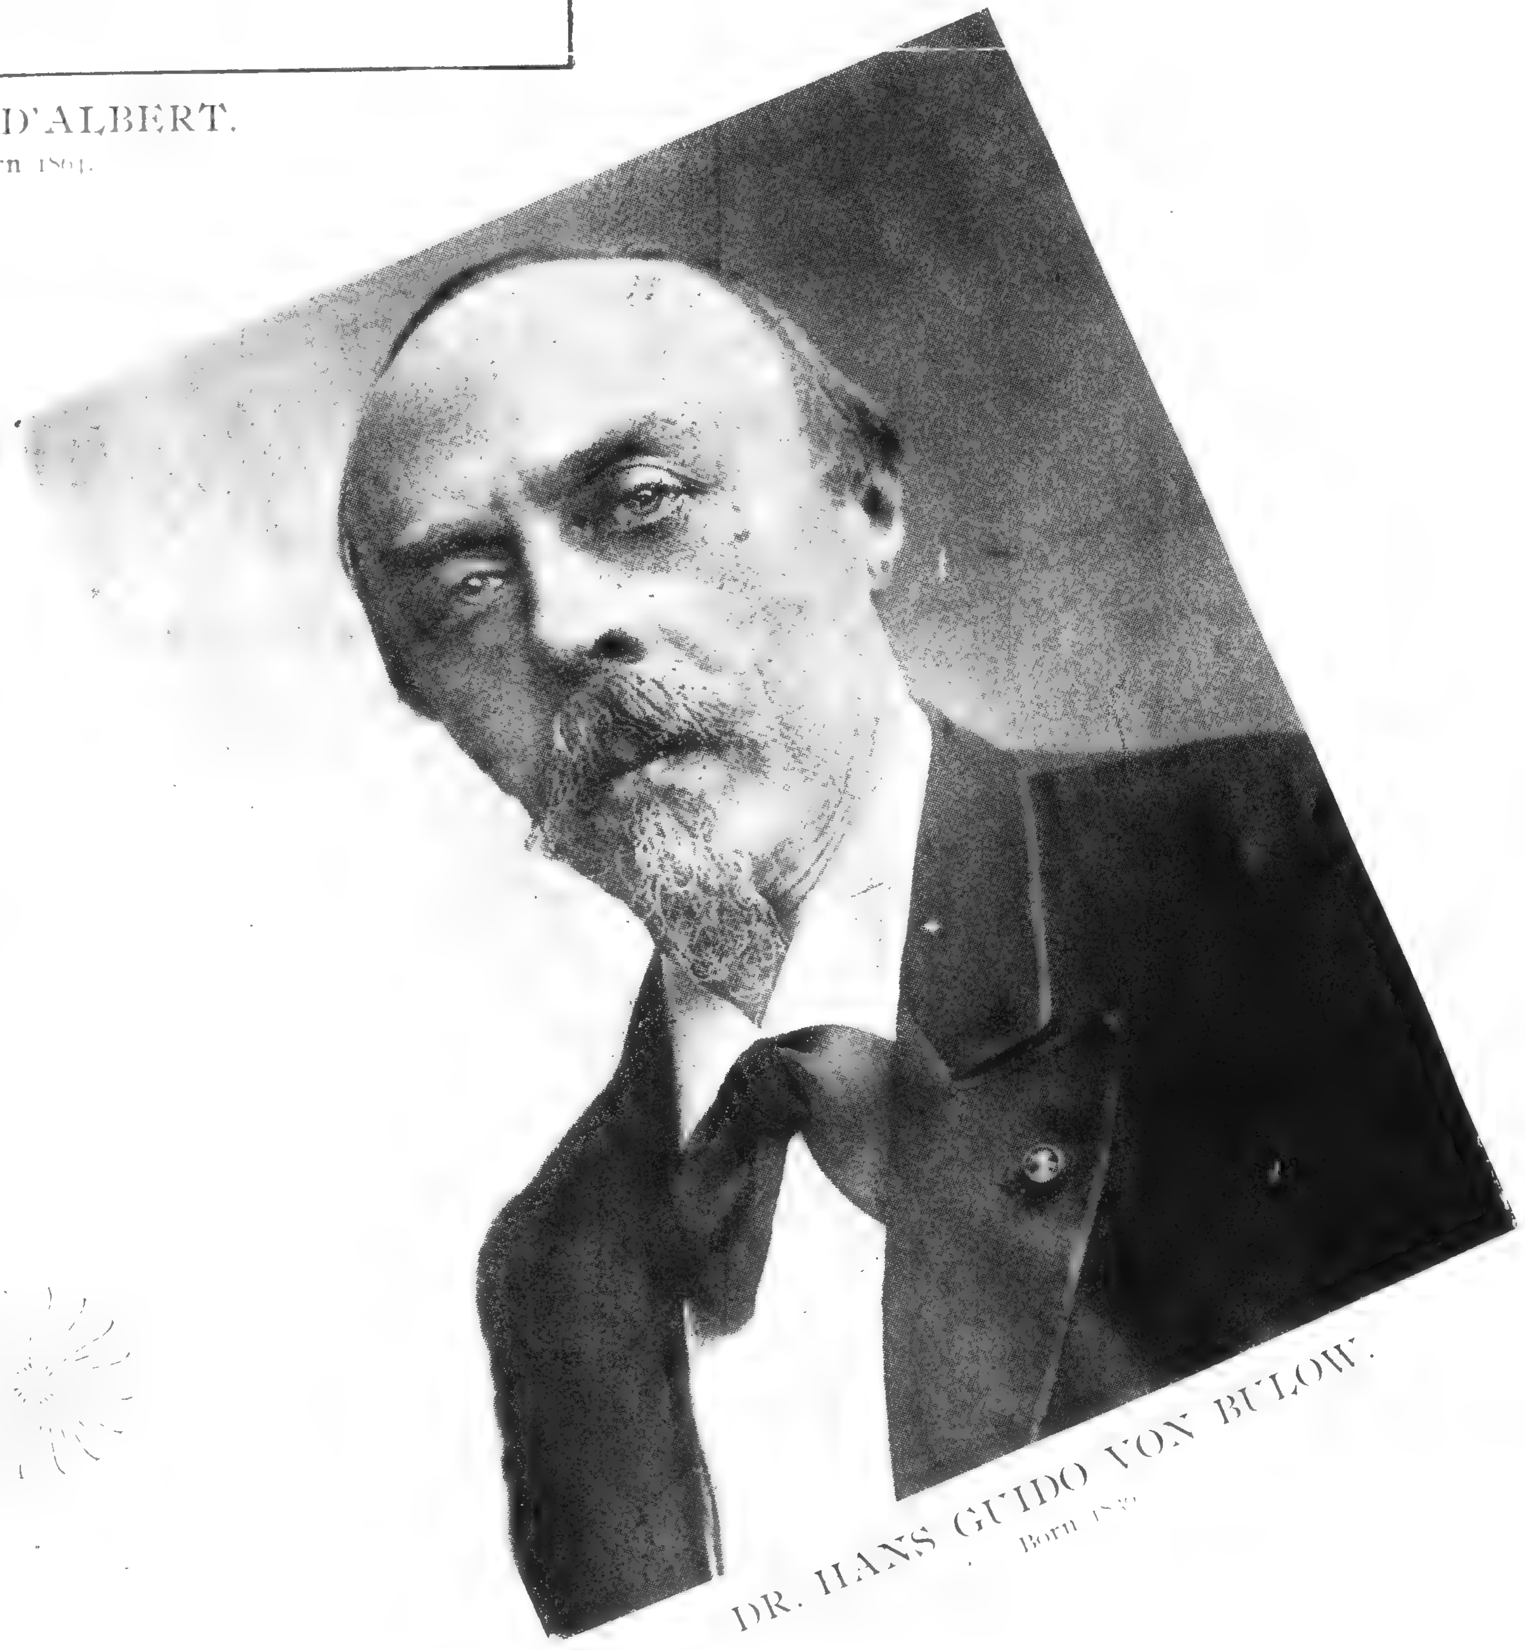
F. WIGHT NEUMANN
MANAGER

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.
Born 18[illegible]



DR. HANS GUIDO VON BULOW.
Born 18[illegible]

THE THREE GREATEST LIVING PIANISTS

THE ·EHM, FIETSCH & WILSON CO., PRINTERS, 117-119 LAKE ST.

D'ALBERT'S • KNABE PIANO

TESTIMONIAL
TO THE PEERLESS

Given after experience with the piano of one of Messrs. Knabe & Co.'s principal competitors, which competing piano he used exclusively on his last tour in this country.

"During my recent sojourn here I had frequent opportunities to make myself acquainted with the Knabe Pianos, and from fullest conviction I declare them to be the best instruments in America. Should I return here for artistic purposes, which may be the case very soon, I shall most certainly use the piano of this celebrated make. I give this testimonial with pleasure, voluntarily, and entirely unsolicited by the house of Knabe."

New York, May 16, 1890. EUGEN D'ALBERT.

Lyon & Healy

STATE AND MONROE STS.

VON BULOW'S • KNABE PIANO

TESTIMONIAL
TO THE PEERLESS

Give by this unimpeachable authority on music at the close of a concert tour, during which he constantly used the Knabe Pianos, and was thus made most familiar with them.

"The Knabe Pianos, which I did not know before, have been chosen for my present concert tour in the United States by my impresario, and accepted by me on the recommendation of my friend, Bechstein, acquainted with their merits. Had I known these Pianos as I do now, I would have chosen them by myself, as their sound and touch are more sympathetic to my ears and hands than all others of the country."

New York, 16th of April, 1889. DR. HANS VON BULOW.

We suppose that nine out of ten of this audience already know that this house of Mandel Brothers is the pleasantest place in Chicago to shop.
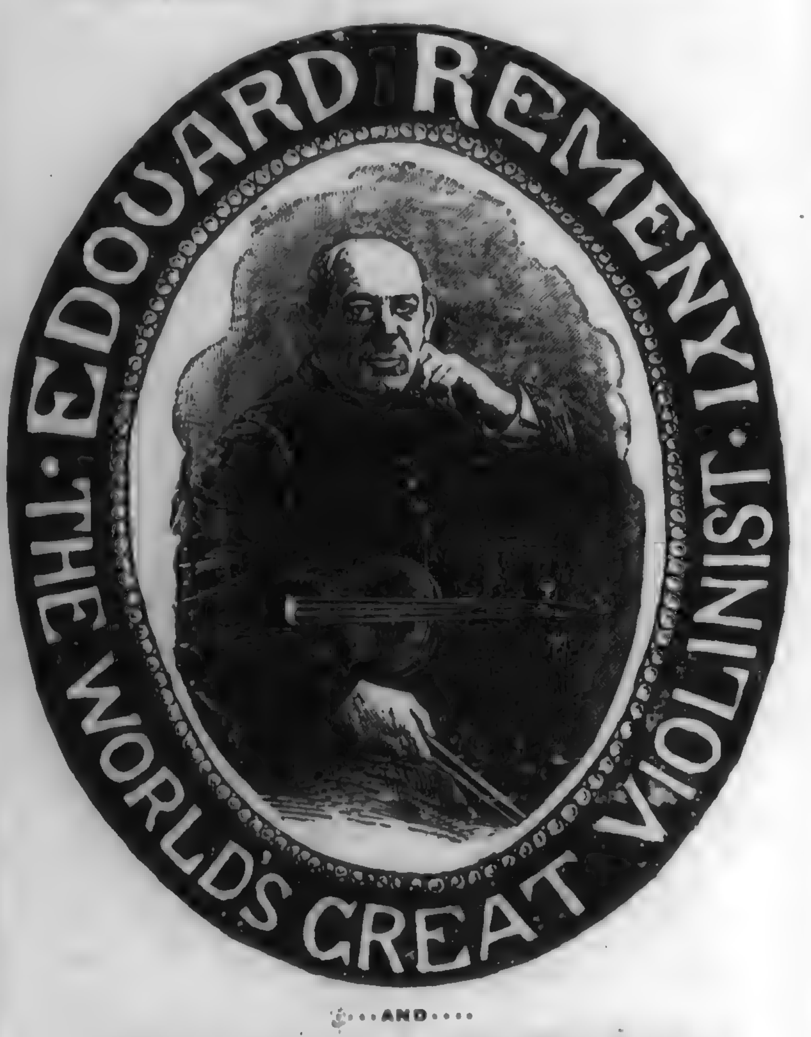
We want the tenth also to know it.

CENTRAL MUSIC HALL
WEDNESDAY EVENING, APRIL 20
SATURDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 23

The Star Lecture Course has the pleasure to announce the engagement of the following combination



....AND....

HELEN HOPEKIRK

The Distinguished Pianiste

SUPPORTED BY THE FOLLOW ARTISTS

MISS ALICE ESTY, SOPRANO
MISS EDITH McGREGOR, ALTO
MR. WM. H. FESSENDEN, TENOR
MISS F. CLIFF BERRY, ACCOMPANIST

Complete change of programme for each performance.
Popular Prices, 50c, 75c and $1.00.

F. WIGHT NEUMANN
Manager

Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel

CAN BE ENGAGED FOR PUBLIC OR PRIVATE...

SONG RECITALS

AFTERNOONS OR EVENINGS

Dates from May 10th to May 25th. For further particulars call on, or address

F. WIGHT NEUMANN,
ROOM 44 KIMBALL HALL, 243 WABASH AVE.

EMIL LIEBLING

CONCERT PIANIST AND TEACHER OF PIANO

KIMBALL HALL, 243-253 WABASH AVE.

Central Music Hall

First Piano Recital,

Thursday Evening, March 24, 1892

AT 8:15

...PROGRAMME...

Prelude and Fugue in D major, . . . Bach-D'Albert

Sonata in C major, ... Beethoven
Allegro con brio.
Introduzione e Rondo.

Suite in D minor, Op. 91, ... Raff
Introduzione e Fuga.
Giga con variazione.
Cavatina.
Marcia.
(First Time.)

Impromptu, Op. 90, No. 3, ... Schubert

Valse Impromptu,
Sonette di Petrarca, ... Liszt
Rhapsodie Espagnole,
(Folies d' Espagne e jota Arragonesa.)

The Knabe Pianos used in all D'Albert Concerts
For sale only at Lyon & Healy's, State and Monroe Streets

ALASKA FUR CO.
159 STATE ST.
ORIGINAL STYLES IN FUR CAPES
FOR
. . . . . SPRING WEAR . . . . .

MANUFACTURERS' CLOAK CO.

∴ LADIES' TAILORS ∴

Successors to H. J. Moore & Co.

TAKE ELEVATOR 188 Wabash Avenue

LATEST NOVELTIES FOR SPRING AND SUMMER WEAR

LADIES' MISSES' AND CHILDREN'S Tailor Made Garments
Made to Order . . .

STIEGLITZ & COMPANY

TAILORS

170 ADAMS STREET
RAND-McNALLY BUILDING

NOVELTIES FOR SPRING AND SUMMER WEAR

EXTRA QUALITY
TRADE MARK
DUNLAP & Co.
N.Y.
COPYRIGHTED.

CELEBRATED HAT.
Correct Styles. Extra Quality.
The Dunlap Silk Umbrella.
CHICAGO,—Palmer House.

$100 TO CALIFORNIA AND RETURN

The ticket takes in all points of interest and is good for half a year. It must read over

THE SANTA FE ROUTE

Ticket Office 212 Clark Street,
Chicago.

Is Your Health Worth a Hundred?

FOR FLORIDA AND THE SOUTH
TAKE THE MONON ROUTE
LOUISVILLE, NEW ALBANY & CHICAGO RY.

THE BEST AND MOST POPULAR ROUTE
TICKET OFFICE, 73 CLARK ST.
W. H. McDOEL, Gen'l Manager.
JAMES BARKER, Gen'l Pass. Agent.

WHO DOES NOT LOVE THE GRAND TONES OF A PIPE ORGAN?

Truly such a man has no music in his soul. Therefore it is difficult to overestimate the importance of the inventions by which an organ of richest resources is practically placed within the reach of everyone. Not only is the expense cut down so that the cost is no longer an obstacle, but the mechanism is so arranged that the instrument is far less liable to get out of order than the old style pipe organ. Moreover the expense of tuning, moving, etc., is reduced to a minimum. Already a number of Chicagoans have perceived in this instrument, the "one thing needful" to complete their homes. In the case of new buildings an organ room should be designed by the architect, but in dwellings of the better class one of these instruments may be readily introduced into an already existing apartment. The system under which these organs are built is known as the "Peloubet." All the letters patent are owned by Lyon & Healy, and a division of their immense factory, facing Union Park, is devoted exclusively to the manufacture of Peloubet Church Organs. That the manufacturers' claims in regard to price, durabilty, etc., can be fully substantiated, any one acquainted with Lyon & Healy's methods will admit at once. In regard to the quality of tone of the Peloubet Church Organs nothing need be taken upon hearsay. Lyon & Healy's salesrooms, State and Monroe streets, are thronged with these magnificent instruments, and tests of the most exacting nature are invited. Pipe organ effects may be brought out upon even the lowest priced of the Peloubet Church Organs. That churches have not been slow to appreciate these instruments, is best attested by the remarkable record of thirty large organs set up within one month. Complete specifications and fullest particulars will be sent upon application, while a visit to the Peloubet salesrooms at Lyon & Healy's is cordially solicited from all interested in music.

THE PUBLIC'S TESTIMONIAL TO THE POPULAR

FISCHER
PIANO

Has taken the form of buying far more of this make of piano than of any other in existence. Over 90,000 Fischer instruments are now in actual use. A glance at the values presented in our very large stock will make clear the reason of this unapproached popularity.

Lyon & Healy
STATE AND MONROE STS.

300 in 1840
1,500 in 1845
3,000 in 1850
4,500 in 1855
7,500 in 1860
10,000 in 1865
14,000 in 1870
18,000 in 1875
34,000 in 1880
65,000 in 1885
90,000 in 1891

FISCHER
PIANO

This table, giving the actual number of Fischer Pianos in use, is a monument to their sterling qualities.

The Bradbury Pianos
·237·
STATE·STREET· CHICAGO.
J·M·HAWKHURST Manager.

FROM CHICAGO TO THE EAST NO CHANGE OF CARS TO NEW YORK

ERIE RAILWAY

LEAVE
DEARBORN STATION
VIA THE CHICAGO & ERIE R. R.
1.30 P. M
VESTIBULED LIMITED
7:45 P. M.
ATLANTIC EXPRESS

City Ticket Office, 242 CLARK ST. Grand Pacific Hotel.

KIMBALL PIANOS INDORSED
BY PATTI
AND OTHER PROMINENT ARTISTS.
WAREROOMS
KIMBALL HALL
243-253 WABASH AVE.

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PAC. R'Y
TAKE THE BIG FIVE TO DENVER.
4 THROUGH TRAINS DAILY 4
WESTWARD.
ELEGANTLY EQUIPPED.

5 GREAT ROCK ISLAND ROUTE

Leaves CHICAGO 10.00 P.M
Arrives OMAHA 1.00 N'N
Arrives LINCOLN 3.20 P.M
Arrives DENVER 7.40 A.M
Arrives COLO. Sp'gs 7.35 A.M
Arrives PUEBLO 9.15 A.M

OUR OWN DINING CARS
TRY THEM.

E. ST. JOHN, General Manager.
JNO. SEBASTIAN, G.T.&P.A., Chicago

CHICAGO,
ST. PAUL
AND KANSAS CITY
RAILWAY
THE BEST LINE TO
ST. PAUL AND MINNEAPOLIS
CITY TICKET OFFICE, 188 Clark St., Chicago.

Central Music Hall

Second Piano Recital,

Saturday Afternoon, March 26, 1892

AT 2:30

... PROGRAMME ...

Passacaglia in C minor,	Bach-D'Albert
Rondo in A minor,	Mozart
Sonata, Op. 90, Allegro Moderato. Moderato Cantabile.	Beethoven
Variations Serieuses, Op. 54,	Mendelssohn
Sonata, Op. 58, Allegro. Scherzo. Largo. Finale.	Chopin
Liebestraum, No. 3, Etude, "Feux Follets," Tarentelle, "Napoli,"	Liszt

The Knabe Pianos used in all D'Albert Concerts
For sale only at Lyon & Healy's, State and Monroe Streets

"LA REINE" GLOVES
WORN EXCLUSIVELY BY SARAH BERNHARDT
READ BERNHARDT'S ORIGINAL TESTIMONIAL
IN OUR SHOW WINDOW
ALASKA FUR CO. 159 STATE ST.

COLUMBIA NATIONAL BANK
INSURANCE EXCHANGE BUILDING
La Salle and Quincy Streets
CHICAGO
CAPITAL PAID IN $1,000,000.
Opened for Business, Feb. 16, 1891
Surplus and Profits
Jan. 2, 1892, $70,253.99.
OFFICERS
L. EVERINGHAM, President
W. G. BENTLEY, Vice-Pres't
Z. DWIGGINS, Cashier
J. T. GREENE, Ass't Cashier

OUR MOTTO, "Safety, Courtesy, Promptness, Liberality."

TRANSACTS a General Banking Business.

ACCOUNTS of Individuals, Firms, Banks and Corporations solicited.

LADIES' DEPARTMENT—A separate suite of rooms, with special clerical force, teller, etc., and every facility in Banking provided especially for ladies.

COLLECTIONS a specialty. Having special facilities on all accessible points.

Investments made for Depositors and others on First-Class Securities on Request.

8½ HOURS VIA
The St. Louis Limited from Chicago
to
St. Louis
A Pullman Vestibuled Train. Leaves Chicago 11.00 a. m., arrives St. Louis 7.30 p. m. same day. Runs Daily (Sundays excepted) over the Chicago & Alton R.R.
City Ticket Office, 195 Clark Street.

CHICKERING PIANOS. CHASE BROS PIANOS. CO.
219-221 WABASH AVE.

WISCONSIN CENTRAL LINES
NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD CO.
LESSEE
THE POPULAR ROUTE TO
ST. PAUL AND MINNEAPOLIS
City Ticket Office, 205 Clark St.

THE MARVELOUS AEOLIAN

The best musical educator is the Aeolian. Why? No learning of notes or weeks of practice. A few simple instructions—which a child can follow readily—and you can play the most difficult pieces like an expert. A visit to our warerooms to examine the Aeolian will be esteemed a favor.

Lyon & Healy
STATE AND MONROE STS.

EVERY HOME NEEDS AN AEOLIAN

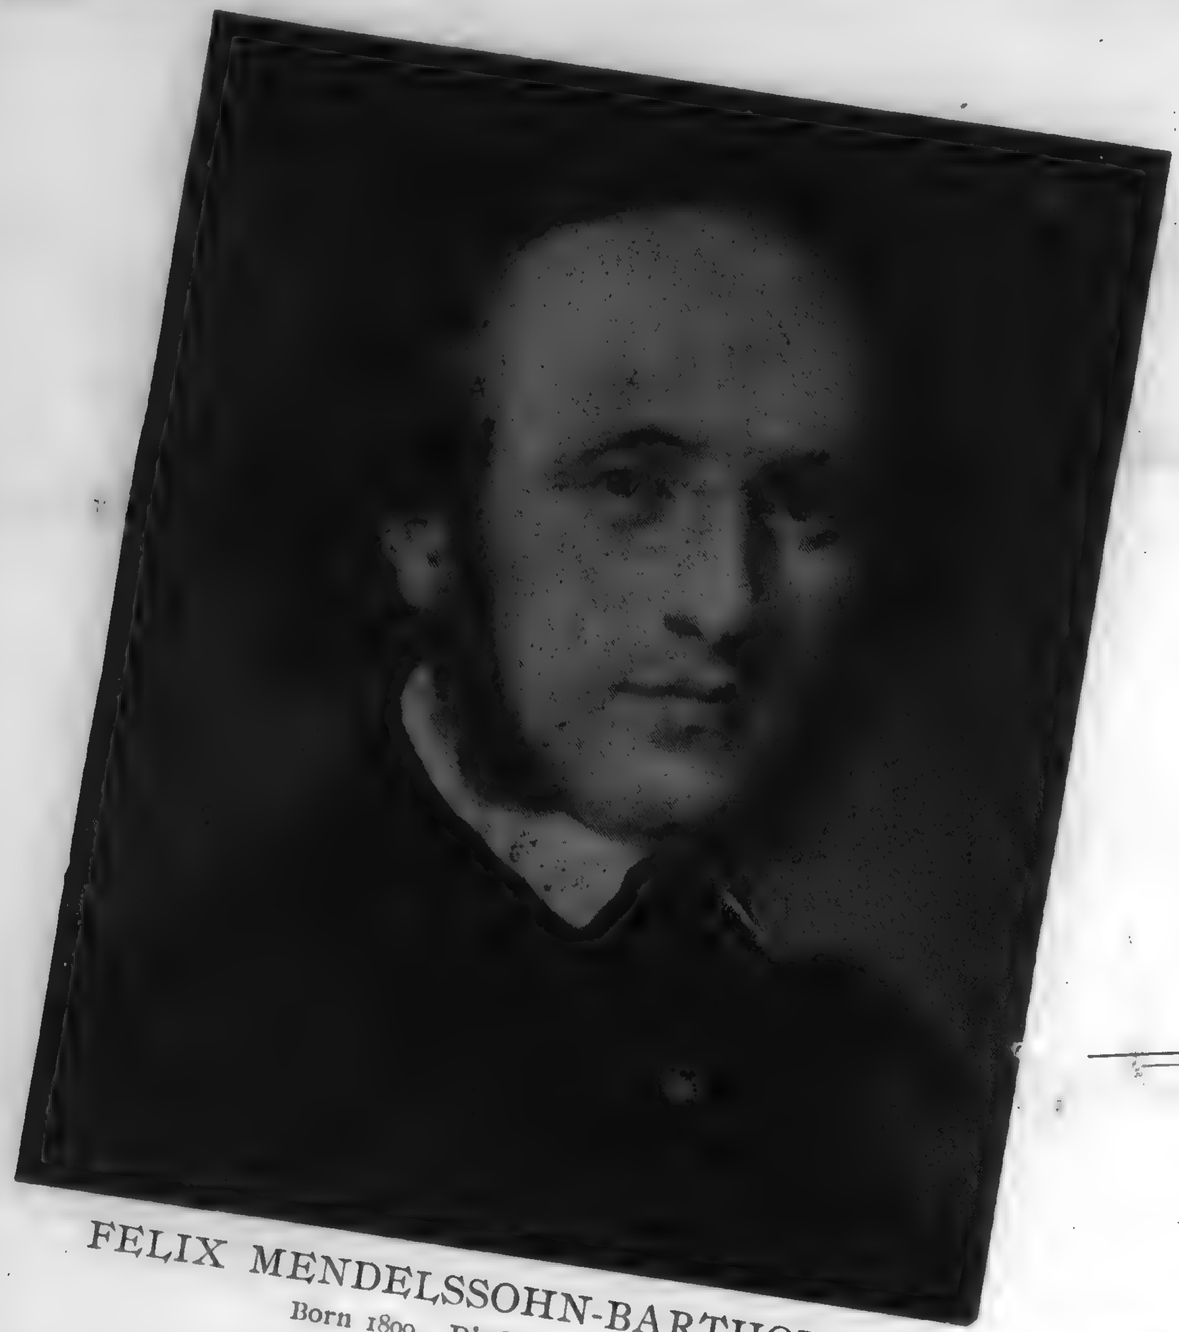
The Aeolian repertoire is unlimited. Any piece of music can be obtained for this wonderful instrument. All music for the Aeolian is arranged from the full orchestral score and is therefore presented in its most effective form. The Aeolian is on exhibition daily at our warerooms.

CORTICELLI SPOOL SILK
UNEQUALED FOR
DRESSMAKING AND FAMILY SEWING

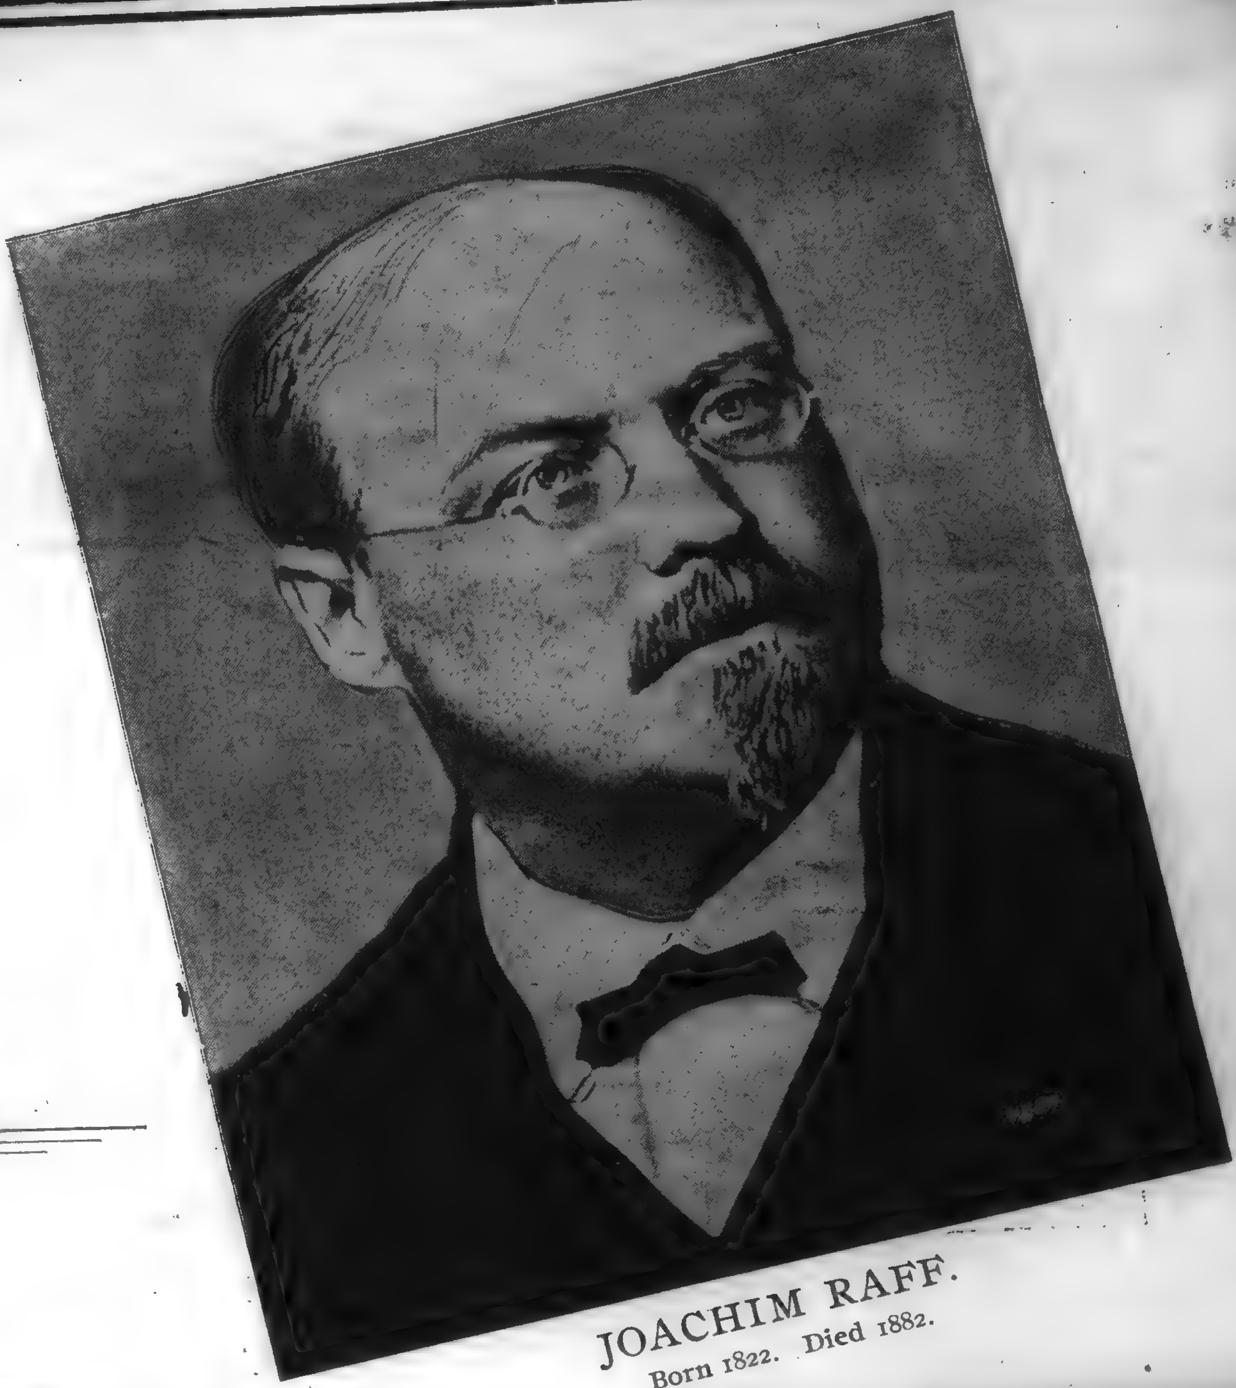
CORTICELLI KNITTING AND
. . . CROCHET SILK
HIGH LUSTRE. FAST DYE.

CORTICELLI
WARRANTED
100 YDS.
BEST A TWIST

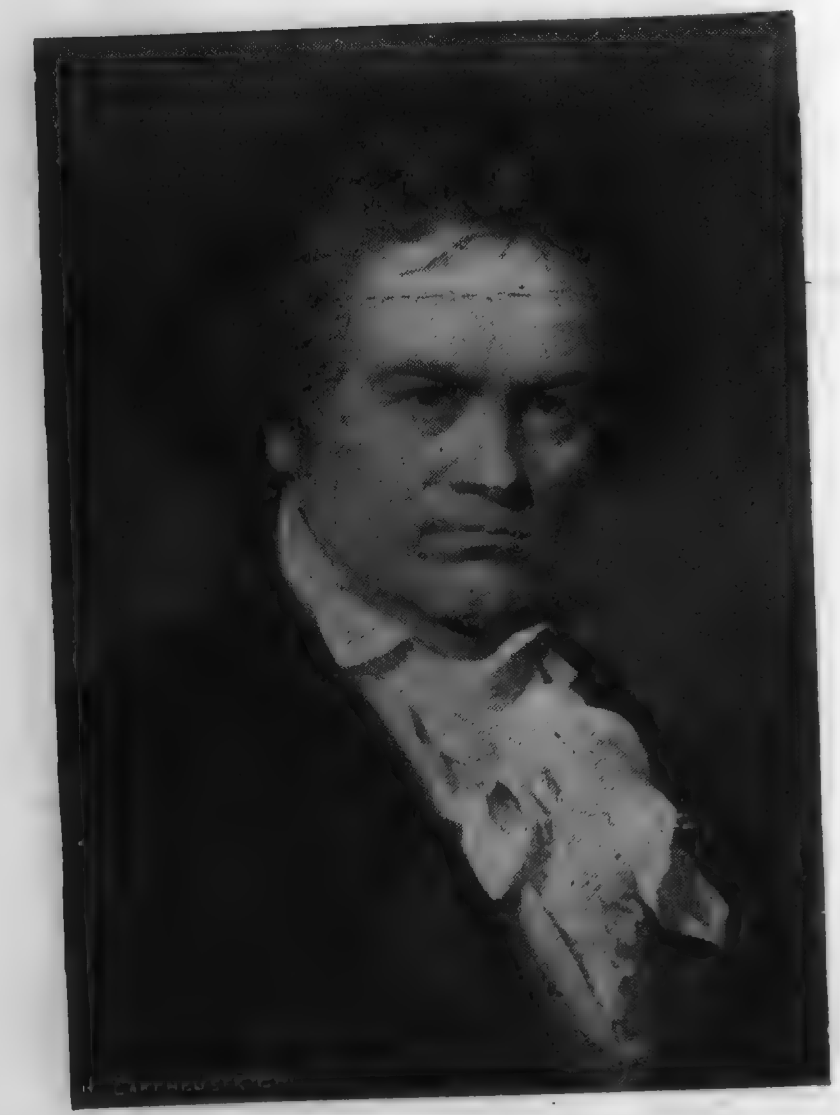
CORTICELLI WASH SILK
FAST DYE. WASHING COLORS
SOLD BY ALL ENTERPRISING DRY GOODS MERCHANTS
MANUFACTURED BY THE
NONOTUCK SILK CO., 238-240 Fifth Ave.
R. W. HARE, Manager.



FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY.
Born 1809. Died 1847.

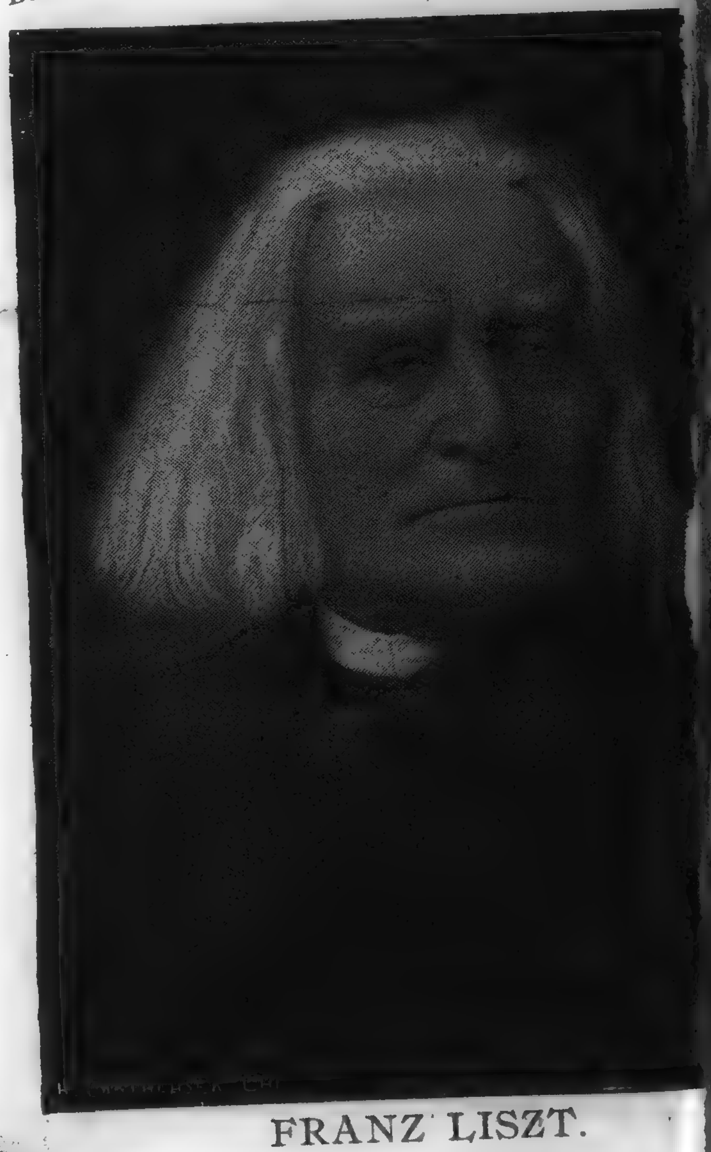


JOACHIM RAFF.
Born 1822. Died 1882.

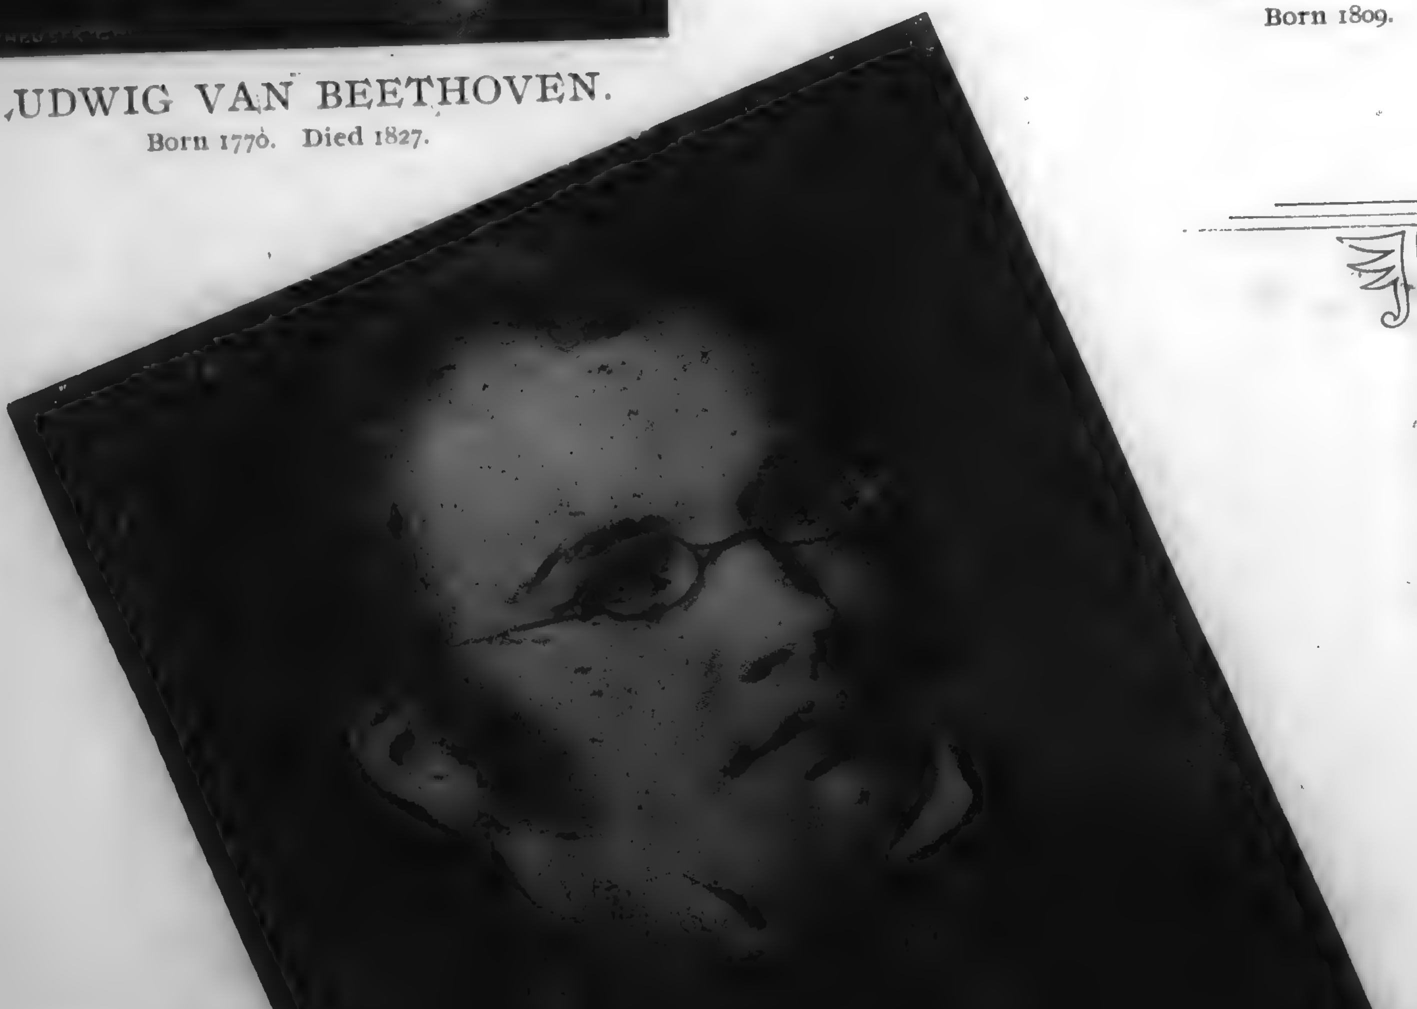


LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN.
Born 1770. Died 1827.

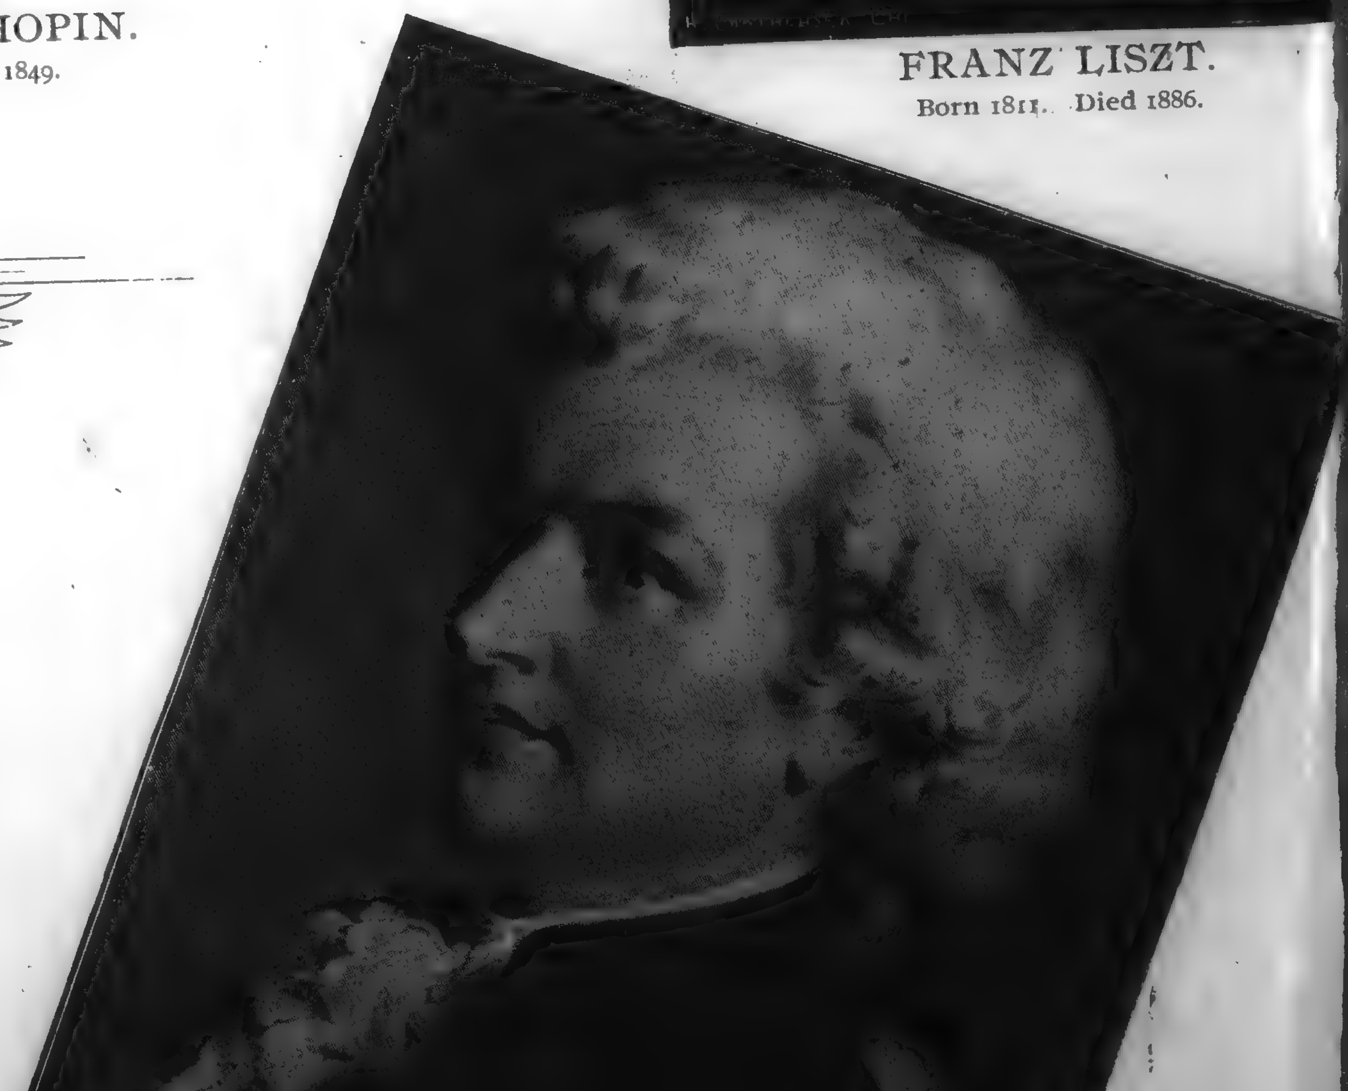
FREDERIC CHOPIN.
Born 1809. Died 1849.



FRANZ LISZT.
Born 1811. Died 1886.



FRANZ SCHUBERT.
Born 1797. Dien 1828.



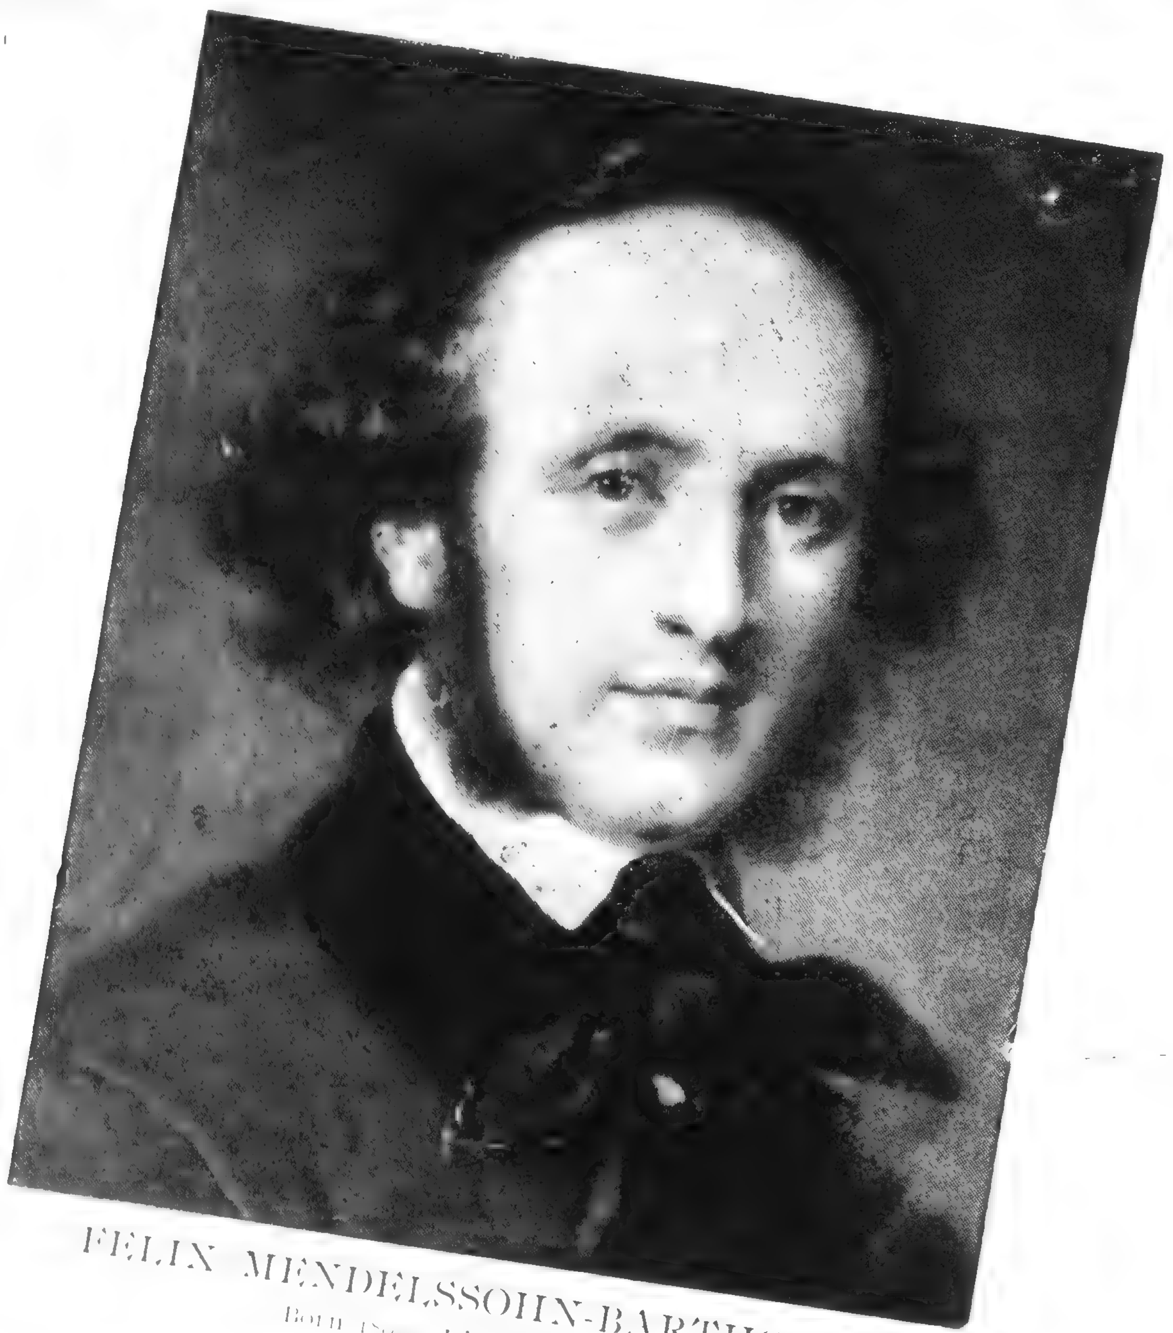
WOLFGANG AMADEUS MOZART.
Born 1756. Died 1791.

CORTICELLI SPOOL SILK
UNEQUALED FOR
DRESSMAKING AND FAMILY SEWING

CORTICELLI KNITTING AND . . . CROCHET SILK
HIGH LUSTRE. FAST DYE.

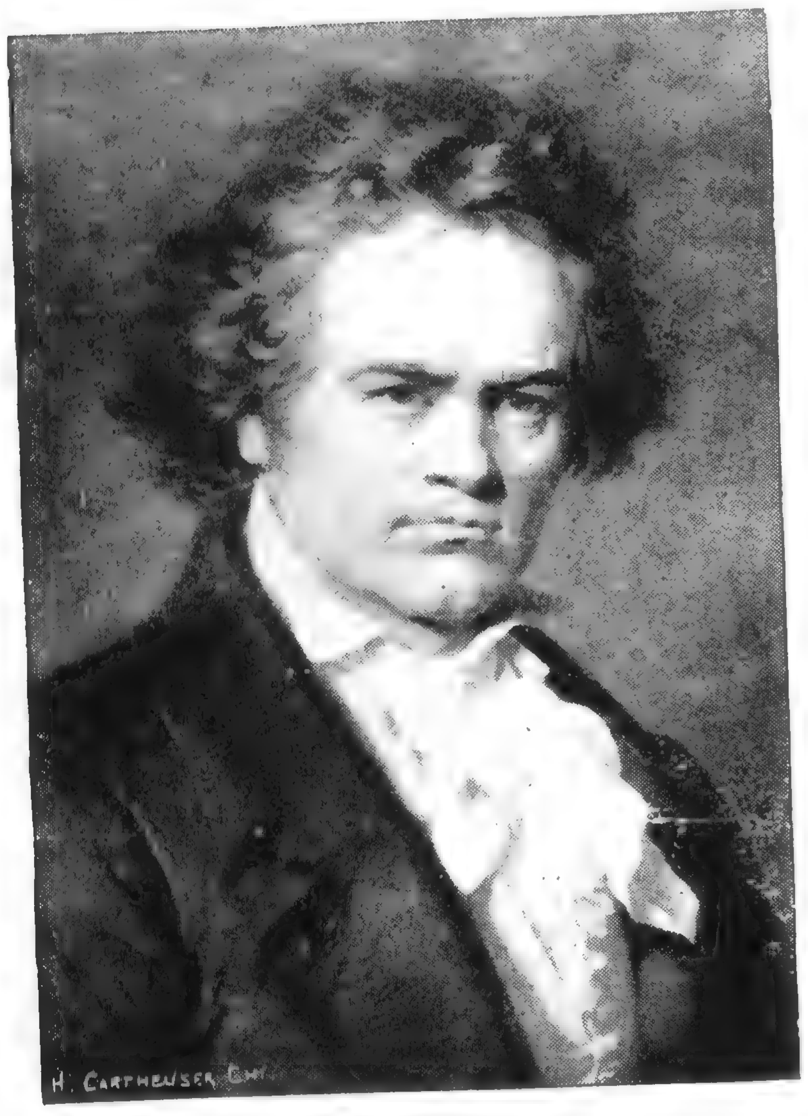
Use Corticelli Sewing Silk.
CORTICELLI WARRANTED 100 YDS. BEST A TWIST

CORTICELLI WASH SILK
. . . . FAST DYE. WASHING COLORS.
SOLD BY ALL ENTERPRISING DRY GOODS MERCHANTS
MANUFACTURED BY THE
NONOTUCK SILK CO., 238-240 Fifth Ave.
R. W. HARE, Manager.



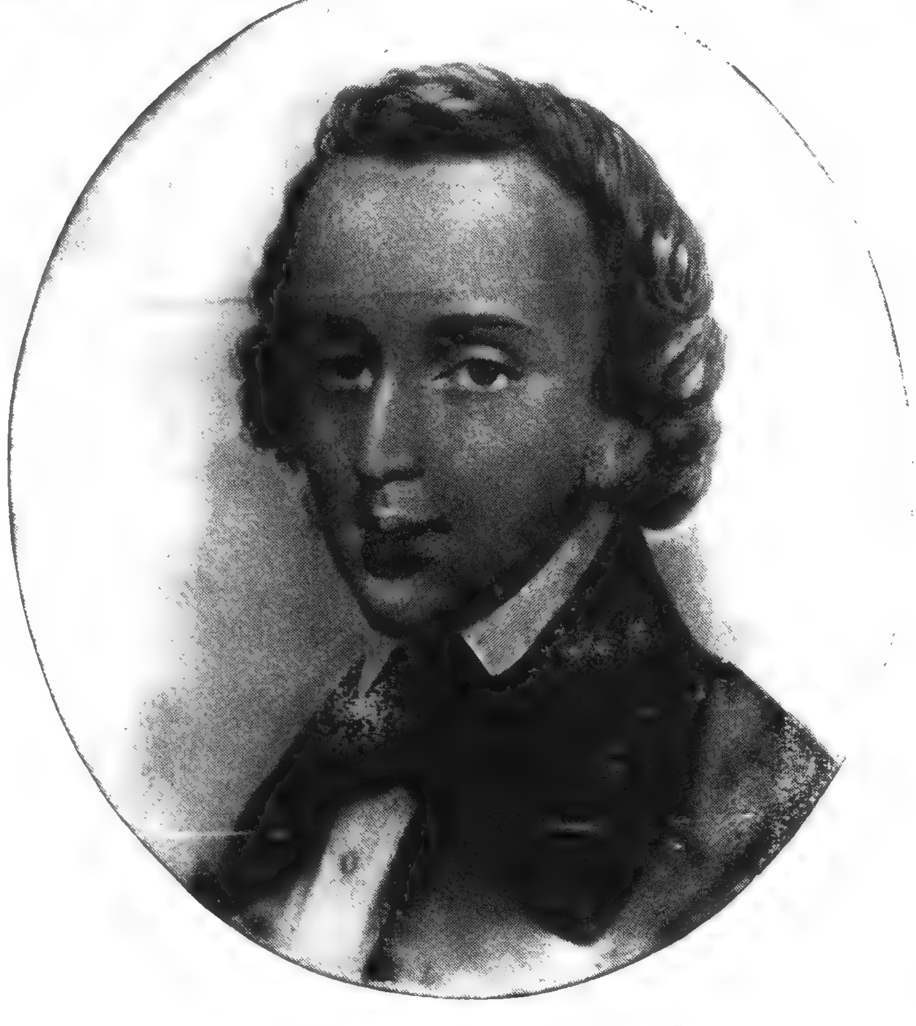
FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY.
Born 1809. Died 1847.

JOACHIM RAFF.
Born 1822. Died 1882.

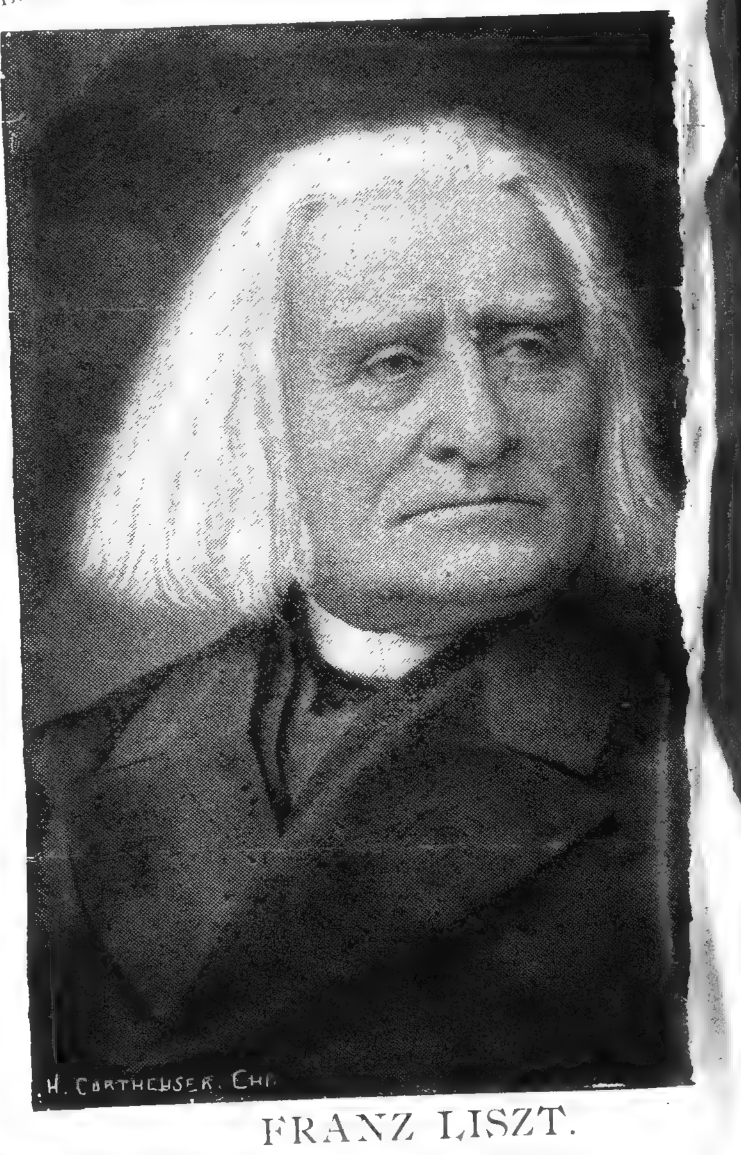


H. CARTHEUSER, CHI.

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN.
Born 1770. Died [illegible]

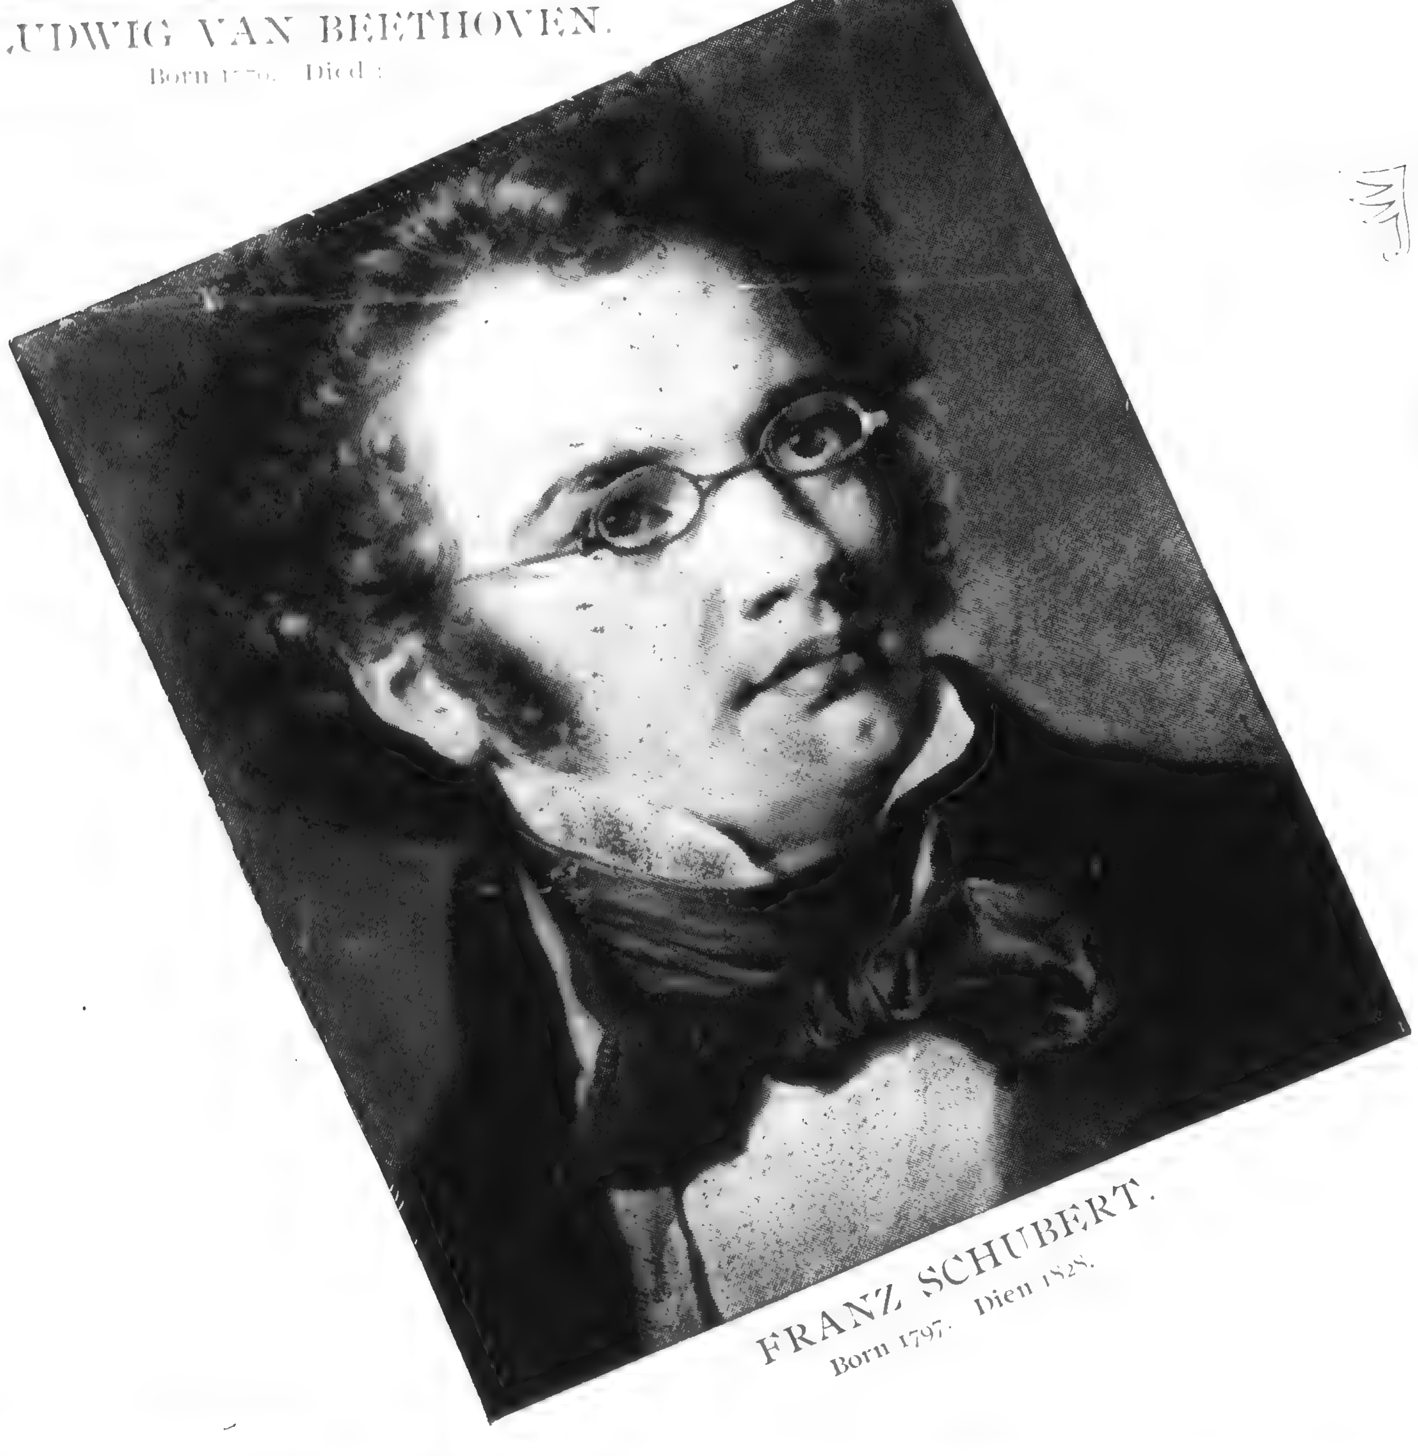


FREDERIC CHOPIN.
Born 1809. Died 1849.

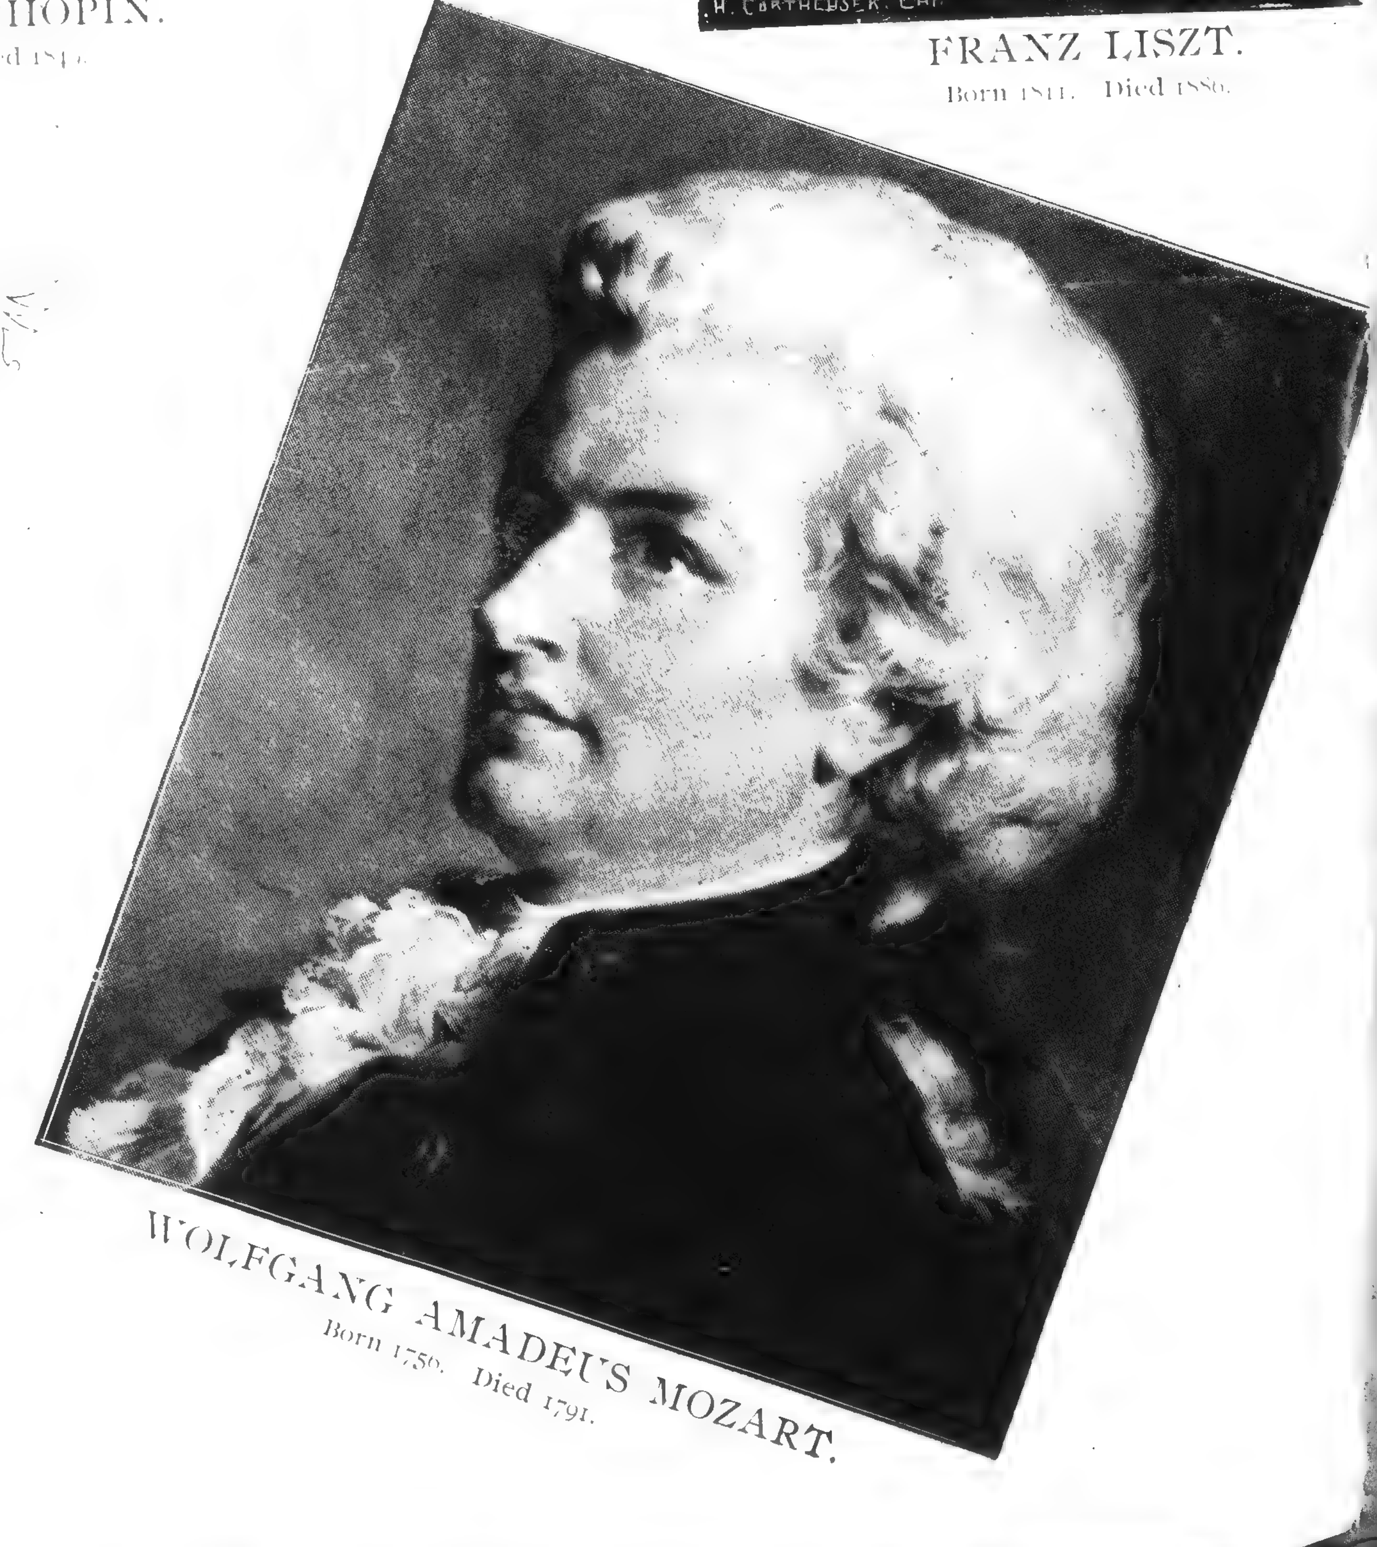


H. CARTHEUSER, CHI.

FRANZ LISZT.
Born 1811. Died 1886.



FRANZ SCHUBERT.
Born 1797. Died 1828.



WOLFGANG AMADEUS MOZART.
Born 1756. Died 1791.

NEW YORK HERALD

TWELVE PAGES.

NEW YORK, MONDAY, MARCH 28, 1892.

PADEREWSKI PLAYS FOR THE ARCH FUND.

The Metropolitan Opera House Crowded with People Who Applauded Everything and Anything Done by the Famous Pianist.

OVER $4,000 FOR THE FUND.

Boston's Orchestra and Herr Nikisch Came Two Hundred Miles at Mr. Higginson's Expense and Shared in the Honors of the Evening.

"Bravo Paderewski" was the cry that came from every part of the Metropolitan Opera House last night as the Polish virtuoso ended the third movement of his concerto, and it was kept up unwearyingly to an accompaniment of hand clapping and cane rapping until he sat down to repeat it. He seemed inspired as he began the dazzling allegro again and the marvellous technique and dynamic power he displayed in this tour de force, together with the penetrating, impressive quality of his composition, brought the great audience to its feet.

"Bravissimo Paderewski!" was the cry this time, and when he took Herr Nikisch by the hand and pulled him forward to share in the honors the applause redoubled. Paderewski then turned toward the orchestra and kissed his hand several times to show his appreciation of their superb accompaniment.

This concerto he played at his first appearance here last November, but he did not like the accompaniment and it would not have been heard here now had not the Boston Symphony Orchestra come on to play it with him. He cannot speak highly enough of Mr. Nikisch and his men, and took pains to bow his thanks to them after each number.

THE PROGRAMME.

The work of the orchestra in its three numbers and in Paderewski's three accompaniments was irreproachable and was as much of a treat to the thoroughly musical crowd that filled the house and gave over $4,200 to the Washington arch fund as was the gifted Pole's solos. The well balanced programme was as follows:—

Overture—"Tannhäuser"..................Richard Wagner
Orchestra.
Concerto in A minor..................Robert Schumann
Paderewski.
Overture—"Benvenuto Cellini"..........Hector Berlioz
Orchestra.
Concerto—Op. 17..............................Paderewski
Paderewski.
Poëme Symphonique—"Le Rouet d'Omphale,"......
Camille Saint-Saens
Orchestra.
Hungarian Fantasia.............................Franz Liszt
Paderewski.

The opera house held a throng of people known in the musical, dramatic, artistic and professional worlds last night, but the strictly fashionable set was conspicuous by its absence. The crowd was not so large as the Arch Fund Committee had hoped for, but there were three reasons for this—Sunday night, bad weather and the tremendous crush at Paderewski's last concert at the Music Hall the previous afternoon. Still the $4,275 which came in goes to the arch fund complete, for Paderewski offered his services, Colonel Thomas Wentworth Higginson sent the orchestra on free, even paying all the hotel and travelling expenses of its eighty-five members, and Steinway & Sons shouldered the rent of the hall, the printing and the other local expenses.

Conductor Nikisch's desk was covered with an American flag and draped with the Polish standard and all the orchestral desks were decorated with the Polish colors, red and white. American flags stood at the bases of the proscenium arch and at the back of the stage, and the piano was almost hidden with the palms and bunches of roses sent to the pianist. Mr. Nikisch was called out after the ending of the "Tannhäuser" overture and presented with a laurel wreath, as was Paderewski at the close of the Schumann concert. The rheumatism which sometimes attacks the knuckles of the pianist's right hand bothered him a bit in his opening number, but he worked it out when he came to his own concerto and met with the enthusiastic approval already noted.

THANKING THE ARTIST.

He played the Hungarian Fantasia as he always plays his Liszt, faultlessly, and the audience begged for an encore. Just as they had given up hope, and as some were getting on their wraps, Mr. Parke Godwin, Richard Watson Gilder and William R. Stewart came upon the stage and two ushers marched down the aisle bearing a superb laurel crown on crossed American and Polish standards.

Mr. Godwin stepped forward to Paderewski's side and said that the wreath was a slight earnest and pledge of admiration of his art.

"There is to be a substantial and durable offering," said Mr. Godwin, "just so soon as Mr. St. Gaudens can get to work. That great sculptor has promised to undertake a bust of the great pianist, and it will be presented as a recognition not only of the exquisite technical perfection which is the basis of all that is fine in art, but also that spirituelle quality which is its crown and glory."

Mr. Godwin said it was appropriate that a countryman of Kosciusko should help to rear a monument to Washington and ended by wishing a bon voyage and a speedy return to the pianist.

There were cries of "speech," but Paderewski put his finger to his lips and shook his head and then sat down to play the Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2 as few men living can play it. It was a fitting close to the most successful visit that a pianist has made to this country since Rubinstein's time.

MRS. NIKISCH AT THE MUSIC HALL.

Most prominent, not only because of its length, but also because of artistic excellence in the Music Hall concert last evening was Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," the most famous and the best of the great composer's works.

Of the original eighteen numbers fourteen were given. The weird Rakoczy march was played with spirit, and the dance of the sylphs and "Will o' the Wisp" minuet were daintily handled by the orchestra under the baton of Mr. Damrosch.

Mrs. Nikisch appeared as Marguerite, Signor Campanini as Faust and Mr. Heinrich as both Mephistopheles and Brander. Both Signor Campanini and Mr. Max Heinrich suffered from slight hoarseness, Mr. Heinrich, indeed, being obliged to begin the "Rat Song" anew; but on recovering from his nervousness he sang very acceptably.

Mrs. Nikisch sang with spirit but showed lack of

At the beginning of the concert Bizet's "L'Arlesienne," a favorate with Mr. Damrosch, was played with grace and finish, and Mrs. Nikisch sang an "Indian Love Song," by Reginald de Koven, a "Volkslied," by Bungert, and "Vergebliches Ständchen," by Brahms.

Wagner's "Dreams," incorporated in another form in the second act of "Tristan and Isolde," where it consists of a soprano solo with accompaniment, was given as a violin obligato by Mr. Jules Conus, and so acceptably that it was repeated.

A new "March of the Gnomes," by Reginald de Koven, concluded the first part. While it is weird, as its title indicates, it failed to arouse enthusiasm.

The World

JOSEPH PULITZER.

Published Every Day in the Year at Nos. 63-69 Park Row.

MONDAY, MARCH 28, 1892.

PADEREWSKI'S FAREWELL.

He Receives an Ovation at the Washington Arch Fund Benefit.

The concert for the benefit of the Washington Arch Fund at the Metropolitan last night, at which M. Paderewski made his final appearance this season previous to sailing for Europe on Tuesday, was certainly one of the best given this year. M. Paderewski was assisted by the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Nikisch, whose services had been generously offered to M. Paderewski for this occasion by Col. Higginson. The stage was tastefully decorated with the American and Polish colors and with plants and flowers.

The following is the programme:

Overture, "Tannhauser".........Richard-Wagner
Orchestra.
Concerto in A minor..............Robert Schumann
Paderewski.
Overture, Benvenuto Cellini.........Hector Berlioz
Orchestra.
Concerto, op. 17........................Paderewski
Paderewski.
Poëme Symphonique, "Le Rouet d'Omphale,"
Camille Saint-Saëns
Orchestra.
Hungarian Fantasia......................Franz Liszt
Paderewski.

This programme was an unusually fine one and received the best possible interpretation. M. Paderewski played magnificently, never better in short; so did the orchestra. The Berlioz overture and M. Paderewski's concerto were about as near perfection as mortal men can come. The orchestra had the advantage of a better auditorium than ever before in New York, and M. Paderewski the advantage of playing with them, and the result could not have been more enjoyable. The audience was large, though many of the boxes were unoccupied, and naturally enthusiastic to a degree.

After his concerto M. Paderewski received a perfect ovation, being recalled again and again, and was finally obliged to repeat the last movement, when he was presented with flowers and wreaths.

At the conclusion of the concert Parke Godwin, on behalf of a committee of friends of the great pianist, came forward and in a few well chosen words of thanks and recognition of his talents and genius, and his kindness and generosity in thus offering his services in so worthy a cause, presented M. Paderewski with a large laurel wreath supported by the American and Polish flags, as an earnest of a future presentation to be made him of a wreath in bronze, the execution of which has been undertaken by Mr. St. Gaudens. Then M. Paderewski, in graceful acknowledgment, played Liszt's Second Rhapsodie superbly, and the audience reluctantly dispersed. The New York public, whom M. Paderewski has so often delighted, will certainly join with Mr. Goodwin in wishing him bon voyage and a quick return.

The New York Recorder.

MONDAY, MARCH 28, 1892.

FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE ARCH.

Paderewski and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Play Superbly.

Paderewski, the great Polish pianist, played last night at the Metropolitan Opera House for the benefit of the Washington arch fund. He was assisted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conductor, which organization Col. Higginson generously offered to Mr. Paderewski for this memorable occasion. The house was a large, fashionable and representative one, nearly $4,000 being realized by the sale of seats and boxes. The stage was resplendent with the Polish and American colors and flowers galore.

Mr. Paderewski gave the Schumann A minor concerto and then his own beautiful concerto in the same key. This last he played with such "fine careless rapture" that he had to repeat the last movement.

The orchestral accompaniments were simply exquisite, and Mr. Nikisch came in for a goodly share of the applause. Other numbers were the overture to "Tannhauser," the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture by Berliz, and "Le Rouet d'Omphale," which were interpreted with all the faultless finish, breadth and delicacy we expect from the greatest orchestra in the country. The evening closed with a brilliant performance of the Liszt Hungarian Fantusia for piano and orchestra.

The pianist received many floral tributes and wreaths. The whole affair was a great success, and quite in consonance with Mr. Paderewski's generositty and the liberality of the Steinways, who defrayed the expenses of the house.

SUN, New York, N. Y.
Date 3/27

Paderewski closes this evening with his grand concert at the Metropolitan Opera House in aid of the Washington Arch Fund his remarkably successful tour in this country, remarkable both from an artistic and financial standpoint. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will take part in to-night's concert, under the leadership of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and the event promises to be particularly interesting and pleasurable. The idea of such a benefit concert originated with Paderewski himself, who was anxious to show his keen appreciation of the generous way in which he has been received by the American people. Col. Higginson of Boston offered the services of the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra, free of all expense, and the Steinways have agreed to pay the rent of the Opera House, so that the entire gross receipts will go to the Arch fund. The programme arranged is as follows: Overture, "Tannhäuser," Wagner; concerto "A minor," Schumann; overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz; concerto, Paderewski; "Le rouet d'Omphale," Saint Saëns, and Hungarian Fantasie, by Liszt.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, MONDAY, MARCH 28, 1892.

PADEREWSKI AND NIKISCH.

The concert in aid of the Washington Memorial Arch Fund, projected by Mr. Paderewski, the great pianist, was given at the Metropolitan Opera House last night and was a success of the most pronounced type. The fund is increased by $4,300, and the pianist, who is nothing if not amiable, departs leaving behind him the memory of a graceful act as well as the remembrance of a noble art. Great credit is due to those who assisted the Polish musician in carrying his purpose to a successful issue. Col. Higginson of Boston sent over the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and William Steinway, who is never behindhand in public spirit or charity, paid the rent of the house and the expenses of advertising the concert.

The entertainment was in itself a thoroughly enjoyable one, and it was made the occasion of a public demonstration of the warm esteem which Mr. Paderewski's personal qualities as well as his splendid abilities have won for him. The programme consisted of the following numbers: Overture to "Tannhäuser," Schumann's piano concert in A minor; overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz; Paderewski's piano concerto; symphonic poem, "Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Säens, and Liszt's Hungarian fantasy for piano and orchestra.

The audience displayed its greatest enthusiasm after the performance of the pianist's fine concerto, which is a work fully worthy of admiration. After several recalls, Mr. Paderewski returned to the piano and Mr. Nikisch to the conductor's desk. The audience, perceiving that the last movement of the concerto was to be repeated, demonstrated its delight in a manner which must have warmed the composer's heart. He repeated the last movement with superb vigor, and compelled Mr. Nikisch to join him in acknowledging the applause which followed.

After the final number Parke Godwin and Richard Watson Gilder appeared on the stage, while an usher rushed down the centre aisle bearing the crossed colors of the United States and Poland, between which hung a wreath. Mr. Gilder held Mr. Paderewski, while Mr. Godwin presented the token of appreciation in a brief speech. He dwelt upon the excellence of the pianist's art and expressed gratitude for his kindly aid to the arch fund, treating it as an act in keeping with the regard shown for this country by Mr. Paderewski's countrymen in days gone by. He intimated that the wreath was a pledge of a finer gift to come, a gift which would emanate from the chisel of St. Gaudens.

The audience seemed much pleased, and its applause plainly demanded a response from the pianist. Not being a public speaker, he expressed himself through his art. He returned to the piano and gave a vigorous performance of Liszt's second Hungarian rhapsody. Taken altogether, it was a great night for the artist; and had he needed any proof of the high regard in which he is held, he could certainly have asked for no greater one. No further comment need be made at this time on Mr. Paderewski's playing, but it may be said that a certain indefinable personal attractiveness, which has always found expression in his art, has given great aid to his unsurpassed technical accomplishments and his unfailing beauty of performance. We share most heartily in the hope voiced by Mr. Godwin that he will return to America at no distant date. No artist whom we have ever heard has done more to justify the poetic fancy of Sidney Lanier that "music is love in search of a word."

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

MONDAY, MARCH 28, 1892.

MR. PADEREWSKI'S FAREWELL.

It is not only probable but most likely that Mr. Paderewski, when he leaves the shores of America to-morrow, will carry with him quite as good an opinion of the people of this country as he has compelled them to have of him. His artistic tour just concluded was the most successful of any pianist who has visited the United States. It was a graceful act of appreciation on his part that he gave the concert which took place last night at the Metropolitan Opera House for the benefit of the Washington Arch Fund. Fortunately for the financial and artistic outcome of the undertaking, he found three men who were willing to aid him—Mr. Steinway, who paid all the local expenses of the concert; Mr. Higginson, who contributed the services of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and paid the cost of their visit, and Mr. Nikisch, who conducted the concert. As a result, the arch fund has been increased about $4,300, which may be looked upon as a handsome result, indeed, in view of all the circumstances.

Everything except the weather and a rather large number of empty boxes, which might be accounted for on the score of Lent, the weather, the short notice and the excessive price put upon them by the management, conspired to make the affair of last night one of extreme brilliancy. The visiting orchestra did not appear to such good advantage as it does in Chickering Hall, and the Academy of Music, in Brooklyn, but it was in close sympathy with Mr. Paderewski and he with it, and the music which was played went with a good deal of spirit—especially the pianist's own concerto, the exquisite slow movement and the brilliant finale of which aroused such enthusiasm that Mr. Paderewski repeated the last movement. The repetition was a well-earned and neatly-paid compliment to Mr. Nikisch and his men, with whom the pianist seemed extremely desirous to share the honors of the evening.

The concert was made a gala occasion for the concert-goers. The desks of all the musicians were decorated with the Polish colors and the flags of the United States and Poland stood in the corners of the stage. Wreaths of laurel were handed to Mr. Paderewski and Mr. Nikisch. When the end of the programme was reached and while the house was ringing with applause and cries of "bravo," Mr. Parke Godwin and Mr. Richard Watson Gilder appeared upon the stage and intercepted Mr. Paderewski, who was about to leave it. Mr. Godwin then on behalf of some friends of the pianist asked for silence, and in a speech of some length presented him with a second wreath and a stand of colors which, it was explained, was but an earnest of a more substantial token of appreciation of the artist's genius and generosity, which is to follow later. It is to be a work of art from the hands of Mr. St. Gaudens. Mr. Godwin waxed eloquent on the subject of Polish independence and the appositeness o the act of a countryman of Kosciusko in aiding to build a monument to the Polish patriot's companion in arms, and fired the enthusiasm anew. Mr. Paderewski went to the pianoforte to give expression to his feelings, and played Liszt's second Hungarian Rhapsody.

The Sun.

MONDAY, MARCH 28, 1892.

Mr. Paderewski's Final Appearance.

Mr. Paderewski took leave last evening of some 2,000 of his admirers, assembled in the Metropolitan Opera House. The occasion was made particularly noteworthy in an artistic sense by the coöperation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and, from a material standpoint, by the intended contribution to the Washington Arch Fund of the whole proceeds of the entertainment. An effort had been made to enliven the somewhat sombre aspect of the stage by a show of American flags, and by draping the musicians' stands with parti-colored sashes of red and white—the Polish colors. The piano, too, was partially imbedded in flowers and palms. It would be flattery to say that the decorative features of the proceedings were as impressive as was the performance itself.

This, if it threw no new light upon the marvellous execution and endurance of Mr. Paderewski and upon the admirable dignity of his art, gave his attributes greater prominence than was ever bestowed upon them in this city. It is simple justice to say that such accompaniments as were furnished the concertos and the fantasia that made up the virtuoso's share of the programme had never before been listened to by a New York audience, and when, at the close of the virtuoso's own composition, he forced Mr. Nikisch to step down from his platform and with him acknowledge the applause, there were no two opinions as to the fairness of the tribute. Those music lovers that missed last night's concert missed such an opportunity of realizing the possibilities of orchestral playing as may not soon be offered them.

Of Mr. Paderewski's own work there is little, at this late day, to be said. The clearness and virility of conception, strength and splendor of execution, and gigantic force which never once last evening degenerated into brutality, asserted themselves all through his playing, and if aught was lacking, it was the occasional sentimentality, and morbidness that might now and then impart to the pianist's readings a subtle charm that many would welcome as a passing cloudlet in the dazzling glow of a tropical dawn. In Schumann's A minor concerto, in Mr. Paderewski's rendering of which directness, power, clearness, and absolute precision were the plainest characteristics, this lack of contrast was more evident than in the player's own concerto, with the emotional side of which he is naturally in closer sympathy; from the first, moreover, the tempo in Schumann's tone-poem was taken a trifle faster than could have been wished. Mr. Paderewski's concerto, on the other hand, was executed to perfection, and the unity of purpose and interpretation between the soloist and Mr. Nikisch's band, was, as mentioned already, something akin to a revelation.

There was a strong demonstration of delight at this stage of events, and part of the last division of the concerto had to be repeated. Mr. Paderewski's final number was Liszt's Hungarian Fantasia, and the orchestra's pieces were the "Tannhäuser" and "Benvenuto Cellini" overtures, and Saint Saëns's "Rouet d'Omphale." The receipts of the concert will reach between $3,500 and $4,000. The farewell matinee of the day previous brought in $6,500.

---

lipping from 3-26

Date

VOCAL MUSIC.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel's Second Recital. A Musicale Classique.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel gave their second recital at the Chestnut Street Opera House yesterday and a larger audience than before enjoyed anew their exquisitely refined and finished singing. The programme had the same wide range from classic to modern songs, the duets including one from Mehul's "Joseph" and one from Gretry's "Richard," a brilliant bit of Boildieu and Mr. Henschel's "Oh, That We Two Were Maying." The last is an admirably written duet in canon form, skilful and smooth and genuinely musical, and the execution of it was a delight. No two artists have recently appeared here whose impression was more completely satisfying and all who appreciate the fine art of singing will look forward to their return.

Mrs. Helen Boice-Hunsicker gave a musicale at the New Century Drawing Room last evening before a fashionable audience. The well-known soprano was in excellent voice and sang the "Freischutz" aria and a group of modern songs with her usual success. Mr. Marzen, tenor, and Mr. Hunsicker, baritone, were the other singers. The programme, including a trio by Randegger. Mr. Hille, Mr. Hennig and Mrs. Murray played, the concert opening with a quintette by Jadassohn.

SHERIFF DUNN'S SLAYERS.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 3/26

THE HENCSHEL RECITAL.

A Charming Concert of Song at the Opera House.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel gave their second song recital at the Opera House yesterday afternoon before a large and cultivated audience. They are both consummate artists, and the long and varied programme which they presented was very admirably and charmingly rendered. Few vocalists have carried the art of singing songs, with piano accompaniment, to such perfection as they have. Mrs. Henschel's method is excellent, and her sentiment always sincere, while her voice, cultivated to the last degree, is finely sympathetic. Mr. Henschel is also an uncommonly good singer, and an ideal accompanist. Together they make a combination quite unique and scarcely surpassable. Among their selections yesterday those which gave the most pleasure were perhaps the song from "Il Seraglio," the "Little Red Lark," "Polly Willis," Massenet's "Crepusenle," and Henschel's duet "Oh! that we two [illegible] Maying."

[164]

Daily Traveller

MONDAY, MARCH 28, 1892.

The Twentieth Symphony Concert.

The programme of the 20th Symphony Concert at the Music Hall Saturday evening embraced Brahms's "Tragic Overture;" two movements from the ballet music in "Orpheus," by Gluck; Beethoven's 8th Symphony; an aria from "Orpheus," "Che faro," Gluck; two songs by Schubert and one by Schumann. The vocalist was Mme. Amalia Joachim, who appeared to much better advantage in the large area of the Music Hall than in the more confined space of Steinert's concert room. Her false intonation was just as pronounced, however, and her method of voice production just as reprehensible for the observance of the student in vocal culture.

Mr. Nikisch accompanied her songs upon the piano in a most artistic and charming manner. In fact, the accompaniment of the "Erl King" of Schubert attracted more attention, and rightly so, than did the singing of the piece. It is a rare gift of Mr. Nikisch, this ability to so superbly accompany a singer. The "Tragic Overture" of Brahms is a noble work, bold and original in many respects, but wanting in something to brighten it up and relieve the dramatic or heroic intensity of much of the music. Mr. Henschel first brought it out in these concerts in 1881.

Mr. Gericke also played it, and to him we are indebted for the favorable impression it has created, for under his masterly direction all that there is of repose in it was revealed in relief to the tragic energy that prevails so generously. It was played Saturday evening by Mr. Nikisch with fierceness and harshness and almost devoid of any contrast, so slight was the variation between the more or less loudness of the rendering. Such indications as P sotto voce, PP sempre, Sempre P e dolce, PP tranquillo were never for one moment experienced in the playing. But, then, one has little reason for expecting any refinement from Mr. Nikisch's orchestral efforts. For three years he has revelled among the delicate nuances of compositions of every class as a bull would in a china shop.

I cannot understand how a man can sit at a piano and play with such wonderful delicacy and artistic judgment as he did in accompanying Mme. Joachim at this concert, and then climb up on his two boxes and go at the playful, humorous eighth symphony with his whole band rasping and blowing fffff's, as on Saturday night. The delightful strains of this symphony have been given us so beautifully and effectively by the refined Gericke that it will take several seasons more of this violent discipline under Nikisch before the intelligent and musical listener at the symphony concerts can become accustomed to having it fired at them out of a 20-inch gun, so to speak, and not rebel. The Allegretto Scherzando was taken too slowly, having neither the sense of Allegretto or Scherzando about it.

It has been a most unfortunate thing for Mr. Nikisch's reputation as a classic interpreter that Theodore Thomas and Wilhelm Gericke have set a standard in the rendering of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven years ago in Boston—a standard so far above anything that Nikisch has shown that the critical or even the refined musical listener cannot accept what Nikisch has given us as other than an example of coarseness, if not to say vulgarity of interpretation.

The Gluck numbers went fairly well, the first one particularly so. The flute solo by Mr. Mole was played in a masterly manner. The "Furientanz," however, got a good rasping from the strings; the dim poco a poco smorzando PP could hardly have been discovered with a telescope of high power.

Clipping from ..... Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3/26

PADEREWSKI'S PROGRAMME.

M. Paderewski and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take part in the concert to be given to-morrow in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, for the benefit of the Washington Arch Fund. The "Tannhauser" overture of Richard Wagner, the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz, and Saint-Saens' "Le Rouet d'Omphale" will be played by the band.

M. Paderewski will be heard in the A minor concerto of Schumann, his own concerto, and the Liszt "Hungarian Fantasie."

GAZETTE, Worcester, Mass.

Date 3/26

[illegible] Paderewski's last appearance in this country will be in New York for the benefit of the Washington Arch Fund. This [illegible] New-York charity, like the [illegible] Monument. The Boston Symphony [illegible] has been loaned by Mr. [illegible]. We are sorry some real [illegible] selected.

[165]

Season of 1892

Mr. & Mrs. Georg Henschel's

. . Vocal Recitals . .

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

First Recital

MEIONAON,
BOSTON.

Tuesday Evening, March 29, at 8.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 88.

MONDAY, MARCH 28, 1892.

PADEREWSKI AND BOSTON.

Joint Efforts in Aid of New York's Washington Arch.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, March 28, 1892. Paderewski the pianist and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid a large sum toward the completion of the Washington arch, by their services at the Metropolitan Opera House concert last evening, the receipts being over $4000.

The combination of this talent for the evening was brought about originally by the great admiration expressed by the pianist for the Boston musicians under Mr. Nikisch's direction, and this evening's concert has fully justified the sentiments of Paderewski, for a greater ovation has never been paid here to any orchestral organization than that shown the Boston men on this occasion.

The programme opened with the "Tannhauser" overture, and at its conclusion the audience called Mr. Nikisch repeatedly to acknowledge the applause it aroused. Later on the enthusiasm of the audience rose to its highest pitch at the conclusion of the romance of Paderewski's concerto, which he played as he has never played anything before in this country. It was a revelation of the genius of the composer and player which will not soon be forgotten by the audience present. Paderewski insisted upon having Mr. Nikisch share the ovation which followed the movement, and at the conclusion of the concerto the applause could not be quieted until the final movement had been repeated.

The concert was throughout a series of triumphs for the pianist and the orchestra and made an impression that will not easily be effaced.

The public spirit and liberality of Mr. Henry L. Higginson in contributing free of all expense the services of the Boston Symphony orchestra was a universal topic of commendation during the evening.

Clipping from Herald Willimantic Conn

Date 3/26

Henry L. Higginson of Boston has added a codicil to his will leaving an investment of $1,000,000 as an endowment fund, the interest to be used for the support of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Clipping from Telegram New York N.Y.

Date 3/26

To-morrow evening at the Metropolitan Opera House, Paderewski, the greatest living pianist, will make his last appearance here. He will be supported by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Paderewski says is the best in the world. The proceeds of this concert will be generously donated by Paderewski and Arthur Nikish, the conductor of the orchestra, to the Washington Arch Fund. It is expected that a large sum will be realised.

* * *

Mr. Eugene d'Albert will give three recitals of piano music at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, on the afternoons of April 5, 7 and 9. His first programme will be devoted to Beethoven. The second will include compositions by Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Tausig and Liszt, and at the third concert he will play selections from Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubenstein and Liszt.

* * *

PRESS, Portland, Me.

Date 3/24

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The great Boston Symphony Orchestra, sixty musicians, conducted by Mr. Nikisch, with Mrs. Nikisch as soprano soloist, will appear in the regular Stockbridge course next Tuesday evening. Mrs. Nikisch is one of the most agreeable of the many vocalists on the concert stage today, possessing in great degree the many qualities that go to make a popular singer. She is a great favorite in Boston. Tickets at Stockbridge's. There will be late trains.

Harrisburg
Telegram
march 27

Eugene d'Albert is here and presently there will be a fresh stirring of the waters of the piano world.

Boston Herald.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30, 1892.

THE HENSCHELS.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave last evening in the Meionaon the first of a series of four vocal recitals. The programme was as follows:

Duet, "Qual onda che rovina" ..... Padre Martini
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Aria, "Oh, Sleep," from "Semele." } ..... Handel
Aria, "Qual farfaletta," from "Partenope" }
Mrs. Henschel.
Aria from "Il Maestro di Musica" ..... Pergolesi
Aria Buffa from "Calandrino" ..... Cimarosa
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's Song ..... Beethoven
"Auf Flugeln des Gesanges" ..... Mendelssohn
"In the Woods" ..... Franz
Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Doppleganger." }
"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus." } ..... Schubert
"Der Schiffer." }
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from the "Taming of the Shrew." ..... Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Romance. }
"Morgens als Lerche." } (New) ..... Henschel
"Der Bote." }
Mrs. Henschel.
The Czar's Song, from "Czar and Carpenter." ..... Lortzing
Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philemon et Baucis." Gounod
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village." Boieldieu
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

The programme of last evening showed, as usual, the catholic spirit and fine taste of Mr. Henschel. He does not question nationality or time. He introduces to the hearer the glories of operas that, once the fashion, are now forgotten. He arranges his programmes without pedantry, and yet, by the graceful display of his knowledge, his concerts have a distinct educational value. Martini, for instance, is known to many as a theoretical and an historical writer; to some as a composer of sonatas and church pieces, but few are acquainted with his chamber duets. Pergolesi's "Stabat" and "Nina" are familiar, but the genius of the man is perhaps more fully seen in opera and intermezzo. The mention of "Il Maestro di Musica" brings to mind the translation of this and other works of the gifted Italian into French, and the history of the opera bouffon in Paris and its influence on French music. And see with what simple means the men of former days worked delightful results. Take the numbers by Pergolesi, Cimarosa and Boieldieu and compare their melodies and the expression of their musical ideas with the work of the men of our day in the same direction. Goetz writes an opera called "The Taming of the Shrew." The subject is certainly not tragic; it does not call for strong, emotional music, and yet in the duet between Petruchio and Katherine, which, according to the programme, be ins in a playful tone, we find the accompaniment arresting the attention; we find harmonies and modulations that might be easily taken from the later music-dramas of Wagner, music that suggests neither playfulness nor the sparkling love passages of comedy. We seem to have lost the frank and laughing melody, the unaffected expression, the innocent simplicity of the old masters of light opera. Where to-day is there a composer who could write the duet of Boieldieu that was sung last evening; who could so admirably suit with his music the situation; who could be so naturally simple and graceful?

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were most warmly welcomed, and throughout the evening there was hearty and genuine applause. The actual performance was, in certain respects, a disappointment. Mrs. Henschel was evidently indisposed, and she did not do herself justice. Her intonation was not always true; she was at times unable to sustain her tones, and she often sang with a decided tremolo. Still there was much that was pleasing in her interpretation, and the singer may well say, with de Musset, "My glass is small, but I drink out of my own glass." She was heard to best advantage in the Mendelssohn number, the romance by her husband and the duets.

Mr. Henschel's natural gifts and limitations are well known in this city, and they do not call for full discussion. It is also idle, perhaps, to quarrel with him for his practice of playing his own accompaniments. At the same time, it may be said that a singer can not give his attention to the song and to the accompaniment. One or the other must inevitably suffer. Last evening, for instance, the climax of Schubert's "Gruppe" was in the accompaniment and not in the song. I admit cheerfully that Mr. Henschel, as a rule, plays delightful accompaniments. But is it not probable that he would make greater vocal effects if he were able to concentrate his attention on the song, and on the song alone? Certain of his mannerisms are now more pronounced; and he has grown careless in the rounding of his phrases, for he often prefers an uncalled-for exclamation point to the needed period. Nor was his sentiment always free from exaggeration, as in the third verse of the Lortzing number. It is a pleasure, however, to pay tribute to his cleverness and his versatility. The aria of Cimarosa was given with infinite spirit, certain lines of Vulcan's complaint were most sympathetically delivered, and in the Boieldieu duet he was wholly admirable. In Schubert's "Dopplegaenger" Mr. Henschel narrowly escaped full and intense dramatic expression. His uncommon temperament is often in evidence. He is a singer of remarkable moments.

The second of these vocal recitals will be given Thursday afternoon in the Meionaon at 2.30 o'clock.

PHILIP HALE.

HERALD, Chicago, Ill.

Date 3/27

D'ALBERT'S SECOND RECITAL.

The comparatively small size of the audience that assembled in Central Music hall yesterday afternoon to listen to Eugene D'Albert's second recital is no doubt to be ascribed to the almost excessive number of concerts of this kind that have been given this season. The performance merited a better attendance, if for no other reason, simply on account of the exceptional opportunity for a comparative study of piano playing that it afforded, since D'Albert's, Paderewski's and Pachmann's styles and individualities are entirely unlike. The programme was as follows: Passacaglia in C minor, Bach, D'Albert; Rondo in A minor, Mozart; Sonata, op. 90, Beethoven; Variations Serieuses, Mendelssohn; Sonata, op. 58, Chopin; "Liebestraum, No. 3," "Feux Follets," Tarantelle, "Napoli," Liszt. To these he was obliged to add Chopin's waltz in A flat and the Strauss-Tausig waltz, "Man lebt nur einmal."

D'Albert's marvelous technique has always caused astonishment, and it did not fail to affect the audience yesterday similarly, particularly as it was exhibited in the Liszt etude and the Strauss-Tausig waltz. But it is not always employed to the best advantage of the composer. Technical facility often overcomes interpretative intentions, meaning is sacrificed to speed, and especially rhythm is made to suffer severely, as was the case in several of the Mendelssohn [illegible]

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, MARCH 28. 1892.

The Twentieth Symphony Concert.

The programme of the 20th Symphony Concert at the Music Hall Saturday evening embraced Brahms's "Tragic Overture;" two movements from the ballet music in "Orpheus," by Gluck; Beethoven's 8th Symphony; an aria from "Orpheus," "Che faro," Gluck; two songs by Schubert and one by Schumann. The vocalist was Mme. Amalia Joachim, who appeared to much better advantage in the large area of the Music Hall than in the more confined space of Steinert's concert room. Her false intonation was just as pronounced, however, and her method of voice production just as reprehensible for the observance of the student in vocal culture.

Mr. Nikisch accompanied her songs upon the piano in a most artistic and charming manner. In fact, the accompaniment of the "Erl King" of Schubert attracted more attention, and rightly so, than did the singing of the piece. It is a rare gift of Mr. Nikisch, this ability to so superbly accompany a singer. The "Tragic Overture" of Brahms is a noble work, bold and original in many respects, but wanting in something to brighten it up and relieve the dramatic or heroic intensity of much of the music. Mr. Henschel first brought it out in these concerts in 1881.

Mr. Gericke also played it, and to him we are indebted for the favorable impression it has created, for under his masterly direction all that there is of repose in it was revealed in relief to the tragic energy that prevails so generously. It was played Saturday evening by Mr. Nikisch with fierceness and harshness and almost devoid of any contrast, so slight was the variation between the more or less loudness of the rendering. Such indications as P sotto voce, PP sempre, Sempre P e dolce, PP tranquillo were never for one moment experienced in the playing. But, then, one has little reason for expecting any refinement from Mr. Nikisch's orchestral efforts. For three years he has revelled among the delicate nuances of compositions of every class as a bull would in a china shop.

I cannot understand how a man can sit at a piano and play with such wonderful delicacy and artistic judgment as he did in accompanying Mme. Joachim at this concert, and then climb up on his two boxes and go at the playful, humorous eighth symphony with his whole band rasping and blowing fffff's, as on Saturday night. The delightful strains of this symphony have been given us so beautifully and effectively by the refined Gericke that it will take several seasons more of this violent discipline under Nikisch before the intelligent and musical listener at the symphony concerts can become accustomed to having it fired at them out of a 20-inch gun, so to speak, and not rebel. The Allegretto Scherzando was taken too slowly, having neither the sense of Allegretto or Scherzando about it.

It has been a most unfortunate thing for Mr. Nikisch's reputation as a classic interpreter that Theodore Thomas and Wilhelm Gericke have set a standard in the rendering of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven years ago in Boston—a standard so far above anything that Nikisch has shown that the critical or even the refined musical listener cannot accept what Nikisch has given us as other than an example of coarseness, if not to say vulgarity of interpretation.

The Gluck numbers went fairly well, the first one particularly so. The flute solo by Mr. Mole was played in a masterly manner. The "Furientanz," however, got a good rasping from the strings; the dim poco a poco smorzando PP could hardly have been discovered with a telescope of high power.

Clipping from ....

Date 3/26

PADEREWSKI'S PROGRAMME.

M. Paderewski and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take part in the concert to be given morrow in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, for the benefit of the Washington Arch Fund. The "Tannhauser" overture of Richard Wagner, the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz, and Saint-Saens' "Le Rouet d'Omphale" will be played by the band.

M. Paderewski will be heard in the A minor concerto of Schumann, his own concerto, and the Liszt "Hungarian Fantasie."

GAZETTE, Worcester, Mass.

Date 3/26

Paderewski's last appearance in this country will be in New York for the benefit of the Washington Arch Fund. This is another New-York charity, like the Grant Monument. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been loaned by Mr. Higginson. We are sorry some real charity was not selected.

[165]

Season of 1892

Mr. & Mrs. Georg Henschel's

. . Vocal Recitals . .

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

First Recital

MEIONAON,
BOSTON.

Tuesday Evening, March 29, at 8.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 88.

MONDAY, MARCH 28, 1892.

PADEREWSKI AND BOSTON.

Joint Efforts in Aid of New York's Washington Arch.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, March 28, 1892. Paderewski the pianist and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid a large sum toward the completion of the Washington arch, by their services at the Metropolitan Opera House concert last evening, the receipts being over $4000.

The combination of this talent for the evening was brought about originally by the great admiration expressed by the pianist for the Boston musicians under Mr. Nikisch's direction, and this evening's concert has fully justified the sentiments of Paderewski, for a greater ovation has never been paid here to any orchestral organization than that shown the Boston men on this occasion.

The programme opened with the "Tannhauser" overture, and at its conclusion the audience called Mr. Nikisch repeatedly to acknowledge the applause it aroused. Later on the enthusiasm of the audience rose to its highest pitch at the conclusion of the romance of Paderewski's concerto, which he played as he has never played anything before in this country. It was a revelation of the genius of the composer and player which will not soon be forgotten by the audience present. Paderewski insisted upon having Mr. Nikisch share the ovation which followed the movement, and at the conclusion of the concerto the applause could not be quieted until the final movement had been repeated.

The concert was throughout a series of triumphs for the pianist and the orchestra and made an impression that will not easily be effaced.

The public spirit and liberality of Mr. Henry L. Higginson in contributing free of all expense the services of the Boston Symphony orchestra was a universal topic of commendation during the evening.

Clipping from [illegible]
Willimantic Conn

Date 3/26

Henry L. Higginson of Boston has added a codicil to his will leaving an investment of $1,000,000 as an endowment fund, the interest to be used for the support of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Clipping from Telegram
New York N.Y.

Date 3/26

To-morrow evening at the Metropolitan Opera House, Paderewski, the greatest living pianist, will make his last appearance here. He will be supported by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Paderewski says is the best in the world. The proceeds of this concert will be generously donated by Paderewski and Arthur Nikish, the conductor of the orchestra, to the Washington Arch Fund. It is expected that a large sum will be realised.

* * *

Mr. Eugene d'Albert will give three recitals of piano music at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, on the afternoons of April 5, 7 and 9. His first programme will be devoted to Beethoven. The second will include compositions by Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Tausig and Liszt, and at the third concert he will play selections from Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubenstein and Liszt.

* * *

PRESS, Portland, Me.

Date 3/24

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The great Boston Symphony Orchestra, sixty musicians, conducted by Mr. Nikisch, with Mrs. Nikisch as soprano soloist, will appear in the regular Stockbridge course next Tuesday evening. Mrs. Nikisch is one of the most agreeable of the many vocalists on the concert stage today, possessing in great degree the many qualities that go to make a popular singer. She is a great favorite in Boston. Tickets at Stockbridge's. There will be late trains.

Harris[illegible]
Teleg[illegible]
March 21

Eugene d'Albert is here and presently there will be a fresh stirring of the waters of the piano world.

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30, 1892.

THE HENSCHELS.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave last evening in the Meionaon the first of a series of four vocal recitals. The programme was as follows:

Duet, "Quel onda che rovina" .... Padre Martini
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Aria, "Oh, Sleep," from "Semele."
Aria, "Qual farfaletta," from "Partenope" } ...... Handel
Mrs. Henschel.
Aria from "Il Maestro di Musica" .... Pergolesi
Aria Buffa from "Calandrino" .... Cimarosa
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's Song .... Beethoven
"Auf Flugeln des Gesanges" .... Mendelssohn
"In the Woods" .... Franz
Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Doppleganger."
"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus."
"Der Schiffer." } .... Schubert
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from the "Taming of the Shrew." .... Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Romance.
"Morgens als Lerche."
"Der Bote." } (New) .... Henschel
Mrs. Henschel.
The Czar's Song, from "Czar and Carpenter." .... Lortzing
Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philemon et Baucis." Gounod
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village." Boieldieu
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

The programme of last evening showed, as usual, the catholic spirit and fine taste of Mr. Henschel. He does not question nationality or time. He introduces to the hearer the glories of operas that, once the fashion, are now forgotten. He arranges his programmes without pedantry, and yet, by the graceful display of his knowledge, his concerts have a distinct educational value. Martini, for instance, is known to many as a theoretical and an historical writer; to some as a composer of sonatas and church pieces, but few are acquainted with his chamber duets. Pergolesi's "Stabat" and "Nina" are familiar, but the genius of the man is perhaps more fully seen in opera and intermezzo. The mention of "Il Maestro di Musica" brings to mind the translation of this and other works of the gifted Italian into French, and the history of the opera bouffon in Paris and its influence on French music. And see with what simple means the men of former days worked delightful results. Take the numbers by Pergolesi, Cimarosa and Boieldieu and compare their melodies and the expression of their musical ideas with the work of the men of our day in the same direction. Goetz writes an opera called "The Taming of the Shrew." The subject is certainly not tragic; it does not call for strong, emotional music, and yet in the duet between Petruchio and Katherine, which, according to the programme, be ins in a playful tone, we find the accompaniment arresting the attention; we find harmonies and modulations that might be easily taken from the later music-dramas of Wagner, music that suggests neither playfulness nor the sparkling love passages of comedy. We seem to have lost the frank and laughing melody, the unaffected expression, the innocent simplicity of the old masters of light opera. Where to-day is there a composer who could write the duet of Boieldieu that was sung last evening; who could so admirably suit with his music the situation; who could be so naturally simple and graceful?

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were most warmly welcomed, and throughout the evening there was hearty and genuine applause. The actual performance was, in certain respects, a disappointment. Mrs. Henschel was evidently indisposed, and she did not do herself justice. Her intonation was not always true; she was at times unable to sustain her tones, and she often sang with a decided tremolo. Still there was much that was pleasing in her interpretation, and the singer may well say, with de Musset, "My glass is small, but I drink out of my own glass." She was heard to best advantage in the Mendelssohn number, the romance by her husband and the duets.

Mr. Henschel's natural gifts and limitations are well known in this city, and they do not call for full discussion. It is also idle, perhaps, to quarrel with him for his practice of playing his own accompaniments. At the same time, it may be said that a singer can not give his attention to the song and to the accompaniment. One or the other must inevitably suffer. Last evening, for instance, the climax of Schubert's "Gruppe" was in the accompaniment and not in the song. I admit cheerfully that Mr. Henschel, as a rule, plays delightful accompaniments. But is it not probable that he would make greater vocal effects if he were able to concentrate his attention on the song, and on the song alone? Certain of his mannerisms are now more pronounced; and he has grown careless in the rounding of his phrases, for he often prefers an uncalled-for exclamation point to the needed period. Nor was his sentiment always free from exaggeration, as in the third verse of the Lortzing number. It is a pleasure, however, to pay tribute to his cleverness and his versatility. The aria of Cimarosa was given with infinite spirit, certain lines of Vulcan's complaint were most sympathetically delivered, and in the Boieldieu duet he was wholly admirable. In Schubert's "Dopplegaenger" Mr. Henschel narrowly escaped full and intense dramatic expression. His uncommon temperament is often in evidence. He is a singer of remarkable moments.

The second of these vocal recitals will be given Thursday afternoon in the Meionaon at 2.30 o'clock.

PHILIP HALE.

HERALD, Chicago, Ill.

Date 3/27

D'ALBERT'S SECOND RECITAL.

The comparatively small size of the audience that assembled in Central Music hall yesterday afternoon to listen to Eugene D'Albert's second recital is no doubt to be ascribed to the almost excessive number of concerts of this kind that have been given this season. The performance merited a better attendance, if for no other reason, simply on account of the exceptional opportunity for a comparative study of piano playing that it afforded, since D'Albert's, Paderewski's and Pachmann's styles and individualities are entirely unlike. The programme was as follows: Passacaglia in C minor, Bach, D'Albert; Rondo in A minor, Mozart; Sonata, op. 90, Beethoven; Variations Serieuses, Mendelssohn; Sonata, op. 58, Chopin; "Liebestraum, No. 3," "Feux Follets," Tarantelle, "Napoli," Liszt. To these he was obliged to add Chopin's waltz in A flat and the Strauss-Tausig waltz, "Man lebt nur einmal."

D'Albert's marvelous technique has always caused astonishment, and it did not fail to affect the audience yesterday similarly, particularly as it was exhibited in the Liszt etude and the Strauss-Tausig waltz. But it is not always employed to the best advantage of the composer. Technical facility often overcomes interpretative intentions, meaning is sacrificed to speed, and especially rhythm is made to suffer severely, as was the case in several of the Mendelssohn variations and in the scherzo of the Chopin sonata. He was heard to best advantage in the Bach and Beethoven numbers.

MEIONAON, BOSTON.

Tuesday Evening, March 29,

First Recital, at 8 o'clock.

PROGRAMME.

DUET. "Quel onda che rovina." . . . . PADRE MARTINI
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

The stream that proudly flashing
Leaps from the alpine height,
Is broken on the cruel rocks,
But flows on clear and bright.

While many another lagging
In woodland cool recess
Hath lost in that sweet dull repose
Its crystal loveliness.
—Translation by Miss Gertrude Hall.

(a) ARIA. "Oh, Sleep," from "Semele." } . . . . HANDEL
(b) ARIA. "Qual farfaletta," from "Partenope." }
Mrs. Henschel.

(a) Oh, sleep! why dost thou leave me?
Why thy visionary joys remove?
Oh, sleep! again deceive me,
To my arms restore my wand'ring love.

(b) As a butterfly flutters
Around the light,
My Cupid will burn
His wings so bright.

The shining light attracts me;
I'll constant be forever.
My faith, it shall outshine
All others, changing never.

(a) ARIA from "Il Maestro di Musica." . . . . . . PERGOLESI
(b) ARIA BUFFA from "Calandrino." . . . . . . CIMAROSA
Mr. Henschel.

(English Version.)

(a) Beauty mine, when I'm thy husband,
O what revels! O what banquets!
On my word, I am not jealous;
Wouldst have lovers? I'll dissemble.
Wouldst be courted? I will slumber.
Wouldst be dancing? So will I dance.
'Tis enough that thou art willing
To ennoble my poor house.

(b) Thou shalt see the strong, fair Germany,
France the beautiful, Spain the rich,
Then to England, the thoughtful and serious.
From there will we wander farther away,
Beautiful things we then shall see,
Then shall we laugh in verity.
We shall see low foreheads;
We shall see twisted hair,
Ugly mouths and crooked noses,
Jolly people and people doleful,
Faces white and faces yellow,
Americans, Turks, and Moors, and Negroes,
Giants and dwarfs too dreadful to think of;
Oh, what pleasure it will be!
Fair Irene, thou shalt come with me.
My love, my life, my turtle-dove,
Over the seas and over the land,
My faithful companion thou shalt be.

(a) Mignon's Song. . . . . . . BEETHOVEN
(b) Auf Flügeln des Gesanges. . . . . . MENDELSSOHN
(c) In the Woods. . . . . . . FRANZ
Mrs. Henschel.

(a) Knowest thou the land where the pale citron grows,
And the gold orange through dark foliage glows?
A soft wind flutters from the deep blue sky,
The myrtle blooms, and towers the laurel high.
Knowest thou it well?
Oh, there with thee!
Oh, that I might, my own beloved one, flee!

Knowest thou the house? On pillars rest its beams,
Bright is its hall, in light one chamber gleams,
And marble statues stand and look on me,—
What have they done, thou hapless child, to thee?
Knowest thou it well?
Oh, there with thee!
Oh, that I might, my loved protector, flee!

Knowest thou the track that o'er the mountain goes,
Where the mule threads its way through mist and snows,
Where dwelt in caves the dragon's ancient brood,
Topples the crag, and o'er it rolls the flood?
Knowest thou it well?
Oh, come with me!
There lies our road,—oh, father, let us flee!
From the German of Goethe, by Sir Theodore Martin.

(b) On wings of song, my fairest,
Oh, come with me away,
Where flow'rs in beauty rarest
Awake to greet the day;

And there soft hours beguiling,
Beneath the moonlit ray,
The lotus brightly smiling
Awaits thy fondest lay.

The violet gently viewing
The starlit heav'n above,
Roses calmly wooing
Mild zephyrs with tales of love.

Gazelles come hither list'ning,
While breezes lightly blow,
And in the distance glist'ning
The sacred Ganges flow.

Amid the palms reposing,
We'll breathe the fragrant air,
While sleep our eyelids closing,
In dreams forget all care.

(c) The woods, the woods, are fresh and green,
There wave the dark branches and flowers are seen;
Through the drooping boughs, to my heart's delight;
Smile heaven's blue sky and the sunshine bright,
In woodlands cool and shady.

[illegible]

THE HENSCHELS.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave last evening in the Meionaon the first of a series of four vocal recitals. The programme was as follows:

Duet, "Quel onda che rovina" . . . . Padre Martini
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Aria, "Oh, Sleep," from "Semele." } . . . . . Handel
Aria, "Qual farfaletta," from "Partenope" }
Mrs. Henschel.
Aria from "Il Maestro di Musica" . . . . Pergolesi
Aria Buffa from "Calandrino" . . . . Cimarosa
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's Song . . . . Beethoven
"Auf Flugeln des Gesanges" . . . . Mendelssohn
"In the Woods" . . . . Franz
Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Doppleganger." }
"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus." } . . . . Schubert
"Der Schiffer." }
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from the "Taming of the Shrew." . . . . Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Romance. }
"Morgens als Lerche." } (New) . . . . Henschel
"Der Bote." }
Mrs. Henschel.
The Czar's Song, from "Czar and Carpenter." . . Lortzing
Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philemon et Baucis." Gounod
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village." Boieldieu
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

The programme of last evening showed, as usual, the catholic spirit and fine taste of Mr. Henschel. He does not question nationality or time. He introduces to the hearer the glories of operas that, once the fashion, are now forgotten. He arranges his programmes without pedantry, and yet, by the graceful display of his knowledge, his concerts have a distinct educational value. Martini for instance, is known to many as a theoretical and an historical writer; to some as a composer of sonatas and church pieces, but few are acquainted with his chamber duets. Pergolesi's "Stabat" and "Nina" are familiar, but the genius of the man is perhaps more fully seen in opera and intermezzo. The mention of "Il Maestro di Musica" brings to mind the translation of this and other works of the gifted Italian into French, and the history of the opera bouffon in Paris and its influence on French music. And see with what simple means the men of former days worked delightful results. Take the numbers by Pergolesi, Cimarosa and Boieldieu and compare their melodies and the expression of their musical ideas with the work of the men of our day in the same direction. Goetz writes an opera called "The Taming of the Shrew." The subject is certainly not tragic; it does not call for strong, emotional music, and yet in the duet between Petruchio and Katherine, which, according to the programme, be ins in a playful tone, we find the accompaniment arresting the attention; we find harmonies and modulations that might be easily taken from the later music-dramas of Wagner, music that suggests neither playfulness nor the sparkling love passages of comedy. We seem to have lost the frank and laughing melody, the unaffected expression, the innocent simplicity of the old masters of light opera. Where to-day is there a composer who could write the duet of Boieldieu that was sung last evening; who could so admirably suit with his music the situation; who could be so naturally simple and graceful?

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were most warmly welcomed, and throughout the evening there was hearty and genuine applause. The actual performance was, in certain respects, a disappointment. Mrs. Henschel was evidently indisposed, and she did not do herself justice. Her intonation was not always true; she was at times unable to sustain her tones, and she often sang with a decided tremolo. Still there was much that was pleasing in her interpretation, and the singer may well say, with de Musset, "My glass is small, but I drink out of my own glass." She was heard to best advantage in the Mendelssohn number, the romance by her husband and the duets.

Mr. Henschel's natural gifts and limitations are well known in this city, and they do not call for full discussion. It is also idle, perhaps, to quarrel with him for his practice of playing his own accompaniments. At the same time, it may be said that a singer can not give his attention to the song and to the accompaniment. One or the other must inevitably suffer. Last evening, for instance, the climax of Schubert's "Gruppe" was in the accompaniment and not in the song. I admit cheerfully that Mr. Henschel, as a rule, plays delightful accompaniments. But is it not probable that he would make greater vocal effects if he were able to concentrate his attention on the song, and on the song alone? Certain of his mannerisms are now more pronounced; and he has grown careless in the rounding of his phrases, for he often prefers an uncalled-for exclamation point to the needed period. Nor was his sentiment always free from exaggeration, as in the third verse of the Lortzing number. It is a pleasure, however, to pay tribute to his cleverness and his versatility. The aria of Cimarosa was given with infinite spirit, certain lines of Vulcan's complaint were most sympathetically delivered, and in the Boieldieu duet he was wholly admirable. In Schubert's "Doppiegaenger" Mr. Henschel narrowly escaped full and intense dramatic expression. His uncommon temperament is often in evidence. He is a singer of remarkable moments.

The second of these vocal recitals will be given Thursday afternoon in the Meionaon at 2.30 o'clock.

PHILIP HALE.

HERALD, Chicago, Ill.
Date 3/27

D'ALBERT'S SECOND RECITAL.

The comparatively small size of the audience that assembled in Central Music hall yesterday afternoon to listen to Eugene D'Albert's second recital is no doubt to be ascribed to the almost excessive number of concerts of this kind that have been given this season. The performance merited a better attendance, if for no other reason, simply on account of the exceptional opportunity for a comparative study of piano playing that it afforded, since D'Albert's, Paderewski's and Pachmann's styles and individualities are entirely unlike. The programme was as follows: Passacaglia in C minor, Bach, D'Albert; Rondo in A minor, Mozart; Sonata, op. 90, Beethoven; Variations Serieuses, Mendelssohn; Sonata, op. 58, Chopin; "Liebestraum, No. 3," "Feux Follets," Tarantelle, "Napoli," Liszt. To these he was obliged to add Chopin's waltz in A flat and the Strauss-Tausig waltz, "Man lebt nur einmal."

D'Albert's marvelous technique has always caused astonishment, and it did not fail to affect the audience yesterday [illegible]

[illegible] about it.

It has been a most unfortunate thing for Mr. Nikisch's reputation as a classic interpreter that Theodore Thomas and Wilhelm Gericke have set a standard in the rendering of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven years ago in Boston—a standard so far above anything that Nikisch has shown that the critical or even the [illegible] musical listener cannot accept what Nikisch has given us as other than an example of coarseness, if not to say vulgarity of interpretation.

The Gluck numbers went fairly well, the first one particularly so. The flute solo by Mr. Mole was played in a masterly manner. The "Furientanz," however, got a good rasping from the strings; [illegible] poco a poco smorzando PP could hardly have been discovered with a telescope of high power.

Clipping from Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 3/26

PADEREWSKI'S PROGRAMME.

[illegible] Paderewski and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take part in the concert to be given [illegible] in the Metropolitan Opera House, New [illegible] for the benefit of the Washington Arch [illegible] The "Tannhauser" overture of Richard [illegible], the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of [illegible] and Saint-Saens' "Le Rouet d'Omphale" [illegible] played by the band.

[illegible] Paderewski will be heard in the A minor [illegible] of Schumann, his own concerto, and the [illegible] Hungarian Fantasie."

GAZETTE, Worcester, Mass.
3/26

[illegible] last appearance in this [illegible] in New York for the benefit [illegible] Washington Arch Fund. This [illegible] York charity, like the [illegible]. The Boston Symphony [illegible] has been loaned by Mr. [illegible] are sorry some real [illegible] affected.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 88.

MONDAY, MARCH 28, 1892.

PADEREWSKI AND BOSTON.

Joint Efforts in Aid of New York's Washington Arch.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

New York, March 28, 1892. Paderewski the pianist and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid a large sum toward the completion of the Washington arch, by their services at the Metropolitan Opera House concert last evening, the receipts being over $4000.

The combination of this talent for the evening was brought about originally by the great admiration expressed by the pianist for the Boston musicians under Mr. Nikisch's direction, and this evening's concert has fully justified the sentiments of Paderewski, for a greater ovation has never been paid here to any orchestral organization than that shown the Boston men on this occasion.

The programme opened with the "Tannhauser" overture, and at its conclusion the audience called Mr. Nikisch repeatedly to acknowledge the applause it aroused. Later on the enthusiasm of the audience rose to its highest pitch at the conclusion of the romance of Paderewski's concerto, which he played as he has never played anything before in this country. It was a revelation of the genius of the composer and player which will not soon be forgotten by the audience present. Paderewski insisted upon having Mr. Nikisch share the ovation which followed the movement, and at the conclusion of the concerto the applause could not be quieted until the final movement had been repeated.

The concert was throughout a series of triumphs for the pianist and the orchestra and made an impression that will not easily be effaced.

The public spirit and liberality of Mr. Henry L. Higginson in contributing free of all expense the services of the Boston Symphony orchestra was a universal topic of commendation during the evening.

Clipping from Herald
Willimantic Conn
Date 3/26

Henry L. Higginson of Boston has added a codicil to his will leaving an in[illegible] of $1,000,000 as an endowment [illegible] used for the sup[illegible]

Clipping from Telegram
New York N.Y.
Date 3/26

To-morrow evening at the Metropolitan Opera House, Paderewski, the greatest living pianist, will make his last appearance here. He will be supported by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Paderewski says is the best in the world. The proceeds of this concert will be generously donated by Paderewski and Arthur Nikish, the conductor of the orchestra, to the Washington Arch Fund. It is expected that a large sum will be realised.

* * *

Mr. Eugene d'Albert will give three recitals of piano music at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, on the afternoons of April 5, 7 and 9. His first programme will be devoted to Beethoven. The second will include compositions by Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Tausig and Liszt, and at the third concert he will play selections from Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubenstein and Liszt.

* * *

PRESS, Portland, Me.
Date 3/24

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The great Boston Symphony Orchestra, sixty musicians, conducted by Mr. Nikisch, with Mrs. Nikisch as soprano soloist, will appear in the regular Stockbridge course next Tuesday evening. Mrs. Nikisch is one of the most agreeable of the many vocalists on the concert stage today, possessing in great degree the many qualities that go to make a popular singer. She is a great favorite in Boston. Tickets at Stockbridge's. There will be late trains.

Harrisburg
Teligram
March 27

[illegible] d'Albert is here and presently [illegible]

The woods, the woods, are the realms of love,
There warble the birds in the boughs above,
There rocks the flowers the whispering air;
And I rock and kiss thee, my darling, there
In woodlands cool and shady.

Shines red through the branches the evening glow,
And night steals onward so calm and slow;
Gayly for home we then depart,
Joy of the woodlands within each heart,
Of woodlands cool and shady.

(a) Der Doppelgänger.
(b) Gruppe aus dem Tartarus. . . . . . SCHUBERT
(c) Der Schiffer.

Mr. Henschel.

(English Version.)

(a) The night is still, and the streets are deserted,
In this house my love had her dwelling of yore;
'Tis long since she from the city departed,
Yet her house still stands on the spot as before.

There stands, too, a man, who stares up at her casement,
And wrings his hands with the weight of his woes;
I look on his face with shudd'ring amazement,—
The moon doth the form of myself disclose.

Thou pallid fellow, thou worthless double!
Why dare to mimic my love's hard lot,
Which many a night gave me grief and trouble
In former days, on this very spot?

(b) Hark! Like the sea in wrath the heavens assailing,
Or like a brook through rocky basin wailing,
Comes from below, in groaning agony,
A heavy, vacant, torment-breathing sigh!

Their faces marks of bitter torture wear,
While from their lips burst curses of despair;
Their eyes are hollow, and full of woe,
And their looks with heartfelt anguish
Seek Cocytus' stream that runs wailing below,
For the bridge o'er its waters they languish.

And they say to each other in accents of fear,
"Oh, when will the time of fulfilment appear?"
High over them boundless eternity quivers,
And the scythe of Saturnus all-ruthlessly shivers!

English version by E. A. Bowring.

(English Version.)

(c) In wind and in weather the river I ply,
All drenched by the rain the storm I defy,
And lashing the waves with a powerful sway
I hope for a beautiful day.

The billows give chase to the small moaning skiff,
The whirlpool it threatens and threatens the cliff.
Now boulders are rolling from rocky height,
And fir-trees are sighing like spectres of night.

Yea, as it has happened so was it my will,
I shrink from a life that is quiet and still;
And, should e'er the billows my vessel devour,
I'd praise my lot e'en in that hour.

Rage on then, thou element's impotent ire,
Within me there gloweth a blissful desire,
Refreshing the nerves,—O heaven's delight,— Defying the storm with a man's power and might.

DUET from the "Taming of the Shrew." . . . . . . GOETZ

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

Petruchio. (In a playful tone.)
Come, Kate, my dearest! 'Tis so warm at home,
The silver moon invites us forth to roam.

Katherine. The sun now shines with mid-day heat,
But yet to please thee, yes! The moon is shining o'er us!

Petruchio. The moon! my dearest! thou hast thy reason yet!
Bethink thee now! the day is half before us.
Say, thou dost not mean that now the moon is shining?

Katherine. I mean it not.
Mine eyes with tears are blinded, I see not clearly.
This alone is clear: I am myself no longer what I was!
At last is tamed the shrewish maiden's haughtiness.
A wife's far fairer honor is what I long for.
I see what thou hast meant by all thy joking.
Do what thou wilt with me, I am thy wife,
And thine I am for life!

Petruchio. Enough, my dearest wife! The test is ended,
And all these juggler's tricks away we send.
To help thee has thy noble reason tended,
And now we both have reached a happy end.

Katherine. O what exceeding joy! O happy end!

Katherine. I wished I could hate thee, and from thee sever.

Petruchio. And now thou art mine own forever!

Katherine. The heart that vexed thee deep sorrow is feeling.

Petruchio. And at this moment has met with its healing.

Katherine. Then joking and teasing away we send,

Both. And put to our sorrows their longed for end.

Both. What rest to the weary once more to have gladness,
When sunlight returning drives far cloudy sadness.
Such power as love has is nowhere found,
By love is creation together bound!

The music to Goetz's opera is set to Dr. Widmann's German libretto.

THE HENSCHELS.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave last evening in the Meionaon the first of a series of four vocal recitals. The programme was as follows:

Duet, "Quel onda che rovina" . . . . . Padre Martini
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Aria, "Oh, Sleep," from "Semele." } . . . . . Handel
Aria, "Qual farfaletta," from "Partenope" }
Mrs. Henschel.
Aria from "Il Maestro di Musica" . . . . . Pergolesi
Aria Buffa from "Calandrino" . . . . . Cimarosa
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's Song . . . . . Beethoven
"Auf Flugeln des Gesanges" . . . . . Mendelssohn
"In the Woods" . . . . . Franz
Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Doppleganger." }
"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus." } . . . . . Schubert
"Der Schiffer." }
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from the "Taming of the Shrew." . . . . . Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Romance. }
"Morgens als Lerche." } (New) . . . . . Henschel
"Der Bote." }
Mrs. Henschel.
The Czar's Song, from "Czar and Carpenter." . . . Lortzing
Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philemon et Baucis." Gounod
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village." Boieldieu
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

The programme of last evening showed, as usual, the catholic spirit and fine taste of Mr. Henschel. He does not question nationality or time. He introduces to the hearer the glories of operas that, once the fashion, are now forgotten. He arranges his programmes without pedantry, and yet, by the graceful display of his knowledge, his concerts have a distinct educational value. Martini, for instance, is known to many as a theoretical and an historical writer; to some as a composer of sonatas and church pieces, but few are acquainted with his chamber duets. Pergolesi's "Stabat" and "Nina" are familiar, but the genius of the man is perhaps more fully seen in opera and intermezzo. The mention of "Il Maestro di Musica" brings to mind the translation of this and other works of the gifted Italian into French, and the history of the opera bouffon in Paris and its influence on French music. And see with what simple means the men of former days worked delightful results. Take the numbers by Pergolesi, Cimarosa and Boieldieu and compare their melodies and the expression of their musical ideas with the work of the men of our day in the same direction. Goetz writes an opera called "The Taming of the Shrew." The subject is certainly not tragic; it does not call for strong, emotional music, and yet in the duet between Petruchio and Katherine, which, according to the programme, be ins in a playful tone, we find the accompaniment arresting the attention; we find harmonies and modulations that might be easily taken from the later music-dramas of Wagner, music that suggests neither playfulness nor the sparkling love passages of comedy. We seem to have lost the frank and laughing melody, the unaffected expression, the innocent simplicity of the old masters of light opera. Where to-day is there a composer who could write the duet of Boieldieu that was sung last evening; who could so admirably suit with his music the situation; who could be so naturally simple and graceful?

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were most warmly welcomed, and throughout the evening there was hearty and genuine applause. The actual performance was, in certain respects, a disappointment. Mrs. Henschel was evidently indisposed, and she did not do herself justice. Her intonation was not always true; she was at times unable to sustain her tones, and she often sang with a decided tremolo. Still there was much that was pleasing in her interpretation, and the singer may well say, with de Musset, "My glass is small, but I drink out of my own glass." She was heard to best advantage in the Mendelssohn number, the romance by her husband and the duets.

Mr. Henschel's natural gifts and limitations are well known in this city, and they do not call for full discussion. It is also idle, perhaps, to quarrel with him for his practice of playing his own accompaniments. At the same time, it may be said that a singer can not give his attention to the song and to the accompaniment. One or the other must inevitably suffer. Last evening, for instance, the climax of Schubert's "Gruppe" was in the accompaniment and not in the song. I admit cheerfully that Mr. Henschel, as a rule, plays delightful accompaniments. But is it not probable that he would make greater vocal effects if he were able to concentrate his attention on the song, and on the song alone? Certain of his mannerisms are now more pronounced; and he has grown careless in the rounding of his phrases, for he often prefers an uncalled-for exclamation point to the needed period. Nor was his sentiment always free from exaggeration, as in the third verse of the Lortzing number. It is a pleasure, however, to pay tribute to his cleverness and his versatility. The aria of Cimarosa was given with infinite spirit, certain lines of Vulcan's complaint were most sympathetically delivered, and in the Boieldieu duet he was wholly admirable. In Schubert's "Doppiegaenger" Mr. Henschel narrowly escaped full and intense dramatic expression. His uncommon temperament is often in evidence. He is a singer of remarkable moments.

The second of these vocal recitals will be given Thursday afternoon in the Meionaon at 2.30 o'clock.

PHILIP HALE.

HERALD, Chicago, Ill.

Date 3/27

D'ALBERT'S SECOND RECITAL.

The comparatively small size of the audience that assembled in Central Music hall yesterday afternoon to listen to Eugene D'Albert's second recital is no doubt to be ascribed to the almost excessive number of concerts of this kind that have been given this season. The performance merited a better attendance, if for no other reason, simply on account of the exceptional opportunity for a comparative study of piano playing that it afforded, since D'Albert's, Paderewski's and Pachmann's styles and individualities are entirely unlike. The programme was as follows: Passacaglia in C minor, Bach, D'Albert; Rondo in A minor, Mozart; Sonata, op. 90, Beethoven; Variations Serieuses, Mendelssohn; Sonata, op. 58, Chopin; "Liebestraum, No. 3," "Feux Follets," Tarantelle, "Napoli," Liszt. To these he was obliged to add Chopin's waltz in A flat and the Strauss-Tausig waltz, "Man lebt nur einmal."

D'Albert's marvelous technique has always caused astonishment, and it did not fail to affect the audience yesterday similarly, particularly as it was exhibited in the [illegible] and the Strauss-Tausig waltz. [illegible]

[illegible] it.

It has been a most unfortunate thing for Mr. Nikisch's reputation as a classic interpreter that Theodore Thomas and Wilhelm Gericke have set a standard in the rendering of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven years ago in Boston—a standard so far above anything that Nikisch has shown that the critical or even the [illegible] musical listener cannot accept what Nikisch has given us as other than an example of coarseness, if not to say vulgarity of interpretation.

The Gluck numbers went fairly well, the first one particularly so. The flute solo by Mr. Mole was played in a masterly manner. The "Furientanz," however, got a good rasping from the strings; the [illegible] poco a poco smorzando PP could hardly have been discovered with a telescope of high power.

Clipping from Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3/26

PADEREWSKI'S PROGRAMME.

Mr. Paderewski and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take part in the concert to be given to-morrow in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, for the benefit of the Washington Arch Fund. The "Tannhauser" overture of Richard Wagner, the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz, and Saint-Saens' "Le Rouet d'Omphale" will be played by the band.

Mr. Paderewski will be heard in the A minor [illegible] of Schumann, his own concerto, and the [illegible] "Hungarian Fantasie."

GAZETTE, Worcester, Mass.

Date 3/26

[illegible]'s last appearance in this [illegible] be in New York for the benefit of the Washington Arch Fund. This [illegible] New-York charity, like the [illegible]. The Boston Symphony [illegible] has been loaned by Mr. [illegible] are sorry some real [illegible] selected.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 88.

MONDAY, MARCH 28, 1892.

PADERJEWSKI AND BOSTON.

Joint Efforts in Aid of New York's Washington Arch.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

New York, March 28, 1892. Paderewski the pianist and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid a large sum toward the completion of the Washington arch, by their services at the Metropolitan Opera House concert last evening, the receipts being over $4000.

The combination of this talent for the evening was brought about originally by the great admiration expressed by the pianist for the Boston musicians under Mr. Nikisch's direction, and this evening's concert has fully justified the sentiments of Paderewski, for a greater ovation has never been paid here to any orchestral organization than that shown the Boston men on this occasion.

The programme opened with the "Tannhauser" overture, and at its conclusion the audience called Mr. Nikisch repeatedly to acknowledge the applause it aroused. Later on the enthusiasm of the audience rose to its highest pitch at the conclusion of the romance of Paderewski's concerto, which he played as he has never played anything before in this country. It was a revelation of the genius of the composer and player which will not soon be forgotten by the audience present. Paderewski insisted upon having Mr. Nikisch share the ovation which followed the movement, and at the conclusion of the concerto the applause could not be quieted until the final movement had been repeated.

The concert was throughout a series of triumphs for the pianist and the orchestra and made an impression that will not easily be effaced.

The public spirit and liberality of Mr. Henry L. Higginson in contributing free of all expense the services of the Boston Symphony orchestra was a universal topic of commendation during the evening.

Clipping from Herald Willimantic Conn

Date 3/26

Henry L. Higginson of Boston has added a codicil to his will leaving an in[illegible] of $1,000,000 as an endowment [illegible] to be used for the sup-

---

Clipping from Telegram New York N.Y.

Date 3/26

To-morrow evening at the Metropolitan Opera House, Paderewski, the greatest living pianist, will make his last appearance here. He will be supported by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Paderewski says is the best in the world. The proceeds of this concert will be generously donated by Paderewski and Arthur Nikish, the conductor of the orchestra, to the Washington Arch Fund. It is expected that a large sum will be realised.

* * *

Mr. Eugene d'Albert will give three recitals of piano music at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, on the afternoons of April 5, 7 and 9. His first programme will be devoted to Beethoven. The second will include compositions by Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Tausig and Liszt, and at the third concert he will play selections from Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubenstein and Liszt.

PRESS, Portland, Me.

Date 3/24

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The great Boston Symphony Orchestra, sixty musicians, conducted by Mr. Nikisch, with Mrs. Nikisch as soprano soloist, will appear in the regular Stockbridge course next Tuesday evening. Mrs. Nikisch is one of the most agreeable of the many vocalists on the concert stage today, possessing in great degree the many qualities that go to make a popular singer. She is a great favorite in Boston. Tickets at Stockbridge's. There will be late trains.

Harrisburg
Telegram
March 27

Eugene d'Albert is here and presently [illegible]

(a) ROMANCE.
(b) MORGENS ALS LERCHE. } (New.) . . . . HENSCHEL
(c) DER BOTE.

MRS. HENSCHEL.

(a) What are to me all golden treasures,
What all this life, so proud and gay?
My heart, alas! is far away
Amid my childhood's haunts and pleasures.
Ah me! with tears mine eyes are dim,
Day and night I can but think of him.

When at the dance where all is gladness
I must to smiles with smiles respond,
I feel deep in my heart so fond
A pang of pity and of sadness.
What is the praise of men to me?
Ah! him I love so well, I cannot see!

Yesternight, when slumber had descended
Upon my weary eyes at last,
A lovely dream before my senses passed —
Oh! would it never, ne'er had ended!
Alas! I woke, my joy is o'er —
Still I shall dream of him for evermore.

(b) Morning's a lark! Oh,
Could I but welcome the sun's first ray!
Mid-day's a butterfly,
Kiss all the flowers that grace the day.
Evening's a swan, I'd Float on the stars' gentle harmony.
And in the moon-night
Light and airy an elf I'd be.

Sun, oh, when wilt thou
Show thyself in thy pride to me?
Flower, oh, could I
Here 'mong the blossoms lie with thee!
Star, and hearest thou
Rushing the waters? They call for thee.
Fair is the moon-night!
Queen of fairies, appear to me!

(English Version.)

(c) On the heavens are shooting
So merry the stars.
Thy sweetheart sends greeting
From afar, yea, from afar.

There was a zither once hanging
On the door out of sight,
And the wind came and rustled
Through the strings in the night.

Fled away through the window
Over wood, over mound—
My heart is the zither
Makes joyful sound.

(a) THE CZAR'S SONG, from "CZAR AND CARPENTER." . . . LORTZING
(b) COUPLETS DE VULCAIN, from "PHILEMON ET BAUCIS." . . . GOUNOD

MR. HENSCHEL.

(a) In childhood I dallied with sceptre and crown,
And warred with my playmates who shrank at my frown;
The sword from its scabbard how proudly I drew,
Then back to the arms of my father I flew.
And as he caressed me: "My boy," thus quoth he,
"How happy, how happy, a child still to be!"

In manhood I'm wearing that crown on my brow,
The weal of my Russians stamps care on it now;
In peace or in war for their glory I strive,
Though little they love me who cause them to thrive!
In purple robes shrouded, all's lonely for me,
How happy, how happy, a child still to be!

When, ended each struggle, the Czar's life has flown,
His subjects will raise him a tablet of stone;
But scarce in their hearts will his name live a day,
For all earthly greatness is doomed to decay.
Yet Thou say'st, Almighty, "In peace come to me!"
And happy in heaven Thy child shall I be.

(b) Where my heavy hammer rings blows,
Where my fiery furnace glows,
In my empire under ground,
I walk about and breathe at ease,
I rule supreme o'er all around.
But in your sight my spirits die
Every time I mount on high.
I rage to see myself, alack!
So misshapen and so black.
When you see me, smiles do play
Round your lips, and low you say:
"Surely, Venus erred not;
None too hard hath been his lot."
To hear no more I stay.
From your bright home I speed away;
And now you know why
Your presence I fly.

Under mounts that to heaven aspire,
A mighty army me adore,
Of dusky giants, lords of fire,
While ardent smoke clouds upward pour.
Like you on high,
A god am I!
But, when Juno doth ask
Me in her presence to bask,
I rage to see myself, alack!
So misshapen and so black, etc.

THE HENSCHELS.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave last evening in the Meionaon the first of a series of four vocal recitals. The programme was as follows:

Duet, "Quel onda che rovina" . . . . Padre Martini
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Aria, "Oh, Sleep," from "Semele."
Aria, "Qual farfaletta," from "Partenope" } . . . . . . Handel
Mrs. Henschel.
Aria from "Il Maestro di Musica" . . . . Pergolesi
Aria Buffa from "Calandrino" . . . . Cimarosa
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's Song . . . . Beethoven
"Auf Flugeln des Gesanges" . . . . Mendelssohn
"In the Woods" . . . . Franz
Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Doppleganger."
"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus." } . . . . Schubert
"Der Schiffer."
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from the "Taming of the Shrew." . . . . Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Romance.
"Morgens als Lerche." } (New) . . . . Henschel
"Der Bote."
Mrs. Henschel.
The Czar's Song, from "Czar and Carpenter." . . . Lortzing
Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philemon et Baucis." Gounod
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Le Nonveau Seigneur de Village." Boieldieu
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

The programme of last evening showed, as usual, the catholic spirit and fine taste of Mr. Henschel. He does not question nationality or time. He introduces to the hearer the glories of operas that, once the fashion, are now forgotten. He arranges his programmes without pedantry, and yet, by the graceful display of his knowledge, his concerts have a distinct educational value. Martini, for instance, is known to many as a theoretical and an historical writer; to some as a composer of sonatas and church pieces, but few are acquainted with his chamber duets. Pergolesi's "Stabat" and "Nina" are familiar, but the genius of the man is perhaps more fully seen in opera and intermezzo. The mention of "Il Maestro di Musica" brings to mind the translation of this and other works of the gifted Italian into French, and the history of the opera bouffon in Paris and its influence on French music. And see with what simple means the men of former days worked delightful results. Take the numbers by Pergolesi, Cimarosa and Boieldieu and compare their melodies and the expression of their musical ideas with the work of the men of our day in the same direction. Goetz writes an opera called "The Taming of the Shrew." The subject is certainly not tragic; it does not call for strong, emotional music, and yet in the duet between Petruchio and Katherine, which, according to the programme, be ins in a playful tone, we find the accompaniment arresting the attention; we find harmonies and modulations that might be easily taken from the later music-dramas of Wagner, music that suggests neither playfulness nor the sparkling love passages of comedy. We seem to have lost the frank and laughing melody, the unaffected expression, the innocent simplicity of the old masters of light opera. Where to-day is there a composer who could write the duet of Boieldieu that was sung last evening; who could so admirably suit with his music the situation; who could be so naturally simple and graceful?

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were most warmly welcomed, and throughout the evening there was hearty and genuine applause. The actual performance was, in certain respects, a disappointment. Mrs. Henschel was evidently indisposed, and she did not do herself justice. Her intonation was not always true; she was at times unable to sustain her tones, and she often sang with a decided tremolo. Still there was much that was pleasing in her interpretation, and the singer may well say, with de Musset, "My glass is small, but I drink out of my own glass." She was heard to best advantage in the Mendelssohn number, the romance by her husband and the duets.

Mr. Henschel's natural gifts and limitations are well known in this city, and they do not call for full discussion. It is also idle, perhaps, to quarrel with him for his practice of playing his own accompaniments. At the same time, it may be said that a singer can not give his attention to the song and to the accompaniment. One or the other must inevitably suffer. Last evening, for instance, the climax of Schubert's "Gruppe" was in the accompaniment and not in the song. I admit cheerfully that Mr. Henschel, as a rule, plays delightful accompaniments. But is it not probable that he would make greater vocal effects if he were able to concentrate his attention on the song, and on the song alone? Certain of his mannerisms are now more pronounced; and he has grown careless in the rounding of his phrases, for he often prefers an uncalled-for exclamation point to the needed period. Nor was his sentiment always free from exaggeration, as in the third verse of the Lortzing number. It is a pleasure, however, to pay tribute to his cleverness and his versatility. The aria of Cimarosa was given with infinite spirit, certain lines of Vulcan's complaint were most sympathetically delivered, and in the Boieldieu duet he was wholly admirable. In Schubert's "Dopplegaenger" Mr. Henschel narrowly escaped full and intense dramatic expression. His uncommon temperament is often in evidence. He is a singer of remarkable moments.

The second of these vocal recitals will be given Thursday afternoon in the Meionaon at 2.30 o'clock.

PHILIP HALE.

HERALD, Chicago, Ill.
Date 3/27

D'ALBERT'S SECOND RECITAL.

The comparatively small size of the audience that assembled in Central Music hall yesterday afternoon to listen to Eugene D'Albert's second recital is no doubt to be ascribed to the almost excessive number of concerts of this kind that have been given this season. The performance merited a better attendance, if for no other reason, simply on account of the exceptional opportunity for a comparative study of piano playing that it afforded, since D'Albert's, Paderewski's and Pachmann's styles and individualities are entirely unlike. The programme was as follows: Passacaglia in C minor, Bach, D'Albert; Rondo in A minor, Mozart; Sonata, op. 90, Beethoven; Variations Serieuses, Mendelssohn; Sonata, op. 58, Chopin; "Liebestraum, No. 3," "Feux Follets," Tarantelle, "Napoli," Liszt. To these he was obliged to add Chopin's waltz in A flat and the Strauss-Tausig waltz, "Man lebt nur einmal."

D'Albert's marvelous technique has always caused astonishment, and it did not fail to affect the audience yesterday similarly, particularly as it was exhibited in the [illegible] and the Strauss-Tausig waltz. [illegible] always employed to the [illegible] the composer. [illegible]

[illegible] it.

It has been a most unfortunate thing for Mr. Nikisch's reputation as a classic interpreter that Theodore Thomas and Wilhelm Gericke have set a standard in the rendering of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven years ago in Boston—a standard so far above anything that Nikisch has shown that the critical or even the refined musical listener cannot accept what Nikisch has given us as other than an example of coarseness, if not to say vulgarity of interpretation.

The Gluck numbers went fairly well, the first one particularly so. The flute solo by Mr. Mole was played in a masterly manner. The "Furientanz," however, got a good rasping from the strings; the dim poco a poco smorzando PP could hardly have been discovered with a telescope of high power.

Clipping from Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 3/26

PADEREWSKI'S PROGRAMME.

M. Paderewski and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take part in the concert to be given to-morrow in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, for the benefit of the Washington Arch Fund. The "Tannhauser" overture of Richard Wagner, the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz, and Saint-Saens' "Le Rouet d'Omphale" will be played by the band.

M. Paderewski will be heard in the A minor concerto of Schumann, his own concerto, and the Liszt "Hungarian Fantasie."

GAZETTE, Worcester, Mass.
Date 3/26

[illegible]'s last appearance in this [illegible] will be in New York for the benefit of the Washington Arch Fund. This [illegible] New York charity, like the [illegible]. The Boston Symphony [illegible] has been loaned by Mr. [illegible] are sorry some real [illegible] expected.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 88.
MONDAY, MARCH 28, 1892.

PADERE WSKI AND BOSTON.

Joint Efforts in Aid of New York's Washington Arch.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, March 28, 1892. Paderewski the pianist and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid a large sum toward the completion of the Washington arch, by their services at the Metropolitan Opera House concert last evening, the receipts being over $4000.

The combination of this talent for the evening was brought about originally by the great admiration expressed by the pianist for the Boston musicians under Mr. Nikisch's direction, and this evening's concert has fully justified the sentiments of Paderewski, for a greater ovation has never been paid here to any orchestral organization than that shown the Boston men on this occasion.

The programme opened with the "Tannhauser" overture, and at its conclusion the audience called Mr. Nikisch repeatedly to acknowledge the applause it aroused. Later on the enthusiasm of the audience rose to its highest pitch at the conclusion of the romance of Paderewski's concerto, which he played as he has never played anything before in this country. It was a revelation of the genius of the composer and player which will not soon be forgotten by the audience present. Paderewski insisted upon having Mr. Nikisch share the ovation which followed the movement, and at the conclusion of the concerto the applause could not be quieted until the final movement had been repeated.

The concert was throughout a series of triumphs for the pianist and the orchestra and made an impression that will not easily be effaced.

The public spirit and liberality of Mr. Henry L. Higginson in contributing free of all expense the services of the Boston Symphony orchestra was a universal topic of commendation during the evening.

Clipping from Herald Willimantic Conn
Date 3/26

Henry L. Higginson of Boston has added a codicil to his will leaving an investment of $1,000,000 as an endowment [illegible] interest is to be used for the support [illegible]

Clipping from Telegram New York N.Y.
Date 3/26

To-morrow evening at the Metropolitan Opera House, Paderewski, the greatest living pianist, will make his last appearance here. He will be supported by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Paderewski says is the best in the world. The proceeds of this concert will be generously donated by Paderewski and Arthur Nikish, the conductor of the orchestra, to the Washington Arch Fund. It is expected that a large sum will be realised.

* * *

Mr. Eugene d'Albert will give three recitals of piano music at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, on the afternoons of April 5, 7 and 9. His first programme will be devoted to Beethoven. The second will include compositions by Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Tausig and Liszt, and at the third concert he will play selections from Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubenstein and Liszt.

* * *

PRESS, Portland, Me.
Date 3/24

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The great Boston Symphony Orchestra, sixty musicians, conducted by Mr. Nikisch, with Mrs. Nikisch as soprano soloist, will appear in the regular Stockbridge course next Tuesday evening. Mrs. Nikisch is one of the most agreeable of the many vocalists on the concert stage today, possessing in great degree the many qualities that go to make a popular singer. She is a great favorite in Boston. Tickets at Stockbridge's. There will be late trains.

Harrisburg
Telegram
march 27

Eugene d'Albert is here and presently [illegible] of the [illegible]

DUET from "LE NOUVEAU SEIGNEUR DE VILLAGE." . . . . BOIELDIEU

MR. and MRS. HENSCHEL.

Frontin. I will stay in this place,
Then you will have no fear.

Babet. If you stay in that place,
Then I shall have no fear.

Frontin. How charming she is, and what grace!

Babet. You're quite too kind, dear sir.

Frontin. Assuredly I oft before
Saw pretty women to adore;
But stay, never before my eye
Did so many beauties espy.

Babet. Good sir!
No more you keep your place,
No more of Colin now you say.

Frontin. If I no more do keep my place,
'Tis when with you I feel so gay.

Babet. Ah, my good sir,
If in your place you'll stay,
Then I shall know no fear.

Frontin. Very well, I will obey,
Babet! So, then, my dear,
Colin to please you knew!

Babet. Do you doubt to please he understood?
Colin is so sweet, so good!

Frontin. His bearing's quite refined.

Babet. I like his air and spirit bold.

Frontin. I hear he's very kind.

Babet. Sir, quite rightly you've been told!

Frontin. No longer now you keep your place!

Babet. Because of Colin spoke your grace!

SUCCEEDING RECITALS

Thursday Afternoon, March 31,
Tuesday Afternoon, April 5, } at 2.30.
Saturday Afternoon, April 9,

Tickets on Sale, Box Office, Music Hall.

GEO. H. ELLIS, PRINTER, 141 FRANKLIN ST., BOSTON.

---

about it.

It has been a most unfortunate thing for Mr. Nikisch's reputation as a classic interpreter that Theodore Thomas and Wilhelm Gericke have set a standard in the rendering of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven years ago in Boston—a standard so far above anything that Nikisch has shown that the critical or even the refined musical listener cannot accept what Nikisch has given us as other than an example of coarsenesss, if not to say vulgarity of interpretation.

The Gluck numbers went fairly well, the first one particularly so. The flute solo by Mr. Mole was played in a masterly manner. The "Furientanz," however, got a good rasping from the strings; the dim poco a poco smorzando PP could hardly have been discovered with a telescope of high power.

Clipping from Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 3/26

PADEREWSKI'S PROGRAMME.

M. Paderewski and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take part in the concert to be given morrow in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, for the benefit of the Washington Arch Fund. The "Tannhauser" overture of Richard Wagner, the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz, and Saint-Saens' "Le Rouet d'Omphale" will be played by the band.

M. Paderewski will be heard in the A minor concerto of Schumann, his own concerto, and the Liszt "Hungarian Fantasie."

GAZETTE, Worcester, Mass.

Date 3/26

Paderewski's last appearance in this country will be in New York for the bene[illegible] of the Washington Arch Fund. This [illegible] New-York charity, like the [illegible] Monument. The Boston Sym[illegible] has been loaned by Mr. [illegible]. We are sorry some real [illegible] not selected.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 88.

MONDAY, MARCH 28, 1892.

PADERGEWSKI AND BOSTON.

Joint Efforts in Aid of New York's Washington Arch.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, March 28, 1892. Paderewski the pianist and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid a large sum toward the completion of the Washington arch, by their services at the Metropolitan Opera House concert last evening, the receipts being over $4000.

The combination of this talent for the evening was brought about originally by the great admiration expressed by the pianist for the Boston musicians under Mr. Nikisch's direction, and this evening's concert has fully justified the sentiments of Paderewski, for a greater ovation has never been paid here to any orchestral organization than that shown the Boston men on this occasion.

The programme opened with the "Tannhauser" overture, and at its conclusion the audience called Mr. Nikisch repeatedly to acknowledge the applause it aroused. Later on the enthusiasm of the audience rose to its highest pitch at the conclusion of the romance of Paderewski's concerto, which he played as he has never played anything before in this country. It was a revelation of the genius of the composer and player which will not soon be forgotten by the audience present. Paderewski insisted upon having Mr. Nikisch share the ovation which followed the movement, and at the conclusion of the concerto the applause could not be quieted until the final movement had been repeated.

The concert was throughout a series of triumphs for the pianist and the orchestra and made an impression that will not easily be effaced.

The public spirit and liberality of Mr. Henry L. Higginson in contributing free of all expense the services of the Boston Symphony orchestra was a universal topic of commendation during the evening.

Clipping from Herald Willimantic Conn

Date 3/26

Henry L. Higginson of Boston has added a codicil to his will leaving an investment of $1,000,000 as an endowment fund, the interest to be used for the support of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Clipping from Telegram N.Y. New York

Date 3/26

To-morrow evening at the Metropolitan Opera House, Paderewski, the greatest living pianist, will make his last appearance here. He will be supported by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Paderewski says is the best in the world. The proceeds of this concert will be generously donated by Paderewski and Arthur Nikish, the conductor of the orchestra, to the Washington Arch Fund. It is expected that a large sum will be realised.

* * *

Mr. Eugene d'Albert will give three recitals of piano music at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, on the afternoons of April 5, 7 and 9. His first programme will be devoted to Beethoven. The second will include compositions by Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Tausig and Liszt, and at the third concert he will play selections from Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubenstein and Liszt.

* * *

PRESS, Portland, Me.

Date 3|24

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The great Boston Symphony Orchestra, sixty musicians, conducted by Mr. Nikisch, with Mrs. Nikisch as soprano soloist, will appear in the regular Stockbridge course next Tuesday evening. Mrs. Nikisch is one of the most agreeable of the many vocalists on the concert stage today, possessing in great degree the many qualities that go to make a popular singer. She is a great favorite in Boston. Tickets at Stockbridge's. There will be late trains.

Harrisburg
Telegram
march 27

Eugene d'Albert is here and presently there will be a fresh stirring of the waters of the piano world.

Boston [illegible]

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30, 1892.

THE HENSCHELS.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave last evening in the Meionaon the first of a series of four vocal recitals. The programme was as follows:

Duet, "Quel onda che rovina" .... Padre Martini
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Aria, "Oh, Sleep," from "Semele."
Aria, "Qual farfaletta," from "Partenope" } ..... Handel
Mrs. Henschel.
Aria from "Il Maestro di Musica" .... Pergolesi
Aria Buffa from "Calandrino" .... Cimarosa
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's Song .... Beethoven
"Auf Flugeln des Gesanges" .... Mendelssohn
"In the Woods" .... Franz
Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Doppleganger."
"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus." } .... Schubert
"Der Schiffer."
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from the "Taming of the Shrew." .... Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Romance.
"Morgens als Lerche." } (New) .... Henschel
"Der Bote."
Mrs. Henschel.
The Czar's Song, from "Czar and Carpenter." ... Lortzing
Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philemon et Baucis." Gounod
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village." Boieldieu
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

The programme of last evening showed, as usual, the catholic spirit and fine taste of Mr. Henschel. He does not question nationality or time. He introduces to the hearer the glories of operas that, once the fashion, are now forgotten. He arranges his programmes without pedantry, and yet, by the graceful display of his knowledge, his concerts have a distinct educational value. Martini for instance, is known to many as a theoretical and an historical writer; to some as a composer of sonatas and church pieces, but few are acquainted with his chamber duets. Pergolesi's "Stabat" and "Nina" are familiar, but the genius of the man is perhaps more fully seen in opera and intermezzo. The mention of "Il Maestro di Musica" brings to mind the translation of this and other works of the gifted Italian into French, and the history of the opera bouffon in Paris and its influence on French music. And see with what simple means the men of former days worked delightful results. Take the numbers by Pergolesi, Cimarosa and Boieldieu and compare their melodies and the expression of their musical ideas with the work of the men of our day in the same direction. Goetz writes an opera called "The Taming of the Shrew." The subject is certainly not tragic; it does not call for strong, emotional music, and yet in the duet between Petruchio and Katherine, which, according to the programme, be ins in a playful tone, we find the accompaniment arresting the attention; we find harmonies and modulations that might be easily taken from the later music-dramas of Wagner, music that suggests neither playfulness nor the sparkling love passages of comedy. We seem to have lost the frank and laughing melody, the unaffected expression, the innocent simplicity of the old masters of light opera. Where to-day is there a composer who could write the duet of Boieldieu that was sung last evening; who could so admirably suit with his music the situation; who could be so naturally simple and graceful?

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were most warmly welcomed, and throughout the evening there was hearty and genuine applause. The actual performance was, in certain respects, a disappointment. Mrs. Henschel was evidently indisposed, and she did not do herself justice. Her intonation was not always true; she was at times unable to sustain her tones, and she often sang with a decided tremolo. Still there was much that was pleasing in her interpretation, and the singer may well say, with de Musset, "My glass is small, but I drink out of my own glass." She was heard to best advantage in the Mendelssohn number, the romance by her husband and the duets.

Mr. Henschel's natural gifts and limitations are well known in this city, and they do not call for full discussion. It is also idle, perhaps, to quarrel with him for his practice of playing his own accompaniments. At the same time, it may be said that a singer can not give his attention to the song and to the accompaniment. One or the other must inevitably suffer. Last evening, for instance, the climax of Schubert's "Gruppe" was in the accompaniment and not in the song. I admit cheerfully that Mr. Henschel, as a rule, plays delightful accompaniments. But is it not probable that he would make greater vocal effects if he were able to concentrate his attention on the song, and on the song alone? Certain of his mannerisms are now more pronounced; and he has grown careless in the rounding of his phrases, for he often prefers an uncalled-for exclamation point to the needed period. Nor was his sentiment always free from exaggeration, as in the third verse of the Lortzing number. It is a pleasure, however, to pay tribute to his cleverness and his versatility. The aria of Cimarosa was given with infinite spirit, certain lines of Vulcan's complaint were most sympathetically delivered, and in the Boieldieu duet he was wholly admirable. In Schubert's "Dopplegaenger" Mr. Henschel narrowly escaped full and intense dramatic expression. His uncommon temperament is often in evidence. He is a singer of remarkable moments.

The second of these vocal recitals will be given Thursday afternoon in the Meionaon at 2.30 o'clock.

PHILIP HALE.

HERALD, Chicago, Ill.

Date 3/27

D'ALBERT'S SECOND RECITAL.

The comparatively small size of the audience that assembled in Central Music hall yesterday afternoon to listen to Eugene D'Albert's second recital is no doubt to be ascribed to the almost excessive number of concerts of this kind that have been given this season. The performance merited a better attendance, if for no other reason, simply on account of the exceptional opportunity for a comparative study of piano playing that it afforded, since D'Albert's, Paderewski's and Pachmann's styles and individualities are entirely unlike. The programme was as follows: Passacaglia in C minor, Bach, D'Albert; Rondo in A minor, Mozart; Sonata, op. 90, Beethoven; Variations Serieuses, Mendelssohn; Sonata, op. 58, Chopin; "Liebestraum, No. 3." "Feux Follets," Tarantelle, "Napoli," Liszt. To these he was obliged to add Chopin's waltz in A flat and the Strauss-Tausig waltz, "Man lebt nur einmal."

D'Albert's marvelous technique has always caused astonishment, and it did not fail to affect the audience yesterday similarly, particularly as it was exhibited in the Liszt etude and the Strauss-Tausig waltz. But it is not always employed to the best advantage of the composer. Technical facility often overcomes interpretative intention, meaning is sacrificed to speed, and [illegible] is made to suffer severely, as [illegible] Mendelssohn [illegible]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

WEDNESDAY MORNING MAR. 30, 1892.

The Henschel Recital.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel may travel about as much as they please; they may win foreign laurels to their heart's content, but we shall still regard them as Bostonians, and their homecoming will still have in its great success a degree of personal greeting. But apart from all possible municipal pride, the concerts of such a gifted pair must have an intrinsic value of their own, and the programmes they present during their present season in Boston are worthy of any musical metropolis in the world. The execution of these programmes is likely to be almost beyond criticism, if the performance of last night be taken as criterion. Last night's list was a very broad and comprehensive one; it did not deal exclusively with the German lied, although that was not absent either, but it swept the circle from the old pure school of Fr. Martini to the modern works of Franz and of Henschel. I was especially glad to find a Franz number on the programme, for this most eminent of living lied composers has not been too frequently presented by the Henschels in their concerts. The voices remain very much the same as when the artists last appeared in our city; the lady sings with a tenderness and purity that charms by its simplicity, while the husband has the same timbre, the same dramatic fervor as heretofore. Judged by last night's work, the voice of Mr. Henschel is wearing a little better than that of his wife, for there were occasional traces of effort in her work, but by no means enough to mar its beauty. Hers is a voice that stands almost alone in its genre, and it possesses a charm peculiarly its own. The Handelion songs were perhaps a trifle too saccharine for their school, but the flexibility and artistic phrasing were commendable. The shading in that most difficultly simple song, Mendelssohn's "Auf Fluegeln des Gesonges," was entirely excellent, but Franz's "The Woods" was again not broad enough.

Mrs. Henschel sang three new songs by her husband, and all of these were worthy compositions. The first, a "French Romance," had a most musicianly accompaniment, and just that delicacy which suited to the French school, and to Mrs. Henschel's voice. The second did not seem so sustainedly interesting, but its climax at

"Schoen ist die Mondnacht; Elfenkoenigin, Zeige dich"

was very effective. The third—"On the Heavens"—had a true folk-song vein, although wrought up to a higher climax than ordinary folk music. It won an encore, and one of Mr. Henschel's delightful settings of Kingsley's "Waterbabies" carried the enthusiasm to a still greater height.

Mr. Henschel's own singing was the best he has ever given here, and those who know what his work has been, can imagine the high standard attained. His rapidity of enunciation and purity of tone in Cimarasa's buffo aria were masterly, but the acme of vocal effect was attained in that gloomiest of all songs, Schubert's "Doppelgaenger," which suited his voice perfectly. Lortzing's famous "In Childhood I Eallied" was perfect in its legato refrain, but unpleasantly sibilant in its pronunciation. The "Couplets of Vulcan" by Gounod, were well sung, but scarcely worth the singing, for at times the treatment is very trivial, as in the jingly phrase "Venus n'avait pas tort," but it caused the singer to be four times recalled.

The duets were all above criticism. Padre Martini is chiefly remembered nowadays by his pretty gavotte—"Les Moutons"—but Mr. Henschel will do an excellent work if he prevents the finer compositions of the master from becoming obsolete. Mrs. Henschel did her very best work of the evening in the duet from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," and now we will hope for a good number of Carl Loewe's ballads, which Mr. Henschel sings better than any man living.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Post

WEDNESDAY MORNING, MAR. 30, 1892.

MOTTO:

With a Mission

—AND—

Without a Muzzle.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The large audience present at the first Henschel recital at the Meionion, last night, was agreeably surprised at the degree of excellence which prevailed throughout the entire performance. Rumors of the manner in which Mr. and Mrs. Henschel had been received in other cities had, in a measure, prepared people for an enjoyable evening, and those familiar with their methods knew that the concert could not be other than artistic, and yet they were surprised.

The Henschels lay no claims to greatness, but rather base their popularity upon good musical taste, a thorough knowledge of correct phrasing, a clear idea of shading, and well trained, sympathetic voices, and with such gifts, how could they do otherwise than stand at the head of the musical profession?

Mr. Henschel played all the accompaniments in his own finished manner, and evinced rare taste in the arrangement of the programme which introduced both Mrs. Henschel and himself in solo work with a limited number of duets in which the two voices were perfectly blended.

Martini's duet, "Quel onda che rovina"; Handel's arias, "Oh, Sleep," from "Semele" and "Qual farfaletta," from "Partenope"; Pergolesi's aria, from "Il Maestro di Musica"; Cimarosa's aria buffa from "Calandrino," "Mignon's Song," by Beethoven; Mendelssohn's "Auf Flugeln des Gesanges"; "In the Woods," by Franz; Schubert's three little songs, "Der Doppelganger," "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus," "Der Schiffer"; duet from the "Taming of the Shrew"; three songs by Henschel, "Romance," "Morgens als Lerche," "Der Bote"; the Czar's song from "Czar and Carpenter"; "Couplets de Vulcain," from Gounod's "Philemon et Baucis," and duet from Boieldieu's "Le Nouveau Signeur du Village," made up a programme which for merit is rarely equalled. Boston is to be congratulated on having three more opportunities for hearing these artists, one of which will occur this week, Thursday, at 2:30 o'clock.

VIVIAN.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCI., NO. 90.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30, 1892.

The Return of the Henschels—Their First Recital.

The pleasantly anticipated return of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel to the scene of so many earlier triumphs at the Meionaon yesterday, as was expected, took on the character of a reunion of the patrons of their vocal recitals in the past, and made it as pleasant a social occasion as it was an artistic success.

The hall is admirably adapted to such events, as its arrangement brings the singers unusually near to all those who listen, and thus affords artists and audience an opportunity to feel each other's presence and influence to an unusual degree.

The audience assembled last evening was one that any artist would gladly appeal to, and the quick appreciation of all the good work done by the singers added not a small element to the enjoyment of the occasion.

As in former years, the programme made showed the skill and good judgment of Mr. Henschel in this art, and the varied list of numbers contained much that was unfamiliar and more that was enjoyable.

Mrs. Henschel sung the arias, "Oh, Sleep," from "Semele," and "Qual farfaletta," from "Partenope," by Handel; Mignon's song, Beethoven; "Auf Flugeln des Gesanges," Mendelssohn, and "In the Woods," Franz, and a romance, "Morgens als Lerche," and "Der Bote," by Mr. Henschel. At the first her voice appeared slightly less clear and pure than in earlier years, but she quickly sung herself free from the temporary difficulty, and then the voice that has so often charmed her home admirers was again heard in all its purity and sweetness. Of her singing little that is new can be said. She is a most delightful artist at all times, and last evening she again caused the most complete satisfaction in all her contributions to the programme. Her graceful interpretation of the Handel arias and the pretty songs by her husband made her most pronounced successes, and a new setting of "I once had a sweet little doll" was used as an encore number after the Henschel group.

Mr. Henschel's numbers consisted of arias from "Il Maestro di Musica," Pergolesi, and "Calandrino," Cimarosa; "Der Doppelzanger," "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus," and "Der Schiffer," by Schubert; the Czar's song, from "Czar and Carpenter," Lostzing, and Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philemon et Baucis," Gounod.

Mr. Henschel has always done wonders with his voice, but his triumphs over nature's limitations on his vocal equipment were never so pronounced as on this occasion. The jolly aria by Cimarosa was splendidly sung, and the famous song from Lortzing's opera was an artistic treat rarely enjoyed, even in the work of this great artist. The Gounod couplets were also given in the most admirable fashion, and quite captivated the audience.

The duets of the evening were the "Quel Onda Che Rovina," by Padre Martini, one from the "Taming of the Shrew," by Goetz, and one from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village," by Boieldieu, and in these numbers the two singers were heard with unstinted pleasure, their voices blending most enjoyably, and their singing being marked by a joint intelligence that commanded and gained the heartiest applause.

Needless to say that Mr. Henschel's accompaniments were a most important factor in the successes of the evening.

The second of these recitals will be given at the Meionaon tomorrow afternoon.

---

ipping from Tribune
Cambridge Mass

ate 3/26

Symphony Concert.

The seventh concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, was given in Sanders theatre, on Thursday evening. The programme was a tribute to the memory of James Russell Lowell, and the beautiful selections were as follows: Overture to Manfred, Schumann; unfinished symphony, Schubert; fifth symphony, Beethoven. The sentiment which inspired this token of affection for Mr. Lowell must have been deeply gratifying to his nearest and dearest friends, for although he belonged distinctly to the field of literature, poetry, and music are closely allied, and the occasion seemed to be peculiarly fitting and appropriate. Mr. Nikisch's conception of Schumann's great overture is exactly in harmony with its romantic character, and the performance by the orchestra noble in every respect. It was, in fact, an ideal interpretation. Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, that "gem of purest ray serene," was wonderfully played, the exquisite themes of the Allegro being given with a soulful expression which produced a profound effect upon the audience. The ethereal beauty of the Andante con moto was always felt in Mr. Nikisch's refined and delicate conception which was delightfully satisfying to the hearers. Beethoven's great symphony in C minor brought the concert to a close, and in it Mr. Nikisch achieved a positive triumph. The Allegro con bino was played with great vigor and incisiveness of accent, and although the drums and brass were brought out fortissimo as indicated by the composer, the effect was so beautifully balanced that not a note of the strings and wind instruments was lost. The tempo in the Andante was admirable, the Scherzo and trio were played with beautiful distinctness, and the Finale was a veritable triumphal march, the alternations of wind and string being beautifully defined, while the Presto was a wonder of virtuosity. The large audience was quick to appreciate the beauty of the performance, and was most enthusiastic in its recognition of Mr. Nikisch's efforts. The next concert will be on Thursday evening, April 21.

C. R.

Boston Daily Globe.

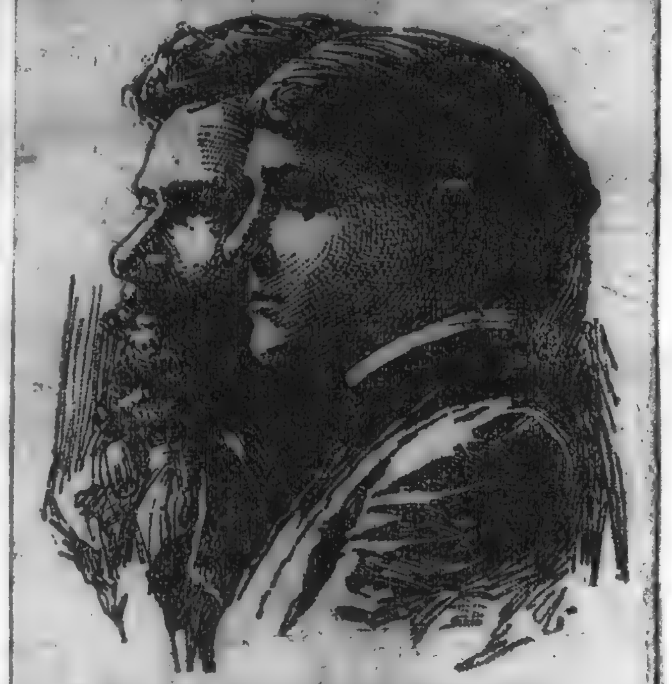
WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30.

FIRST HENSCHEL CONCERT.

Musical Boston Welcomes the Return of Two Old Favorites.

The first of a series of vocal recitals by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel was given in the Meionaon last evening, and a fashionable and cultured audience was present to welcome the return to Boston of these two sterling artists and long-time favorites here.

It is scarcely necessary to tell Bostonians what thorough artists they are, or to dwell upon the delight which was offered yesterday's audience and the pleasure that is in store for those who attend the subsequent concerts of this uniquely interesting series. Mr. Henschel's labors with the Symphony orchestra in the days of its formation are still gratefully remembered, and their much too seldom appearance here since they left us for Europe are notable events in the season's musical annals. Their last appearance here was three years ago.



MR. AND MRS. GEORG HENSCHEL.

An admirably arranged programme was offered last night, and both the artists seemed to be in especially good voice. It is in itself a delight to listen to Mr. Henschel's piano accompaniments, whether to his own or to his wife's songs.

Their first offering was Padre Martini's "Quel onda che revina," which was charmingly interpreted, and called forth enthusiastic demonstrations of approval. Indeed, the applause was unreservedly enthusiastic throughout the evening, and there were demands for several encore numberings being added to the already long programme. They also sang a duet from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," and one from Boieldieu's "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Villiage." Both were sung with charming expression and artistic effect.

The solos assigned to Mr. Henschel consisted of arias from Pergolesi's "Il Maestro di Muscia" and Cimarosa's "Calandrino," the Czar's song from "Czar and Carpenter," couplets de Vulcain from "Philemon et Baucis," and a trio of songs by Schubert. All were sung with wonderful spirit and inspiration.

Mrs. Henschel never sang more sweetly, more purely or with greater grace than she did last night, when she offered as solos two arias by Handel, Beethoven's Mignon song, Mendelssohn's "Auf Flugeln des Gesanges," Franz's "In the Woods" and three of Mr. Henschel's own composition, a romance, "Morgeus als Lerche" and "Der Bote," all of them heard here for the first time. They are all beautiful compositions, and the latter number proved especially pleasing.

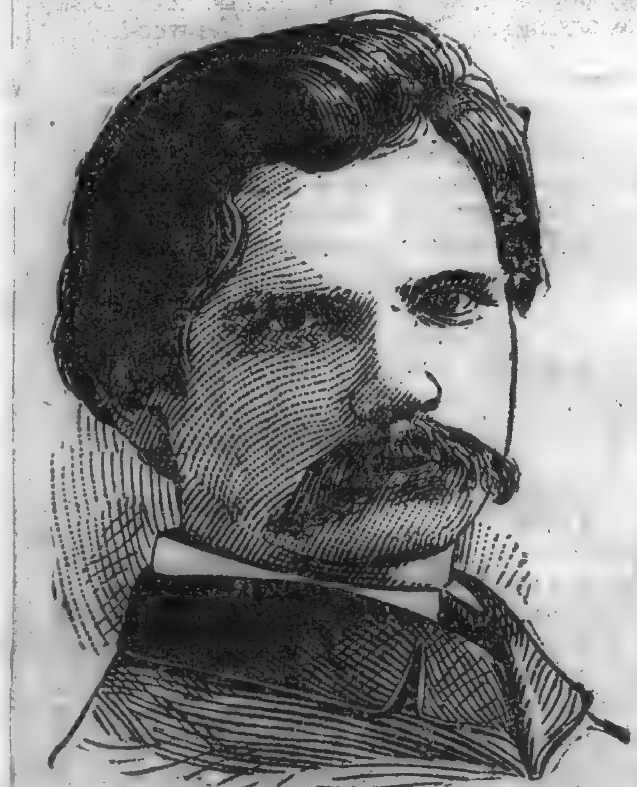
Succeeding recitals will be given as follows: Thursday afternoon, March 31. Tuesday afternoon, April 5. Saturday afternoon, April 9. Tickets are on sale at the box office, Music Hall.

Clipping from Times
uffalo N.Y.

Date 3-27

D'Albert Next Saturday Night.

Eugene D'Albert, one of the most brilliant pianists now before the public will give a recital at Music hall next Saturday evening. Wherever this great artist has appeared he has been enthusiastically received by the public and the prospects are that he will meet with a warm reception in Buffalo. He is playing under the management of Mr. Charles A. Ellis and his tour cannot but be a success. The programme is as follows:



Eugene D'Albert.

Prelude and Fugue in D major, Bach-D'Albert.
Sonata in E minor, Op. 90.............Beethoven.
Allegro moderato—Moderato cantabile.
Variations serieuses, Op. 54,.......Mendelssohn.

Suite in D minor, Op. 91,.......................Raff.
Introduzione e Fuga.
Giga con Variazioni.
Cavatina.
Marcia.
(First time.)

Berceuse, Op. 57, } ....Chopin.
Valse, Op. 42, }
Liebestraum, No. 3, } ....Liszt.
Tarentelle, "Napoli," }

Journal, Lewiston, Me.

Date 3-28

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel arrived in Boston Sunday, and on Tuesday evening will give the first of the series of four vocal recitals announced at the Meionaon.

Paderewski and the Boston Symyhony Orchestra gave that Washington arch fund in New York a lift Sunday night at the Metropolitan Opera House in that city. The program included the "Tannhauser" and "Bueventa Celini,' overtures. "Le Rouet d'Omphale" concertos for piano by Schumann and Paderewski, and a Liszt "Hungarian Rhapsody." Every seat for the concert was sold.

Clipping from Tribune
Cambridge Mass

Date 3/26

Old Cambridge

....It was a beautiful thought of Mr. Nikisch to make the Symphony concert, on Thursday evening, a memorial to Mr. Lowell, and the music was selected with rare delicacy and judgment for the occasion.

PRESS, Portland, Me.

Date 3-28

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Symphony Concert.

The only concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of 60 musicians, conducted by Mr. Nikisch, will be given in the regular Stockbridge course at City Hall, tomorrow evening. The charming Mrs. Nikisch will be the solo vocalist. The band has just returned from its western trip, and is playing in splendid form. Get tickets at Stockbridge's at once.

SENTINEL, Milwaukee, Wis.

Date 3/27

Paderewski will give an extra concert on Sunday evening at the Metropolitan theater in New York, for the benefit of the Washington Arch fund. The concert will be made further attractive from the fact that the services of the Boston Symphony orchestra have been offered for the occasion, and two concerts will be played by M. Paderewski in connection with this orchestra. The boxes will be $50 and $30 each, and the seats will range from $1.50 to $3.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartet will give the second of its series of chamber concerts at Brattle Hall, Cambridge, tonight. Works by Dittersdorf, Tschaikowsky and Beethoven are promised for the quartet, and Mrs. Nikisch will sing songs by De Koven, Bungert, Strauss, Schumann, Brahms and Heuberger.

The second in the series of concerts of songs by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel at the Meionaon will be given tomorrow afternoon. The series also includes concerts on the afternoons of April 5 and 9. The programme for tomorrow includes examples of French, Italian, German and English schools, old and new, and songs by Tschaikowski and Paderewski.

[166]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
WEDNESDAY MORNING MAR. 30, 1892.

The Henschel Recital.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel may travel about as much as they please; they may win foreign laurels to their heart's content, but we shall still regard them as Bostonians, and their homecoming will still have in its great success a degree of personal greeting. But apart from all possible municipal pride, the concerts of such a gifted pair must have an intrinsic value of their own, and the programmes they present during their present season in Boston are worthy of any musical metropolis in the world. The execution of these programmes is likely to be almost beyond criticism, if the performance of last night be taken as criterion. Last night's list was a very broad and comprehensive one; it did not deal exclusively with the German lied, although that was not absent either, but it swept the circle from the old pure school of Fr. Martini to the modern works of Franz and of Henschel. I was especially glad to find a Franz number on the programme, for this most eminent of living lied composers has not been too frequently presented by the Henschels in their concerts. The voices remain very much the same as when the artists last appeared in our city; the lady sings with a tenderness and purity that charms by its simplicity, while the husband has the same timbre, the same dramatic fervor as heretofore. Judged by last night's work, the voice of Mr. Henschel is wearing a little better than that of his wife, for there were occasional traces of effort in her work, but by no means enough to mar its beauty. Hers is a voice that stands almost alone in its genre, and it possesses a charm peculiarly its own. The Handelion songs were perhaps a trifle too saccharine for their school, but the flexibility and artistic phrasing were commendable. The shading in that most difficultly simple song, Mendelssohn's "Auf Fluegeln des Gesonges," was entirely excellent, but Franz's "The Woods" was again not broad enough.

Mrs. Henschel sang three new songs by her husband, and all of these were worthy compositions. The first, a "French Romance," had a most musicianly accompaniment, and just that delicacy which suited to the French school, and to Mrs. Henschel's voice. The second did not seem so sustainedly interesting, but its climax at

"Schoen ist die Mondnacht; Elfenkoenigin, Zeige dich"

was very effective. The third—"On the Heavens"—had a true folk-song vein, although wrought up to a higher climax than ordinary folk music. It won an encore, and one of Mr. Henschel's delightful settings of Kingsley's "Waterhabies" carried the enthusiasm to a still greater height.

Mr. Henschel's own singing was the best he has ever given here, and those who know what his work has been, can imagine the high standard attained. His rapidity of enunciation and purity of tone in Cimarasa's buffo aria were masterly, but the acme of vocal effect was attained in that gloomiest of all songs, Schubert's "Doppelgaenger," which suited his voice perfectly. Lortzing's famous "In Childhood I Eallied" was perfect in its legato refrain, but unpleasantly sibilant in its pronunciation. The "Couplets of Vulcan" by Gounod, were well sung, but scarcely worth the singing, for at times the treatment is very trivial, as in the jingly phrase "Venus n'avait pas tort," but it caused the singer to be four times recalled.

The duets were all above criticism. Padre Martini is chiefly remembered nowadays by his pretty gavotte—"Les Moutons"—but Mr. Henschel will do an excellent work if he prevents the finer compositions of the master from becoming obsolete. Mrs. Henschel did her very best work of the evening in the duet from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," and now we will hope for a good number of Carl Loewe's ballads, which Mr. Henschel sings better than any man living.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Post
WEDNESDAY MORNING, MAR. 30, 1892.
MOTTO:
With a Mission
—AND—
Without a Muzzle.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The large audience present at the first Henschel recital at the Meionion, last night, was agreeably surprised at the degree of excellence which prevailed throughout the entire performance. Rumors of the manner in which Mr. and Mrs. Henschel had been received in other cities had, in a measure, prepared people for an enjoyable evening, and those familiar with their methods knew that the concert could not be other than artistic, and yet they were surprised.

The Henschels lay no claims to greatness, but rather base their popularity upon good musical taste, a thorough knowledge of correct phrasing, a clear idea of shading, and well trained, sympathetic voices, and with such gifts, how could they do otherwise than stand at the head of the musical profession?

Mr. Henschel played all the accompaniments in his own finished manner, and evinced rare taste in the arrangement of the programme which introduced both Mrs. Henschel and himself in solo work with a limited number of duets in which the two voices were perfectly blended.

Martini's duet, "Quel onda che rovina"; Handel's arias, "Oh, Sleep," from "Semele" and "Qual farfaietta," from "Partenope"; Pergolesi's aria, from "Il Maestro di Musica"; Cimarosa's aria buffa from "Calandrino," "Mignon's Song," by Beethoven; Mendelssohn's "Auf Flugeln des Gesanges"; "In the Woods," by Franz; Schubert's three little songs, "Der Doppelganger," "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus," "Der Schiffer"; duet from the "Taming of the Shrew"; three songs by Henschel, "Romance," "Morgens als Lerche," "Der Bote"; the Czar's song from "Czar and Carpenter"; "Couplets de Vulcain," from Gounod's "Philemon et Baucis," and duet from Boieldieu's "Le Nouveau Signeur du Village," made up a programme which for merit is rarely equalled. Boston is to be congratulated on having three more opportunities for hearing these artists, one of which will occur this week, Thursday, at 2:30 o'clock.

VIVIAN.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCI., NO. 90.
WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30, 1892.

The Return of the Henschels—Their First Recital.

The pleasantly anticipated return of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel to the scene of so many earlier triumphs at the Meionaon yesterday, as was expected, took on the character of a reunion of the patrons of their vocal recitals in the past, and made it as pleasant a social occasion as it was an artistic success.

The hall is admirably adapted to such events, as its arrangement brings the singers unusually near to all those who listen, and thus affords artists and audience an opportunity to feel each other's presence and influence to an unusual degree.

The audience assembled last evening was one that any artist would gladly appeal to, and the quick appreciation of all the good work done by the singers added not a small element to the enjoyment of the occasion.

As in former years, the programme made showed the skill and good judgment of Mr. Henschel in this art, and the varied list of numbers contained much that was unfamiliar and more that was enjoyable.

Mrs. Henschel sung the arias, "Oh, Sleep," from "Semele," and "Qual farfaletta," from "Partenope," by Handel; Mignon's song, Beethoven; "Auf Flugeln des Gesanges," Mendelssohn, and "In the Woods," Franz, and a romance, "Morgens als Lerche," and "Der Bote," by Mr. Henschel. At the first her voice appeared slightly less clear and pure than in earlier years, but she quickly sung herself free from the temporary difficulty, and then the voice that has so often charmed her home admirers was again heard in all its purity and sweetness. Of her singing little that is new can be said. She is a most delightful artist at all times, and last evening she again caused the most complete satisfaction in all her contributions to the programme. Her graceful interpretation of the Handel arias and the pretty songs by her husband made her most pronounced successes, and a new setting of "I once had a sweet little doll" was used as an encore number after the Henschel group.

Mr. Henschel's numbers consisted of arias from "Il Maestro di Musica," Pergolesi, and "Calandrino," Cimarosa; "Der Doppelzanger," "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus," and "Der Schiffer," by Schubert; the Czar's song, from "Czar and Carpenter," Lostzing, and Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philemon et Baucis," Gounod.

Mr. Henschel has always done wonders with his voice, but his triumphs over nature's limitations on his vocal equipment were never so pronounced as on this occasion. The jolly aria by Cimarosa was splendidly sung, and the famous song from Lortzing's opera was an artistic treat rarely enjoyed, even in the work of this great artist. The Gounod couplets were also given in the most admirable fashion, and quite captivated the audience.

The duets of the evening were the "Quel Onda Che Rovina," by Padre Martini, one from the "Taming of the Shrew," by Goetz, and one from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village," by Boieldieu, and in these numbers the two singers were heard with unstinted pleasure, their voices blending most enjoyably, and their singing being marked by a joint intelligence that commanded and gained the heartiest applause.

Needless to say that Mr. Henschel's accompaniments were a most important factor in the successes of the evening.

The second of these recitals will be given at the Meionaon tomorrow afternoon.

Clipping from Tribune
Cambridge Mass

Date 3/26

Symphony Concert.

The seventh concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, was given in Sanders theatre, on Thursday evening. The programme was a tribute to the memory of James Russell Lowell, and the beautiful selections were as follows: Overture to Manfred, Schumann; unfinished symphony, Schubert; fifth symphony, Beethoven. The sentiment which inspired this token of affection for Mr. Lowell must have been deeply gratifying to his nearest and dearest friends, for although he belonged distinctly to the field of literature, poetry, and music are closely allied, and the occasion seemed to be peculiarly fitting and appropriate. Mr. Nikisch's conception of Schumann's great overture is exactly in harmony with its romantic character, and the performance by the orchestra noble in every respect. It was, in fact, an ideal interpretation. Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, that "gem of purest ray serene," was wonderfully played, the exquisite themes of the Allegro being given with a soulful expression which produced a profound effect upon the audience. The ethereal beauty of the Andante con moto was always felt in Mr. Nikisch's refined and delicate conception which was delightfully satisfying to the hearers. Beethoven's great symphony in C minor brought the concert to a close, and in it Mr. Nikisch achieved a positive triumph. The Allegro con bino was played with great vigor and incisiveness of accent, and although the drums and brass were brought out fortissimo as indicated by the composer, the effect was so beautifully balanced that not a note of the strings and wind instruments was lost. The tempo in the Andante was admirable, the Scherzo and trio were played with beautiful distinctness, and the Finale was a veritable triumphal march, the alternations of wind and string being beautifully defined, while the Presto was a wonder of virtuosity. The large audience was quick to appreciate the beauty of the performance, and was most enthusiastic in its recognition of Mr. Nikisch's efforts. The next concert will be on Thursday evening, April 21.

C. R.

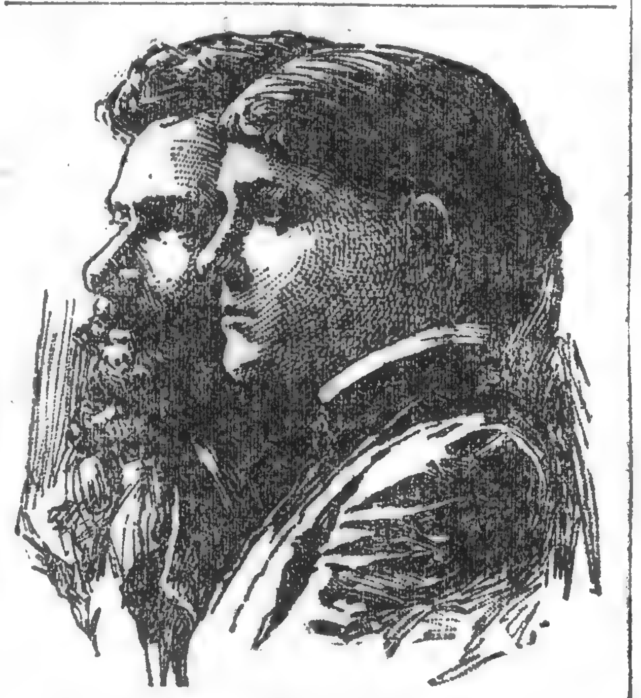
Boston Daily Globe.
WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30.

FIRST HENSCHEL CONCERT.

Musical Boston Welcomes the Return of Two Old Favorites.

The first of a series of vocal recitals by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel was given in the Meionaon last evening, and a fashionable and cultured audience was present to welcome the return to Boston of these two sterling artists and long-time favorites here.

It is scarcely necessary to tell Bostonians what thorough artists they are, or to dwell upon the delight which was offered yesterday's audience and the pleasure that is in store for those who attend the subsequent concerts of this uniquely interesting series. Mr. Henschel's labors with the Symphony orchestra in the days of its formation are still gratefully remembered, and their much too seldom appearance here since they left us for Europe are notable events in the season's musical annals. Their last appearance here was three years ago.



MR. AND MRS. GEORG HENSCHEL.

An admirably arrranged programme was offered last night, and both the artists seemed to be in especially good voice. It is in itself a delight to listen to Mr. Henschel's piano accompaniments, whether to his own or to his wife's songs.

Their first offering was Padre Martini's "Quel onda che revina," which was charmingly interpreted, and called forth enthusiastic demonstrations of approval. Indeed, the applause was unreservedly enthusiastic throughout the evening, and there were demands for several encore numberings being added to the already long programme. They also sang a duet from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," and one from Boieldieu's "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Villiage." Both were sung with charming expression and artistic effect.

The solos assigned to Mr. Henschel consisted of arias from Pergolesi's "Il Maestro di Muscia" and Cimarosa's "Calandrino," the Czar's song from "Czar and Carpenter," couplets de Vulcain from "Philemon et Baucis," and a trio of songs by Schubert. All were sung with wonderful spirit and inspiration.

Mrs. Henschel never sang more sweetly, more purely or with greater grace than she did last night, when she offered as solos two arias by Handel, Beethoven's Mignon song, Mendelssohn's "Auf Flugeln des Gesanges," Franz's "In the Woods" and three of Mr. Henschel's own composition, a romance, "Morgeus als Lerche" and "Der Bote," all of them heard here for the first time. They are all beautiful compositions, and the latter number proved especially pleasing.

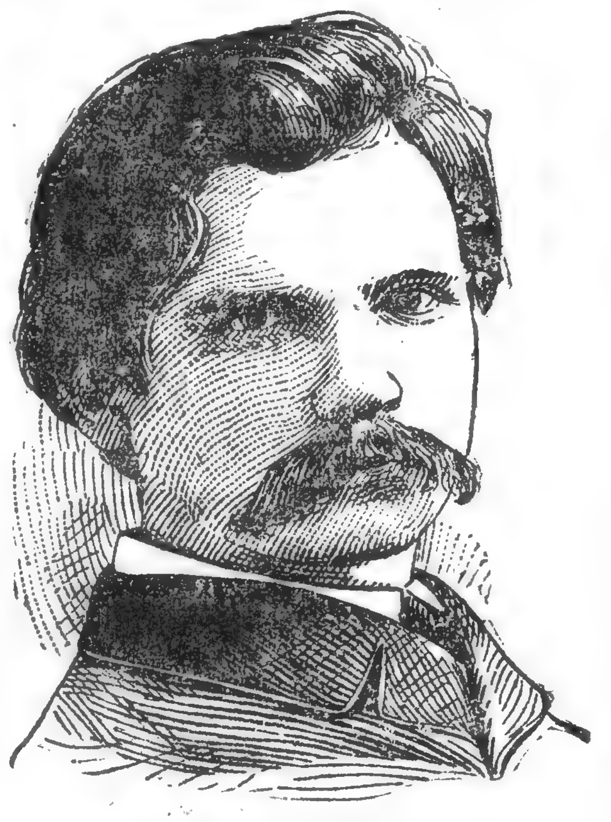
Succeeding recitals will be given as follows: Thursday afternoon, March 31, Tuesday afternoon, April 5, Saturday afternoon, April 9. Tickets are on sale at the box office, Music Hall.

Clipping from Times
Buffalo N.Y.

Date 3-21

D'Albert Next Saturday Night.

Eugene D'Albert, one of the most brilliant pianists now before the public will give a recital at Music hall next Saturday evening. Wherever this great artist has appeared he has been enthusiastically received by the public and the prospects are that he will meet with a warm reception in Buffalo. He is playing under the management of Mr. Charles A. Ellis and his tour cannot but be a success. The programme is as follows:



Eugene D'Albert.

Prelude and Fugue in D major, Bach-D'Albert.
Sonata in E minor, Op. 90............Beethoven.
Allegro moderato—Moderato cantabile.
Variations serieuses, Op. 54,......Mendelssohn.

Suite in D minor, Op. 91,..................Raff.
Introduzione e Fuga.
Giga con Variazioni.
Cavatina.
Marcia.
(First time.)

Berceuse, Op. 57, } Valse, Op. 42, }..................Chopin.
Liebestraum, No. 3, } Tarentelle, "Napoli," }..................Liszt.

Journal, Lewiston, Me.

Date 3-28

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel arrived in Boston Sunday, and on Tuesday evening will give the first of the series of four vocal recitals announced at the Meionaon.

Paderewski and the Boston Symyhony Orchestra gave that Washington arch fund in New York a lift Sunday night at the Metropolitan Opera House in that city. The program included the "Tannhauser" and "Bueventa Celini," overtures. "Le Rouet d'Omphale" concertos for piano by Schumann and Paderewski, and a Liszt "Hungarian Rhapsody." Every seat for the concert was sold.

Clipping from Tribune
Cambridge Mass.

Date 3/26

[illegible] Cambridge

....It was a beautiful thought of Mr. Nikisch to make the Symphony concert, on Thursday evening, a memorial to Mr. Lowell, and the music was selected with rare delicacy and judgment for the occasion.

PRESS, Portland, Me.

Date 3-28

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Symphony Concert.

The only concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of 60 musicians, conducted by Mr. Nikisch, will be given in the regular Stockbridge course at City Hall, tomorrow evening. The charming Mrs. Nikisch will be the solo vocalist. The band has just returned from its western trip, and is playing in splendid form. Get tickets at Stockbridge's at once.

SENTINEL, Milwaukee, Wis.

Date 3/27

Paderewski will give an extra concert on Sunday evening at the Metropolitan theater in New York, for the benefit of the Washington Arch fund. The concert will be made further attractive from the fact that the services of the Boston Symphony orchestra have been offered for the occasion, and two concerts will be played by M. Paderewski in connection with this orchestra. The boxes will be $50 and $30 each, and the seats will range from $1.50 to $3.

Boston Transcript
WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartet will give the second of its series of chamber concerts at Brattle Hall, Cambridge, tonight. Works by Dittersdorf, Tschaikowsky and Beethoven are promised for the quartet, and Mrs. Nikisch will sing songs by De Koven, Bungert, Strauss, Schumann, Brahms and Heuberger.

The second in the series of concerts of songs by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel at the Meionaon will be given tomorrow afternoon. The series also includes concerts on the afternoons of April 5 and 9. The programme for tomorrow includes examples of French, Italian, German and English schools, old and new, and songs by Tschaikowski and Paderewski.

Season of 1892

Mr. & Mrs. Georg Henschel's

. . Vocal Recitals . .

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

Second Recital

MEIONAON,
. . BOSTON.

Thursday Afternoon, March 31, at 2.30.

Succeeding Recitals, Tuesday Afternoon, April 5, and Saturday Afternoon, April 9, at 2.30. Tickets on sale, Box Office, Music Hall.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

American Art Journal.
The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.
FOUNDED IN 1868 BY HENRY C. WATSON.
WM. M. THOMS, Editor.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1892.

MR. HENCSHEL'S "HAMLET" MUSIC, written specially by the ex-conductor of the Boston Symphony Concerts for Mr. Beerbohm Tree's presentation of Shakespeare's tragedy, was publicly produced at the Haymarket last Thursday, and the principal portions were given in concert form at the London Symphony Concert last night. The prelude, Danish march and four entractes, make up a capital little suite. Mr. Henschel has employed leading motives freely, the two principal motives respectively standing for hero and heroine, where there is also a motive of Faith and a motive of Murder. In the Hamlet theme the words of the prince's soliloquy, "To be, or not to be," are clearly enunciated, while the Ophelia theme is a stream of pure melody, typical of her simple and lovable character. As a concert piece, perhaps the Danish march is the most effective portion of the suite, for here the barbaric and picturesque elements have play. In the trio of the march are two genuine old Danish melodies, selected for Mr. Henschel by the Princess of Wales, who has taken a great interest in the work. Next perhaps in order of effectiveness are the second or Ophelia entracte, and the fourth, a delicious little number written throughout for muted strings and drums and played immediately before the scene of the heroine's death. The last entracte of all is a pretty little Pastorale, intended to prepare the mind of the audience for the village churchyard in which Mr. Tree indicates the scene of Ophelia's burial. Mr. Henschel, who conducted, was very warmly applauded, and the suite is likely to be heard in many a concert room this winter. The concert was preceded by the Funeral March from Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's cantata, "The Story of Sayid" written for the Leeds festival six years ago. The Funeral March, so far as, at any rate, [illegible] are concerned, is practi- [illegible]

Boston Daily Globe.
FRIDAY, APRIL 1.

HENSCHEL RECITAL.

Second Concert at the Meionaon by the Popular Artists.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel entertained a very large and select audience at their second vocal recital in the Meionaon, yesterday afternoon, and the hearty applause with which the artists were greeted at the close of each number must have convinced the gifted pair of the high estimation in which they are held by musical, as well as fashionable Boston.

The concert was of a very high order and ranged from grave to gay: from Bach, Handel and Beethoven to English ballad and Irish love songs.

The duets were from Paisiello, Schumann's "Faust" and Thomas' "Hamlet." The opening one was sung with admirable gusto and aroused the enthusiasm of the audience from the beginning. The more delicate compositions by Schumann and Thomas were also well received, the latter being followed by several recalls.

Mrs. Henschel's group of English and Irish songs were sung with exceptional musical skill, and the gem of the three, "The Glen of Kenmare," was most heartily redemanded. In Corder's "O Sun that Wakenest" the sympathetic qualities of her rich soprano voice made the number the notable achievement of the afternoon, although surpassing but slightly a dainty little French gavotti by Sgambati.

Of the solo numbers contributed by Mr. Henschel the recitative and aria by Handel was the most artistically given. The audience was greatly pleased with the Brahms group, but the rollicking vagabond song by Beethoven was sung with such animation and dramatic fervor that from the popular standpoint it must be considered Mr. Henschel's most successful effort.

Mr. Henschel's versatility as singer and accompanist was amply evidenced, and he played with his usual skill and artistic expression.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel are such consummate artists that their reappearance in Boston is heartily welcomed even in this surfeit of concert and musical offerings of the season.

The next recital will occur at the Meionaon on Tuesday afternoon, April 5.

Boston Transcript
WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30, 1892.

THE HENSCHEL RECITALS.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave their first vocal recital in the Meionaon last evening, the programme being as follows:

Duet: "Quel onda che rovina."..........Padre Martini
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Aria: "Oh! Sleep," from "Semele." } ....Handel
Aria "Quel farfalletta," from "Partenope." }
Mrs. Henschel.
Aria from "Il maestro di musica"..........Pergolesi
Aria buffa from "Il ritorno di Don Calandino," Cimarosa
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's Song..........Beethoven
"Auf Flügeln des Gesanges"..........Mendelssohn
In the Woods..........Franz
Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Döppelgänger." }
"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus." } ....Schubert
"Der Schiffer." }
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from the "Taming of the Shrew"..........Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Romance. }
"Morgens als Lerche." } ....Henschel
"Der Bote." }
Mrs. Henschel.
The Czar's Song, from "Czar and Carpenter," Lortzing
Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philémon et Baucis," Gounod
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village," Boieldieu
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

It has often been remarked how small a vista over the field of music any one artist opens to our view. The repertory of a singer or player may be large or small, but, in either case, it is pretty sure to be constant and unchanging, year in, year out. For instance, here come the Henschels back to us, and, in a programme of eighteen numbers, how very few things do we find that they have not sung here before, time and time again! Three new songs by Mr. Henschel, one or two other new things, and the rest of the list made up of old friends—friends, to be sure, but still old ones. We had hoped for a longer list of novelties. But, if these admirable singers return to us with an almost unchanged repertory, they come back not entirely unchanged themselves. Mrs. Henschel's voice, for one thing, has ripened noticeably. One often hears of voices growing, becoming larger and more powerful; we have never known an indubitable instance of this. As far as our observation goes, voices do not really grow; but they do mature, ripen and gain in richness, depth of quality and timbre. Mrs. Henschel's voice is no longer the merely limpid light soprano it used to be; it has acquired a rich, sensuous quality, an emotional expressiveness, which was once foreign to it. It now approaches, in timbre, if not in volume, the great dramatic soprani. A similar change is to be noted in her singing; with no loss of that exquisite finish of style for which she has been conspicuous ever since her first return from Europe, she has regained all the emotional, passionate force, the native largeness of style and magnetism, which we remember in her when a half-taught young girl of fifteen. She now sings once more with all the fire she did in the days when she used to sing Schubert's "Gretchen am Spinnrade" to her own accompaniment. Mr. Henschel has still his old mannerisms, but his voice sounds smoother and mellower than of yore, while his singing shows all its whilom artistic insight and dramatic power.

Mr. Henschel displays his wonderful versatility as brilliantly as ever; from Schubert's "Döppelgänger" and "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" to the rollicking patter of the air from Cimarosa's "Don Calandrino," what a distance! Yet Mr. Henschel sings the one as admirably, as brilliantly and characteristically, to the manner born, as the other. One was sorry to hear him still stick to that threadbare old song from "Czar und Zimmermann"; after making people cry two or three times, as it did some years ago, this song might be considered fully to have done its duty and to be ready for rest. It has now lost what virtue it may once have had as a musical onion; and, stripped of its tear-provoking power, it lays bare all its musical poverty and triviality. Upon the whole, it has no proper place on such a programme.

Mrs. Henschel's singing of the Handel songs was simply exquisite; here warmth of feeling and Handelian purity of melodic outline went hand in hand. It was especially good, too, to hear her sing Robert Franz's "Waldfahrt" (only would that she had sung it in German!). In writing his songs Franz always had a pure soprano voice in his mind, and we have hitherto only heard this particular song sung by tenors. Mrs. Henschel's soprano gives it just its right character, and she sang it to perfection. In her husband's three songs she was thoroughly charming; the songs themselves are beautiful, albeit one finds in the second one somewhat more of sudden, quasi-Lisztian modulation than one would have expected of Mr. Henschel.

We were disappointed at hearing the duet from Hermann Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" sung in English, instead of in the original German; it doubtless helped a large part of the audience to a better understanding of the text; but, to our mind, it is always a ticklish undertaking to do anything in English that recalls Shakspeare. To listen to a garbled imitation of Shakspeare in German is not so bad; but to hear the same thing in English induces one insensibly to draw comparisons that are not without their ludicrous side. The English text is so incomparably and comically weaker than Shakspeare's that it is rather hard to stand. Still the beauty of Goetz's music and the thrice admirable manner in which the duet was sung made up for much; one could enjoy it in spite of the triviality of the text. The large audience was as enthusiastic as possible, and Mrs. Henschel responded to a repeated recall with her husband's favorite "I had a Sweet Little Doll, Dears," to the rapturous delight of everyone.

Journal, Lewiston, Me.
Date 3-29

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert at Portland, which was to have been given this evening, has been postponed. Mr. Stockbridge received a telegram Monday afternoon and the same was telegraphed to the Journal, but too late for announcement Monday. The date when they will come has not yet been fixed.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 92.
FRIDAY, APRIL 1, 1892.

THE HENSCHEL RECITAL.

The second of the vocal recitals announced by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel was given at the Meionaon yesterday afternoon, with an audience in attendance that left no shadow of doubt as to the favor with which these artists are held by the public.

Mrs. Henschel revived the almost forgotten songs: "It Was a Lover and His Lass" (old English), "Polly Willis" (Dr. Arne), and "The Glen of Kenmare" (old Irish), and also sung the more modern selections: "Lullaby" by Tschaikowsky, Mignon's song by Liszt, "O Sun That Wakenest" by F. Corder, a Polish song by Paderewski, the "Serenade du Passant" by Massenet, and a gavotte, "Il faut aimer," by Sgambati.

This honest singer never appealed more successfully to an audience than on this occasion, for the applause which rewarded her efforts was so spontaneous that it gave conclusive evidence of the emotions caused by her charming vocalization. There is a quaintness about this little woman that made her singing of the old songs, "It Was a Lover," "Polly Willis" and "The Glen of Kenmare," peculiarly delightful, and the value of these old-time melodies was fully realized in her interpretation of them. There was such a charm about her singing of the old Irish ballad that its repetition was necessarily granted. The "lullaby" of the composer Tschaikowsky and Massenet's graceful ditty were other prominent successes, but there was little to commend in the Paderewski song, despite the intelligent fashion in which it was sung.

Mr. Henschel's numbers included "Vergissmeinnicht," J. S. Bach; the serenata from "Agrippina," and the recitative and air from "Susanna," by Handel; the songs by Brahms, "Die Mainacht," "Sontags" and "Unuberwindlich"; Crugantino's song from Goethe's "Claudine von Villa Bella" (1790), Beethoven; and the ballad, "Die verfallene Muhle," by Loewe.

The jolly song by Beethoven, which represents the dignified father of the nine symphonies in a somewhat surprising fashion, made a distinctly prominent success among these numbers, and it was sung with inspiring effect by Mr. Henschel. The Loewe ballad was heard with great satisfaction, and its admirable delivery displayed Mr. Henschel's gifts as a dramatic singer at their best. The recitative and aria from Handel's "Susanna" was another bit of thoroughly artistic vocal work, illustrating Mr. Henschel's absolute mastery of all the technical details of such compositions. The sentimental is not a prominent side of this singer's characteristics, and if any exception is to be taken to his part of the programme, it would be in reference to his singing of "Die Mainacht" and "Sontags," by Brahms, which demand this element to a greater extent than he possesses.

The day's programme was begun with the duetto buffo "La cosa non va netta," by Paisiello, and the two singers were also heard in a duet from Schumann's "Faust" and one from Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet." Mrs. Henschel is such an apparently earnest singer, that the gay measures of Paisiello's duet seemed an odd selection for her voice, but she sung her share of the composition delightfully, nevertheless. It was in the "Hamlet" duet that the remarkable resources of Mrs. Henschel's vocal gifts were made most prominent, and her broad, dramatic singing in this number brought the recital to a fitting climax.

These two singers set an example in one direction which might well be followed with profit by all who come upon the concert stage. They are "letter perfect" in everything they announce upon their programmes, and they gain no little of their success by the freedom which this fact makes possible in all their vocal work.

The third recital of this series occurs next Tuesday afternoon.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
FRIDAY MORNING APRIL 1, 1892.

The Second Henschel Recital.

A programme sufficiently extended in variety to suit all tastes, and the artistic rendering of whose numbers must have satisfied the most exacting, was presented by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel at their second vocal recital at the Meionan, yesterday afternoon, to an audience that completely filled the hall. It was an appreciative audience, as well, lavish to a fault with its applause, and enduring with patience, the decidedly uncomfortable seats, throughout the rather long performance.

In listening to this gifted pair one forgets to criticise, and gives himself up to the enjoyment of the hour. And such enjoyment! Those who have heard Mr. and Mrs. Henschel need no description of their charming entertainment. To such it may be said that Mrs. Henschel sings as sweetly and expressively as ever, and that her husband has lost none of his former excellence. His voice seems rather to improve with years, and Loewe's ballad "Die verfallene Muhle" was sung as only Henschel can sing it. In the severer numbers, by Bach and Handel, notably the recitative and air from "Susanna" by the latter, the wonderful power and compass of his voice appeared to great advantage. A trio of songs by Brahms and Crugantino's song from Goethe's "Claudine von Villa Bella" were particularly well rendered.

Mrs. Henschel's voice is especially adapted to ballad singing, and the pleasant expectations aroused by the old English and Irish songs early in the programme were fully realized. The "Glen of Kenmare" demanded and received an encore, the only one responded to during the afternoon. Among her other numbers a lullaby by Tschaikowsky, Mignon's song (Liszt's music), and the pretty gavotte by Sgambati, "Il faut aimer," deserve particular notice. The duets with which the recital opened and closed, "La cosa non va netta," by Paisiello, and Thomas' "Hamlet," were simply beyond criticism.

[167]

Season of 1892

Mr. & Mrs. Georg Henschel's

. . Vocal Recitals . .

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

Second Recital

MEIONAON,
. . BOSTON.

Thursday Afternoon, March 31, at 2.30.

Succeeding Recitals, Tuesday Afternoon, April 5, and Saturday Afternoon, April 9, at 2.30. Tickets on sale, Box Office, Music Hall.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.

WM. M. THOMS, Editor.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1892.

MR. HENCSHEL'S "HAMLET" MUSIC, written specially by the ex-conductor of the Boston Symphony Concerts for Mr. Beerbohm Tree's presentation of Shakespeare's tragedy, was publicly produced at the Haymarket last Thursday, and the principal portions were given in concert form at the London Symphony Concert last night. The prelude, Danish march and four entractes, make up a capital little suite. Mr. Henschel has employed leading motives freely, the two principal motives respectively standing for hero and heroine, where there is also a motive of Faith and a motive of Murder. In the Hamlet theme the words of the prince's soliloquy, "To be, or not to be," are clearly enunciated, while the Ophelia theme is a stream of pure melody, typical of her simple and lovable character. As a concert piece, perhaps the Danish march is the most effective portion of the suite, for here the barbaric and picturesque elements have play. In the trio of the march are two genuine old Danish melodies, selected for Mr. Henschel by the Princess of Wales, who has taken a great interest in the work. Next perhaps in order of effectiveness are the second or Ophelia entracte, and the fourth, a delicious little number written throughout for muted strings and drums and played immediately before the scene of the heroine's death. The last entracte of all is a pretty little Pastorale, intended to prepare the mind of the audience for the village churchyard in which Mr. Tree indicates the scene of Ophelia's burial. Mr. Henschel, who conducted, was very warmly applauded, and the suite is likely to be heard in many a concert room this winter. The concert was preceded by the Funeral March from Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's cantata, "The Story of Sayid" written for the Leeds festival six years ago. The Funeral March, so far as, at any rate, London audiences are concerned, is practi- [illegible] vived of the work.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, APRIL 1.

HENSCHEL RECITAL.

Second Concert at the Meionaon by the Popular Artists.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel entertained a very large and select audience at their second vocal recital in the Meionaon, yesterday afternoon, and the hearty applause with which the artists were greeted at the close of each number must have convinced the gifted pair of the high estimation in which they are held by musical, as well as fashionable Boston.

The concert was of a very high order and ranged from grave to gay: from Bach, Handel and Beethoven to English ballad and Irish love songs.

The duets were from Paisiello, Schumann's "Faust" and Thomas' "Hamlet." The opening one was sung with admirable gusto and aroused the enthusiasm of the audience from the beginning. The more delicate compositions by Schumann and Thomas were also well received, the latter being followed by several recalls.

Mrs. Henschel's group of English and Irish songs were sung with exceptional musical skill, and the gem of the three, "The Glen of Kenmare," was most heartily redemanded. In Corder's "O Sun that Wakenest" the sympathetic qualities of her rich soprano voice made the number the notable achievement of the afternoon, although surpassing but slightly a dainty little French gavotti by Sgambati.

Of the solo numbers contributed by Mr. Henschel the recitative and aria by Handel was the most artistically given. The audience was greatly pleased with the Brahms group, but the rollicking vagabond song by Beethoven was sung with such animation and dramatic fervor that from the popular standpoint it must be considered Mr. Henschel's most successful effort.

Mr. Henschel's versatility as singer and accompanist was amply evidenced, and he played with his usual skill and artistic expression.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel are such consummate artists that their reappearance in Boston is heartily welcomed even in this surfeit of concert and musical offerings of the season.

The next recital will occur at the Meionaon on Tuesday afternoon, April 5.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30, 1892.

THE HENSCHEL RECITALS.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave their first vocal recital in the Meionaon last evening, the programme being as follows:

Duet: "Quel onda che rovina." .... Padre Martini
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Aria: "Oh! Sleep," from "Semele." } .... Handel
Aria "Quel farfalletta," from "Partenope." }
Mrs. Henschel.
Aria from "Il maestro di musica" .... Pergolesi
Aria buffa from "Il ritorno di Don Calandino," Cimarosa
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's Song .... Beethoven
"Auf Flügeln des Gesanges" .... Mendelssohn
In the Woods .... Franz
Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Döppelgänger." }
"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus." } .... Schubert
"Der Schiffer." }
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from the "Taming of the Shrew" .... Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Romance. }
"Morgens als Lerche." } .... Henschel
"Der Bote." }
Mrs. Henschel.
The Czar's Song, from "Czar and Carpenter," Lortzing
Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philémon et Baucis," Gounod
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village," Boieldieu
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

It has often been remarked how small a vista over the field of music any one artist opens to our view. The repertory of a singer or player may be large or small, but, in either case, it is pretty sure to be constant and unchanging, year in, year out. For instance, here come the Henschels back to us, and, in a programme of eighteen numbers, how very few things do we find that they have not sung here before, time and time again! Three new songs by Mr. Henschel, one or two other new things, and the rest of the list made up of old friends—friends, to be sure, but still old ones. We had hoped for a longer list of novelties. But, if these admirable singers return to us with an almost unchanged repertory, they come back not entirely unchanged themselves. Mrs. Henschel's voice, for one thing, has ripened noticeably. One often hears of voices growing, becoming larger and more powerful; we have never known an indubitable instance of this. As far as our observation goes, voices do not really grow; but they do mature, ripen and gain in richness, depth of quality and timbre. Mrs. Henschel's voice is no longer the merely limpid light soprano it used to be; it has acquired a rich, sensuous quality, an emotional expressiveness, which was once foreign to it. It now approaches, in timbre, if not in volume, the great dramatic soprani. A similar change is to be noted in her singing; with no loss of that exquisite finish of style for which she has been conspicuous ever since her first return from Europe, she has regained all the emotional, passionate force, the native largeness of style and magnetism, which we remember in her when a half-taught young girl of fifteen. She now sings once more with all the fire she did in the days when she used to sing Schubert's "Gretchen am Spinnrade" to her own accompaniment. Mr. Henschel has still his old mannerisms, but his voice sounds smoother and mellower than of yore, while his singing shows all its whilom artistic insight and dramatic power.

Mr. Henschel displays his wonderful versatility as brilliantly as ever; from Schubert's "Döppelgänger" and "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" to the rollicking patter of the air from Cimarosa's "Don Calandrino," what a distance! Yet Mr. Henschel sings the one as admirably, as brilliantly and characteristically, to the manner born, as the other. One was sorry to hear him still stick to that threadbare old song from "Czar und Zimmermann"; after making people cry two or three times, as it did some years ago, this song might be considered fully to have done its duty and to be ready for rest. It has now lost what virtue it may once have had as a musical onion; and, stripped of its tear-provoking power, it lays bare all its musical poverty and triviality. Upon the whole, it has no proper place on such a programme.

Mrs. Henschel's singing of the Handel songs was simply exquisite; here warmth of feeling and Handelian purity of melodic outline went hand in hand. It was especially good, too, to hear her sing Robert Franz's "Waldfahrt" (only would that she had sung it in German!). In writing his songs Franz always had a pure soprano voice in his mind, and we have hitherto only heard this particular song sung by tenors. Mrs. Henschel's soprano gives it just its right character, and she sang it to perfection. In her husband's three songs she was thoroughly charming; the songs themselves are beautiful, albeit one finds in the second one somewhat more of sudden, quasi-Lisztian modulation than one would have expected of Mr. Henschel.

We were disappointed at hearing the duet from Hermann Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" sung in English, instead of in the original German; it doubtless helped a large part of the audience to a better understanding of the text; but, to our mind, it is always a ticklish undertaking to do anything in English that recalls Shakspeare. To listen to a garbled imitation of Shakspeare in German is not so bad; but to hear the same thing in English induces one insensibly to draw comparisons that are not without their ludicrous side. The English text is so incomparably and comically weaker than Shakspeare's that it is rather hard to stand. Still the beauty of Goetz's music and the thrice admirable manner in which the duet was sung made up for much; one could enjoy it in spite of the triviality of the text. The large audience was as enthusiastic as possible, and Mrs. Henschel responded to a repeated recall with her husband's favorite "I had a Sweet Little Doll, Dears," to the rapturous delight of everyone.

Journal, Lewiston, Me.

Date 3-29

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert at Portland, which was to have been given this evening, has been postponed. Mr. Stockbridge received a telegram Monday afternoon and the same was telegraphed to the Journal, but too late for announcement Monday. The date when they will come has not yet been fixed.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 92.

FRIDAY, APRIL 1, 1892.

THE HENSCHEL RECITAL.

The second of the vocal recitals announced by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel was given at the Meionaon yesterday afternoon, with an audience in attendance that left no shadow of doubt as to the favor with which these artists are held by the public.

Mrs. Henschel revived the almost forgotten songs: "It Was a Lover and His Lass" (old English), "Polly Willis" (Dr. Arne), and "The Glen of Kenmare" (old Irish), and also sung the more modern selections: "Lullaby" by Tschaikowsky, Mignon's song by Liszt, "O Sun That Wakenest" by F. Corder, a Polish song by Paderewski, the "Serenade du Passant" by Massenet, and a gavotte, "Il faut aimer," by Sgambati.

This honest singer never appealed more successfully to an audience than on this occasion, for the applause which rewarded her efforts was so spontaneous that it gave conclusive evidence of the emotions caused by her charming vocalization. There is a quaintness about this little woman that made her singing of the old songs, "It Was a Lover," "Polly Willis" and "The Glen of Kenmare," peculiarly delightful, and the value of these old-time melodies was fully realized in her interpretation of them. There was such a charm about her singing of the old Irish ballad that its repetition was necessarily granted. The "lullaby" of the composer Tschaikowsky and Massenet's graceful ditty were other prominent successes, but there was little to commend in the Paderewski song, despite the intelligent fashion in which it was sung.

Mr. Henschel's numbers included "Vergissmeinnicht," J. S. Bach; the serenata from "Agrippina," and the recitative and air from "Susanna," by Handel; the songs by Brahms, "Die Mainacht," "Sontags" and "Unuberwindlich"; Crugantino's song from Goethe's "Claudine von Villa Bella" (1790), Beethoven; and the ballad, "Die verfallene Muhle," by Loewe.

The jolly song by Beethoven, which represents the dignified father of the nine symphonies in a somewhat surprising fashion, made a distinctly prominent success among these numbers, and it was sung with inspiring effect by Mr. Henschel. The Loewe ballad was heard with great satisfaction, and its admirable delivery displayed Mr. Henschel's gifts as a dramatic singer at their best. The recitative and aria from Handel's "Susanna" was another bit of thoroughly artistic vocal work, illustrating Mr. Henschel's absolute mastery of all the technical details of such compositions. The sentimental is not a prominent side of this singer's characteristics, and if any exception is to be taken to his part of the programme, it would be in reference to his singing of "Die Mainacht" and "Sontags," by Brahms, which demand this element to a greater extent than he possesses.

The day's programme was begun with the duetto buffo "La cosa non va netta," by Paisiello, and the two singers were also heard in a duet from Schumann's "Faust" and one from Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet." Mrs. Henschel is such an apparently earnest singer, that the gay measures of Paisiello's duet seemed an odd selection for her voice, but she sung her share of the composition delightfully, nevertheless. It was in the "Hamlet" duet that the remarkable resources of Mrs. Henschel's vocal gifts were made most prominent, and her broad, dramatic singing in this number brought the recital to a fitting climax.

These two singers set an example in one direction which might well be followed with profit by all who come upon the concert stage. They are "letter perfect" in everything they announce upon their programmes, and they gain no little of their success by the freedom which this fact makes possible in all their vocal work.

The third recital of this series occurs next Tuesday afternoon.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING APRIL 1, 1892.

The Second Henschel Recital.

A programme sufficiently extended in variety to suit all tastes, and the artistic rendering of whose numbers must have satisfied the most exacting, was presented by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel at their second vocal recital at the Meionan, yesterday afternoon, to an audience that completely filled the hall. It was an appreciative audience, as well, lavish to a fault with its applause, and enduring with patience, the decidedly uncomfortable seats, throughout the rather long performance.

In listening to this gifted pair one forgets to criticise, and gives himself up to the enjoyment of the hour. And such enjoyment! Those who have heard Mr. and Mrs. Henschel need no description of their charming entertainment. To such it may be said that Mrs. Henschel sings as sweetly and expressively as ever, and that her husband has lost none of his former excellence. His voice seems rather to improve with years, and Loewe's ballad "Die verfallene Muhle" was sung as only Henschel can sing it. In the severer numbers, by Bach and Handel, notably the recitative and air from "Susanna" by the latter, the wonderful power and compass of his voice appeared to great advantage. A trio of songs by Brahms and Crugantino's song from Goethe's "Claudine von Villa Bella" were particularly well rendered.

Mrs. Henschel's voice is especially adapted to ballad singing, and the pleasant expectations aroused by the old English and Irish songs early in the programme were fully realized. The "Glen of Kenmare" demanded and received an encore, the only one responded to during the afternoon. Among her other numbers a lullaby by Tschaikowsky, Mignon's song (Liszt's music), and the pretty gavotte by Sgambati, "Il faut aimer," deserve particular notice. The duets with which the recital opened and closed, "La cosa non va netta," by Paisiello, and Thomas' "Hamlet," were simply beyond criticism.

MEIONAON, BOSTON. Thursday Afternoon March 31,

Second Recital, at 2.30 o'clock.

PROGRAMME.

DUETTO BUFFO. "La cosa non va netta." . . . . PAISIELLO
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

(English Version.)

Aurora. This affair moves rather slowly,
Surely something is the matter.
Trifone. This shrewd woman is suspicious,
Still she must drink.
Aurora. Come, let us be going.
Trifone. But first drink a little.
Aurora. No, no, excuse me.
Trifone. Yes, yes, please try it.
Aurora. Many thanks, good sir,
I have tried it already.
Trifone. But all this is shameful,
The way that you treat me.
Aurora. O heav'ns! don't mortify me.
Trifone. Try it,—just one drop.
Aurora. I cannot, it is disgusting.
Trifone. Then I will throw it in your face,
With all politeness.
Aurora. Let the old beast growl,
He cannot make me drink it.
Aurora. This affair moves rather slowly,
Surely something is the matter.
Trifone. This shrewd woman is suspicious,
Still she must drink.

(a) Vergissmeinnicht. . . . . J. S BACH
(b) SERENATA from "Agrippina." }
(c) RECITATIVE and AIR from "Susanna." } . . . . . HANDEL
Mr. Henschel.

(a) Forget me not, thou dearest, dearest Lord.
Oh, hear my supplication,
Be thou my consolation;
In time of pain and fear,
Oh, be thou near!

Forget me not when Death knocks at my door.
I'll open joyfully,
For I shall come to thee.
My God, what should I fear
If thou be near?

(English Version.)

(b) Beloved, come!
The stars are bright,
Love's sweet delight
Awaits us, come!

(c) Recit. Tyrannic Love, I feel thy cruel dart,
Nor age protects me from its burning smart!
What! seated with the elders of the land,
To guide stern Justice's unrelenting hand,
Shall I submit to feel the raging fire?
Youth in its ardor reckless courts love's darts;
But, when the blood should scarce attempt to flow,
I feel the purple torrents fiercely glow.
Love conquers all. Alas! I find it so!
Bear me resistless down the rapid tide.
No faithful pilot shall my vessel guide,
No friendly star her gentle light supplies;
But pitchy clouds involve the darkened skies,
The tempest howls, the foaming surges roar;
While I, unhappy, quit the safer shore!

Air. Ye verdant hills, ye balmy vales,
Bear witness of my pain;
How oft have Shinar's flow'ry dales
Been taught my loving strain!
The wounded oaks in yonder grove
Retain the name of her I love.

Oh! let me gaze upon thy face,
Entranced with beauty's spell;
The love awakened by each grace
I feel 'twere vain to quell.
Then set my throbbing heart at rest,
And soothe the anguish of my breast.

(a) It was a Lover and his Lass. (OLD ENGLISH.) . . . . DR. ARNE
(b) Polly Willis.
(c) The Glen of Kenmare. (OLD IRISH.)
Mrs. Henschel.

(a) It was a lover and his lass,
With a hey, and a ho, and a hey nonino,
That o'er the green cornfield did pass,
In spring-time, the only pretty ring-time,
When birds do sing, hey ding a ding, ding;
Sweet lovers love the spring.

Between the acres of the rye,
With a hey, and a ho, and a hey nonino,
These pretty country folks would lie,
In spring-time, etc.

This carol they began that hour,
With a hey, and a ho, and a hey nonino,
How that life was but a flower
In spring-time, etc.

Then pretty lovers take the time,
With a hey, and a ho, and a hey nonino,
For love is crowned with the prime
In spring-time, etc.

(b) Attend, ye nymphs and tuneful swains,
Who in persuasive, lulling strains
Of Chloe sing or Phyllis;
Tho' rude my voice and mean my verse,
Upbraid me not while I rehearse
The charms of Polly Willis.

Though languid I and poor in thought,
No simile shall e'er be brought
From roses, pinks, or lilies;
Some common beauties they may hit,
But sure no simile e'er can fit
The charms of Polly Willis.

She's not as Venus on the flood,
Nor as she once on Ida stood,
Nor mortal Amaryllis.
Frame all that's beauteous, gay, and fair,
With pleasing mien and winning air,
And that is Polly Willis.

(c) There's a gap in the hedge of Kenmare,
With a seat just contrived for a pair;
A nice shady spot when the weather is hot,
And the couples that don't like the glare go there,
To sit down in the hedge at Kenmare.

---

ston Tr
WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30,

THE HENSCHEL RECITA

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave the vocal recital in the Meionaon last eveni programme being as follows:
Duet: "Quel onda che rovina."..........Padre
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Aria: "Oh! Sleep," from "Semele." }
Aria "Quel farfalletta," from "Partenope." } ...
Mrs. Henschel.
Aria from "Il maestro di musica"...............
Aria buffa from "Il ritorno di Don Calandino,"
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's Song......................................Be
"Auf Flügeln des Gesanges"...............Men
In the Woods...
Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Döppelgänger." }
"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus." } ....
"Der Schiffer." }
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from the "Taming of the Shrew"..........
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Romance. }
"Morgens als Lerche." } ....
"Der Bote." }
Mrs. Henschel.
The Czar's Song, from "Czar and Carpenter,"
Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philémon et Bauc
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village.
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

It has often been remarked how small over the field of music any one artist c
our view. The repertory of a singer o may be large or small, but, in either ca pretty sure to be constant and unch year in, year out. For instance, here c
Henschels back to us, and, in a progra eighteen numbers, how very few do we find that they have no
here before, time and time again!
new songs by Mr. Henschel, one other new things, and the rest list made up of old friends—friends, to but still old ones. We had hoped for list of novelties. But, if these admira ers return to us with an almost unchan ertory, they come back not entirely un themselves. Mrs. Henschel's voice, thing, has ripened noticeably. One oft of voices growing, becoming larger a powerful; we have never known an ble instance of this. As far as our obs goes, voices do not really grow; but mature, ripen and gain in richness,
quality and timbre. Mrs. Henschel's no longer the merely limpid light so used to be; it has acquired a rich, quality, an emotional expressivenes
was once foreign to it. It now appro timbre, if not in volume, the great dra prani. A similar change is to be note singing; with no loss of that exquisite style for which she has been conspicu since her first return from Europe, she gained all the emotional, passionate native largeness of style and magnetis
we remember in her when a half-taug girl of fifteen. She now sings once m all the fire she did in the days when sh sing Schubert's "Gretchen am Spinn her own accompaniment. Mr. Hens still his old mannerisms, but his voic smoother and mellower than of yore, singing shows all its whilom artistic in dramatic power.

Mr. Henschel displays his wonder tility as brilliantly as ever; from S
"Döppelgänger" and "Gruppe aus
tarus" to the rollicking patter of the Cimarosa's "Don Calandrino," what a
Yet Mr. Henschel sings the one as a as brilliantly and characteristically manner born, as the other. One wa hear him still stick to that threadbare from "Czar und Zimmermann"; afte people cry two or three times, as it
years ago, this song might be conside
to have done its duty and to be read
It has now lost what virtue it may had as a musical onion; and, strip tear-provoking power, it lays bare all cal poverty and triviality. Upon the has no proper place on such a progran

Mrs. Henschel's singing of the Han was simply exquisite; here warmth and Handelian purity of melodic out hand in hand. It was especially goo hear her sing Robert Franz's "W
(only would that she had sung it in
In writing his songs Franz always soprano voice in his mind, and we ha to only heard this particular song tenors. Mrs. Henschel's soprano giv its right character, and she sang it tion. In her husband's three song thoroughly charming; the songs t are beautiful, albeit one finds in the s somewhat more of sudden, qua modulation than one would have e
Mr. Henschel.

We were disappointed at hearing
from Hermann Goetz's "Taming of t sung in English, instead of in the or man; it doubtless helped a large par dience to a better understanding o
but, to our mind, it is always a tick
taking to do anything in English t
Shakspeare. To listen to a garbled i Shakspeare in German is not so b hear the same thing in English indu sensibly to draw comparisons that ar out their ludicrous side. The Engl
so incomparably and comically w
Shakspeare's that it is rather hard to the beauty of Goetz's music and the mirable manner in which the due made up for much; one could enjoy of the triviality of the text. The ence was as enthusiastic as possibl
Henschel responded to a repeated
her husband's favorite "I had a S Doll, Dears," to the rapturous delig
one.

American Art Journal.
The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.
FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.
WM. M. THOMS, Editor.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1892.

MR. HENCSHEL'S "HAMLET" MUSIC, written specially by the ex-conductor of the Boston Symphony Concerts for Mr. Beerbohm Tree's presentation of Shakespeare's tragedy, was publicly produced at the Haymarket last Thursday, and the principal portions were given in concert form at the London Symphony Concert last night. The prelude, Danish march and four entractes, make up a capital little suite. Mr. Henschel has employed leading motives freely, the two principal motives respectively standing for hero and heroine, where there is also a motive of Faith and a motive of Murder. In the Hamlet theme the words of the prince's soliloquy, "To be, or not to be," are clearly enunciated, while the Ophelia theme is a stream of pure melody, typical of her simple and lovable character. As a concert piece, perhaps the Danish march is the most effective portion of the suite, for here the barbaric and picturesque elements have play. In the trio of the march are two genuine old Danish melodies, selected for Mr. Henschel by the Princess of Wales, who has taken a great interest in the work. Next perhaps in order of effectiveness are the second or Ophelia entracte, and the fourth, a delicious little number written throughout for muted strings and drums and played immediately before the scene of the heroine's death. The last entracte of all is a pretty little Pastorale, intended to prepare the mind of the audience for the village churchyard in which Mr. Tree indicates the scene of Ophelia's burial. Mr. Henschel, who conducted, was very warmly applauded, and the suite is likely to be heard in many a concert room this winter. The concert was preceded by the Funeral March from Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's cantata, "The Story of Sayid" written for the Leeds festival six years ago. The Funeral March, so far as, at any rate, [illegible] audiences are concerned, is practi- [illegible] of the work.

Boston Daily Globe.
FRIDAY, APRIL 1.

HENSCHEL RECITAL.

Second Concert at the Meionaon by the Popular Artists.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel entertained a very large and select audience at their second vocal recital in the Meionaon, yesterday afternoon, and the hearty applause with which the artists were greeted at the close of each number must have convinced the gifted pair of the high estimation in which they are held by musical, as well as fashionable Boston.

The concert was of a very high order and ranged from grave to gay; from Bach, Handel and Beethoven to English ballad and Irish love songs.

The duets were from Paisiello, Schumann's "Faust" and Thomas' "Hamlet." The opening one was sung with admirable gusto and aroused the enthusiasm of the audience from the beginning. The more delicate compositions by Schumann and Thomas were also well received, the latter being followed by several recalls.

Mrs. Henschel's group of English and Irish songs were sung with exceptional musical skill, and the gem of the three, "The Glen of Kenmare," was most heartily redemanded. In Corder's "O Sun that Wakenest" the sympathetic qualities of her rich soprano voice made the number the notable achievement of the afternoon, although surpassing but slightly a dainty little French gavotti by Sgambati.

Of the solo numbers contributed by Mr. Henschel the recitative and aria by Handel was the most artistically given. The audience was greatly pleased with the Brahms group, but the rollicking vagabond song by Beethoven was sung with such animation and dramatic fervor that from the popular standpoint it must be considered Mr. Henschel's most successful effort.

Mr. Henschel's versatility as singer and accompanist was amply evidenced, and he played with his usual skill and artistic expression.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel are such consummate artists that their reappearance in Boston is heartily welcomed even in this surfeit of concert and musical offerings of the season.

The next recital will occur at the Meionaon on Tuesday afternoon, April 5.

Journal, Lewiston
Date 3-29

The Boston Symphony Orche
at Portland, which was to hav
this evening, has been post
Stockbridge received a telegr afternoon and the same was te
the Journal, but too late for a Monday. The date when the
has not yet been fixed.

There's a lad in the mill at Kenmare,
It's with him that I danced at the fair;
One day in the gap, where we met just by hap,
He made bold his true love to declare, just there,
In the gap of the hedge at Kenmare.

There's a day, and I wish it were here,
Sure the very best day of the year;
For I'll then be a bride, with the lad at my side,
Him that courted me down at Kenmare, just there,
In the gap of the hedge at Kenmare.

(a) DIE MAINACHT.
(b) SONTAGS. . . . . BRAHMS
(c) UNÜBERWINDLICH.

MR. HENSCHEL.

(a) When the silvery moon shines through the woodland far,
And her slumbering light falls on the meadows soft,
And the nightingale singeth,
Sad I wander from bush to bush.

Hidden under the leaves, cooing of doves I hear,— Sweet, enchanting a sound; but e'en from them I turn,
Seeking still darker shadows,
And in loneliness tears I shed.

When, O image so fair, which like the morning glow
Shines within me, oh, when wilt thou appear to me?
And in loneliness tears I Feel, hot tears coursing down my cheek.

After the German of Hoelty.

(b) Six weary days are past and over
Since I my true love gazed on last,
And that was upon a Sunday,
By her dwelling as I passed.
She stood before the cottage door,
A thousand pretty looks she wore.
Would to heav'n I were with her this day!

Six pleasant days are past and over
Since a look on me she cast,
And that was upon a Sunday,
In the church door, as she passed.
That look of hers I'll ne'er forget,
A thousand times I think of it.
Would to heav'n I were with her this day!

(c) Though I've vowed that I will perish
Ere the flask again I cherish,
Yet a life renewed comes o'er me
When I see it gleam before me.
Charming is its ev'ry feature,
Crystal flash and ruby red,
But I cannot tame the creature,
Once its fumes are in my head.

Though I vowed that I will perish
Ere the faithless fair I cherish,
Yet a life renewed comes o'er me
When her witching smile's before me.
Do your cruel will upon me
(Samson was a stronger man),
Only love, when you've undone me,
Sweet Dalila, if you can.

(a) LULLABY. . . . . TSCHAIKOWSKY
(b) MIGNON'S SONG. . . . . LISZT
(c) O SUN THAT WAKENEST. . . . . F. CORDER

MRS. HENSCHEL.

(a) Sleep, my baby — baby, sleep!
May thy rest be sweet and deep.
I bade the eagle, wind, and sun
Keep watch o'er my little one:
The eagle flew home to his nest,
The sun dropped in the sea to rest;
When three long, dark nights were spent,
The swift wind to the mother went.

Spoke the mother, all afraid:
"Wind, so long where hast thou stayed?
Hast thou vexed the golden stars?
With the tossing sea made wars?"
"Nay, I let the stars alone,
O'er the sea I have not blown;
By the little child I kept,
Rocking it the while it slept."

Translation by Gertrude Hall.

(b) Knowest thou the land where the pale citron grows,
And the gold orange through dark foliage glows?
A soft wind flutters from the deep blue sky,
The myrtle blooms, and towers the laurel high.
Knowest thou it well?
Oh, there with thee!
Oh, that I might, my own beloved one, flee!

Knowest thou the house? On pillars rest its beams,
Bright is its hall, in light one chamber gleams,
And marble statues stand and look on me,—
What have they done, thou hapless child, to thee?
Knowest thou it well?
Oh, there with thee!
Oh, that I might, my loved protector, flee!

Knowest thou the track that o'er the mountain goes,
Where the mule threads its way through mist and snows,
Where dwelt in caves the dragon's ancient brood,
Topples the crag, and o'er it rolls the flood?
Knowest thou it well?
Oh, come with me!
There lies our road,—oh, father, let us flee!

From the German of Goethe, by Sir Theodore Martin.

(c) O Sun, that wakenest all to bliss or pain,
O Moon, that layest all to sleep again,
Shine sweetly: Twice my love hath smiled on me.

O birds, that warble to the morning sky,
O birds, that warble as the day goes by,
Sing sweetly: Twice my love hath smiled on me.

O dewy flow'rs, that open in the sun,
O dewy flow'rs, that close when day is done,
Blow sweetly: Twice my love hath smiled on me.

O trefoil, sparkling on the rainy plain,
O rainbow, with three colors after rain,
Shine sweetly: Thrice my love hath smiled on me.

Tennyson.

DUET from "FAUST." . . . . SCHUMANN

MR. and MRS. HENSCHEL.

(English Version.)

Faust. (In Gretchen's garden.)
My angel, tell me truly, didst thou know me,
As through the garden gate I came?
Gretchen. You could well read my downcast eyes, I trow me.
Faust. Dost thou forgive that rudely I did claim Thine ear, coarse flattery intending,
As thou home from the minster wert wending?
Gretchen. Perplexed I felt — it was so strange to me,
Of whom an evil word was never spoken.
Ah, thought I then, did he of lightness some token
In me discern? Some boldness did he see,
That he should think his mere approaching
Would give the right free talk to be broaching?
Yet — I must own, I know not how — soon came
A little stirring in my bosom to your favor;
And then myself I scolded well, with shame,
Because, in scolding you, my heart did waver.
Faust. My sweet one!

American Art Journal.
The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.
FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.
WM. M. THOMS, Editor.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1892.

MR. HENCSHEL'S "HAMLET" MUSIC, written specially by the ex-conductor of the Boston Symphony Concerts for Mr. Beerbohm Tree's presentation of Shakespeare's tragedy, was publicly produced at the Haymarket last Thursday, and the principal portions were given in concert form at the London Symphony Concert last night. The prelude, Danish march and four entractes, make up a capital little suite. Mr. Henschel has employed leading motives freely, the two principal motives respectively standing for hero and heroine, where there is also a motive of Faith and a motive of Murder. In the Hamlet theme the words of the prince's soliloquy, "To be, or not to be," are clearly enunciated, while the Ophelia theme is a stream of pure melody, typical of her simple and lovable character. As a concert piece, perhaps the Danish march is the most effective portion of the suite, for here the barbaric and picturesque elements have play. In the trio of the march are two genuine old Danish melodies, selected for Mr. Henschel by the Princess of Wales, who has taken a great interest in the work. Next perhaps in order of effectiveness are the second or Ophelia entracte, and the fourth, a delicious little number written throughout for muted strings and drums and played immediately before the scene of the heroine's death. The last entracte of all is a pretty little Pastorale, intended to prepare the mind of the audience for the village churchyard in which Mr. Tree indicates the scene of Ophelia's burial. Mr. Henschel, who conducted, was very warmly applauded, and the suite is likely to be heard in many a concert room this winter. The concert was preceded by the Funeral March from Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's cantata, "The Story of Sayid" written for the Leeds festival six years ago. The Funeral March, so far as, at any rate, [illegible] audiences are concerned, is practi- [illegible] of the work.

Boston Daily Globe.
FRIDAY, APRIL 1.

HENSCHEL RECITAL.

Second Concert at the Meionaon by the Popular Artists.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel entertained a very large and select audience at their second vocal recital in the Meionaon, yesterday afternoon, and the hearty applause with which the artists were greeted at the close of each number must have convinced the gifted pair of the high estimation in which they are held by musical, as well as fashionable Boston.

The concert was of a very high order and ranged from grave to gay: from Bach, Handel and Beethoven to English ballad and Irish love songs.

The duets were from Paisiello, Schumann's "Faust" and Thomas' "Hamlet." The opening one was sung with admirable gusto and aroused the enthusiasm of the audience from the beginning. The more delicate compositions by Schumann and Thomas were also well received, the latter being followed by several recalls.

Mrs. Henschel's group of English and Irish songs were sung with exceptional musical skill, and the gem of the three, "The Glen of Kenmare," was most heartily redemanded. In Corder's "O Sun that Wakenest" the sympathetic qualities of her rich soprano voice made the number the notable achievement of the afternoon, although surpassing but slightly a dainty little French gavotti by Sgambati.

Of the solo numbers contributed by Mr. Henschel the recitative and aria by Handel was the most artistically given. The audience was greatly pleased with the Brahms group, but the rollicking vagabond song by Beethoven was sung with such animation and dramatic fervor that from the popular standpoint it must be considered Mr. Henschel's most successful effort.

Mr. Henschel's versatility as singer and accompanist was amply evidenced, and he played with his usual skill and artistic expression.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel are such consummate artists that their reappearance in Boston is heartily welcomed even in this surfeit of concert and musical offerings of the season.

The next recital will occur at the Meionaon on Tuesday afternoon, April 5.

[illegible]
WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30,

THE HENSCHEL RECITAL

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave the vocal recital in the Meionaon last eveni
programme being as follows:
Duet: "Quel onda che rovina." . . . . . . Padre
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Aria: "Oh! Sleep," from "Semele."
Aria "Quel farfalletta," from "Partenope." } . . .
Mrs. Henschel.
Aria from "Il maestro di musica" . . . . . .
Aria buffa from "Il ritorno di Don Calandino,"
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's Song . . . . Bo
"Auf Flügeln des Gesanges" . . . . . . Men
In the Woods . . . .
Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Döppelgänger."
"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus." } . . . . . .
"Der Schiffer."
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from the "Taming of the Shrew" . . . . . .
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Romance.
"Morgens als Lerche." } . . . . . .
"Der Bote."
Mrs. Henschel.
The Czar's Song, from "Czar and Carpenter," Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philémon et Bau
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village.
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

It has often been remarked how small over the field of music any one artist our view. The repertory of a singer o
may be large or small, but, in either ca pretty sure to be constant and unc year in, year out. For instance, here Henschels back to us, and, in a progra eighteen numbers, how very few
do we find that they have no
here before, time and time again!
new songs by Mr. Henschel, one other new things, and the rest
list made up of old friends—friends, to but still old ones. We had hoped for list of novelties. But, if these admira
ers return to us with an almost uncha ertory, they come back not entirely u themselves. Mrs. Henschel's voice, thing, has ripened noticeably. One of
of voices growing, becoming larger a powerful; we have never known an ble instance of this. As far as our ob goes, voices do not really grow; bu
mature, ripen and gain in richness,
quality and timbre. Mrs. Henschel's
no longer the merely limpid light s
used to be; it has acquired a rich,
quality, an emotional expressivenes was once foreign to it. It now appr timbre, if not in volume, the great dra
prani. A similar change is to be note singing; with no loss of that exquisit style for which she has been conspic
since her first return from Europe, sh gained all the emotional, passionate native largeness of style and magneti
we remember in her when a half-taug
girl of fifteen. She now sings once m all the fire she did in the days when s sing Schubert's "Gretchen am Spin her own accompaniment. Mr. Hen still his old mannerisms, but his voi
smoother and mellower than of yore, singing shows all its whilom artistic i
dramatic power.

Mr. Henschel displays his wonde tility as brilliantly as ever; from
"Döppelgänger" and "Gruppe aus
tarus" to the rollicking patter of the Cimarosa's "Don Calandrino," what a
Yet Mr. Henschel sings the one as as brilliantly and characteristicall manner born, as the other. One wa hear him still stick to that threadbar
from "Czar und Zimmermann"; aft
people cry two or three times, as it years ago, this song might be consid
to have done its duty and to be rea
It has now lost what virtue it may had as a musical onion; and, stri tear-provoking power, it lays bare al
cal poverty and triviality. Upon th has no proper place on such a progra

Mrs. Henschel's singing of the Ha was simply exquisite; here warmth and Handelian purity of melodic ou hand in hand. It was especially g hear her sing Robert Franz's "
(only would that she had sung it in
In writing his songs Franz always soprano voice in his mind, and we h
to only heard this particular son tenors. Mrs. Henschel's soprano gi its right character, and she sang i tion. In her husband's three son thoroughly charming; the songs are beautiful, albeit one finds in the somewhat more of sudden, qu modulation than one would have
Mr. Henschel.

We were disappointed at hearing from Hermann Goetz's "Taming of sung in English, instead of in the o man; it doubtless helped a large pa
dience to a better understanding but, to our mind, it is always a tick
taking to do anything in English
Shakspeare. To listen to a garbled
Shakspeare in German is not so h hear the same thing in English ind sensibly to draw comparisons that a out their ludicrous side. The Eng
so incomparably and comically w
Shakspeare's that it is rather hard t
the beauty of Goetz's music and th mirable manner in which the du made up for much; one could enjo
of the triviality of the text. The ence was as enthusiastic as possib
Henschel responded to a repeated
her husband's favorite "I had a S Doll, Dears," to the rapturous deli
one.

Journal, Lewisto
Date 2-29

The Boston Symphony Orch
at Portland, which was to ha
this evening, has been pos
Stockbridge received a teleg
afternoon and the same was t
the Journal, but too late for a Monday. The date when th
has not yet been fixed.

Gretchen. (Gathers an aster and picks off the petals one after the other.) Wait for me!
Faust. A nosegay have we here?
Gretchen. Nay, 'tis but a jest.
Faust. How?
Gretchen. You would laugh, I fear!
(She picks on, murmuring to herself.)
Faust. What murmurest thou?
Gretchen. He loves me — loves me not — he loves me —
Loves me not — loves me — loves me not —
Loves me,— not,— he loves me!
Faust. Yes, my child! Take this fair flower's reply
For Heaven's own decree! He loves thee!
Gretchen. Ha! How I shudder!
Faust. Oh, tremble not, let this fond look,
Let this warm grasp of hand,
The secret beyond all words make known:
The inmost self to lose in that blest rapture unearthly
That once felt must be eternal.

. . . .

My escort may I offer?
Gretchen. I fear my mother's wrath — farewell!
Faust. I go with pain — farewell!
Gretchen. Oh, soon may we meet again!

(a) CRUGANTINO'S SONG. . . . . BEETHOVEN
From Goethe's "CLAUDINE VON VILLA BELLA" (1790).
(b) BALLAD. "DIE VERFALLENE MÜHLE." . . . . . . LOEWE

MR. HENSCHEL.

(a) A room in a poor rustic inn. Three vagabonds stand around a table and play at dice. CRUGANTINO, the sword at his side, a guitar with blue ribbon in his hand, is walking up and down, tunes and sings: —

To make love to the girls,
To fight with the churls,
And to have more credit than gold —
Is success in the world, I am told.

A song at evening, sung with glee,
Has drawn many a heart to me,
Whilst envious knaves that hiding stand
I like to face with sword in hand.

Out, fiery, brisk
The feather-whisk!
Kling! Kling! Klang! Klang!
Dik! Dik! Dak! Dak!
Krik! Krak!

To make love to the girls,
To fight with the churls,
And to have more credit than gold —
Is success in the world, I'm told.

(b) Alone, in wrapt and silent mood,
The old count rides into the wood;
He rides along o'er stone and thorn,
And at his side swing sword and horn.

Still darker grows the way, and wild,
As frowning rock on rock is piled,
When ruins of a mill appear—
But naught alive, or far or near.

In pieces lie the millstones all,
No mill-wheel drives the waterfall,
Through open roof the welkin peeps
O'er scattered rocks, and weeds in heaps.

One only settle can he see;
There seats himself the gloomy guest,
And folds his arms upon his breast;
His eyes they close unconsciously.

Then into life starts all around!
The works with thunder thump resound;
The water roars, the greenwood stirs,
With merry clack the mill-wheel whirs.

And see! how, in and out, the boys
Bear sacks through all the rush and noise,
And from the mill-race, erst so drear,
The miller greets with friendly cheer.

Now down the path flies, skipping light,
His pretty daughter, young and bright;
Her face — no sky more clear and fair,
Her braids go dancing in the air.

She meets the count, and proffers him
The sparkling glass of liquid gold;
Well feels he, as he felt of old,
His heart in love's young dream to swim.

And, blandly smiling on the lass,
He reaches forth to take the glass;
But, when he clutches it with haste,
'Tis only air to touch or taste!

All vanished now are glass and wine,
The miller and his daughter fine;
No mill-wheel goes, no water pours,
Only the wind through rafters roars.

Upon his coal-black steed again
He flings himself and rides amain!
Along the wood rides dumb and meek,
And shakes a tear-drop from his cheek.

English Version by John S. Dwight.

(a) POLISH SONG. . . . . PADEREWSKI
(b) SÉRÉNADE DU PASSANT. . . . . MASSENET
(c) GAVOTTE. "IL FAUT AIMER." . . . . . . SGAMBATI

MRS. HENSCHEL.

(a) They have sent away my lover,
Mother dear;
Far away, the broad seas over:
Nought my anxious heart can cheer.
Yet the priest for him is praying,
Masses for the absent saying,
Mother dear!

Now he stands in armor shining;
O heaven!
Death around him is entwining,
O'er his grave the sad wind sighing,
Nought avails my bitter crying,
Nought the care of guarding angels:
O heaven!

Ah, the foe, they slay unheeding
Whom they strike;
Whether heart of friend is bleeding,
Whether love is silent pleading,
Or a mother's heart be breaking,
All alike their chance are taking,
All alike.

Stricken down by foemen cruel
In battle;
Low he lies, my love, my jewel:
Help, O God, and grant in mercy
That his wounds may yet be healed,
All the wounds from which he suffers
In battle.

Look down from thy throne of glory,
Queen of Heaven!
See I throw myself before thee;
Hear, oh, hear me, I implore thee!
In thy gracious care enfold him,
Let me once again behold him,
Queen of Heaven!

(English Version.)

(b) Arise! at the voice of spring,
For the sun enthroned as king,
Kisses languid dawn, his queen.
Flow'rets white and flow'rets blue,
Laughing, shake their sparkling dew
In the tender sunlight's sheen.

Arise! for the swallow's lay
Sweetly calls to waking day,
And bids thee no longer dream.

Deck thee in thy woodland dress,
Hasten then in joyfulness
To the glade beside the stream!

Arise! for all joys are fleet,
And the joy of dawn is sweet;
Let it beam, then, in thine eyes.
Rise, for ev'rything is mirth;
Rise, for now the sunny earth
Is a golden Paradise.

(c) Vous qui de l'amoureuse ivresse
Fuyez la loi,
Approchez vous, belle jeunesse,
Écoutez moi!

Votre cœur a beau se défendre
De s'enflammer;
Le moment vient, il faut se rendre,
Il faut aimer.

Hier au bois ma chère Annette Prenait le frais;
Elle chantait sur sa musette:
"N'aimons jamais!"

Me glissant alors tout près d'elle,
Sans me nommer,
Je dis: "Vous vous trompez, ma belle,
Il faut aimer."

American Art Journal.
The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.
FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.
WM. M. THOMS, Editor.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1892.

MR. HENCSHEL'S "HAMLET" MUSIC, written specially by the ex-conductor of the Boston Symphony Concerts for Mr. Beerbohm Tree's presentation of Shakespeare's tragedy, was publicly produced at the Haymarket last Thursday, and the principal portions were given in concert form at the London Symphony Concert last night. The prelude, Danish march and four entractes, make up a capital little suite. Mr. Henschel has employed leading motives freely, the two principal motives respectively standing for hero and heroine, where there is also a motive of Faith and a motive of Murder. In the Hamlet theme the words of the prince's soliloquy, "To be, or not to be," are clearly enunciated, while the Ophelia theme is a stream of pure melody, typical of her simple and lovable character. As a concert piece, perhaps the Danish march is the most effective portion of the suite, for here the barbaric and picturesque elements have play. In the trio of the march are two genuine old Danish melodies, selected for Mr. Henschel by the Princess of Wales, who has taken a great interest in the work. Next perhaps in order of effectiveness are the second or Ophelia entracte, and the fourth, a delicious little number written throughout for muted strings and drums and played immediately before the scene of the heroine's death. The last entracte of all is a pretty little Pastorale, intended to prepare the mind of the audience for the village churchyard in which Mr. Tree indicates the scene of Ophelia's burial. Mr. Henschel, who conducted, was very warmly applauded, and the suite is likely to be heard in many a concert room this winter. The concert was preceded by the Funeral March from Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's cantata, "The Story of Sayid" written for the Leeds festival six years ago. The Funeral March, so far as, at any rate, London audiences are concerned, is practi[illegible] of the work.

Boston Daily Globe.
FRIDAY, APRIL 1.

HENSCHEL RECITAL.

Second Concert at the Meionaon by the Popular Artists.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel entertained a very large and select audience at their second vocal recital in the Meionaon, yesterday afternoon, and the hearty applause with which the artists were greeted at the close of each number must have convinced the gifted pair of the high estimation in which they are held by musical, as well as fashionable Boston.

The concert was of a very high order and ranged from grave to gay: from Bach, Handel and Beethoven to English ballad and Irish love songs.

The duets were from Paisiello, Schumann's "Faust" and Thomas' "Hamlet." The opening one was sung with admirable gusto and aroused the enthusiasm of the audience from the beginning. The more delicate compositions by Schumann and Thomas were also well received, the latter being followed by several recalls.

Mrs. Henschel's group of English and Irish songs were sung with exceptional musical skill, and the gem of the three, "The Glen of Kenmare," was most heartily redemanded. In Corder's "O Sun that Wakenest" the sympathetic qualities of her rich soprano voice made the number the notable achievement of the afternoon, although surpassing but slightly a dainty little French gavotti by Sgambati.

Of the solo numbers contributed by Mr. Henschel the recitative and aria by Handel was the most artistically given. The audience was greatly pleased with the Brahms group, but the rollicking vagabond song by Beethoven was sung with such animation and dramatic fervor that from the popular standpoint it must be considered Mr. Henschel's most successful effort.

Mr. Henschel's versatility as singer and accompanist was amply evidenced, and he played with his usual skill and artistic expression.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel are such consummate artists that their reappearance in Boston is heartily welcomed even in this surfeit of concert and musical offerings of the season.

The next recital will occur at the Meionaon on Tuesday afternoon, April 5.

[illegible]
WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30, 1

THE HENSCHEL RECITAL

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave the vocal recital in the Meionaon last eveni
programme being as follows:
Duet: "Quel onda che rovina."..........Padre
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Aria: "Oh! Sleep," from "Semele."
Aria "Quel farfalletta," from "Partenope." }....
Mrs. Henschel.
Aria from "Il maestro di musica"...........P
Aria buffa from "Il ritorno di Don Calandino,"
C
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's Song......................................Be
"Auf Flügeln des Gesanges"..................Men
In the Woods...
Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Döppelgänger."
"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus." }..............
"Der Schiffer."
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from the "Taming of the Shrew"..........
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Romance.
"Morgens als Lerche." }..........................
"Der Bote."
Mrs. Henschel.
The Czar's Song, from "Czar and Carpenter,"
Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philémon et Bauc
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village.
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

It has often been remarked how small
over the field of music any one artist c
our view. The repertory of a singer o
may be large or small, but, in either ca
pretty sure to be constant and unc
year in, year out. For instance, here c
Henschels back to us, and, in a progra eighteen numbers, how very few
do we find that they have no
here before, time and time again!
new songs by Mr. Henschel, one other new things, and the rest
list made up of old friends—friends, to but still old ones. We had hoped for list of novelties. But, if these admira
ers return to us with an almost uncha
ertory, they come back not entirely u themselves. Mrs. Henschel's voice, thing, has ripened noticeably. One of
of voices growing, becoming larger a powerful; we have never known an ble instance of this. As far as our ob goes, voices do not really grow; bu mature, ripen and gain in richness,
quality and timbre. Mrs. Henschel's
no longer the merely limpid light s
used to be; it has acquired a rich,
quality, an emotional expressivenes
was once foreign to it. It now appro
timbre, if not in volume, the great dra
prani. A similar change is to be note singing; with no loss of that exquisite style for which she has been conspic
since her first return from Europe, sh gained all the emotional, passionate native largeness of style and magnetis
we remember in her when a half-taug girl of fifteen. She now sings once n
all the fire she did in the days when s
sing Schubert's "Gretchen am Spin
her own accompaniment. Mr. Hen still his old mannerisms, but his voi
smoother and mellower than of yore, singing shows all its whilom artistic i
dramatic power.
Mr. Henschel displays his wonde
tility as brilliantly as ever; from S
"Döppelgänger" and "Gruppe aus
tarus" to the rollicking patter of the Cimarosa's "Don Calandrino," what a
Yet Mr. Henschel sings the one as
as brilliantly and characteristicall manner born, as the other. One wa hear him still stick to that threadbar
from "Czar und Zimmermann"; aft people cry two or three times, as i
years ago, this song might be consid
to have done its duty and to be rea
It has now lost what virtue it may
had as a musical onion; and, stri
tear-provoking power, it lays bare al
cal poverty and triviality. Upon th has no proper place on such a progra
Mrs. Henschel's singing of the Ha was simply exquisite; here warmth
and Handelian purity of melodic ou
hand in hand. It was especially g hear her sing Robert Franz's "V (only would that she had sung it in
In writing his songs Franz always soprano voice in his mind, and we h
to only heard this particular son tenors. Mrs. Henschel's soprano gi its right character, and she sang i tion. In her husband's three son thoroughly charming; the songs are beautiful, albeit one finds in the somewhat more of sudden, qu
modulation than one would have
Mr. Henschel.
We were disappointed at hearin
from Hermann Goetz's "Taming of sung in English, instead of in the c man; it doubtless helped a large pa
dience to a better understanding but, to our mind, it is always a tic
taking to do anything in English
Shakspeare. To listen to a garbled
Shakspeare in German is not so hear the same thing in English ind sensibly to draw comparisons that out their ludicrous side. The Eng so incomparably and comically
Shakspeare's that it is rather hard t
the beauty of Goetz's music and th
mirable manner in which the du made up for much; one could enjo
of the triviality of the text. The ence was as enthusiastic as possil
Henschel responded to a repeated her husband's favorite "I had a Doll, Dears," to the rapturous deli
one.

Journal, Lewisto
Date 3-29

The Boston Symphony Orch
at Portland, which was to ha
this evening, has been pos
Stockbridge received a teleg
afternoon and the same was the Journal, but too late for Monday. The date when th
has not yet been fixed.

En rongissant la pastourelle
  Me répondit :
" D'amour la flèche est trop cruelle,
  On me l'a dit.

" A quinze ans le cœur est trop tendre
  Pour s'enflammer ;
C'est à vingt ans qu'il faut attendre
  Pour mieux aimer."

DUET from "HAMLET." . . . . AMBROISE THOMAS

MR. and MRS. HENSCHEL.

Ophelia. My Lord.
Hamlet. Ophelia !
Ophelia. Alas! Your soul a prey
To grief eternal, dooms our joy.
The King, I hear, your farewell has received ;
You flee this court : you depart !
Hamlet. Ophelia !
Ophelia. Why turn your gaze away ?
What dull despair that drives you hence !
Shall I believe your heart has mine forgot !
Hamlet. No, Heaven shall witness bear
That I am not of those Who swear eternal love one day,
And then forget their true love's vows.
Mine is no woman's heart.
Ophelia. Oh, cruel !
What has Ophelia done
That such wrong she should bear !
Hamlet. Forgive me, Love, I do accuse
Thee not : thy spirit, pure,
Is mirrored in thy face divine.
Doubt that the stars are fire ;
  Doubt that the sun doth move ;
Doubt truth to be a liar ;
  But never doubt I love.
Ophelia. Alas ! Hamlet, this very love
Cannot your flight restrain,
You would not my presence fly
If your love equalled mine !
Hamlet. From thee I would not fly,
But from inconstant men ;
Thy image in my memory borne
Should have consoled my weary life !
But now thy presence calms my grief,
And love dispels my bitter tears ;
A single word from thee hath power
To keep me at thy feet.
Ophelia. O Constellations bright,
Of Heaven, that shine above,
Spirits of Earth and Air,
Be witness of his love.
Hamlet. Ophelia, dear Ophelia !
Ophelia. My soul confides in thee.
Hamlet. By Fate, forever joined — Ophelia. Thine is my life, thine is my soul.
Hamlet. Forevermore ! Forevermore !
{ Hamlet. Doubt that the stars are fire, etc.
{ Ophelia. O Constellations bright, etc.

GEO. H. ELLIS, PRINTER, 141 FRANKLIN ST., BOSTON

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.

WM. M. THOMS, Editor.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1892.

MR. HENCSHEL'S "HAMLET" MUSIC, written specially by the ex-conductor of the Boston Symphony Concerts for Mr. Beerbohm Tree's presentation of Shakespeare's tragedy, was publicly produced at the Haymarket last Thursday, and the principal portions were given in concert form at the London Symphony Concert last night. The prelude, Danish march and four entractes, make up a capital little suite. Mr. Henschel has employed leading motives freely, the two principal motives respectively standing for hero and heroine, where there is also a motive of Faith and a motive of Murder. In the Hamlet theme the words of the prince's soliloquy, "To be, or not to be," are clearly enunciated, while the Ophelia theme is a stream of pure melody, typical of her simple and lovable character. As a concert piece, perhaps the Danish march is the most effective portion of the suite, for here the barbaric and picturesque elements have play. In the trio of the march are two genuine old Danish melodies, selected for Mr. Henschel by the Princess of Wales, who has taken a great interest in the work. Next perhaps in order of effectiveness are the second or Ophelia entracte, and the fourth, a delicious little number written throughout for muted strings and drums and played immediately before the scene of the heroine's death. The last entracte of all is a pretty little Pastorale, intended to prepare the mind of the audience for the village churchyard in which Mr. Tree indicates the scene of Ophelia's burial. Mr. Henschel, who conducted, was very warmly applauded, and the suite is likely to be heard in many a concert room this winter. The concert was preceded by the Funeral March from Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's cantata, "The Story of Sayid" written for the Leeds festival six years ago. The Funeral March, so far as, at any rate, London audiences are concerned, is practi- [illegible] of the work.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, APRIL 1.

HENSCHEL RECITAL.

Second Concert at the Meionaon by the Popular Artists.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel entertained a very large and select audience at their second vocal recital in the Meionaon, yesterday afternoon, and the hearty applause with which the artists were greeted at the close of each number must have convinced the gifted pair of the high estimation in which they are held by musical, as well as fashionable Boston.

The concert was of a very high order and ranged from grave to gay: from Bach, Handel and Beethoven to English ballad and Irish love songs.

The duets were from Paisiello, Schumann's "Faust" and Thomas' "Hamlet." The opening one was sung with admirable gusto and aroused the enthusiasm of the audience from the beginning. The more delicate compositions by Schumann and Thomas were also well received, the latter being followed by several recalls.

Mrs. Henschel's group of English and Irish songs were sung with exceptional musical skill, and the gem of the three, "The Glen of Kenmare," was most heartily redemanded. In Corder's "O Sun that Wakenest" the sympathetic qualities of her rich soprano voice made the number the notable achievement of the afternoon, although surpassing but slightly a dainty little French gavotti by Sgambati.

Of the solo numbers contributed by Mr. Henschel the recitative and aria by Handel was the most artistically given. The audience was greatly pleased with the Brahms group, but the rollicking vagabond song by Beethoven was sung with such animation and dramatic fervor that from the popular standpoint it must be considered Mr. Henschel's most successful effort.

Mr. Henschel's versatility as singer and accompanist was amply evidenced, and he played with his usual skill and artistic expression.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel are such consummate artists that their reappearance in Boston is heartily welcomed even in this surfeit of concert and musical offerings of the season.

The next recital will occur at the Meionaon on Tuesday afternoon, April 5.

Boston Transcri

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30, 18

THE HENSCHEL RECITALS

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave their vocal recital in the Meionaon last evening
programme being as follows:
Duet: "Quel onda che rovina."..........Padre M
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Aria: "Oh! Sleep," from "Semele."
Aria "Quel farfalletta," from "Partenope." }....H
Mrs. Henschel.
Aria from "Il maestro di musica"..............Per Aria buffa from "Il ritorno di Don Calandino," Ci
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's Song...............................Bee
"Auf Flügeln des Gesanges"..............Mende
In the Woods..................................
Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Döppelgänger."
"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus." }..............Sc
"Der Schiffer."
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from the "Taming of the Shrew"..........
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Romance.
"Morgens als Lerche." }.....................Ho
"Der Bote."
Mrs. Henschel.
The Czar's Song, from "Czar and Carpenter,"
L
Couplets de Vulcain, from "Philémon et Baucis
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village," Bo
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

It has often been remarked how small a over the field of music any one artist op our view. The repertory of a singer or may be large or small, but, in either cas pretty sure to be constant and uncha year in, year out. For instance, here co Henschels back to us, and, in a program eighteen numbers, how very few do we find that they have not here before, time and time again!
new songs by Mr. Henschel, one o other new things, and the rest o list made up of old friends—friends, to b but still old ones. We had hoped for a list of novelties. But, if these admirabl ers return to us with an almost unchang ertory, they come back not entirely unc themselves. Mrs. Henschel's voice, thing, has ripened noticeably. One ofte of voices growing, becoming larger an powerful; we have never known an in ble instance of this. As far as our obse goes, voices do not really grow; but mature, ripen and gain in richness, d quality and timbre. Mrs. Henschel's no longer the merely limpid light sop used to be; it has acquired a rich, s quality, an emotional expressiveness, was once foreign to it. It now appro timbre, if not in volume, the great dram prani. A similar change is to be noted singing; with no loss of that exquisite style for which she has been conspicu
since her first return from Europe, she gained all the emotional, passionate f native largeness of style and magnetism we remember in her when a half-taugh girl of fifteen. She now sings once m all the fire she did in the days when she sing Schubert's "Gretchen am Spinn her own accompaniment. Mr. Hensc still his old mannerisms, but his voice smoother and mellower than of yore, singing shows all its whilom artistic ins
dramatic power.

Mr. Henschel displays his wonderf tility as brilliantly as ever; from Sc
"Döppelgänger" and "Gruppe aus d tarus" to the rollicking patter of the Cimarosa's "Don Calandrino," what a
Yet Mr. Henschel sings the one as ad
as brilliantly and characteristically, manner born, as the other. One was hear him still stick to that threadbare from "Czar und Zimmermann"; after people cry two or three times, as it
years ago, this song might be conside
to have done its duty and to be read
It has now lost what virtue it may
had as a musical onion; and, strip tear-provoking power, it lays bare all cal poverty and triviality. Upon the has no proper place on such a program

Mrs. Henschel's singing of the Hand was simply exquisite; here warmth o and Handelian purity of melodic outl hand in hand. It was especially goo
hear her sing Robert Franz's "W
(only would that she had sung it in
In writing his songs Franz always h soprano voice in his mind, and we ha
to only heard this particular song
tenors. Mrs. Henschel's soprano giv its right character, and she sang it
tion. In her husband's three song thoroughly charming; the songs th are beautiful, albeit one finds in the s somewhat more of sudden, quas modulation than one would have e
Mr. Henschel.

We were disappointed at hearing
from Hermann Goetz's "Taming of t sung in English, instead of in the or man; it doubtless helped a large part dience to a better understanding o
but, to our mind, it is always a tick
taking to do anything in English t
Shakspeare. To listen to a garbled i Shakspeare in German is not so ba hear the same thing in English indu
sensibly to draw comparisons that ar
out their ludicrous side. The Engl
so incomparably and comically w
Shakspeare's that it is rather hard to the beauty of Goetz's music and the mirable manner in which the due
made up for much; one could enjoy
of the triviality of the text. The ence was as enthusiastic as possibl
Henschel responded to a repeated
her husband's favorite "I had a S Doll, Dears," to the rapturous delig
one.

Journal, Lewiston

Date 3-29

The Boston Symphony Orche
at Portland, which was to hav
this evening, has been post
Stockbridge received a telegr afternoon and the same was te
the Journal, but too late for a Monday. The date when the
has not yet been fixed.

The Musical Courier.
PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30, 1892.

UNPRECEDENTED.

I. J. PADEREWSKI has been the most marvelous and unprecedented success, up to date, in the musical history of America. From a financial point of view (and it must be acknowledged that this is the ultimate test) Paderewski has surpassed all previous records. The following amazing table will illustrate the practical results of his visit to the United States:

Receipts up to March 12, 1892, under contract with C. F. Tretbar	$74 892
Week commencing March 14, six recitals	9.000
Monday, March 21, Brooklyn	3,086
Tuesday, March 22, Boston	4,551
Wednesday, March 23, New Haven and Hartford	3.361
Thursday, March 24, Philadelphia	3,856
Saturday, March 26, New York	6,390
Sunday, March 27, New York	4,180
Total	$109,316

To this may be added about one dozen private engagements here and in Boston and Chicago, none of which netted less than $1,000.

The tournée lasted from November 17 to March 27—four months and ten days—and one of its features was the fact that not one disappointment took place.

Another feature which constitutes a tribute to the scientific and technical genius of American artisans is the record of the Steinway piano. This instrument was used for nearly 100 performances. It was originally selected by Paderewski from among a number of Steinway grands, and if ever a grand piano was subjected to the tests of endurance and strain it was this individual instrument, which on Sunday night proved as satisfactory as it did on the first night.

The farewell concert which Paderewski gave for the benefit of the Washington Arch Fund at the Metropolitan Opera House last Sunday night was a most brilliant success, artistically and pecuniarily. The orchestra was the famous organization from Boston, the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, generously offered to Paderewski for the occasion by Colonel Higginson. The program was this:

Overture, "Tannhäuser" .... Richard Wagner
Orchestra.
Concerto in A minor .... Robert Schumann
Paderewski.
Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini" .... Hector Berlioz
Orchestra.
Concerto, op. 17 .... Paderewski
Paderewski.
Poème symphonique, "Le Rouet d'Omphale" .... Camille Saint-Saëns
Orchestra.
Hungarian fantasia .... Franz Liszt
Paderewski.

Conductor Nikisch's desk was covered with an American flag and draped with the Polish standard and all the orchestral desks were decorated with the Polish colors, red and white. American flags stood at the bases of the proscenium arch and at the back of the stage and the piano was almost hidden with the palms and bunches of roses sent to the pianist.

The great pianist played superbly and the last movement of his concerto was delivered with such "fine careless rapture" that it had to be repeated.

Numerous demonstrations were made during the evening to which Paderewski and Nikisch had to respond. After the Hungarian fantasia, which was played in an electric fashion, three gentlemen, Parke Godwin, Richard Watson Gilder and William R. Stewart, came out upon the stage and a presentation of a superb laurel crown in crossed American and Polish standards followed. Mr. Godwin stepped forward to Paderewski's side and said that the wreath was a slight earnest and pledge of admiration of his art.

"There is to be a substantial and durable offering," said Mr. Godwin, "just so soon as Mr. St. Gaudens can get to work. That great sculptor has promised to undertake a bust of the great pianist, and it will be presented as a recognition not only of the exquisite technical perfection which is the basis of all that is fine in art, but also that spirituelle quality which is its crown and glory."

Mr. Godwin said it was appropriate that a countryman of Kosciusko should help to rear a monument to Washington, and ended by wishing a bon voyage and a speedy return to the pianist.

There were cries of speech, but Paderewski shook his head, put his fingers to his lips and sat down to the piano and played the second Liszt Hungarian rhapsody in magnificent fashion. It was a remarkable evening in the annals of piano playing. Four thousand two hundred and seventy-five dollars was netted for the Arch Fund. Paderewski leaves America in a blaze of glory. His season has been extraordinary, but thoroughly well deserved. His playing, like his personality, is both lovable and brilliant, and all pianists should be grateful for the dignity with which Paderewski has invested their art and the honors which he has won for it.

The Henschel Recital.

THE second song recital of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel took place at Chickering Hall last Saturday afternoon before a crowded and enthusiastic house. These finished artists again gave proofs of their admirable mastery of vocal technic, fine musical taste and careful treatment of the voice. The program was as follows:

Two duets—
"Alma Mia" .... Marco da Gagliano (1670)
From "Richard Cœur de Lion" .... Gretry
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Recitative and air from "Susanna" .... Handel
Air from "Calandrino" .... Cimarosa
Mr. Henschel.
"It Was a Lover" (old English song) ....
"Glen of Kenmare" (old Irish song) ....
"Polly Willis" .... Dr. Arne
Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Asra" .... Rubinstein
"Der Erlkönig" .... Loewe
"Jung Dieterich," op. 45 .... Henschel
Mr. Henschel.
"Mignon" .... Beethoven
"Geheimes" .... Schubert
"Rheinisches Volkslied" .... Mendelssohn
Mrs. Henschel.
Two duets—
"Oh, That We Two Were Maying!" (MS.) } .... Henschel
"Beharrliche Liebe" (from op. 28) }
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Air from "Jean de Paris" .... Boieldieu
"Couplets de Vulcain," from "Philemon et Baucis" .... Gounod
Mr. Henschel.
"Le Soir" .... Ambroise Thomas
Air from "Samson and Delilah" .... Saint-Saëns
"Vieille Chanson" .... Bizet
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet from "Mignon" .... Ambroise Thomas
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

As Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will give by request a third and last recital on Saturday next, at 2:30 P. M., it is to be hoped that they will provide a somewhat more novel program, which should contain numbers also for the display of Mrs. Henschel's artistically trained coloratura.

BOSTON NEWS.

BOSTON OFFICE THE MUSICAL COURIER,
157 TREMONT STREET, March 26, 1892.

THE twentieth concert by the Symphony Orchestra was given this evening, the soloist being Mrs. Amalie Joachim. The program was:

"Tragic" overture .... Brahms
Aria from "Orpheus" .... Glück
"Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien Tanz," from "Orpheus" .... Glück
Songs with piano .... { a, "Liebesbotschaft" .... Schubert
{ b, "Schoene Wiege meiner Leiden" . Schumann
{ c, "Erlkoenig" .... Schubert
Symphony No. 8, in F major .... Beethoven

The excellent performance by the orchestra alone prevented the program from being tiresome. With the exception of the "Orpheus" ballet music, and possibly the symphony, more gloomy numbers could with difficulty have been chosen. The orchestra, however, has rarely done better work, and Mr. Nikisch gave the entire program a painstaking, careful reading.

Of the soloist, Mrs. Joachim, we find little reason to change views heretofore expressed. At one time she may have been a great singer. As a figure in musical history she has been, and probably will continue to be, a prominent one, not less as the once wife of a great violinist than as a justly famed exponent of the art of Lieder singing. What Mrs. Joachim once was and what she now is are totally different things. The program for the next concert is as follows:

Symphony No. 3 in A minor, "Scotch" .... Mendelssohn
Concerto for flute and harp .... Mozart
Serenade for string orchestra in F major .... Volkmann
"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm" from "Die Walkuere" . Wagner

The soloists will be Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Ch. Molé and Mr. Heinrich Schuecker.

* * * *

Boston Post
FRIDAY MORNING, APR. 1, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave a second recital at Meionaon yesterday afternoon with a programme as delightful as the first one and an audience as ready to appreciate a truly artistic concert. This programme also presented both Mr. and Mrs. Henschel in solo work and in a limited number of duets, two of them chosen from the beautiful operas of "Faust" and "Hamlet," by Schumann and Ambroise Thomas. There have been no vocalists in Boston this season who could give such finished and altogether enjoyable performances, and the thought that there are yet two more recitals in the series is a pleasant one.

Mrs. Henschel's voice gives strong evidence of untiring study, for it has gained in richness of tone and in flexibility. Mr. Henschel sings as he always did, with true, firm tone and without a suspicion of tremolo, always giving an impression of great reserve power.

The date of the third and fourth recitals is announced for the afternoons of April 5 and 9.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.
Date 3-28

MR. AND MRS. HENSCHEL'S SONG RECITAL.

The second of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel's song recitals at Chickering Hall, on Saturday afternoon, was of the same delightful character as those which have preceded it, and which have made these accomplished singers so deservedly popular with the lovers of the highest forms of vocal art. The programme, as usual, took a wide range, including compositions of an early date and later works by contemporary composers. Gagliano, Gretrey, Handel, Cimarosa, Dr. Arne and Beethoven were drawn upon as well as Rubinstein, Loewe, Saint-Saens, Gounod, Bizet, Ambroise Thomas and Henschel. In all of the selections chosen the admirable art of the singers was shown in a manner to delight the audience. One more opportunity of hearing these sterling artists will be offered at the additional recital which they have decided to give next Saturday afternoon.

Boston Journal.
FRIDAY, APRIL 1, 1892.

THE SECOND VOCAL RECITAL OF MR. AND MRS. HENSCHEL.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel gave the second of a series of vocal recitations yesterday afternoon in the Meionaon.

Duetto buffo, "La cosa non va netta" .... Paisiello
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
"Vergissmeinnicht" .... Bach
Serenata from "Agrippina" } .... Handel
Recitative and air from "Susanna" }
Mr. Henschel.
"It was a Lover and his Lass" .... (Old English)
"Polly Willis" .... Dr. Arne
"The Glen of Kenmare" .... (Old Irish)
Mrs. Henschel.
"Die Mainacht" }
"Sontags" } .... Brahms
"Unuberwindlich" }
Mr. Henschel.
"Lullaby" .... Tschaikowsky
Mignon's Song .... Liszt
"O, Sun that Wakenest" .... Corder
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet from "Faust" .... Schumann
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Crugantino's Song .... Beethoven
Ballad, "Die verfallene Muhle" .... Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
Polish Song .... Paderewski
"Serenade du Passant" .... Massenet
Gavotte, "Il faut aimer" .... Sgambati
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet from "Hamlet" .... Thomas
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

This concert gave genuine delight to the hearers. Mrs. Henschel appeared to better advantage than at the first recital, and her singing of yesterday can be heartily praised. It was without effort; it was sympathetic and it was further characterized by pure and refined taste. Her simple and unaffected delivery of the old English songs gave perhaps the keenest pleasure. She was also charming in the duet of Paisiello, the favorite of the First Consul, Napoleon Bonaparte; in the haunting Lullaby of Tschaikowsky, and in the Sgambati gavotte. Her natural limitations forbid the display of breadth or passion. She cuts cunningly song cameos.

The strength as well as the cleverness of Mr. Henschel, was most fully seen in the Loewe ballad. And yet his performance of the airs of Bach and Handel was worthy of warm praise. In "Die Mainacht," by Brahms, the natural aridity of his voice was too apparent. Certain of his mannerisms may be pardoned on account of his temperament and his skill, but when he accompanies Mrs. Henschel, he should confine himself to the pianoforte, and not seek to intensify the beauty of her song by varying facial expression, for when Mrs. Henschel sings, the audience is not in need of such explanation.

The "Polish Song" by Paderewski is unworthy of the pianist-composer: it is tame and commonplace. Nor was the song of Corder a sufficient excuse for its introduction in such a recital. "Unueberwindlich," by Brahms, is an elephantine setting of rollicking words, and the gavotte by Sgambati is an exquisite trifle.

The audience was large and enthusiastic. The third recital will be given in the Meionaon, Tuesday afternoon, April 5, at 2.30 o'clock.

PHILIP HALE.

---

ipping from Argus ortland Me.
te 3-29

SYMPHONY CONCERT POSTPONED.

Mr. Stockbridge yesterday afternoon received a telegram from the Boston Symphony Orchestra postponing their concert, which has been announced for this evening. The date when they will come has not yet been decided.

---

pping from vertiser, ortland, Me.
e 3-28

Symphony Concert Postponed.

Mr. Stockbridge this afternoon received a telegram from the Boston Symphony orchestra, postponing their concert, which has been announced for to-morrow evening. The date when they will come has not yet been decided.

Boston Transcript
FRIDAY, APRIL 1, 1892.

The Henschel Recitals.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave their second vocal recital in the Meionaon yesterday afternoon, the programme being as follows:

Duetto buffo, "La cosa non va netta" .... Paisiello
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Vergissmeinnicht .... Bach
Serenata from "Agrippina" } .... Handel
Recitative and Aria from "Susanna" }
Mr. Henschel.
"It was a lover and his lass" .... Old English
Polly Willis .... Dr. Arne
The Glen of Kenmare .... Old Irish
Mrs. Henschel.
Die Mainacht }
Sonntags } .... Brahms
Unüberwindlich }
Mr. Henschel.
Lullaby .... Tschaikowsky
Mignon's Song .... Liszt
"O sun that wakenest" .... Corder
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet from "Faust" .... Schumann
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Crugantino's Song from Goethe's "Claudine von Villa Bella" .... Beethoven
Ballad, "Die verfallene Mühle" .... Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
Polish Song .... Paderewski
Sérénade du Passant" .... Massenet
Gavotte, "Il faut aimer" .... Sgambati
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet from "Hamlet" .... Thomas
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

We sincerely regret not having more space than will suffice to notice this delightful recital in the most summary manner. Both artists sang admirably, and some of the new things given, notably the Brahms songs, and the songs by Sgambati and Massenet, were much to be enjoyed. Loewe's "Verfallene Mühle made once more its unfailing effect, and nothing could have been more charming than the singing of the garden duet from Schumnnn's "Faust." The duet from "Hamlet" we could willingly have done witnout; but it was grandly sung. After all, this duet may now be looked upon as almost classic in comparison with the frightful things younger French composers have written since.

The Musical Courier.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30, 1892.

UNPRECEDENTED.

I. J. PADEREWSKI has been the most marvelous and unprecedented success, up to date, in the musical history of America. From a financial point of view (and it must be acknowledged that this is the ultimate test) Paderewski has surpassed all previous records. The following amazing table will illustrate the practical results of his visit to the United States:

Receipts up to March 12, 1892, under contract with C. F. Tretbar	$74 892
Week commencing March 14, six recitals	9.000
Monday, March 21, Brooklyn	3,086
Tuesday, March 22, Boston	4.551
Wednesday, March 23, New Haven and Hartford	3.361
Thursday, March 24, Philadelphia	3.856
Saturday, March 26, New York	6,390
Sunday, March 27, New York	4.180
Total	$109.316

To this may be added about one dozen private engagements here and in Boston and Chicago, none of which netted less than $1,000.

The tournée lasted from November 17 to March 27—four months and ten days—and one of its features was the fact that not one disappointment took place.

Another feature which constitutes a tribute to the scientific and technical genius of American artisans is the record of the Steinway piano. This instrument was used for nearly 100 performances. It was originally selected by Paderewski from among a number of Steinway grands, and if ever a grand piano was subjected to the tests of endurance and strain it was this individual instrument, which on Sunday night proved as satisfactory as it did on the first night.

The farewell concert which Paderewski gave for the benefit of the Washington Arch Fund at the Metropolitan Opera House last Sunday night was a most brilliant success, artistically and pecuniarily. The orchestra was the famous organization from Boston, the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, generously offered to Paderewski for the occasion by Colonel Higginson. The program was this:

Overture, "Tannhäuser" .... Richard Wagner
Orchestra.
Concerto in A minor .... Robert Schumann
Paderewski.
Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini" .... Hector Berlioz
Orchestra.
Concerto, op. 17 .... Paderewski
Paderewski.
Poème symphonique, "Le Rouet d'Omphale" .... Camille Saint-Saëns
Orchestra.
Hungarian fantasia .... Franz Liszt
Paderewski.

Conductor Nikisch's desk was covered with an American flag and draped with the Polish standard and all the orchestral desks were decorated with the Polish colors, red and white. American flags stood at the bases of the proscenium arch and at the back of the stage and the piano was almost hidden with the palms and bunches of roses sent to the pianist.

The great pianist played superbly and the last movement of his concerto was delivered with such "fine careless rapture" that it had to be repeated.

Numerous demonstrations were made during the evening to which Paderewski and Nikisch had to respond. After the Hungarian fantasia, which was played in an electric fashion, three gentlemen, Parke Godwin, Richard Watson Gilder and William R. Stewart, came out upon the stage and a presentation of a superb laurel crown in crossed American and Polish standards followed. Mr. Godwin stepped forward to Paderewski's side and said that the wreath was a slight earnest and pledge of admiration of his art.

"There is to be a substantial and durable offering," said Mr. Godwin, "just so soon as Mr. St. Gaudens can get to work. That great sculptor has promised to undertake a bust of the great pianist, and it will be presented as a recognition not only of the exquisite technical perfection which is the basis of all that is fine in art, but also that spirituelle quality which is its crown and glory."

Mr. Godwin said it was appropriate that a countryman of Kosciusko should help to rear a monument to Washington, and ended by wishing a bon voyage and a speedy return to the pianist.

There were cries of speech, but Paderewski shook his head, put his fingers to his lips and sat down to the piano and played the second Liszt Hungarian rhapsody in magnificent fashion. It was a remarkable evening in the annals of piano playing. Four thousand two hundred and seventy-five dollars was netted for the Arch Fund. Paderewski leaves America in a blaze of glory. His season has been extraordinary, but thoroughly well deserved. His playing, like his personality, is both lovable and brilliant, and all pianists should be grateful for the dignity with which Paderewski has invested their art and the honors which he has won for it.

The Henschel Recital.

THE second song recital of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel took place at Chickering Hall last Saturday afternoon before a crowded and enthusiastic house. These finished artists again gave proofs of their admirable mastery of vocal technic, fine musical taste and careful treatment of the voice. The program was as follows:

Two duets—
"Alma Mia" .... Marco da Gagliano (1670)
From "Richard Cœur de Lion" .... Gretry
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Recitative and air from "Susanna" .... Handel
Air from "Calandrino" .... Cimarosa
Mr. Henschel.
"It Was a Lover" (old English song) ....
"Glen of Kenmare" (old Irish song) ....
"Polly Willis" .... Dr. Arne
Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Asra" .... Rubinstein
"Der Erlkönig" .... Loewe
"Jung Dieterich," op. 45 .... Henschel
Mr. Henschel.
"Mignon" .... Beethoven
"Geheimes" .... Schubert
"Rheinisches Volkslied" .... Mendelssohn
Mrs. Henschel.
Two duets—
"Oh, That We Two Were Maying!" (MS.) } .... Henschel
"Beharrliche Liebe" (from op. 28) }
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Air from "Jean de Paris" .... Boieldieu
"Couplets de Vulcain," from "Philemon et Baucis" .... Gounod
Mr. Henschel.
"Le Soir" .... Ambroise Thomas
Air from "Samson and Delilah" .... Saint-Saëns
"Vieille Chanson" .... Bizet
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet from "Mignon" .... Ambroise Thomas
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

As Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will give by request a third and last recital on Saturday next, at 2:30 P. M., it is to be hoped that they will provide a somewhat more novel program, which should contain numbers also for the display of Mrs. Henschel's artistically trained coloratura.

BOSTON NEWS.

BOSTON OFFICE THE MUSICAL COURIER,
157 TREMONT STREET, March 26, 1892.

THE twentieth concert by the Symphony Orchestra was given this evening, the soloist being Mrs. Amalie Joachim. The program was:

"Tragic" overture .... Brahms
Aria from "Orpheus" .... Glück
"Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien Tanz," from "Orpheus" .... Glück
Songs with piano .... { a, "Liebesbotschaft" .... Schubert
{ b, "Schoene Wiege meiner Leiden" .... Schumann
{ c, "Erlkoenig" .... Schubert
Symphony No. 8, in F major .... Beethoven

The excellent performance by the orchestra alone prevented the program from being tiresome. With the exception of the "Orpheus" ballet music, and possibly the symphony, more gloomy numbers could with difficulty have been chosen. The orchestra, however, has rarely done better work, and Mr. Nikisch gave the entire program a painstaking, careful reading.

Of the soloist, Mrs. Joachim, we find little reason to change views heretofore expressed. At one time she may have been a great singer. As a figure in musical history she has been, and probably will continue to be, a prominent one, not less as the once wife of a great violinist than as a justly famed exponent of the art of Lieder singing. What Mrs. Joachim once was and what she now is are totally different things. The program for the next concert is as follows:

Symphony No. 3 in A minor, "Scotch" .... Mendelssohn
Concerto for flute and harp .... Mozart
Serenade for string orchestra in F major .... Volkmann
"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm" from "Die Walkuere" .... Wagner

The soloists will be Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Ch. Molé and Mr. Heinrich Schuecker.

* * * *

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, APR. 1, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave a second recital at Meionaon yesterday afternoon with a programme as delightful as the first one and an audience as ready to appreciate a truly artistic concert. This programme also presented both Mr. and Mrs. Henschel in solo work and in a limited number of duets, two of them chosen from the beautiful operas of "Faust" and "Hamlet," by Schumann and Ambroise Thomas. There have been no vocalists in Boston this season who could give such finished and altogether enjoyable performances, and the thought that there are yet two more recitals in the series is a pleasant one.

Mrs. Henschel's voice gives strong evidence of untiring study, for it has gained in richness of tone and in flexibility. Mr. Henschel sings as he always did, with true, firm tone and without a suspicion of tremolo, always giving an impression of great reserve power.

The date of the third and fourth recitals is announced for the afternoons of April 5 and 9.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 3-28

MR. AND MRS. HENSCHEL'S SONG RECITAL.

The second of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel's song recitals at Chickering Hall, on Saturday afternoon, was of the same delightful character as those which have preceded it, and which have made these accomplished singers so deservedly popular with the lovers of the highest forms of vocal art. The programme, as usual, took a wide range, including compositions of an early date and later works by contemporary composers. Gagliano, Gretrey, Handel, Cimarosa, Dr. Arne and Beethoven were drawn upon as well as Rubinstein, Loewe, Saint-Saens, Gounod, Bizet, Ambroise Thomas and Henschel. In all of the selections chosen the admirable art of the singers was shown in a manner to delight the audience. One more opportunity of hearing these sterling artists will be offered at the additional recital which they have decided to give next Saturday afternoon.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, APRIL 1, 1892.

THE SECOND VOCAL RECITAL OF MR. AND MRS. HENSCHEL.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel gave the second of a series of vocal recitations yesterday afternoon in the Meionaon.

Duetto buffo, "La cosa non va netta" .... Paisiello
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
"Vergissmeinnicht" .... Bach
Serenata from "Agrippina" } .... Handel
Recitative and air from "Susanna" }
Mr. Henschel.
"It was a Lover and his Lass" .... (Old English)
"Polly Willis" .... Dr. Arne
"The Glen of Kenmare" .... (Old Irish)
Mrs. Henschel.
"Die Mainacht" }
"Sontags" } .... Brahms
"Unuberwindlich" }
Mr. Henschel.
"Lullaby" .... Tschaikowsky
Mignon's Song .... Liszt
"O, Sun that Wakenest" .... Corder
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet from "Faust" .... Schumann
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Cruganttino's Song .... Beethoven
Ballad, "Die verfallene Muhle" .... Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
Polish Song .... Paderewski
"Serenade du Passant" .... Massenet
Gavotte, "Il faut aimer" .... Sgambati
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet from "Hamlet" .... Thomas
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

This concert gave genuine delight to the hearers. Mrs. Henschel appeared to better advantage than at the first recital, and her singing of yesterday can be heartily praised. It was without effort; it was sympathetic and it was further characterized by pure and refined taste. Her simple and unaffected delivery of the old English songs gave perhaps the keenest pleasure. She was also charming in the duet of Paisiello, the favorite of the First Consul, Napoleon Bonaparte; in the haunting Lullaby of Tschaikowsky, and in the Sgambati gavotte. Her natural limitations forbid the display of breadth or passion. She cuts cunningly song cameos.

The strength as well as the cleverness of Mr. Henschel, was most fully seen in the Loewe ballad. And yet his performance of the airs of Bach and Handel was worthy of warm praise. In "Die Mainacht," by Brahms, the natural aridity of his voice was too apparent. Certain of his mannerisms may be pardoned on account of his temperament and his skill, but when he accompanies Mrs. Henschel, he should confine himself to the pianoforte, and not seek to intensify the beauty of her song by varying facial expression, for when Mrs. Henschel sings, the audience is not in need of such explanation.

The "Polish Song" by Paderewski is unworthy of the pianist-composer: it is tame and commonplace. Nor was the song of Corder a sufficient excuse for its introduction in such a recital. "Unueberwindlich," by Brahms, is an elephantine setting of rollicking words, and the gavotte by Sgambati is an exquisite trifle.

The audience was large and enthusiastic. The third recital will be given in the Meionaon, Tuesday afternoon, April 5, at 2.30 o'clock.

PHILIP HALE,

---

pping from Argus [illegible] Me.

to 3-27

SYMPHONY CONCERT POSTPONED.

Mr. Stockbridge yesterday afternoon received a telegram from the Boston Symphony Orchestra postponing their concert, which has been announced for this evening. The date when they will come has not yet been decided.

---

pping from [illegible]

e 3-28

Symphony Concert Postponed.

Mr. Stockbridge this afternoon received a telegram from the Boston Symphony orchestra, postponing their concert, which has been announced for to-morrow evening. The date when they will come has not yet been decided.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, APRIL 1, 1892.

The Henschel Recitals.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave their second vocal recital in the Meionaon yesterday afternoon, the programme being as follows:

Duetto buffo, "La cosa non va netta" .... Paisiello
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Vergissmeinnicht .... Bach
Serenata from "Agrippina" } .... Handel
Recitative and Aria from "Susanna" }
Mr. Henschel.
"It was a lover and his lass" .... Old English
Polly Willis .... Dr. Arne
The Glen of Kenmare .... Old Irish
Mrs. Henschel.
Die Mainacht }
Sonntags } .... Brahms
Unüberwindlich }
Mr. Henschel.
Lullaby .... Tschaikowsky
Mignon's Song .... Liszt
"O sun that wakenest" .... Corder
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet from "Faust" .... Schumann
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Crugantino's Song from Goethe's "Claudine von Villa Bella" .... Beethoven
Ballad, "Die verfallene Mühle" .... Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
Polish Song .... Paderewski
Sérénade du Passant" .... Massenet
Gavotte, "Il faut aimer" .... Sgambati
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet from "Hamlet" .... Thomas
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

We sincerely regret not having more space than will suffice to notice this delightful recital in the most summary manner. Both artists sang admirably, and some of the new things given, notably the Brahms songs, and the songs by Sgambati and Massenet, were much to be enjoyed. Loewe's "Verfallene Mühle made once more its unfailing effect, and nothing could have been more charming than the singing of the garden duet from Schumnnn's "Faust." The duet from "Hamlet" we could willingly have done witnout; but it was grandly sung. After all, this duet may now be looked upon as almost classic in comparison with the frightful things younger French composers have written since.

MUSICAL CIRCLES.

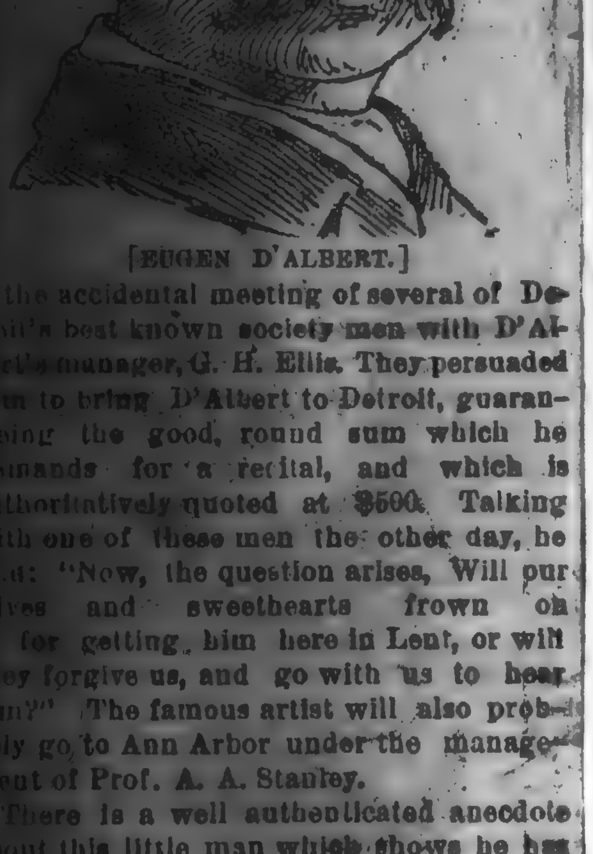
Recital by Eugen D'Albert, the Great Pianist.

[illegible]

THE SYMPHONY'S CONCERT

Mrs. Fisk, the Celebrated Contralto, Will Assist---Local Musical Notes.

It was thought that Eugen ("without the 'e' please") D'Albert would appear in Detroit under the auspices of the Tuesday musicale, but as he could not give them a date outside of Lent, the ladies gave up the idea. He is coming all the same, however, and will give one recital at the Detroit opera house April 1. This is due to the accidental meeting of several of Detroit's best known society men with D'Albert's manager, G. H. Ellis. They persuaded him to bring D'Albert to Detroit, guaranteeing the good, round sum which he demands for a recital, and which is authoritatively quoted at $500. Talking with one of these men the other day, he said: "Now, the question arises, Will our wives and sweethearts frown on us for getting him here in Lent, or will they forgive us, and go with us to hear him?" The famous artist will also probably go to Ann Arbor under the management of Prof. A. A. Stanley.



[EUGEN D'ALBERT.]

There is a well authenticated anecdote about this little man which shows he has artistic taste in other than the musical direction. He took some fair musical comrades into a diminutive cafe in Baltimore, noted for the deliciousness of its "flap jacks." These cakes were put to bake and the cook was called away. D'Albert watched them anxiously, growing more and more nervous every minute. At last he could stand it no longer, but rushed to the little stove, and deftly inserting the cake turner under them one by one, "flopped" them in the most approved manner, murmuring half apologetically: "Zey be no good if zey get too mooch black-brown under zem."

D'Albert has a few of the eccentricities of genius, and for a genius he is exceedingly eccentric in following the Franklinian maxim of "Early to bed and early to rise." The musical genius who does that is a rarity, indeed; but D'Albert, immediately after concluding his part in a program, goes at once to his hotel and to his bed. In the morning, if time and weather permit, he is out tramping the city's streets and learning something by personal observation about its characteristics and its points of interest; and it is said he will learn more about a city in one day's stay than most persons would in a month. He is a strict vegetarian in his diet; drinks no coffee and is as careful and regular in his habits as if the flames of poetic fire never coursed through his veins.

He is as particular in some respects about his dress as the late Dion Boucicault, varying its weight with the varying temperature and wearing "health clothing" exclusively, including boots with woolen tops, apparently indifferent to his personal appearance. He is passionately fond of riding the bicycle, and when at home is accustomed to making extended trips on the wheel over the country; of taking long tramps, during which his musical ideas take form, and it is a pretty active pedestrian who can hold his own with this small-bodied, big-headed musician. He differs, too, from most professional pianists in that he does no practicing when on a concert tour, simply carrying his notes along and occasionally glancing over some piece, but nothing more.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 2, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The orchestral part of the twentieth Symphony concert was altogether good. Mr. Nikisch preserved its simple, honest character to Beethoven's eighth symphony, without a deviation from the best standards, gave a broad, firm treatment to Brahms's "Tragic" overture, and was just dramatic enough in the spirit and demon music from Gluck's "Orfeo." There was first-rate understanding and first-rate conducting all through. But the singing was pretty far below par, and could have gratified the conoscenti little beside their curiosity. The singer was Frau Joachim, whose first selection was the "Che farò" from "Orfeo," of which elder Boston has such memories in the perfect pathos of Adelaide Phillipps and which younger Boston has known in the deeply dramatic rendering of Hastreiter. Frau Joachim was often astray in her intonation, having not the art to conceal the decadence of her voice nor the style to atone for it, and the spirit of the song was not in it, a cheap and fallacious attempt towards effect being made in the last return of the theme by accelerating extravagantly the tempo. She sang later three songs which were acceptable not per se, but because they they gave an opportunity for hearing Mr. Nikisch play their accompaniments exquisitely. It has been all well enough for this artist to be heard by a small assembly in the lieder by which she has gained her reputation, and in which the discrimination which she showed about verbal values was a wholesome lesson, but these concerts ought to admit only the best and purest vocal art. The singing of Mr. Reichmann was an affront to the fundamental principle of song—pure intonation—and this lady's was scarcely less nearly inadmissible. Continuously correct intonation is practically impossible in the later operas of Wagner if the singer tries to give the notes he has set down; but this is no reason why bad methods and false productions should be admitted to the concert-room. The programme for tonight names nothing new. It stands thus: Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony; Mozart; flute and harp concerto, Messrs. Molé and Schuecker; Volkmann's F-major serenade for strings, and the "Farewell" and "Fire Charm" music from "The Valkyre," Mr. Meyn singing Wotan's part.

THE HENSCHELS.

Two of the four recitals allotted to Boston in the present brief tour of Mr. and Mrs. Henschel are past, and, as heretofore, large audiences of the best music lovers are finding great delight in the opportunity of hearing these artists again. Listening to one of their concerts, where song after song succeeds so easily and in such apparently natural order, the auditor rarely stops to think how much research, wide sympathy, liberal taste and careful consideration those programmes represent. These songs are not mere extracts from some printed collection accessible to any purchaser, but they come from the heart of old operas and oratorios or from the depths of pages forgotten and practically unknown on the one hand, while on the other they present the composers of the time in airs which are sure to be characteristic, though they may not always be interesting, and even perhaps not always quite worthy of their place. It is not possible in our limits to analyze the two programmes already heard nor those which are promised for next Tuesday and Saturday afternoons. They embrace those operatic duets which are always pointed with keen perception and colored with dramatic tints; the great ballads which Mr. Henschel sings as no one else can; the dainty modern airs and quaint old melodies for which Mrs. Henschel has such purity, grace and silvery lightness; while the gravity of ecclesiastical music and the gayety of humor are not forgotten. It is not possible for any artist to do all things equally well, and we could best spare those buffo songs, of which Mr. Henschel sings the phrases gayly and sturdily, but without their brilliant sharpness of enunciation. The accompaniments, all played by Mr. Henschel, are the same delightful models of distinctness and sensibility—even though he occasionaly covers his own singing with them—and the art with which he passes in modulation from one to another, preserving figures, but changing keys, is as remarkable as ever.

---

legram, New York, N.Y.

Date 3/31

Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel will give a supplementary song recital at Chickering Hall on Saturday afternoon. The programme offered is one of unusual interest, consisting of English, Irish, German and Polish songs and duets.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, APRIL 2.

MR. AND MRS. HENSCHEL'S RECITALS.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave the first of their four vocal recitals on Tuesday evening at Meionaon Hall before a large audience, which gave them a very warm greeting after their long absence, and throughout the evening showed, by enthusiastic applause, its keen appreciation of the delightful work done by these two artists. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were entirely unassisted, Mr. Henschel adhering to his former plan of playing all accompaniments himself. Very exquisite accompaniments they are, too, but it seems at times during his own solo work, as if the vocal part was overshadowed by the instrumental. Mr. Henschel's programs are always interesting, and this one was no exception. It was very catholic in its make-up, too, containing selections of Padre Martini, Handel, Pergolesi, Cimarosa, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Franz, Schubert, Goetz, Henschel, Lortzing, Gounod, and Boieldieu. It was a pleasure to hear Mrs. Henschel's delicious voice once more, and, although it was evidently not in its best condition on Tuesday evening, it gives evidence of having gained in volume and warmth. Exquisite delicacy and grace rather than breadth are characteristic of Mrs. Henschel's work, and these qualities were most appropriately heard in her singing of Mendelssohn's "Auf Flügeln des Gesanges" and the three charming songs of Mr. Henschel's.

Mr. Henschel's powerful and dramatic voice has gained in mellowness since he last sang here and the intellectual part of his work is so masterly that his occasional explosiveness and the uncomfortable prominence he gives to the sibilant letters are but small blots to his fine performances, Nothing but praise can be said of his buffa aria from "Calandrino." It was given with humor, vigor, and rapid, clear-cut enunciation. "Der Doppelgänger" was beautifully interpreted, although it did seem as if the instrumental climax was greater than the vocal. The czar's song from the "Czar and Carpenter" was a delightful example of legato singing, marred only by the hissing sound referred to above. Mr. Henschel's voice showed to great advantage in this selection. The duets between Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were wholly enjoyable, and Mr. Henschel's own songs so delightfully interpreted by Mrs. Henschel, are musicianly and charming.

The second recital on Thursday afternoon proved even more delightful than the first. Mrs. Henschel's voice was in better condition than on Tuesday evening and her singing of "It was a Lover and his Lass," "Polly Willis," and the "Glen of Kenmare," was well nigh flawless in interpretation and execution. The songs were exquisite tone pictures. On Tuesday evening it was not apparent that Mrs. Henschel's style had grown broader, but on Thursday afternoon this was very apparent from her dramatic and beautiful rendering of the "Hamlet" music and the Liszt "Knowest Thou the Land?" The Polish song of Paderewski was wholly weird and not interesting, but the "Sérénade du Passant" of Massanet and the Gavotte of Sgambati were dainty in themselves and daintily given. Mr. Henschel's "Vergissmeinnicht" of Bach and "Serenata" of Handel were soulfully and tenderly sung; Handel's aria from "Susanna" very dramatically, but it seemed ill adapted to piano accompaniment. Crugantino's song was wonderfully well done, but it is not the exuberant style of music that shows Mr. Henschel's voice to the best advantage. The Loewe "Ballad" was exquisitely done and showed Mr. Henschel's skill in adapting the very quality of his voice to the changing sentiment of words and music. The third recital will be given on Tuesday afternoon, April 5th.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, APRIL 2, 1892.

Paderewski's concerts in this country brought in about $125,000. There were nearly a hundred given by him, counting the private engagements (about a dozen) at New York, Chicago and Boston, exclusive of the occasion when the great artist appeared at benefits, one for the Symphony Orchestra, at Boston, and one for the Washington Arch Fund at New York. The following record of the latter occasion (from which $4275 was realized) is from the Musical Courier:

The concert which was Paderewski's farewell was given at the Metropolitan Opera House last Sunday night and was a most brilliant success, artistically and pecuniarily. The orchestra was the Boston Symphony Orchestra, generously offered for the occasion by Colonel Higginson. The programme was—

Overture, "Tannhäuser"	Wagner
Concerto in A minor	Robert Schumann
Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"	Berlioz
Concerto, op. 17	Paderewski
Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale"	Saint-Saëns
Hungarian fantasia	Liszt

Mr. Nikisch's desk was covered with an American flag and draped with the Polish standard, and all the players' desks were decorated with the Polish colors. American flags stood at the bases of the proscenium arch and at the back of the stage, and the piano was almost hidden with palms and roses. Numerous demonstrations were made during the evening to which Paderewski and Nikisch had to respond. After the Hungarian fantasia, Parke Godwin, Richard Watson Gilder and William R. Stewart came upon the stage and a presentation of a superb laurel crown in crossed American and Polish standards followed. Mr. Godwin said that the wreath was a slight earnest and pledge of admiration of Paderewski's art, adding, "There is to be a substantial and durable offering just so soon as Mr. St. Gaudens can get to work. That great sculptor has promised to undertake a bust of the great pianist, and it will be presented as a recognition not only of the exquisite technical perfection which is the basis of all that is fine in art, but also that spirituelle quality which is its crown and glory." There were cries of speech, but Paderewski shook his head, put his fingers to his lips and sat down to the piano and played the second Liszt Hungarian rhapsody in magnificent fashion. It was a remarkable evening in the annals of piano playing.

At Union Hall, next Monday night, the Kneisel Quartet will give the concert originally appointed for Jan. 25, and will end their series for this season.

The last two concerts of songs at the Meionaon by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will be given on Tuesday and Saturday afternoons of next week. Full programmes and tickets at the office in Music Hall.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 94.

SUNDAY, APRIL 3, 1892.

Return of "The Queen's Mate" at the Tremont Theatre.

The Symphony Concert—Success of the Henschel Recitals—Notable Oratorio

The patrons of the Symphony concerts were afforded a rare treat in last evening's programme, as the selections were of unusual interest and variety, excellent soloists took part and the performance of the several numbers was in the main admirable.

Beginning his programme with the "Scotch" symphony by Mendelssohn, Mr. Nikisch afforded his audience an opportunity to hear its inspired movements under the most favorable circumstances, and his reading of the work was thoroughly enjoyed. There was a conservative following of accepted interpretations in the opening movement which predisposed those familiar with other performances of the symphony in favor of the conductor's ideas, and when he made a radical departure from custom, in playing the bivace, his audience was quite ready to, and did, applaud the spirited fashion in which this movement was given. The beauties of the adagio were all made delightfully clear by Mr. Nikisch, and the final movement was also given with rare success under his skilful direction.

Following the symphony came the andante and allegro from Mozart's concerto for flute and harp, played by Messrs. Mole and Schuecker, and these two men of the orchestra gave a splendid exhibition of their best work in the performance of this tuneful number. M. Mole sang the beautiful theme of the andante upon his flute with faultless taste and with fine expression, having excellent support in the equally artistic harp playing of Mr. Schuecker. The allegro was brilliantly interpreted by the two players, M. Mole excelling in all the difficult execution demanded in the flute part, giving a free, pure, true tone at all times, and displaying a mastery of the instrument that charmed and delighted all who listened.

Volkmann's serenade for string orchestra in F major made the third number, and, despite the fact that, aside from its third movement, it is little more than a study for the string players, it made a pleasing effect and afforded a good contrast to "Wotan's Farewell" and the "Fire Charm" from "Die Walkure," which made the last selection on the evening's list.

Mr. Heinrich Meyn was the soloist in the "Farewell," and he met with fair success in overcoming the difficulties it presents to the single soloist opposed to all the instrumental forces arrayed against him. His delivery of the declamatory measures of Wotan was characterized by intelligence and good taste, but his voice is not quite of the heroic quality demanded to realize all the possibilities of this untuneful, unthankful selection which loses well nigh all its meaning when stripped of the stage surroundings of the opera house.

In the playing of the "Fire Charm" Mr. Nikisch was not altogether successful; for, despite the purity of the string tone, there was a lack of the brilliancy which has been given to this wonderful tone picture by other conductors. The audience, however, appeared delighted with the interpretation of both these Wagner numbers.

The postponed concert in the Kneisel Quartet series is announced for tomorrow evening at Union Hall. This will be the last one of the most artistic and enjoyable course given this season.

No event in the way of chamber music concerts has attracted such attention this season as the vocal recitals by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel. The third and fourth of their series will be given at the Meionaon on Tuesday and Saturday afternoons of the coming week.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 3.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

Owing to lack of space, our notice of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra must be postponed until next week.

The Kneisel Quartet will give their last concert of the season in Union Hall to-morrow evening. They will be assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Novacek, and Mr. L. Schultz.

On Tuesday evening and Thursday afternoon Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave song recitals in the Meionaon. The audience on each occasion was large, fashionable and enthusiastic. The artists were welcomed with great cordiality, and their performances afforded to the full the same refined pleasure that has always attended them here. Mr. Henschel's well remembered skill as a programme maker was strikingly exemplified by the programmes of these recitals, and his eclectic taste was no less notably emphasized in the wide variety of styles and nationalities that the selections illustrated. Mrs. Henschel sang with all her familiar finish. Her voice, perhaps, sounds somewhat tired and worn, and and she has fallen into a disagreeable tremolo which now and then suggests untunefulness; but her singing is very pleasing in the hearing, especially in songs of quaint and simple sentiment that do not call for power or passion in their reading. Mr. Henschel, as in the past, was more satisfying in the fine artistic spirit in which he interprets his music than in his method of singing it. The meaning of the composer never eludes him, and his phrasing and musicianly instinct are never at fault. It need not be added that his playing of the accompaniments to the songs was masterly. The two remaining recitals will be given on the afternoons of Tuesday and Saturday next.

—— Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel were accorded a warm and enthusiastic reception last Tuesday night at their first recital in Meionaon Hall. Among the brilliant audience were noticed Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Dr. S. W. Langmaid, Miss Langmaid, Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang, Mrs. Charles Hayden, Mrs. Henry Whitman, Mr. John S. Dwight, Miss Abby Alger, Col. Stephen M. Crosby, and Mr. S. L. Thorndike.

MUSICAL CIRCLES.

A Recital by Eugen D'Albert, the Great Pianist.

Detroit Mich

THE SYMPHONY'S CONCERT

Mrs. Fisk, the Celebrated Contralto, Will Assist---Local Musical Notes.

3/27

It was thought that Eugen ("without the 'e' please") D'Albert would appear in Detroit under the auspices of the Tuesday musicale, but as he could not give them a date outside of Lent, the ladies gave up the idea. He is coming all the same, however, and will give one recital at the Detroit opera house April 1. This is due to the accidental meeting of several of Detroit's best known society men with D'Albert's manager, G. H. Ellis. They persuaded him to bring D'Albert to Detroit, guaranteeing the good, round sum which he demands for a recital, and which is authoritatively quoted at $500. Talking with one of these men the other day, he said: "Now, the question arises, Will our wives and sweethearts frown on us for getting him here in Lent, or will they forgive us, and go with us to hear him?" The famous artist will also probably go to Ann Arbor under the management of Prof. A. A. Stanley.

[EUGEN D'ALBERT.]

There is a well authenticated anecdote about this little man which shows he has artistic taste in other than the musical direction. He took some fair musical comrades into a diminutive cafe in Baltimore, noted for the deliciousness of its "flap jacks." These cakes were put to bake and the cook was called away. D'Albert watched them anxiously, growing more and more nervous every minute. At last he could stand it no longer, but rushed to the little stove, and deftly inserting the cake turner under them one by one, "flopped" them in the most approved manner, murmuring half apologetically: "Zey be no good if zey get too mooch black-brown under zem."

D'Albert has a few of the eccentricities of genius, and for a genius he is exceedingly eccentric in following the Franklinian maxim of "Early to bed and early to rise." The musical genius who does that is a rarity, indeed; but D'Albert, immediately after concluding his part in a program, goes at once to his hotel and to his bed. In the morning, if time and weather permit, he is out tramping the city's streets and learning something by personal observation about its characteristics and its points of interest; and it is said he will learn more about a city in one day's stay than most persons would in a month. He is a strict vegetarian in his diet; drinks no coffee and is as careful and regular in his habits as if the flames of poetic fire never coursed through his veins.

He is as particular in some respects about his dress as the late Dion Boucicault, varying its weight with the varying temperature and wearing "health clothing" exclusively, including boots with woolen tops, apparently indifferent to his personal appearance. He is passionately fond of riding the bicycle, and when at home is accustomed to making extended trips on the wheel over the country; of taking long tramps, during which his musical ideas take form, and it is a pretty active pedestrian who can hold his own with this small-bodied, big-headed musician. He differs, too, from most professional pianists in that he does no practicing when on a concert tour, simply carrying his notes along and occasionally glancing over some piece, but nothing more.

* * *

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 2, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The orchestral part of the twentieth Symphony concert was altogether good. Mr. Nikisch preserved its simple, honest character to Beethoven's eighth symphony, without a deviation from the best standards, gave a broad, firm treatment to Brahms's "Tragic" overture, and was just dramatic enough in the spirit and demon music from Gluck's "Orfeo." There was first-rate understanding and first-rate conducting all through. But the singing was pretty far below par, and could have gratified the conoscenti little beside their curiosity. The singer was Frau Joachim, whose first selection was the "Che farò" from "Orfeo," of which elder Boston has such memories in the perfect pathos of Adelaide Phillipps and which younger Boston has known in the deeply dramatic rendering of Hastreiter. Frau Joachim was often astray in her intonation, having not the art to conceal the decadence of her voice nor the style to atone for it, and the spirit of the song was not in it, a cheap and fallacious attempt towards effect being made in the last return of the theme by accelerating extravagantly the tempo. She sang later three songs which were acceptable not per se, but because they they gave an opportunity for hearing Mr. Nikisch play their accompaniments exquisitely. It has been all well enough for this artist to be heard by a small assembly in the lieder by which she has gained her reputation, and in which the discrimination which she showed about verbal values was a wholesome lesson, but these concerts ought to admit only the best and purest vocal art. The singing of Mr. Reichmann was an affront to the fundamental principle of song—pure intonation—and this lady's was scarcely less nearly inadmissible. Continuously correct intonation is practically impossible in the later operas of Wagner if the singer tries to give the notes he has set down; but this is no reason why bad methods and false productions should be admitted to the concert-room. The programme for tonight names nothing new. It stands thus: Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony; Mozart; flute and harp concerto, Messrs. Molé and Schuecker; Volkmann's F-major serenade for strings, and the "Farewell" and "Fire Charm" music from "The Valkyre," Mr. Meyn singing Wotan's part.

THE HENSCHELS.

Two of the four recitals allotted to Boston in the present brief tour of Mr. and Mrs. Henschel are past, and, as heretofore, large audiences of the best music lovers are finding great delight in the opportunity of hearing these artists again. Listening to one of their concerts, where song after song succeeds so easily and in such apparently natural order, the auditor rarely stops to think how much research, wide sympathy, liberal taste and careful consideration those programmes represent. These songs are not mere extracts from some printed collection accessible to any purchaser, but they come from the heart of old operas and oratorios or from the depths of pages forgotten and practically unknown on the one hand, while on the other they present the composers of the time in airs which are sure to be characteristic, though they may not always be interesting, and even perhaps not always quite worthy of their place. It is not possible in our limits to analyze the two programmes already heard nor those which are promised for next Tuesday and Saturday afternoons. They embrace those operatic duets which are always pointed with keen perception and colored with dramatic tints; the great ballads which Mr. Henschel sings as no one else can; the dainty modern airs and quaint old melodies for which Mrs. Henschel has such purity, grace and silvery lightness; while the gravity of ecclesiastical music and the gayety of humor are not forgotten. It is not possible for any artist to do all things equally well, and we could best spare those buffo songs, of which Mr. Henschel sings the phrases gayly and sturdily, but without their brilliant sharpness of enunciation. The accompaniments, all played by Mr. Henschel, are the same delightful models of distinctness and sensibility—even though he occasionaly covers his own singing with them—and the art with which he passes in modulation from one to another, preserving figures, but changing keys, is as remarkable as ever.

[illegible] York, N.Y.

Date 3/31

Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel will give a supplementary song recital at Chickering Hall on Saturday afternoon. The programme offered is one of unusual interest, consisting of English, Irish, German and Polish songs and duets.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, APRIL 2.

MR. AND MRS. HENSCHEL'S RECITALS.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave the first of their four vocal recitals on Tuesday evening at Meionaon Hall before a large audience, which gave them a very warm greeting after their long absence, and throughout the evening showed, by enthusiastic applause, its keen appreciation of the delightful work done by these two artists. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were entirely unassisted, Mr. Henschel adhering to his former plan of playing all accompaniments himself. Very exquisite accompaniments they are, too, but it seems at times during his own solo work, as if the vocal part was overshadowed by the instrumental. Mr. Henschel's programs are always interesting, and this one was no exception. It was very catholic in its make-up, too, containing selections of Padre Martini, Handel, Pergolesi, Cimarosa, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Franz, Schubert, Goetz, Henschel, Lortzing, Gounod, and Boieldieu. It was a pleasure to hear Mrs. Henschel's delicious voice once more, and, although it was evidently not in its best condition on Tuesday evening, it gives evidence of having gained in volume and warmth. Exquisite delicacy and grace rather than breadth are characteristic of Mrs. Henschel's work, and these qualities were most appropriately heard in her singing of Mendelssohn's "Auf Flügeln des Gesanges" and the three charming songs of Mr. Henschel's.

Mr. Henschel's powerful and dramatic voice has gained in mellowness since he last sang here and the intellectual part of his work is so masterly that his occasional explosiveness and the uncomfortable prominence he gives to the sibilant letters are but small blots to his fine performances, Nothing but praise can be said of his buffa aria from "Calandrino." It was given with humor, vigor, and rapid, clear-cut enunciation. "Der Doppelgänger" was beautifully interpreted, although it did seem as if the instrumental climax was greater than the vocal. The czar's song from the "Czar and Carpenter" was a delightful example of legato singing, marred only by the hissing sound referred to above. Mr. Henschel's voice showed to great advantage in this selection. The duets between Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were wholly enjoyable, and Mr. Henschel's own songs so delightfully interpreted by Mrs. Henschel, are musicianly and charming.

The second recital on Thursday afternoon proved even more delightful than the first. Mrs. Henschel's voice was in better condition than on Tuesday evening and her singing of "It was a Lover and his Lass," "Polly Willis," and the "Glen of Kenmare," was well nigh flawless in interpretation and execution. The songs were exquisite tone pictures. On Tuesday evening it was not apparent that Mrs. Henschel's style had grown broader, but on Thursday afternoon this was very apparent from her dramatic and beautiful rendering of the "Hamlet" music and the Liszt "Knowest Thou the Land?" The Polish song of Paderewski was wholly weird and not interesting, but the "Sérénade du Passant" of Massanet and the Gavotte of Sgambati were dainty in themselves and daintily given. Mr. Henschel's "Vergissmeinnicht" of Bach and "Serenata" of Handel were soulfully and tenderly sung; Handel's aria from "Susanna" very dramatically, but it seemed ill adapted to piano accompaniment. Crugantino's song was wonderfully well done, but it is not the exuberant style of music that shows Mr. Henschel's voice to the best advantage. The Loewe "Ballad" was exquisitely done and showed Mr. Henschel's skill in adapting the very quality of his voice to the changing sentiment of words and music. The third recital will be given on Tuesday afternoon, April 5th.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, APRIL 2, 1892.

Paderewski's concerts in this country brought in about $125,000. There were nearly a hundred given by him, counting the private engagements (about a dozen) at New York, Chicago and Boston, exclusive of the occasion when the great artist appeared at benefits, one for the Symphony Orchestra, at Boston, and one for the Washington Arch Fund at New York. The following record of the latter occasion (from which $4275 was realized) is from the Musical Courier:

The concert which was Paderewski's farewell was given at the Metropolitan Opera House last Sunday night and was a most brilliant success, artistically and pecuniarily. The orchestra was the Boston Symphony Orchestra, generously offered for the occasion by Colonel Higginson. The programme was—

Overture, "Tannhäuser"	Wagner
Concerto in A minor	Robert Schumann
Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"	Berlioz
Concerto, op. 17	Paderewski
Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale"	Saint-Saëns
Hungarian fantasia	Liszt

Mr. Nikisch's desk was covered with an American flag and draped with the Polish standard, and all the players' desks were decorated with the Polish colors. American flags stood at the bases of the proscenium arch and at the back of the stage, and the piano was almost hidden with palms and roses. Numerous demonstrations were made during the evening to which Paderewski and Nikisch had to respond. After the Hungarian fantasia, Parke Godwin, Richard Watson Gilder and William R. Stewart came upon the stage and a presentation of a superb laurel crown in crossed American and Polish standards followed. Mr. Godwin said that the wreath was a slight earnest and pledge of admiration of Paderewski's art, adding, "There is to be a substantial and durable offering just so soon as Mr. St. Gaudens can get to work. That great sculptor has promised to undertake a bust of the great pianist, and it will be presented as a recognition not only of the exquisite technical perfection which is the basis of all that is fine in art, but also that spirituelle quality which is its crown and glory." There were cries of speech, but Paderewski shook his head, put his fingers to his lips and sat down to the piano and played the second Liszt Hungarian rhapsody in magnificent fashion. It was a remarkable evening in the annals of piano playing.

At Union Hall, next Monday night, the Kneisel Quartet will give the concert originally appointed for Jan. 25, and will end their series for this season.

The last two concerts of songs at the Meionaon by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will be given on Tuesday and Saturday afternoons of next week. Full programmes and tickets at the office in Music Hall.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 94.

SUNDAY, APRIL 3, 1892.

Return of "The Queen's Mate" at the Tremont Theatre.

The Symphony Concert—Success of the Henschel Recitals—Notable Oratorio

The patrons of the Symphony concerts were afforded a rare treat in last evening's programme, as the selections were of unusual interest and variety, excellent soloists took part and the performance of the several numbers was in the main admirable.

Beginning his programme with the "Scotch" symphony by Mendelssohn, Mr. Nikisch afforded his audience an opportunity to hear its inspired movements under the most favorable circumstances, and his reading of the work was thoroughly enjoyed. There was a conservative following of accepted interpretations in the opening movement which predisposed those familiar with other performances of the symphony in favor of the conductor's ideas, and when he made a radical departure from custom, in playing the bivace, his audience was quite ready to, and did, applaud the spirited fashion in which this movement was given. The beauties of the adagio were all made delightfully clear by Mr. Nikisch, and the final movement was also given with rare success under his skilful direction.

Following the symphony came the andante and allegro from Mozart's concerto for flute and harp, played by Messrs. Mole and Schuecker, and these two men of the orchestra gave a splendid exhibition of their best work in the performance of this tuneful number. M. Mole sang the beautiful theme of the andante upon his flute with faultless taste and with fine expression, having excellent support in the equally artistic harp playing of Mr. Schuecker. The allegro was brilliantly interpreted by the two players, M. Mole excelling in all the difficult execution demanded in the flute part, giving a free, pure, true tone at all times, and displaying a mastery of the instrument that charmed and delighted all who listened.

Volkmann's serenade for string orchestra in F major made the third number, and, despite the fact that, aside from its third movement, it is little more than a study for the string players, it made a pleasing effect and afforded a good contrast to "Wotan's Farewell" and the "Fire Charm" from "Die Walkure," which made the last selection on the evening's list.

Mr. Heinrich Meyn was the soloist in the "Farewell," and he met with fair success in overcoming the difficulties it presents to the single soloist opposed to all the instrumental forces arrayed against him. His delivery of the declamatory measures of Wotan was characterized by intelligence and good taste, but his voice is not quite of the heroic quality demanded to realize all the possibilities of this untuneful, unthankful selection which loses well nigh all its meaning when stripped of the stage surroundings of the opera house.

In the playing of the "Fire Charm" Mr. Nikisch was not altogether successful; for, despite the purity of the string tone, there was a lack of the brilliancy which has been given to this wonderful tone picture by other conductors. The audience, however, appeared delighted with the interpretation of both these Wagner numbers.

The postponed concert in the Kneisel Quartet series is announced for tomorrow evening at Union Hall. This will be the last one of the most artistic and enjoyable course given this season.

No event in the way of chamber music concerts has attracted such attention this season as the vocal recitals by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel. The third and fourth of their series will be given at the Meionaon on Tuesday and Saturday afternoons of the coming week.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 3.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

Owing to lack of space, our notice of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra must be postponed until next week.

The Kneisel Quartet will give their last concert of the season in Union Hall to-morrow evening. They will be assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Novacek, and Mr. L. Schultz.

On Tuesday evening and Thursday afternoon Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave song recitals in the Meionaon. The audience on each occasion was large, fashionable and enthusiastic. The artists were welcomed with great cordiality, and their performances afforded to the full the same refined pleasure that has always attended them here. Mr. Henschel's well remembered skill as a programme maker was strikingly exemplified by the programmes of these recitals, and his eclectic taste was no less notably emphasized in the wide variety of styles and nationalities that the selections illustrated. Mrs. Henschel sang with all her familiar finish. Her voice, perhaps, sounds somewhat tired and worn, and and she has fallen into a disagreeable tremolo which now and then suggests untunefulness; but her singing is very pleasing in the hearing, especially in songs of quaint and simple sentiment that do not call for power or passion in their reading. Mr. Henschel, as in the past, was more satisfying in the fine artistic spirit in which he interprets his music than in his method of singing it. The meaning of the composer never eludes him, and his phrasing and musicianly instinct are never at fault. It need not be added that his playing of the accompaniments to the songs was masterly. The two remaining recitals will be given on the afternoons of Tuesday and Saturday next.

—— Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel were accorded a warm and enthusiastic reception last Tuesday night at their first recital in Meionaon Hall. Among the brilliant audience were noticed Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Dr. S. W. Langmaid, Miss Langmaid, Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang, Mrs. Charles Hayden, Mrs. Henry Whitman, Mr. John S. Dwight, Miss Abby Alger, Col. Stephen M. Crosby, and Mr. S. L. Thorndike.

[169]

THE NEWS.

SATURDAY, APRIL 2, 1892.

B. W. BARNSTEAD, Editor.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE.
$1.25 a year; 6 months 65c; 3 months 35c.

OFFICE—Franklin St., near Central Sq.
STONEHAM, MASS.

How Boston's Great Orchestra Travels.

By William A. Field.

Presuming that many of the readers of THE NEWS are more or less interested in musical affairs, and, as it is a well known fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in nearly every city and town, often mentioned as a theme for musical discussion, the writer will. by the kind permission of the editor, endeavor occasionally, to impart through its columns such information to the readers regarding this famous musical organization, as he has from time to time gathered during his long association with it.

The subject chosen for this writing: "How Boston's Great Orchestra Travels," has never, to the writer's knowledge, been written up, and it is hoped that it may prove to be interesting.

The question is often asked. How is this and that done, when you are on the road? When and where do go? Herein I will in as brief and comprehensive a manner as is possible, endeavor to explain the modus operandi, concerning a one week trip to the cities visited, once each month during the concert season. In all five trips, aside from the long trip of three or four weeks, beginning in April.

To begin with I would remark that there is no haphazard business. Nothing left to chance. On the contrary there is a perfectly arranged system even to the minutest detail. The charge of this department is one of the many responsible and ardous duties that constantly rest upon the young shoulders of the very quiet appearing and unassuming gentleman but remarkably versatile and sagacious manager, Mr. Charles A. Ellis, who is aided in his labors by Mr. Fred A. Comee, his able and efficient assistant manager, whose duties are manifold, one of his essential ones being that of road manager, and to superintend the whole business of the trips.

The duties thus devolving upon Mr. Comee are often of an extremely arduous and perplexing nature. But Fred is fully alive and equal to any emergency and faithfully carries the business through in a thoroughly impartial manner.

Now, for instance, there are 87 men to make a trip of one week. Each and every one is to be cared for, and, as the writer can testify, they are exceedingly well cared for. Excellent hotels, at times the very best are selected. The car accommodations are ample. Special cars are furnished for the exclusive use of the "boys." No strangers can enter them. Two cars, a passenger and a smoker, for day travel. For night, three sleeping coaches. No tickets are at all handled by the men. For a night ride an envelope is furnished by Mr. Comee at the hall, handed to one or two mates, who usually pair together. This envelope contains two checks with as usual, number of section, upper and lower berth, and marked car 1, 2, 3. as the case may be. The question of upper or lower berth to be decided between the pair. You can go to bed as soon as you like, or if you wish to you can sit up all night. The sleepers are ready to go into, as soon as you reach the station, after the concert, and for the time the cars belong exclusively to the "boys." Can the Raymond excursionists fare better?

With the orchestra there goes also over 100 pieces of baggage. These consist chiefly of the instruments, music stands and music trunks. A few pieces go to the hotel. As there must be no delay in baggage transfer to and from, the transfer arrangements are at every place previously understood. The care of this department is a very responsible charge. Here is another query often asked the writer. Are the members of the orchestra always on hand punctually? Yes, barring illness, every man is, at all times, at concert, at rehearsal, at cars, boat, everywhere invariably and punctually. The fact that 87 men can be on a trip for a week, visiting the liveliest cities in the country, and not a man, but is and has ever without fail been punctually and in good form at his post of duty, ought to satisfy the minds of some, that, that musicians can be honorable gentlemen, possessing moral tendencies of high average, and are faithful servants as well. Pardon the sentiment. It is on the part of the writer but a simple act of justice and fairness to his colleagues. Again it is asked, how do you always know the hour of leaving by train? The day and hour of rehearsals? etc. It is this way.

Before leaving Boston, each one is furnished with a neatly prepared and printed document, which reads for instance, March itinerary.

To sum it all up. Your sleeping car is ready. Your room at the hotel is ready upon arrival. Your trunk will be at your room by the time you will need it. A lunch is served aboard the train, if riding at the regular meal hour. Your instrument is at the hall, you have only to take up your instrument at the concert, watch carefully, very, very carefully, the great conductor, and pay close attention, very, very close attention to your business. If one wishes anything more comfortably arranged, he should at once join a circus company. Before closing I desire to speak of one, who although not seen in the ranks of a performer, yet is a good musician. I refer to one who commands and enjoys the respect of every member of the orchestra. A veritable prince of good fellows, Mr. Johann Sauerquell, the first syllable of whose name is by no means an indicator of his character. He is the librarian, and a very responsible duty it is too. Suppose for instance that a prominent instrumental part when about to be played from was missing. Oh my! But it never is, Herr Sauerquell's system is in perfect keeping with that of the other departments. It is a part of his duties also to set and prepare the stage for concerts and rehearsals. And so efficiently is it done, that it is very seldom that a chair or stand is even handled by any performer. Now it is of much importance that every performer should occupy the same relative positions as in Music Hall at a concert.

A rather difficult task in some cases to accomplish, as stages in different halls are apt to differ in size and construction. But the genius of our friend is equal to any emergency. I really believe that he could and would arrange everything conveniently and satisfactorily for 87 men, if the same were obliged to give a grand concert in a balloon. He never "gets left."

As with the Symphony Orchestra on its travels, so it is everywhere, and at all times. The same careful attention is everywhere paid to every minute detail. A most perfect system is therefore the result. The whole however has been obtained only through long years of experience, coupled with hard labor on the part of its persevering manager, and his carefully selected, faithful and courteous officials in all departments.

No expense has been or is spared to make this grand organization what it now is.

An honor to its liberal spirited founder. The pride of a great metropolis, and a rich blessing to all true lovers of music. Well may the musical public of Boston and its vicinity echo the words of the immortal poet, in regard to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"I am beholden to you for your sweet music;
My ears were never better fed with such delightful, pleasing sounds."

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, APR. 4, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Saturday night's Symphony programme was one of rare excellence, beginning with Mendelssohn's beautiful Scotch symphony in A minor, which received an excellent interpretation at the hands of Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra, and ending with the grand music of "Wotan's Farewell" and "The Charm," from Wagner's "Die Walknere." Mr. Heinrich Meyer, the well-known bass, gave these two numbers in an artistic manner, although his voice, which is full and rich and used according to the best method, was not fully equal to the demands made by the brilliant orchestration of Wagner's masterpiece.

Volkmann's serenade for string orchestra, in F major, was not interesting, save in the fact that a first hearing of any composition must possess a certain charm; yet there were some pleasing effects in each part, and the third movement possessed decided beauty. However, it served to bring out all the best points of the orchestra.

The Mozart andante and allegro for flute and harp was exquisite, the occasional orchestral portions serving to set forth more clearly the beauties of the two solo instruments played by Mr. Charles Mole and Heinrich Schuecker. Next week's programme will be wholly orchestral, consisting of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, a ballade for orchestra; "The Mermaid," by Edmond de Mihalovich (first time), and J. H. Paine's symphony No. 2, in A major, "In the Spring."

THE · PRESTO ·

MARCH 31, 1892

I am anticipating a treat when the Henschels come. All reports that reach me state that their recitals are as beautiful and artistic as ever. It is alone worth the price of admission to hear Georg Henschel play accompaniments. Our budding pianists can learn (if they will) very much from this portion of a Henschel recital.

THE NEWS.

SATURDAY, APRIL 2, 1892.

R. W. BARNSTEAD, Editor.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE.
$1.25 a year; 6 months 65c; 3 months 35c.

OFFICE—Franklin St., near Central Sq.
STONEHAM, MASS.

How Boston's Great Orchestra Travels.

By William A. Field.

Presuming that many of the readers of THE NEWS are more or less interested in musical affairs, and, as it is a well known fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in nearly every city and town, often mentioned as a theme for musical discussion, the writer will, by the kind permission of the editor, endeavor occasionally, to impart through its columns such information to the readers regarding this famous musical organization, as he has from time to time gathered during his long association with it.

The subject chosen for this writing: "How Boston's Great Orchestra Travels," has never, to the writer's knowledge, been written up, and it is hoped that it may prove to be interesting.

The question is often asked. How is this and that done, when you are on the road? When and where do go? Herein I will in as brief and comprehensive a manner as is possible, endeavor to explain the modus operandi, concerning a one week trip to the cities visited, once each month during the concert season. In all five trips, aside from the long trip of three or four weeks, beginning in April.

To begin with I would remark that there is no haphazard business. Nothing left to chance. On the contrary there is a perfectly arranged system even to the minutest detail. The charge of this department is one of the many responsible and ardous duties that constantly rest upon the young shoulders of the very quiet appearing and unassuming gentleman but remarkably versatile and sagacious manager, Mr. Charles A. Ellis, who is aided in his labors by Mr. Fred A. Comee, his able and efficient assistant manager, whose duties are manifold, one of his essential ones being that of road manager, and to superintend the whole business of the trips.

The duties thus devolving upon Mr. Comee are often of an extremely arduous and perplexing nature. But Fred is fully alive and equal to any emergency and faithfully carries the business through in a thoroughly impartial manner.

Now, for instance, there are 87 men to make a trip of one week. Each and every one is to be cared for, and, as the writer can testify, they are exceedingly well cared for. Excellent hotels, at times the very best are selected. The car accommodations are ample. Special cars are furnished for the exclusive use of the "boys." No strangers can enter them. Two cars, a passenger and a smoker, for day travel. For night, three sleeping coaches. No tickets are at all handled by the men. For a night ride an envelope is furnished by Mr. Comee at the hall, handed to one or two mates, who usually pair together. This envelope contains two checks with as usual, number of section, upper and lower berth, and marked car 1, 2, 3. as the case may be. The question of upper or lower berth to be decided between the pair. You can go to bed as soon as you like, or if you wish to you can sit up all night. The sleepers are ready to go into, as soon as you reach the station, after the concert, and for the time the cars belong exclusively to the "boys." Can the Raymond excursionists fare better?

With the orchestra there goes also over 100 pieces of baggage. These consist chiefly of the instruments, music stands and music trunks. A few pieces go to the hotel. As there must be no delay in baggage transfer to and from, the transfer arrangements are at every place previously understood. The care of this department is a very responsible charge. Here is another query often asked the writer. Are the members of the orchestra always on hand punctually? Yes, barring illness, every man is, at all times, at concert, at rehearsal, at cars, boat, everywhere invariably and punctually. The fact that 87 men can be on a trip for a week, visiting the liveliest cities in the country, and not a man, but is and has ever without fail been punctually and in good form at his post of duty, ought to satisfy the minds of some, that, that musicians can be honorable gentlemen, possessing moral tendencies of high average, and are faithful servants as well. Pardon the sentiment. It is on the part of the writer but a simple act of justice and fairness to his colleagues. Again it is asked, how do you always know the hour of leaving by train? The day and hour of rehearsals? etc. It is this way.

Before leaving Boston, each one is furnished with a neatly prepared and printed document, which reads for instance, March itinerary.

To sum it all up. Your sleeping car is ready. Your room at the hotel is ready upon arrival. Your trunk will be at your room by the time you will need it. A lunch is served aboard the train, if riding at the regular meal hour. Your instrument is at the hall, you have only to take up your instrument at the concert, watch carefully, very, very carefully, the great conductor, and pay close attention, very, very close attention to your business. If one wishes anything more comfortably arranged, he should at once join a circus company. Before closing I desire to speak of one, who although not seen in the ranks of a performer, yet is a good musician. I refer to one who commands and enjoys the respect of every member of the orchestra. A veritable prince of good fellows, Mr. Johann Sauerquell, the first syllable of whose name is by no means an indicator of his character. He is the librarian, and a very responsible duty it is too. Suppose for instance that a prominent instrumental part when about to be played from was missing. Oh my! But it never is, Herr Sauerquell's system is in perfect keeping with that of the other departments. It is a part of his duties also to set and prepare the stage for concerts and rehearsals. And so efficiently is it done, that it is very seldom that a chair or stand is even handled by any performer. Now it is of much importance that every performer should occupy the same relative positions as in Music Hall at a concert.

A rather difficult task in some cases to accomplish, as stages in different halls are apt to differ in size and construction. But the genius of our friend is equal to any emergency. I really believe that he could and would arrange everything conveniently and satisfactorily for 87 men, if the same were obliged to give a grand concert in a balloon. He never "gets left."

As with the Symphony Orchestra on its travels, so it is everywhere, and at all times. The same careful attention is everywhere paid to every minute detail. A most perfect system is therefore the result. The whole however has been obtained only through long years of experience, coupled with hard labor on the part of its persevering manager, and his carefully selected, faithful and courteous officials in all departments.

No expense has been or is spared to make this grand organization what it now is.

An honor to its liberal spirited founder. The pride of a great metropolis, and a rich blessing to all true lovers of music. Well may the musical public of Boston and its vicinity echo the words of the immortal poet, in regard to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

> "I am beholden to you for your sweet music;
> My ears were never better fed with such delightful, pleasing sounds."

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, APR. 4, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Saturday night's Symphony programme was one of rare excellence, beginning with Mendelssohn's beautiful Scotch symphony in A minor, which received an excellent interpretation at the hands of Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra, and ending with the grand music of "Wotan's Farewell" and "The Charm," from Wagner's "Die Walkuere." Mr. Heinrich Meyer, the well-known bass, gave these two numbers in an artistic manner, although his voice, which is full and rich and used according to the best method, was not fully equal to the demands made by the brilliant orchestration of Wagner's masterpiece.

Volkmann's serenade for string orchestra, in F major, was not interesting, save in the fact that a first hearing of any composition must possess a certain charm; yet there were some pleasing effects in each part, and the third movement possessed decided beauty. However, it served to bring out all the best points of the orchestra.

The Mozart andante and allegro for flute and harp was exquisite, the occasional orchestral portions serving to set forth more clearly the beauties of the two solo instruments played by Mr. Charles Mole and Heinrich Schuecker. Next week's programme will be wholly orchestral, consisting of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, a ballade for orchestra; "The Mermaid," by Edmond de Mihalovich (first time), and J. H. Paine's symphony No. 2, in A major, "In the Spring."

THE · PRESTO ·

MARCH 31, 1892

I am anticipating a treat when the Henschels come. All reports that reach me state that their recitals are as beautiful and artistic as ever. It is alone worth the price of admission to hear Georg Henschel play accompaniments. Our budding pianists can learn (if they will) very much from this portion of a Henschel recital.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 3, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTIETH CONCERT.

The programme of the twentieth Symphony concert in Music hall, Saturday evening, March 26, was:

Brahms.	Tragic Overture.
Gluck.	Aria from "Orpheus."
Gluck.	Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien Tanz, from "Orpheus."
	Songs with Piano.
a) Schubert.	"Liebesbotschaft."
b) Schumann.	"Schoene Wiege meiner Leiden."
c) Schubert.	"Erlkoenig."
Beethoven.	Symphony No. 8, in F major. Allegro vivace e con brio.—Allegretto scherzando.—Tempo di minuetto.—Allegro vivace.

Soloist: Mme. Amalie Joachim.

The overture is one of Brahms's long-winded compositions, solidly but not over-richly orchestrated. It is elaborated on a dry theme, though not entirely uninteresting to the student of music. That it is interesting as music to a promiscuous audience, is somewhat doubtful. The orchestra did not at all times seem at its best, which caused the nervous movements of the conductor to multiply.

Apropos of the movements of a conductor's baton, the advice one of the best conductors of Germany, Dr. Julius Rietz, once gave to his class at the Leipsic Conservatory of Music is recalled: "Young men, this baton (holding it up) is useful only when properly used. In the hands of some, it is an intelligent object, conveying time, expression, and phrasing of the music to all the members of the orchestra; but in the hands of others, it becomes confusing and embarrassing in the extreme. It should be used sparingly, without ostentatious display, and only to mark the time, expression and phrasing of the music, which can be done with very slight motions. Remember, you are not handling a gun, drum-sticks, or an Indian club, and the less display the better."

The extra motions Conductor Nikisch imparted to his body and baton in commencing the overture were, to us, perfectly sensational and useless. One stroke, in a direct line down, would have answered the purpose just as well, expressed more decision, and attracted more attention to the music from both orchestra and audience. After the tragic event in the overture of brass, wood-wind and drums, conveying the death of somebody or something by their intense noise, a very pleasant little funeral chant is introduced, the music of which was truly delightful, because it furnished such a relief from former excitement of the tragic events. However, through all the din and struggles of the various instruments, nobody was apparently hurt, and the overture closed calmly.

Thirty years ago, Madame Joachim was a famous singer at Berlin; indeed, was considered the finest in Germany. She is yet a great artiste, but her voice is not what it once was. There are some reminders of the past worth preserving, worth looking at, and worth hearing, if they happen to be animate ones. Madame Joachim, notwithstanding her long service, is yet good for another decade. We will not enter into a close criticism of her vocal efforts, but simply say that she seemingly carried away all the honors of the evening. If hearty, spontaneous applause gives pleasure to artists, she ought to be more than satisfied, for she was many times called back to acknowledge marks of appreciation. Mme. Joachim is a fine, noble, queenly appearing woman, and was elegantly attired in a white gown. The Schubert songs were most artistically rendered, showing her art to perfection; while the accompaniments by Mr. Nikisch on the piano were admirable.

~~The symphony~~, one of the pleasantest of Beethoven's, was, for the most part, well read and played, affording great satisfaction to all those who remained to hear it to the end.

We have been looking for great improvement in the orchestra, on account of the increased rehearsals said to have taken place recently, but so far, there are no signs of any having taken place.

JAMES M. TRACY.

LAST EVENING'S SYMPHONY.

The programme last evening of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music hall was: Mendelssohn, "Scotch Symphony"; Mozart, concerto for flute and harp; Volkmann, serenade for strings; Wagner, Wotan's farewell and the fire charm from "Die Wolküre."

THE HENSCHEL RECITALS.

Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel gave the first two of their series of four vocal recitals in the Meionaon, under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis, last Tuesday evening and Thursday afternoon. Their work is well known in Boston, and to say that it is greatly admired is faint praise. Their programmes are unique and as enjoyable as unique. In ballads and leider especially do they excel, and to all of their varied répertoire do they bring exquisite taste, the perfection of vocal execution, and a musical instinct whose influence is both inspiring and fascinating.

The third recital will be given next Tuesday afternoon at 2.30, and the fourth next Saturday afternoon at 2.30. Tickets are on sale at Music hall.

Tuesday's programme is:

Duet from "Giulio Cesare"..............Handel
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Song of the Harem-keeper from "Il Seraglio"..............Mozart
Aria from "Orfeo"..............Haydn
[illegible]..............Beethoven
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's Song,
[illegible] Wasser zu singen" } ....Schubert
Mrs. Henschel.
Ballad, "Die Löwenbraut"..............Schumann
Ballad, "The Erl-king"..............Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
"Le Soir"..............Ambroise Thomas
Air from "Samson et Dalila"..............Saint-Saëns
"Vieille Chanson"..............Bizet
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet, "Oh that we two were Maying!" (MS.)..............Henschel
(By request)
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
"Der Asra," } Persisches Lied, } ....Rubinstein
Song from the "Magellone"..............Brahms
Mr. Henschel.
Ballad, "There was an Ancient King" } Four, "Lieder im Volkston," } ..Henschel
Mrs. Henschel.
Duetto Buffo from "Don Pasquale"...Donizetti
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

Saturday's programme is:

Two duets { From "Joseph"..............Méhul
From "Richard Cœur de Lion"..............Grétry }
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
"If thou thy Heart bestowest"......Giovannini
"Le Portrait"..............Pacini
"La Charmante Marguerite"......(Old French)
Mrs. Henschel.
Ballad, "Belsatzar"..............Schumann
Ballad, "Die Vätergruft"..............Liszt
Mr. Henschel.
Schlummerlied from the "Magellone," } "Des Mädchen's Fluch," } .....Brahms
Mrs. Henschel.
Ballad, "Archibald Douglas"..............Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
Two duets..............Saint-Saëns
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
"Dov' è la Lorella?"..............Henschel
"The Little Red Lark"..............(Old Irish)
May Song..............A. Hervey
Mrs. Henschel.
Ballad, "Jung Dieterich"..............Henschel
Ballad, "The Grenadiers"..............Schumann
Mr. Henschel.
Duet, "Gondoliera"..............Henschel
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

The last concert of the Kneisel quartette will be given tomorrow evening in Union hall. Messrs. Ernst Perabo, Otto Novacek and Leo Schulz will assist. The programme is as follows: Brahms's sextette in G major; sonata for pianoforte and 'cello, Beethoven; quartette, E minor, op. 59, Beethoven.

Mr. Eugen D'Albert will give three pianoforte recitals in Music hall, Monday afternoon, April 18; Thursday afternoon, April 21; Saturday afternoon, April 23. The first recital will be devoted to works of Beethoven, and the programme will include thirty-two variations, C minor; sonata, op. 53; sonata, op. 90; sonata, op. 109; sonata, op. 110.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 3, 1892.

TWENTY-FIRST SYMPHONY.

Mendelssohn, Mozart, Volkmann and Wagner Pleasingly Interpreted.

The symphony concert season is nearing its close, but three more concerts of the series remaining to be given. The offerings yesterday consisted of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, the andante and allegro from Mozart's concerto for flute and harp, Volkmann's serenade of string orchestra, and "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm" from "Die Walkuere."

Mendelssohn's familiar and always welcome symphony was particularly well played by the orchestra, and extremely cordial were the plaudits which rewarded its performance.

The concerto for flute and harp gave opportunities for hearing two of the most popular soloists of Mr. Nikisch's band, Charles Mole, flute, and H. Schuecker, harp. Each received a warm welcome and at the close of their performance were repeatedly recalled. Mr. Mole's exquisite tones and perfect technique gave a charm to Volkmann's splendid concerto that previous performances of the work here, excellent as they were, had not made manifest. Of Mr. Schuecker's harp playing only words of highest praise are to be said. The graceful passages in which the concerto abounds were played with exceeding delicacy, finish and expression. The accompaniment was finely and sympathetically played by the orchestra.

The Volkmann serenade was played for the first time by the Boston Symphony orchestra. It was given a magnificent performance, but failed to make a particularly favorable impression upon the audience. Although a scholarly composition there is a deal of sameness in it which is apt to become wearisome before the ending. Of the four movements the waltz is rather the most pleasing.

Mr. Heinrich Meyer was the vocal soloist in the scenes from "Die Walkuere." Mr. Heinrich is undoubtedly an able artist, and his voice is one which is usually heard with pleasure. Unfortunately very little of his singing was heard yesterday. The thunderous tones of the brasses, basses and drums, which Wagner so delighted in, were too much for his moderately strong voice. He sang with a good deal of expression, however, and received kindly recognition from the audience.

The programme announced for the next concert is as follows:

Goldmark..............Overture, "Sakuntala"
Edmond de Mihalovich..............
Ballade for Orchestra, "The Mermaid"
(First time.)
J. K. Paine..............
Symphony No. 2, in A major, "In the Spring."

The third recital by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will be given in the Meionaon, Tuesday afternoon, at 2.30 o'clock. The fourth and last concert is assigned for Saturday afternoon.

Mr. Eugen D'Albert will give three pianoforte recitals in Music Hall, Monday afternoon, April 18; Thursday afternoon, April 21; Saturday afternoon, April 23. The first recital will be devoted to works of Beethoven.

—"Bravo Paderewski" was the cry that came from every part of the Metropolitan Opera House, last Sunday night, as the Polish virtuoso ended the third movement of his concerto, and "Bravissimo Paderewski!" was the cry, and, when he took Herr Nikisch by the hand and pulled him forward to share in the honors, the applause redoubled. Paderewski then turned toward Mr. Higginson's orchestra and kissed his hand several times to show his appreciation of their superb accompaniment. By this good deed of Paderewski and the symphony orchestra, $4275 goes into the Washington Arch Fund complete. Mr. Higginson sent the orchestra on free, even paying all the hotel and travelling expenses of its 85 members, and Steinway & Sons shouldered the rent of the hall, the printing and the other local expenses.

—Mr. Nikisch's desk was covered with an American flag and draped with the Polish standard at the great concert in New York, Sunday night, and all the orchestral desks were decorated with the Polish colors, red and white. Mr. Nikisch was called out after the ending of the "Tannhauser" overture and presented with a laurel wreath, as was Paderewski at the close of the Schumann concert.

—The Henschels had a warm welcome at their first recital Tuesday night, every seat in the cosy Meionaon being filled with an extremely fashionable company. Mrs. Henschel looks as young and her exquisite voice is as fresh as when first she sung in Boston. She was most richly and becomingly gowned in white satin, gold embroidered, and wore a few fine diamonds. Several large bouquets of roses were passed up to her and one of Mrs. Gardner's big bunches of Russian violets—although the donor was not present. Mr. Henschel was in superb voice and had an equally enthusiastic reception. In the audience were Mr. and Mrs. Augustus Hemenway, Mrs. C. H. Minot, with Mr. and Mrs. J. Grafton Minot; Mr. and Mrs. Hugh Allan, Mr. and Mrs. F. L. Amory, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote; Mrs. B. J. Lang, who had with her Mrs. Seabury Ford; Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Beebe, Mr. Frank Jackson, Mr. and Mrs. R. M. Morse and daughter, Mrs. Oscar Iasigi, Dr. Hamilton Osgood and his daughter, Mrs. Fiske Warren, Mrs. John Lowell, Dr. and Mrs. Wadsworth, Mr. Pierson Beebe, Mrs. Whitman, Mr. Lothrop Thorndike, Mrs. C. R. Hayden, Miss Alger, Miss Beebe, Mrs. H. M. Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Dupee, Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Parker, Miss Sarah Andrews, Miss Ames, Mr. and Mrs. Elliot Pratt, Mrs. Wyman, Sig. and Signora Rotoli, Mrs. S. B. Field, Miss Alice C. Ward, Miss Josephine Jenkins and Mr. John S. Dwight.

—The first Henschel matinee drew another very fashionable company to the Meionaon Thursday afternoon. Mrs. Henschel was very charming in a pale green gown with white lace garniture. Mr. and Mrs. D. H. Coolidge, Jr., Mr. Francis Bartlett, Mr. Josiah Bradlee and daughter, Mrs. Lowell and her daughter, Mrs. Aspinwall, Miss Linzee, Miss Elsie Perkins, Mr. Edward Jackson, Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Dupee, Mr. and Mrs. Elliot Pratt, Mrs. Robert C. Hooper and Miss Belle Hooper, Mr. Arthur and Mr. Pierson Beebe, Mrs. B. J. Lang, Mrs. C. R. Hayden, Mrs. Sidney Williams and Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Hubbard were in the large audience. The Henschel recital in New York yesterday attracted a great company to Chickering Hall. Mr. Ellis, their manager, went over with them.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING APRIL , 1892.

PRAISE AND BLAME

BOTH DESERVED BY THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony Excellently Given, but the Performance of the Wagnerian Number Was Extremely Poor and Misleading to Those Who do not Know Wagner's Ideal.

Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony is one of the most popular of the works in this form, and is undoubtedly the best of the four great symphonies of the master. Its performance on Saturday was a notable one, and both conductor and orchestra can be unreservedly praised. The first movement shows how Mendelssohn was impressed by the forbidding scenery of the north, and the deep clarinette notes (the so-called "chalumeau register") have just the right tone-color to portray this dark and awe-inspiring effect. The coda of this movement is, however, a slight blemish, and does not seem a logical sequence of the preceding matter. The scherzo is daintiness personified, its themes are full of character, and their treatment is throughout masterly. Mendelssohn is the only one of the German composers who was able to attain the Scotch style in his musical work. Beethoven, Schumann, Bruch, Franz and a host of others have attempted the vein, and have failed to produce anything that could be called really characteristic of Scotland; Mendelssohn has, however, here given a movement which Hamish MacCunn or any other Scotch composer could not excel in the matter of national character—it is Scotch as a Haggis. All through the symphony Mendelssohn shows a great fondness for the woodwind, and in the finale the bassoon and clarinette have some very important phrases to give; the playing of these instruments was especially good in this performance, and as already intimated, the entire work was a success.

Two movements of Mozart's concerto for harp and flute followed, and Messrs. Schuecker and Molé won a triumph in a work that is by no means an inspiring one. Of their playing only the highest praise can be spoken, but of the composition not so much can be said. It was only piece d'occasion in the first place, and Mozart was never much inspired by the flute, and in fact used it less than any other of the great masters. It must be remembered also that both harp and flute have undergone radical changes since Mozart's day, the double-action harp coming in through Erard in 1810, and the Boehm flute in 1834. At the time that this concerto was composed there existed only Simon's single-action pedal harp and the old keyed flute, neither of which could modulate freely. The result of this was heard in the very few modulations used in the work, and in the fact that the harp player had scarcely to use the pedals at all. Spite of such a handicap the work was carried to success by the brilliant performance of the artists. The cadenza in the last movement was a grand display of virtuosity, and in every measure there was not only surety of execution, but beauty of tone and delicacy of shading. Of course the gifted pair were recalled with enthusiasm after the performance.

Volkmann's serenade for string orchestra demonstrated that the art of shading is not yet lost in our great musical organization. The first movement had not much to say for itself, but the second was delicate in the extreme, and the pizzicati on the deeper strings were in excellent balance against the dainty bowings of the violins. The waltz (spite of the rhapsodies of Eugene Field) is but a musical bonbon such as Delibes could have written ad infinitum. But the whole serenade was well played. I wish that the eulogy of the performance could continue to the end, but the performance of the Wagnerian number was as poor as the preceding numbers had been excellent. The artistic baritone, Heinrich Meyn, has not the herculean voice to cope with the measures of Wotan's "Farewell," and at times he was almost obliterated by the orchestra. The fire motive was given in a coarse and heavy manner, and very many of the leit motiven vanished altogether in the hurly-burly. This number has been performed in Boston in vastly superior style before this. It is doubly a pity to give it poorly, for the public have come to imagine that Wagner loved noise and deafening racket, and such a coarse performance only confirms them in their error. In half a dozen Beyreuth performances I have not heard a tumult such as that of this interpretation. In the performance of such a work no amount of enthusiasm on the part of conductor or of orchestra can suffice to atone for a lack of the most careful drilling; there must be the most perfect balance or many of the sub-themes will be drowned out, and such a rough performance of music so pregnant with meaning will cause those who do not know the ideal the composer aimed at to imagine that Wagner was only a sort of musical ogre who dwelt in a palace of fortissimo dissonances.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, APRIL 4, 1892.

CAUSERIE.

The Symphony Concert of Last Saturday Evening.

The Story of the Origin of a Mozart Concerto.

The Thoughts of Walt Whitman Concerning Music.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert, which was given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in A minor. "Scotch"....Mendelssohn
Andante and Allegro from concerto for flute and harp ... Mozart
Serenade for string orchestra, in F major.......Volkmann
"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm" from "Die Walkure"....................Wagner

The solo parts were taken by Mr. Heinrich Meyn, baritone; Mr. Charles Mole, flute, and Mr. Heinrich Schuecker, harp.

⁂

It was a pleasure to find the symphony in its proper place, at the beginning of the programme and not at the end. The programme was too long, however, and the Volkmann Serenade might have been omitted, for, with the exception of the waltz movement, it is dull and commonplace. The dryness of the serenade enhanced the effect of the gorgeous instrumentation of the Wagner excerpt which followed. There is no doubt that the concert, as a whole, was thoroughly enjoyed by the audience, for the applause at the end of the symphony, after the Mozart selection, and after the final number, was hearty and long continued. The "Scotch" symphony, as well as the "Italian," is always relished by concert-goers. They know the tunes. They have the utmost confidence in the composer. When a work is played for the first time they are obliged to exert the faculties of perception and judgment. Amusement is turned into a task. An unexpected modulation, a strange instrumental effect, or a veiled melody may affect the process of calm digestion. Ferdinand Hiller recognizes this fact in his entertaining essay, "Too Much Music," and he speaks of the natural curiosity of the musician to hear constantly that which is new as opposed to the wish of the public at large to take enjoyment "easily and conveniently." Nor is the average concert-goer seriously disturbed by an extravagance or an exaggeration in the reading. He does not question, as a rule, the pace set by the conductor, and he is not inclined to be criticised in matters of detail. It is enough that he greets an old friend. The costume may follow the present fashion, or the coat and trousers and cravat may be of somewhat antiquated cut and style; the features of the friend are the same, the voice is not changed. And when he hears again the old, familiar story that pleased him he does not complain if the incidents are varied, he is not shocked by a stray solecism or a touch of slang. The point of the story is the same, and he is satisfied. Nor does he understand why others are so precise and exact, and refuse to join in the merriment, and even shake the head.

⁂

The movements from Mozart's concerto for flute and harp are perhaps more interesting on account of the history of the composition than from any great intrinsic merit. When Mozart made his second visit to Paris he was introduced by Grimm to the Duke de Guines. The Duke was an accomplished courtier. He gave much attention to his coiffure and his clothes, that is, if Mrs. de Genlis's malicious sketch was founded on fact. He had a mocking wit, and he was a brilliant flute player. His daughter played the harp with unusual skill. Mozart was asked to write a concerto for the purpose of this family display. Now the two instruments that Mozart detested, according to the testimony of Joseph Frank, were the flute and the harp. He wrote the concerto, however, and gave the girl a two-hour lesson daily in composition. This was the father's wish, and he told Mozart that he would be happy if she could write sonatas for flute and harp: he did not expect her to make operas or airs, or symphonies. Unfortunately the girl had no musical ideas, and the teacher could not put them in her head: furthermore it turned out that she was stupid and lazy in her exercises. The father was Ambassador to Prussia and to England. The daughter met a more tragic fate. She married the Duke de Castries and died in childbed.

⁂

The concerto in question is amiable music. It soothes for a time, and it might be of medicinal influence in certain cases of nerve disorders. But its very tranquillity becomes irritating. [It will be remembered that Saul was at first kindly disposed toward David, and he listened to his performance on the harp; afterward he sought to slay him.] Last Saturday evening Mr. Schuecker's instrument was tuneful through the first movement, and no one knew this better than the accomplished player. An opportunity was given him for proper tuning, and the second movement was played delightfully. Mr. Mole displayed his accustomed beauty of tone and technical skill.

⁂

Ferdinand Praeger in "Wagner as I knew him," describing certain inconsistencies of the great maker of music dramas, writes as follows: "Whilst vehemently protesting the inseparability of his music from its related stage representation and scenic accessories, compelled by fate, he traversed Europe from London to St. Petersburg to produce in the concert room orchestral excerpts from the very works upon whose inviolability he had in such unequivocal terms insisted." Such contradictions between a man's theories and practices however do not affect the real value of his work. But from the Wagnerian point of view, it is a mistake to put these excerpts on the concert stage. The devoted disciples of Wagner accept, without doubt, this statement of Maurice Kufferath: "The aim of Richard Wagner is neither poetry nor music, as these terms are generally understood. His only aim is the drama itself. It is not necessary then to ask, 'Shall I hear beautiful melodies,' or 'Shall I hear beautiful verses?' It is necessary to say, 'I shall be present at the performance of a drama; shall I be moved?'"

⁂

When the excerpt is heard in the concert hall the drama disappears: the music alone remains. The music for a particular dramatic situation is then turned into absolute, untrammeled music. Wotan is a singer in evening dress. The different themes are without dramatic significance. We have an amorphous musical composition, in which the human voice is introduced as an orchestral instrument. The brilliancy of the instrumentation and the boisterous performance excited the admiration of the audience of Saturday evening. Mr. Meyn struggled heroically with a thankless and unvocal task. His earnestness and his sincerity were such that he declaimed vigorously in certain passages where more experienced Wagnerian declaimers, realizing the vanity of an attempt to be heard in such an orchestral storm, content themselves wisely with pantomimic display.

2]

Walt Whitman was passionately fond of music. The allusions in his writings to opera, song and orchestra are many, and they are often singular. First of all, he commands the respect of musicians for his definition of music. It is found in the first edition, that thin quarto of 1855, now rare:

"All music is what awakens from you when you are reminded by the instruments,
It is not the violins and the cornets, it is not the oboe nor the beating drums—nor the notes of the baritone singer singing his sweet romanza, nor those of the men's chorus, nor those of the women's chorus,
It is nearer and farther than they."

⁂

In "Good-bye, my Fancy," he speaks of the deep and lasting effect made upon him by Alboni, the famous contralto, and by Bettini, the tenor, years ago in New York. He also mentions the drunken song of Peter Richings as Caliban; the "non-technical singing performances" of the Hutchinson Band, "three brothers and the sister, the red-cheeked New England carnation, sweet Abby; sometimes plaintive and balladic—sometimes anti-slavery, anti-calomel and comic." Then he speaks of Templeton, Russell, Dempster, Jenny Lind, Mrs. Wood, Mrs. Seguin, Mrs. Austin, Grisi, La Grange, Steffanone, Bosio, Truffi, Parodi, Vestvali, Bertucca, Gazzaniga, Laborde; and "the opera men," Bettini, Badiali, Marini, Mario, Amodio, Beneventano, Brignoli. "I was fed and bred under the Italian dispensation, and absorbed it, and doubtless show it." But he also says, "The experts and musicians of my present friends claim that the new Wagner and his pieces belong far more truly to me, and I to them." His love for Italian opera is clearly shown in "Proud Music of the Storm," where he gives thumb-nail sketches of six favorite operas. Here, for example, is "Ernani" in a nutshell:

"I see where Ernani, walking the bridal garden,
Amid the scent of night roses, radiant, holding his bride by the hand, Hears the infernal call, the death-pledge of the horn."

⁂

It would be interesting to trace his musical thoughts and fancies from the book of '55 to that of '91. His comparisons are often subtle and suggestive, although they are couched in singular, sometimes grotesque, language. I quote now from the quarto:

"I hear the violoncello or man's heart's complaint."

Here are two more instances:

"A tenor large and fresh as the creation fills me. The orbic flex of his mouth is pouring and filling me full."

The next is still more extraordinary.

"The orchestra whirls me
wider than Uranus flies,
It wrenches unnamable ardors from my breast,
It throbs me to gulps of the farthest-down horror,
It sails me, I dab with bare feet, they are licked by the indolent waves,
I am exposed, cut by bitter and poisoned hail,
Steeped amid honeyed morphine, my windpipe squeezed in the fakes of death,
Let up again to feel the puzzle of puzzles,
And that we call Being."

⁂

Whitman, too, longed for a national school of music. In "Democratic Vistas" he utters this prophecy:

"A few years, and there will be an appropriate native grand opera, the lusty and wide-lipped offspring of Italian methods. Yet it will be no mere imitation, nor follow precedents, any more than Nature follows precedents. Vast oval halls will be constructed, on acoustic principles, in cities, where companies of musicians will perform lyrical pieces, born to the people of These States; and the people will make perfect music a part of their lives. Every phase, every trade will have its songs, beautifying those trades. Men on the land will have theirs, and men on the water theirs. Who now is ready to begin that work for America of composing music fit for us—songs, choruses, symphonies, operas, oratorios, fully identified with the body and soul of The States? music complete in all its appointments, but in some fresh, courageous, melodious, undeniable styles—as all that is ever to permanently satisfy us must be. The composers to make such music are to learn everything that can be possibly learned in the schools and traditions of their art, and then calmly dismiss all traditions from them."

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING APRIL 5, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

Boston has long since earned the supremacy in orchestral matters in America, but her title to the rank of being the musical metropolis of America does not rest upon this alone, for in chorus clubs, in oratorio performances and in the piano recitals of resident artists, she has equally asserted her right to the first rank. In operatic matters we dare not claim so much, for in this field we gladly accept whatever New York vouchsafes to us; but there is one crucial test of the taste for classical music the world over, and that is the appreciation of the string quartette, and in just this pure field our city has shown a taste and discrimination that promises well for the future of classical music in our midst. Where the string quartette flourishes the symphony and other classical forms are sure to find proper welcome. Years ago this city began this branch of music with the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, and since that time the Euterpe and the Boston Chamber Music Society kept the flame alive; but now we need no especial societies to protect this pure school, for such artists as Prof. Baermann and such organizations as the Kneisel Quartette have appealed directly to the public with chamber music, and have found a ready response. It is surely unnecessary to speak of what the Kneisel Quartette has done in past seasons to build up a taste for the purest and best in chamber music; it is sufficient to state that they have won the very first rank in this school, and that they have never descended from the high standard which they established in their very first season. Last night's concert was a postponed one (the club is always sure to do a little postponing in its season) and was not the very best example the quartette has given of its work. The warm atmosphere of the hall was depressing alike to performers and public, and something of spirit was lacking on the one part and enthusiasm on the other. Brahms' sextette (with Messrs. Novacek and Schulz in the added parts) seemed artificial and prolix, although the development of the first movement proved that this composer is the greatest living master in thematic treatment; bold modulations and contrapuntal skill were there, but a phlegmatic arrangement of material also, and when Mr. Kneisel broke a string and (imitation being the sincerest flattery) Mr. Novacek followed suit and two unexpected waits arose, Brahms seemed just a trifle more extended than was pleasant.

Beethoven's Piano and Cello Sonata is not his most inspired work; it contains far more of repetition than any of his other sonatas, but the really excellent playing of Messrs. Peraho and Schraeder saved it from anything like monotony. The shading was most artistic, and the ensemble perfect; both artists deserved the hearty recall they received. With a good performance of Beethoven's Quartette in E minor the concert and the series ended.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 4, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony Concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 3, in A minor ("Scotch").
Mozart: Andante and Allegro from concerto for flute and harp.
Volkman: Serenade for string orchestra, in F major.
Wagner: "Wotans Abschied" and "Feuerzauber," from "Die Walküre."

Mr. Heinrich Meyn was the singer, Mr. Charles Molé the flutist, and Mr. Heinrich Schuecker the harpist.

It is not unlikely that Mendelssohn knew the old story of the monk who summoned a familiar of the devil to fetch him some ale, and found that the forthcoming supply of ale so far exceeded his personal demand that it ended by drowning him. But, if Mendelssohn did know it, he probably did not think of applying its moral to himself. He, as a "romantic" composer, player and conductor, asked for a certain elasticity of rhythm in the performance of his own and other people's music; for an intelligent and sympathetic reading of the composer's intention between the lines, as it were; nothing was more irksome to him than a metronome. We believe that he even did not care to take the usual indications of tempo—such as Andante, Allegro, etc.—too much au pied de la lettre, but liked, even in this matter, to have a certain freedom allowed. His discussion with Berlioz about metronome marks is tolerably well known. Yet it is out of all likelihood that he would have advocated a complete disregard for a composer's expressed wishes; and it is toward this fashion that the performing musical world of today seems tending with ever increasing speed. Take, for instance, Mr. Nikisch's conducting of the "Scotch" symphony. On the fly leaf of the score stands the following direction to the conductor: "The separate movements of this symphony must follow, one after the other, immediately, and not be separated by the usual longish interruptions." Mr. Nikisch made the usual longish waits between the movements, quite in the usual way; just as he would have done in any other symphony. The first movement is marked "Allegro un poco agitato; Mr. Nikisch began it so slow as to make all "agitato" out of the question, and even to leave one in doubt as to its being "allegro" at all. The second movement is marked "Vivace non troppo;" if Mr. Nikisch thinks the rattling tempo at which he took it "not too lively," one asks in dismay what rate of speed he would consider "too lively"? The peroration of the finale is marked "Allegro maestoso assai, the dotted quarter-note=104;" Mr. Nikisch took the dotted quarter at 86. Now this seems to us bringing on ale with a vengeance! almost, if not quite, enough to drown the good Mendelssohn. Add to this that our excellent conductor seems to have a deeply rooted objection to a piano cantilena on the violins; so soon as it comes to a melodic phrase on the violins, he seems to have no shades on his palette between a murmuring pianissimo and a frank, outspoken forte; a bit of cantilena, played simply piano on the strings, seems not to exist for him. Of course he can reply to this criticism by pointing to the invariably strong effectiveness of his rendering of the "Scotch" symphony; it was undoubtedly an enormously effective piece of playing throughout, as effective a performance of the work as we can remember ever to have heard. But a reply of this sort is no satisfactory answer. In the matter of musical performance, the proof of the pudding is not wholly in the eating; to make music sound well is doubtless no mean achievenent; but, in the case of works of the character and calibre of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, it is a still higher achievement to make the music sound right. And we insist upon our criticism with all the more emphasis, because, although Mr. Nikisch's prevailing tendency to put a good deal of himself into his performances is, after all, essentially Mendelssohnian, we are thoroughly persuaded that the excess to which he inclines to push this tendency, his frequent running freedom of interpretation into the ground, is the most un-Mendelssohnian thing in the world; of all the composers of the post-Beethoven period, Mendelssohn is just the one who should be most jealously guarded against it. We can, however, say heartily that, apart from the restrictions we have made, the performance of the symphony was wonderfully fine, vital and exciting. As a piece of playing, it was magnificent.

Of the two movements given from Mozart's flute and harp concerto, the Andante seems to us exceedingly beautiful, and the Allegro rather commonplace and unworthy of the composer. The performance by Messrs. Molé and Schuecker would have been utterly masterly but for one unlucky circumstance—both the flute and the harp were well out of tune with the orchestra. Truly musical enjoyment was possible only in the cadenzas, where the orchestra was silent. Perhaps "unlucky" is rather a mild term for this accident; we know that extremes of temperature affect string and wind instruments very differently, and the Music Hall was hotter than Tophet last Saturday evening; but no state of the atmosphere should make it impossible for an artist to put his instrument into what tune he pleases, and if it is out of tune the fault is presumably his.

The (new?) Volkmann serenade has more life and fluency of musical invention—in its second and third movements, at least—than anything of his that we have yet heard; here the composer evidently had, what was almost as great a rarity with him as bread and coal during his unhappy life, an inspiration. The first movement does little more than catch the attention, and the fourth is trivial enough; but the two middle movements are full of charm and grace, and show conspicuous cleverness in construction. The whole serenade was admirably played by the strings.

It was good to hear some thoroughly Wagnerish Wagner once more. We would by no means be understood to complain of the comparative infrequency of his name on the programmes of late, for but few of his works are properly in place at a symphony concert, and one cannot keep giving these few over and over again. Still, when anything particularly good and characteristic by him does come our way, we cannot but rejoice; it is inspiring to feel the stroke of his lion's paw from time to time. There are not many finer nor more Titanic pages in his works than Wotan's "Farewell" and the wonderful "Feuerzauber." What a wealth of tragic power, of all-subduing anguish of soul, there is in that "Farewell" to Brünhilde! What a delicacy of expressive beauty in the closing lullaby! Here is true greatness, if ever there was. Mr. Meyn sang the scene with the profoundest sentiment and with irreproachable beauty of expression; it was finely artistic singing (or lyrical declamation, if Wagnerians prefer the term) throughout. At moments the orchestra—which, by the way, was [illegible] complete, according to the score—threatened to overpower his voice, but such moments were few, and he made himself, for the most part, perfectly well heard. He was enthusiastically recalled at the close, and never was applause better earned.

The next programme is: Goldmark, overture to "Sakuntala;" Edmond de Mihalovich, ballad for orchestra, "The Mermaid;" John K. Paine, symphony No. 2, in A major, "In the Spring."

The last two concerts of songs at the Meionaon by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will be given tomorrow and Saturday afternoons. Full programmes and tickets at the office in Music Hall. The programme for tomorrow afternoon includes duets and songs by Handel, Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Loewe, Ambroise Thomas, Saint-Saëns, Bizet, Henschel, Rubinstein, Brahms and Donizetti.

Eugen D'Albert will give concerts of pianoforte music at the Music Hall, Monday, April 18, Thursday, April 21, and Saturday, April 23, afternoons. The first programme, made up of works by Beethoven, includes 32 variations, C minor; and the sonatas, op. 53, 90, 109 and 110.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 3, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony rehearsal and concert was well designed to reveal the possibilities of the orchestra, and the virtuosity of two of its most distinguished members. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, which came first, received a remarkably fine performance. The quality of tone produced by the strings was unusually full and warm, that of the 'cellos in the adagio being notably beautiful; and the wood-wind and brass were also at their very best. The performance throughout was rich in rhythmic and color effects; in brief, the orchestra has done no more finished work during the season.

Volkmann's Serenade for Strings sounded somewhat tame and commonplace after the symphony, though it does not lack in pleasing themes and effective treatment. It is a work of slight dimensions, but its four movements possess a certain individuality of their own, and are happily contrasted. It was delightfully played.

"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkure," which was the closing number, was all the more welcome for the reason that the symphony programmes of this season have contained few selections from Wagner's works. It was given in all respects, save one, magnificently. Never before, perhaps, has the playing of our orchestra in any Wagnerian work been more delicate and finished, and freer from coarseness and noise; and this, too, at no loss of breadth and sonority. The effect was as near like that which is produced by the covered orchestra at Bayreuth as is, in all probability, possible.

With an Edouard de Reszke to sing Wotan's lines, the entire performance would have been a memorable one; but with Mr. Heinrich Meyn as the singer, it can only be remembered as an extraordinary instance of orchestral virtuosity. If Mr. Meyn's tone production in volume, purity and freedom, had been equal to the earnestness that he displayed, his effort might be set down as fairly successful. As it was, his forced and "throaty" tones and labored delivery were not conducive to pleasure; and the only part of his performance that can be praised is the seriousness of his intentions.

It remains to speak of the superb playing of Mr. Mole and Mr. Schuecker in the charming concerto by Mozart for flute and harp. The former fairly surpassed himself in beauty and variety of tone and brilliancy of execution; and such harp playing—so smooth and fluent, so delicious in quality—is seldom heard in any musical center of the world.

THE HENSCHELS.

At their first and second song recitals, given in the Meionaon last Tuesday evening and Thursday afternoon, Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel were warmly welcomed back to Boston by a host of friends, after their absence of three years. The Henschel recitals of past seasons were invariably of an enjoyable and instructive nature; and these two of the present season have proved no exception to this rule. The programmes were remarkable, as regards novelty, variety and musical worth, no less than twenty-six composers being represented; Martini, Pergolesi, Paisiello, Cimarosa, Arne, Bach, Handel, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Brahms, Loewe, Franz, Lortzing, Goetz, Boieldieu, A, Thomas, Gounod, Massenet, Tschaikowsky, Sgambati, Paderewski, Corder and Henschel.

The vocal work of Tuesday evening was in many respects fine and in some, disappointing. Mrs. Henschel seemed hardly in first rate condition. Her delivery was not infrequently labored and her voice seemed to have lost something of its former purity, sweetness and flexibility. Nevertheless, her singing was, as ever, delightful in its artistic simplicity and delicacy of sentiment and there were besides not a few indications of marked gains in breadth and in depth of feeling. Of Mr. Henschel, it may be said that, if anything, he sings better than he did when he was last heard here, his voice seeming more tractable and more musical in quality, especially in its middle register. His interpretations still stand forth as those of a musician of rare dramatic and poetic insight; while his pianoforte playing and accompanying are as wonderful and fascinating as ever. At the second recital Mrs. Henschel appeared to much better advantage. Her tones were steadier and purer, and her singing in several instances revealed a strength and dramatic fervor that at once surprised and delighted. It would be a pleasure to speak in detail of the work of these artists; but at present it is possible to allude only to Mrs. Henschel's exquisite singing in the Beethoven and Liszt settings of "Mignon's Song," Mendelssohn's "On Wings of Song," "Polly Willis," and Tschaikowsky's "Lullaby;" to Mr. Henschel's unforgetable renderings of Schubert's "Der Doppelzanger" and "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus," "Beethoven's "Crugantio's song," and Loewe's "Die verfallene Muhle;" and to the wholly enjoyable manner in which they together gave the duets from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," Boieldieu's "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village," and Schumann's "Faust."

The last concert of the Kneisel Quartet will be given tomorrow evening in Union Hall. Messrs. Ernst Perabo, Otta Novacek and Leo Schultz will assist. The programme is as follows: Brahms's sextet in G major; sonata for pianoforte and 'cello, Beethoven; quartet, E minor, op. 59, Beethoven.

The third vocal recital by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will be given in the Meionaon Tuesday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock. The programme is as follows: Duet from "Giulia Cesare," Handel; song from "Il Seraglio," Mozart; aria from "Orfoe," Haydn; Busslied, Beethoven; Mignon's song, "Auf dem Wassar zu singen," "Geheimes," Schubert; "Die Lowenbraut," Schumann; "The Erl-King," Loewe; "Le Soir," Ambroise Thomas; air from "Samson et Dalila," Saint-Saens; Vieille Chanson, Bizet; duet, "Drei Schlosser" (new), Henschel; "Der Asra," Persiches Lied, Rubinstein; song from the "Magellone," Brahms; "There was an Ancient King," four "Lieder in Volkston," Henschel; "Don Pasquale," Donizetti.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, APRIL 4, 1892.

CAUSERIE.

The Symphony Concert of Last Saturday Evening.

The Story of the Origin of a Mozart Concerto.

The Thoughts of Walt Whitman Concerning Music.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert, which was given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch"....Mendelssohn
Andante and Allegro from concerto for flute and harp ....Mozart
Serenade for string orchestra, in F major.......Volkmann
"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm" from "Die Walkure"....Wagner

The solo parts were taken by Mr. Heinrich Meyn, baritone; Mr. Charles Mole, flute, and Mr. Heinrich Schuecker, harp.

⁂

It was a pleasure to find the symphony in its proper place, at the beginning of the programme and not at the end. The programme was too long, however, and the Volkmann Serenade might have been omitted, for, with the exception of the waltz movement, it is dull and commonplace. The dryness of the serenade enhanced the effect of the gorgeous instrumentation of the Wagner excerpt which followed. There is no doubt that the concert, as a whole, was thoroughly enjoyed by the audience, for the applause at the end of the symphony, after the Mozart selection, and after the final number, was hearty and long continued. The "Scotch" symphony, as well as the "Italian," is always relished by concert-goers. They know the tunes. They have the utmost confidence in the composer. When a work is played for the first time they are obliged to exert the faculties of perception and judgment. Amusement is turned into a task. An unexpected modulation, a strange instrumental effect, or a veiled melody may affect the process of calm digestion. Ferdinand Hiller recognizes this fact in his entertaining essay, "Too Much Music," and he speaks of the natural curiosity of the musician to hear constantly that which is new as opposed to the wish of the public at large to take enjoyment "easily and conveniently." Nor is the average concert-goer seriously disturbed by an extravagance or an exaggeration in the reading. He does not question, as a rule, the pace set by the conductor, and he is not inclined to be criticised in matters of detail. It is enough that he greets an old friend. The costume may follow the present fashion, or the coat and trousers and cravat may be of somewhat antiquated cut and style; the features of the friend are the same, the voice is not changed. And when he hears again the old, familiar story that pleased him he does not complain if the incidents are varied, he is not shocked by a stray solecism or a touch of slang. The point of the story is the same, and he is satisfied. Nor does he understand why others are so precise and exact, and refuse to join in the merriment, and even shake the head.

⁂

The movements from Mozart's concerto for flute and harp are perhaps more interesting on account of the history of the composition than from any great intrinsic merit. When Mozart made his second visit to Paris he was introduced by Grimm to the Duke de Guines. The Duke was an accomplished courtier. He gave much attention to his coiffure and his clothes, that is, if Mrs. de Genlis's malicious sketch was founded on fact. He had a mocking wit, and he was a brilliant flute player. His daughter played the harp with unusual skill. Mozart was asked to write a concerto for the purpose of this family display. Now the two instruments that Mozart detested, according to the testimony of Joseph Frank, were the flute and the harp. He wrote the concerto, however, and gave the girl a two-hour lesson daily in composition. This was the father's wish, and he told Mozart that he would be happy if she could write sonatas for flute and harp; he did not expect her to make operas or airs, or symphonies. Unfortunately the girl had no musical ideas, and the teacher could not put them in her head; furthermore it turned out that she was stupid and lazy in her exercises. The father was Ambassador to Prussia and to England. The daughter met a more tragic fate. She married the Duke de Castries and died in childbed.

⁂

The concerto in question is amiable music. It soothes for a time, and it might be of medicinal influence in certain cases of nerve disorders. But its very tranquillity becomes irritating. [It will be remembered that Saul was at first kindly disposed toward David, and he listened to his performance on the harp; afterward he sought to slay him.] Last Saturday evening Mr. Schuecker's instrument was tuneful through the first movement, and no one knew this better than the accomplished player. An opportunity was given him for proper tuning, and the second movement was played delightfully. Mr. Mole displayed his accustomed beauty of tone and technical skill.

⁂

Ferdinand Praeger in "Wagner as I knew him," describing certain inconsistencies of the great maker of music dramas, writes as follows: "Whilst vehemently protesting the inseparability of his music from its related stage representation and scenic accessories, compelled by fate, he traversed Europe from London to St. Petersburg to produce in the concert room orchestral excerpts from the very works upon whose inviolability he had in such unequivocal terms insisted." Such contradictions between a man's theories and practices however do not affect the real value of his work. But from the Wagnerian point of view, it is a mistake to put these excerpts on the concert stage. The devoted disciples of Wagner accept, without doubt, this statement of Maurice Kufferath: "The aim of Richard Wagner is neither poetry nor music, as these terms are generally understood. His only aim is the drama itself. It is not necessary then to ask, 'Shall I hear beautiful melodies,' or 'Shall I hear beautiful verses?' It is necessary to say, 'I shall be present at the performance of a drama; shall I be moved?'"

⁂

When the excerpt is heard in the concert hall the drama disappears: the music alone remains. The music for a particular dramatic situation is then turned into absolute, untrammeled music. Wotan is a singer in evening dress. The different themes are without dramatic significance. We have an amorphous musical composition, in which the human voice is introduced as an orchestral instrument. The brilliancy of the instrumentation and the boisterous performance excited the admiration of the audience of Saturday evening. Mr. Meyn struggled heroically with a thankless and unvocal task. His earnestness and his sincerity were such that he declaimed vigorously in certain passages where experienced Wagnerian declaimers, realizing the vanity of an attempt to be heard in such an orchestral storm, content themselves wisely with pantomimic display.

Walt Whitman was passionately fond of music. The allusions in his writings to opera, song and orchestra are many, and they are often singular. First of all, he commands the respect of musicians for his definition of music. It is found in the first edition, that thin quarto of 1855, now rare:

> "All music is what awakens from you when you are reminded by the instruments,
> It is not the violins and the cornets, it is not the oboe nor the beating drums—nor the notes of the baritone singer singing his sweet romanza, nor those of the men's chorus, nor those of the women's chorus,
> It is nearer and farther than they."

⁂

In "Good-bye, my Fancy," he speaks of the deep and lasting effect made upon him by Alboni, the famous contralto, and by Bettini, the tenor, years ago in New York. He also mentions the drunken song of Peter Richings as Caliban; the "non-technical singing performances" of the Hutchinson Band, "three brothers and the sister, the red-cheeked New England carnation, sweet Abby; sometimes plaintive and balladic—sometimes anti-slavery, anti-calomel and comic." Then he speaks of Templeton, Russell, Dempster, Jenny Lind, Mrs. Wood, Mrs. Seguin, Mrs. Austin, Grisi, La Grange, Steffanone, Bosio, Truffi, Parodi, Vestvali, Bertucca, Gazzaniga, Laborde; and "the opera men," Bettini, Badiali, Marini, Mario, Amodio, Beneventano, Brignoli. "I was fed and bred under the Italian dispensation, and absorbed it, and doubtless show it." But he also says, "The experts and musicians of my present friends claim that the new Wagner and his pieces belong far more truly to me, and I to them." His love for Italian opera is clearly shown in "Proud Music of the Storm," where he gives thumb-nail sketches of six favorite operas. Here, for example, is "Ernani" in a nutshell:

> "I see where Ernani, walking the bridal garden,
> Amid the scent of night roses, radiant, holding his bride by the hand, > Hears the infernal call, the death-pledge of the horn."

⁂

It would be interesting to trace his musical thoughts and fancies from the book of '55 to that of '91. His comparisons are often subtle and suggestive, although they are couched in singular, sometimes grotesque, language. I quote now from the quarto:

> "I hear the violoncello or man's heart's complaint."

Here are two more instances:

> "A tenor large and fresh as the creation fills me. The orbic flex of his mouth is pouring and filling me full."

The next is still more extraordinary.

> "The orchestra whirls me
> wider than Uranus flies,
> It wrenches unnamable ardors from my breast,
> It throbs me to gulps of the farthest down horror,
> It sails me, I dab with bare feet, they are > licked by the indolent waves,
> I am exposed, cut by bitter and poisoned hail.
> Steeped amid honeyed morphine, my
> windpipe squeezed in the fakes of death,
> Let up again to feel the puzzle of puzzles.
> And that we call Being."

⁂

Whitman, too, longed for a national school of music. In "Democratic Vistas" he utters this prophecy:

"A few years, and there will be an appropriate native grand opera, the lusty and wide-lipped offspring of Italian methods. Yet it will be no mere imitation, nor follow precedents, any more than Nature follows precedents. Vast oval halls will be constructed, on acoustic principles, in cities, where companies of musicians will perform lyrical pieces, born to the people of These States; and the people will make perfect music a part of their lives. Every phase, every trade will have its songs, beautifying those trades. Men on the land will have theirs, and men on the water theirs. Who now is ready to begin that work for America of composing music fit for us—songs, choruses, symphonies, operas, oratorios, fully identified with the body and soul of The States? music complete in all its appointments, but in some fresh, courageous, melodious, undeniable styles—as all that is ever to permanently satisfy us must be. The composers to make such music are to learn everything that can be possibly learned in the schools and traditions of their art, and then calmly dismiss all traditions from them."

PHILIP HALE.

2]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING APRIL 5, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

Boston has long since earned the supremacy in orchestral matters in America, but her title to the rank of being the musical metropolis of America does not rest upon this alone, for in chorus clubs, in oratorio performances and in the piano recitals of resident artists, she has equally asserted her right to the first rank. In operatic matters we dare not claim so much, for in this field we gladly accept whatever New York vouchsafes to us; but there is one crucial test of the taste for classical music the world over, and that is the appreciation of the string quartette, and in just this pure field our city has shown a taste and discrimination that promises well for the future of classical music in our midst. Where the string quartette flourishes the symphony and other classical forms are sure to find proper welcome. Years ago this city began this branch of music with the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, and since that time the Euterpe and the Boston Chamber Music Society kept the flame alive; but now we need no especial societies to protect this pure school, for such artists as Prof. Baermann and such organizations as the Kneisel Quartette have appealed directly to the public with chamber music, and have found a ready response. It is surely unnecessary to speak of what the Kneisel Quartette has done in past seasons to build up a taste for the purest and best in chamber music; it is sufficient to state that they have won the very first rank in this school, and that they have never descended from the high standard which they established in their very first season. Last night's concert was a postponed one (the club is always sure to do a little postponing in its season) and was not the very best example the quartette has given of its work. The warm atmosphere of the hall was depressing alike to performers and public, and something of spirit was lacking on the one part and enthusiasm on the other. Brahms' sextette (with Messrs. Novacek and Schulz in the added parts) seemed artificial and prolix, although the development of the first movement proved that this composer is the greatest living master in thematic treatment; bold modulations and contrapuntal skill were there, but a phlegmatic arrangement of material also, and when Mr. Kneisel broke a string and (imitation being the sincerest flattery) Mr. Novacek followed suit and two unexpected waits arose, Brahms seemed just a trifle more extended than was pleasant.

Beethoven's Piano and Cello Sonata is not his most inspired work; it contains far more of repetition than any of his other sonatas, but the really excellent playing of Messrs. Perabo and Schroeder saved it from anything like monotony. The shading was most artistic, and the ensemble perfect; both artists deserved the hearty recall they received. With a good performance of Beethoven's Quartette in E minor the concert and the series ended.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 4, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony Concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 3, in A minor ("Scotch").
Mozart: Andante and Allegro from concerto for flute and harp.
Volkman: Serenade for string orchestra, in F major.
Wagner: "Wotans Abschied" and "Feuerzauber," from "Die Walküre."

Mr. Heinrich Meyn was the singer, Mr. Charles Molé the flutist, and Mr. Heinrich Schuëcker the harpist.

It is not unlikely that Mendelssohn knew the old story of the monk who summoned a familiar of the devil to fetch him some ale, and found that the forthcoming supply of ale so far exceeded his personal demand that it ended by drowning him. But, if Mendelssohn did know it, he probably did not think of applying its moral to himself. He, as a "romantic" composer, player and conductor, asked for a certain elasticity of rhythm in the performance of his own and other people's music; for an intelligent and sympathetic reading of the composer's intention between the lines, as it were; nothing was more irksome to him than a metronome. We believe that he even did not care to take the usual indications of tempo—such as Andante, Allegro, etc.—too much au pied de la lettre, but liked, even in this matter, to have a certain freedom allowed. His discussion with Berlioz about metronome marks is tolerably well known. Yet it is out of all likelihood that he would have advocated a complete disregard for a composer's expressed wishes; and it is toward this fashion that the performing musical world of today seems tending with ever increasing speed. Take, for instance, Mr. Nikisch's conducting of the "Scotch" symphony. On the fly leaf of the score stands the following direction to the conductor: "The separate movements of this symphony must follow, one after the other, immediately, and not be separated by the usual longish interruptions." Mr. Nikisch made the usual longish waits between the movements, quite in the usual way; just as he would have done in any other symphony. The first movement is marked "Allegro un poco agitato; Mr. Nikisch began it so slow as to make all "agitato" out of the question, and even to leave one in doubt as to its being "allegro" at all. The second movement is marked "Vivace non troppo;" if Mr. Nikisch thinks the rattling tempo at which he took it "not too lively," one asks in dismay what rate of speed he would consider "too lively"? The peroration of the finale is marked "Allegro maestoso assai, the dotted quarter-note=104;" Mr. Nikisch took the dotted quarter at 86. Now this seems to us bringing on ale with a vengeance! almost, if not quite, enough to drown the good Mendelssohn. Add to this that our excellent conductor seems to have a deeply rooted objection to a piano cantilena on the violins; so soon as it comes to a melodic phrase on the violins, he seems to have no shades on his palette between a murmuring pianissimo and a frank, outspoken forte; a bit of cantilena, played simply piano on the strings, seems not to exist for him. Of course he can reply to this criticism by pointing to the invariably strong effectiveness of his rendering of the "Scotch" symphony; it was undoubtedly an enormously effective piece of playing throughout, as effective a performance of the work as we can remember ever to have heard. But a reply of this sort is no satisfactory answer. In the matter of musical performance, the proof of the pudding is not wholly in the eating; to make music sound well is doubtless no mean achievenent; but, in the case of works of the character and calibre of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, it is a still higher achievement to make the music sound right. And we insist upon our criticism with all the more emphasis, because, although Mr. Nikisch's prevailing tendency to put a good deal of himself into his performances is, after all, essentially Mendelssohnian, we are thoroughly persuaded that the excess to which he inclines to push this tendency, his frequent running freedom of interpretation into the ground, is the most un-Mendelssohnian thing in the world; of all the composers of the post-Beethoven period, Mendelssohn is just the one who should be most jealously guarded against it. We can, however, say heartily that, apart from the restrictions we have made, the performance of the symphony was wonderfully fine, vital and exciting. As a piece of playing, it was magnificent.

Of the two movements given from Mozart's flute and harp concerto, the Andante seems to us exceedingly beautiful, and the Allegro rather commonplace and unworthy of the composer. The performance by Messrs. Molé and Schuëcker would have been utterly masterly but for one unlucky circumstance—both the flute and the harp were well out of tune with the orchestra. Truly musical enjoyment was possible only in the cadenzas, where the orchestra was silent. Perhaps "unlucky" is rather a mild term for this accident; we know that extremes of temperature affect string and wind instruments very differently, and the Music Hall was hotter than Tophet last Saturday evening; but no state of the atmosphere should make it impossible for an artist to put his instrument into what tune he pleases, and if it is out of tune the fault is presumably his.

The (new?) Volkmann serenade has more life and fluency of musical invention—in its second and third movements, at least—than anything of his that we have yet heard; here the composer evidently had, what was almost as great a rarity with him as bread and coal during his unhappy life, an inspiration. The first movement does little more than catch the attention, and the fourth is trivial enough; but the two middle movements are full of charm and grace, and show conspicuous cleverness in construction. The whole serenade was admirably played by the strings.

It was good to hear some thoroughly Wagnerish Wagner once more. We would by no means be understood to complain of the comparative infrequency of his name on the programmes of late, for but few of his works are properly in place at a symphony concert, and one cannot keep giving these few over and over again. Still, when anything particularly good and characteristic by him does come our way, we cannot but rejoice; it is inspiring to feel the stroke of his lion's paw from time to time. There are not many finer nor more Titanic pages in his works than Wotan's "Farewell" and the wonderful "Feuerzauber." What a wealth of tragic power, of all-subduing anguish of soul, there is in that "Farewell" to Brünhilde! What a delicacy of expressive beauty in the closing lullaby! Here is true greatness, if ever there was. Mr. Meyn sang the scene with irreproachable beauty of expression; it was finely artistic singing (or lyrical declamation, if Wagnerians prefer the term) throughout. At moments the orchestra—which, by the way, was not quite complete, according to the score—threatened to overpower his voice, but such moments were few, and he made himself, for the most part, perfectly well heard. He was enthusiastically recalled at the close, and never was applause better earned.

The next programme is: Goldmark, overture to "Sakuntala;" Edmond de Mihalovich, ballad for orchestra, "The Mermaid;" John K. Paine, symphony No. 2, in A major, "In the Spring."

The last two concerts of songs at the Meionaon by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will be given to morrow and Saturday afternoons. Full programmes and tickets at the office in Music Hall. The programme for tomorrow afternoon includes duets and songs by Handel, Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Loewe, Ambroise Thomas, Saint-Saëns, Bizet, Henschel, Rubinstein, Brahms and Donizetti.

Eugen D'Albert will give concerts of pianoforte music at the Music Hall, Monday, April 18, Thursday, April 21, and Saturday, April 23, afternoons. The first programme, made up of works by Beethoven, includes 32 variations, C minor; and the sonatas, op. 53, 90, 109 and 110.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 3, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony rehearsal and concert was well designed to reveal the possibilities of the orchestra, and the virtuosity of two of its most distinguished members. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, which came first, received a remarkably fine performance. The quality of tone produced by the strings was unusually full and warm, that of the 'cellos in the adagio being notably beautiful; and the wood-wind and brass were also at their very best. The performance throughout was rich in rhythmic and color effects; in brief, the orchestra has done no more finished work during the season.

Volkmann's Serenade for Strings sounded somewhat tame and commonplace after the symphony, though it does not lack in pleasing themes and effective treatment. It is a work of slight dimensions, but its four movements possess a certain individuality of their own, and are happily contrasted. It was delightfully played.

"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkure," which was the closing number, was all the more welcome for the reason that the symphony programmes of this season have contained few selections from Wagner's works. It was given in all respects, save one, magnificently. Never before, perhaps, has the playing of our orchestra in any Wagnerian work been more delicate and finished, and freer from coarseness and noise; and this, too, at no loss of breadth and sonority. The effect was as near like that which is produced by the covered orchestra at Bayreuth as is, in all probability, possible.

With an Edouard de Reszke to sing Wotan's lines, the entire performance would have been a memorable one; but with Mr. Heinrich Meyn as the singer, it can only be remembered as an extraordinary instance of orchestral virtuosity. If Mr. Meyn's tone production in volume, purity and freedom, had been equal to the earnestness that he displayed, his effort might be set down as fairly successful. As it was, his forced and "throaty" tones and labored delivery were not conducive to pleasure; and the only part of his performance that can be praised is the seriousness of his intentions.

It remains to speak of the superb playing of Mr. Mole and Mr. Schuecker in the charming concerto by Mozart for flute and harp. The former fairly surpassed himself in beauty and variety of tone and brilliancy of execution; and such harp playing—so smooth and fluent, so delicious in quality—is seldom heard in any musical center of the world.

THE HENSCHELS.

At their first and second song recitals, given in the Meionaon last Tuesday evening and Thursday afternoon, Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel were warmly welcomed back to Boston by a host of friends, after their absence of three years. The Henschel recitals of past seasons were invariably of an enjoyable and instructive nature; and these two of the present season have proved no exception to this rule. The programmes were remarkable, as regards novelty, variety and musical worth, no less than twenty-six composers being represented; Martini, Pergolesi, Paisiello, Cimarosa, Arne, Bach, Handel, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Brahms, Loewe, Franz, Lortzing, Goetz, Boieldieu, A, Thomas, Gounod, Massenet, Tschaikowsky, Sgambati, Paderewski, Corder and Henschel.

The vocal work of Tuesday evening was in many respects fine and in some, disappointing. Mrs. Henschel seemed hardly in first rate condition. Her delivery was not infrequently labored and her voice seemed to have lost something of former purity, sweetness and flexibility. Nevertheless, her singing was, as ever, delightful in its artistic simplicity and delicacy of sentiment and there were besides not a few indications of marked gains in breadth and in depth of feeling. Of Mr. Henschel, it may be said that if anything, he sings better than he did when he was last heard here, his voice seeming more tractable and more musical in quality, especially in its middle register. His interpretations still stand forth as those of a musician of rare dramatic and poetic insight; while his pianoforte playing and accompanying are as wonderful and fascinating as ever. At the second recital Mrs. Henschel appeared to much better advantage. Her tones were steadier and purer, and her singing in several instances revealed a strength and dramatic fervor that at once surprised and delighted. It would be a pleasure to speak in detail of the work of these artists; but at present it is possible to allude only to Mrs. Henschel's exquisite singing in the Beethoven and Liszt settings of "Mignon's Song," Mendelssohn's "On Wings of Song," "Polly Willis," and Tschaikowsky's "Lullaby;" to Mr. Henschel's unforgetable renderings of Schubert's "Der Doppelzanger" and "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus," "Beethoven's "Crugantio's song," and Loewe's "Die verfallene Muhle;" and to the wholly enjoyable manner in which they together gave the duets from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," Boieldieu's "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village," and Schumann's "Faust."

The last concert of the Kneisel Quartet will be given tomorrow evening in Union Hall. Messrs. Ernst Perabo, Otta Novacek and Leo Schultz will assist. The programme is as follows: Brahms's sextet in G major; sonata for pianoforte and 'cello, Beethoven; quartet, E minor, op. 59, Beethoven.

The third vocal recital by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will be given in the Meionaon Tuesday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock. The programme is as follows: Duet from "Giulia Cesare," Handel; song from "Il Seraglio," Mozart; aria from "Orfoe," Haydn; Busslied, Beethoven; Mignon's song, "Auf dem Wasser zu singen," "Geheimes," Schubert; "Die Lowenbraut," Schumann; "The Erl-King," Lowewe; "Le Soir," Ambroise Thomas; air from "Samson et Dalila," Saint-Saens; Vieille Chanson, Bizet; duet, "Drei Schlosser" (new), Henschel; "Der Asra," Persiches Lied, Rubinstein; song from the "Magellone," Brahms; "There was an Ancient King," four "Lieder in Volkston," Henschel; "Don Pasquale," Donizetti.

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

SEVENTH SEASON—1891-92.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. ERNST PERABO.

LAST CONCERT

OF THE SEASON.

MONDAY, APRIL 4, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BRAHMS.	SEXTET for STRINGS, in G major. Allegro non troppo.—Scherzo.—Allegro non troppo.—Poco adagio.—Poco allegro. 2d Viola, MR. OTTO NOVACEK. 2d 'Cello, MR. LEO SCHULZ.
BEETHOVEN.	SONATA for PIANO and VIOLONCELLO. Allegro ma non tanto.—Scherzo.—Allegro molto.—Adagio cantabile.—Allegro vivace
BEETHOVEN.	QUARTET in E minor, op. 59. Allegro.—Molto adagio.—Allegretto.—Finale; presto

---

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, APRIL 5, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The last concert of the seventh season of the Kneisel Quartette was given last evening in Union Hall. Messrs. Perabo, Novacek and Schulz assisted. The programme was as follows:

Sextet for strings, G major.....Brahms
Sonata for pianoforte and 'cello.....Beethoven
Quartette, E minor, op. 59, No. 2.....Beethoven

Even the most devoted admirers of Johannes Brahms have found his G major sextet a hard nut to crack. The two last movements show the perversity of the early style of the composer. In his desire to avoid common and popular effects, he shuns deliberately defined melody and harmonic color. The professional musician must study earnestly his aims and methods; only by repeated hearings can he arrive at a full understanding, and the expenditure of time and labor is even then poorly rewarded. To the general public this music is caviare, however excellent the performance may be.

It is not improbable, however, that another generation may prefer such abstract musical-metaphysical weavings to the sensuous charm of the musical compositions that have delighted the many for so long a time. As that keen observer, Thomas Hardy, remarks in his famous description of Egdon Heath, "it is a question if the exclusive reign of this orthodox beauty is not approaching its last quarter. The new vale of Tempe may be a gaunt waste in Thule; human souls may find themselves in closer and closer harmony with external things wearing a sombreness distasteful to our race when it was young."

Time, "the Arch satirist," takes a peculiar pleasure in turning the contemporaneous judgment concerning a musical composition into derision. The quartettes dedicated by Beethoven to Count Rasoumoffsky, one of which was played last evening, were a stumbling block to the musicians of the day. Schuppanzigh laughed, and declared that Beethoven was in jest. Romberg stamped upon the allegretto of the first of the quartettes. Felix Radicati, a violinist of no mean skill, who believed that Beethoven was musically crazy, saw the set in manuscript and said to the composer: "You do not really think these quartettes are music." Beethoven made this proud answer: "They are not for you; they are for posterity."

The large audience of last evening seemed to enjoy heartily the different numbers, and the performance of the sextet and the quartette was well worthy of the applause, in spite of the unavoidable accidents that occurred during the playing of the first number. In the sonata for pianoforte and 'cello, Mr. Perabo so subordinated himself that the pianoforte part was at times inaudible, and there was often no real harmonic basis to support the solo. This came no doubt from the extreme musical sensitiveness of Mr. Perabo's musical nature, but self-depreciation or self-effacement in ensemble playing is as grave a fault as too pronounced self-assertion.

The concert was of undue length. Mr. Kneisel, in the endeavor to please his public, forgets that a chamber concert prolonged to a late hour is apt to weary, particularly when the selections are of such a serious nature. This remark may [illegible] many of his quartette concerts [illegible] genuine pleasure [illegible] music for musical [illegible]

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, APR. 5, 1892.

The last Kneisel concert was given last night in Union Hall, with Mr. Ernst Perabo as soloist. The programme was strictly classic in character, consisting of Brahms's sextet for strings, in G major, with Otto Novacek and Leo Schulz in the second viola and 'cello parts, and Beethoven's sonata for piano and 'cello, and quartet in E minor, Op. 59.

The sextet was grandly given, combining breadth of treatment with finish of phrasing and delicacy of shading.

The Beethoven sonato played by Mr. Perabo and Alwin Shroeder was exquisite in tone blending and the quartet was characterized by the intelligence of interpretation, the taste and beauty of finish which have been features of every one of this series of concerts. From an artistic standpoint, they have been among the best musical entertainments of this season.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will give their third song recital at the Meionaon this afternoon at 2:30 o'clock, with the following programme: Duet from Handel's "Giulio Cesare"; song of the Harem-keeper from "Il Seraglio"; aria from "Orfeo"; Busslied by Beethoven; "Mignon's Song," "Auf dem Wasser zu Singen," "Giheimes," all by Schubert; Schumann's ballad, "Die Lowenbraut"; Loewe's "Erl-King"; "Le Soir," by Thomas; air from "Samson et Delila," "Vieille Chanson," by Bizet; duet, "Oh That We two Were Maying," Henschel; Rubinstein's "Der Asra" and "Persisches Lied"; song from the "Magellene," Brahms; "There Was an Ancient King" and four "Lieder in Volkston," Henschel; duetto buffo from "Don Pasquale."

VIVIAN.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, APRIL 5.

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The seventh and last concert by the Kneisel quartet was given at Union Hall last evening. The usual quartet was further reinforced by Messrs. Novacek and Schulz, who assisted in the first number. Bralım's sextet for strings in G major, consisting of allegro non troppo, scherzo, allegro non troppo, poco adagio and poco allegro.

This number was given with great spirit and dash, and delighted the audience.

The second number, Beethoven's sonata, for piano and violoncello, was sustained by Mr. Perabo at the piano and Mr. Schroeder on the 'cello. Rarely has this sonata received such masterly treatment. The concert concluded with the Beethoven quartet in E minor, op. 59.

This finest of all the great master's quartets was an ideal performance. The second movement, especially, molto adagio, beyond doubt the most exquisite of Beethoven's musical fancies, was treated in a manner worthy of this justly celebrated quartet, and was a performance which will linger for a long time in the memory of yesterday's audience.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, APRIL 4, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Twenty-First Symphony Concert.

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, presented the following programme: Symphony No. 3, in A minor "Scotch," Mendelssohn; andante and allegro, from concerto for flute and harp, Mozart: serenade, for string orchestra, Volkmann; "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fie Charm," from "Die Walkure," Wagner. The soloists were Mr. Charles Mole, Mr. Heinrich Schnecker and Mr. Heinrich Meyer. The music of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony excited the enthusiasm of the audience, which was liberal with its applause. The beautiful melodies and the exquisite treatment displayed in this work must ever command the attention of the musical listener. It was played with little or no regard for the necessity of contrast, being rasped and blowed after the now established standard of coarseness of Mr. Nikisch's band.

The scherzo was disjointed and lacking in precision, and the first movement and finale were rough and blatant. Mendelssohn indicated that the drums should be tuned to A and E, which, by the way, is a good idea, as the symphony is in A minor. It has been claimed by some unknown party on the Transcript, who hid behind a nom-de-plume, not having the courage of his convictions, that Nikisch is a genius. Well, if a disregard of a composer's indications is a sign of genius, the accusation must be admitted. On this same basis Nikisch's drummer must also be regarded as a genius, for he disregards the composer's request concerning the tuning of the drums, and displays this genius upon about every opportunity that is presented. Now on Saturday night he tuned his drums to A flat and nearly to E flat, instead of A natural and E natural.

Of course it was rankly out of tune with the rest of the orchestra, but it appeared to be perfectly agreeable, however, as far as any sign of disturbance was indicated on the part of the genius posing on the two boxes. Now, Mr. Schnecker's harp was out of tune in the first movement of the Mozart piece, and it really seemed to annoy him, and to the extent that he took the opportunity before beginning the second movement to thoroughly tune his instrument, a most commendable performance upon his part, but he can never expect to ascend the pedestal of genius if he is as particular as that, not if he is to remain in the atmosphere that surrounds the glory of our local organization.

The Mozart concerto is pleasant enough in its way, but it is a very feeble one as it employs the harp in a tinkling manner, not the fault of the composer, however, for it was a tinkling instrument in his day. Mr. Mole and Mr. Schnecker played with their well-known skill and were recalled with loud applause.

The Volkmann Serenade is dry, commonplace music. There is a waltz movement in the piece that is agreeable enough, but so are hundreds of other waltzes that would not be permitted to appear upon the programmes of the Symphony concerts.

The concert ended with a most violent, coarse and bombastic performance of the Wagner number. It was absolutely deafening in its racket. Mr. Meyer stood forth and heroically endeavored to do his part in the cyclone of disturbance, but he was distanced from the start. The concert was unnecessarily long. Nikisch shows little judgment in this particular. The serenade should have been left out of the programme for more reasons than one.

Next Saturday Professor Paine's "Spring Symphony" will be performed.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Post

WEDNESDAY MORNING, APR. 6, 1892.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave their third recital at Meionaon yesterday afternoon, with a programme that happily combined the best features of their earlier performances. These recitals have been bright examples of the extent to which art in ballad singing can be carried, requiring, as it does, more than mere skill in handling the voice.

In the Henschels' concerts are plainly discernible the strong development of the intuitive musical sense which careful and long continued study has brought to its present state of perfection.

Among the many good things offered the large and cultivated audience, Mr. Henschel's duet, "Oh, that we two were Maying," given by request, and his four "Lieder im Volkston" rendered so charmingly by Mrs. Henschel, received the heartiest applause. She graciously repeated "Oh, Fair Is My Lass." Mr. Henschel's numbers represented Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Schumann, Loewe, Rubinstein and Brahms, a wide range, but fully covered by his exceptional powers. The fourth and last recital will take place Saturday afternoon, April 9, with a programme of unusual excellence, even for such artists as these.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, APRIL 5, 1892.

Union Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the closing concert of its this year's course in Union Hall last evening. The quartet was assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Novacek and Mr. Leo Schulz in the following programme:

Brahms: Sextet in G major, Op. 36.
Beethoven: Sonata for pianoforte and 'cello, in A major, Op. 69.
Beethoven: Quartet in E minor, Op. 59, No. 2.

One hardly knows which of Brahms's two sextets to prefer; the first one, in B-flat, is perhaps the more largely heroic of the pair, but it does not show quite so fine a sense of euphony as the one in G, played last evening. In Brahms's earlier period his instinct for, and skill in, treating instruments so as to get the best quality of tone from them, in their various combinations, was not very fully developed; the same was true of Schumann; and the selection of instruments in these sextets is by no means very easy to treat entirely well. With only two violins, against two violas and two 'celli, the preponderance of instruments of low or medium register makes it often difficult to escape a certain thickness and muddiness of effect, if each one of the four lower instruments is to be treated as an independent voice in the harmony. Brahms showed decidedly less skill in steering round this rock in his B-flat sextet, than he has in this later one in G; here one has little thick and quasi-opaque writing to complain of; the instrumentation is admirable. Add to this the high intrinsic beauty of the music, and one finds the work almost uniquely fine of its kind. It was admirably played.

Beethoven's third sonata for pianoforte and 'cello is one of those perfect things in which not a note is to be changed; the final Allegro vivace is, in especial, a gem of the first water. The work was beautifully played by Messrs. Perabo and Schroeder; indeed the performance would have been irreproachable and ideal had not Mr. Perabo been too constantly over-anxious to give his companion more than fair play. The result was that he played throughout with such extreme delicacy that the pianoforte part was at times barely audible. Apart from this, however, the playing of both artists was beyond praise.

The E minor Rasoumoffsky quartet is not so often played here as its companions in F and C; but it is a wholly delightful work, full of all that is most Beethovenish. The performance last evening was a marvel of perfection, leaving nothing to be desired.

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 6, 1892.

The Third Vocal Recital of Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

The programme deserves more than a passing notice. The performance was a delight to the amateur; the programme itself was full of interest to the student. The charming duet from Handel's "Giulio Cesare" brought to mind the glories of that epoch-making opera; the discovery of Cuzzoni's fading physical charms when she appeared as Cleopatra; the fright of Senesino at the fall of pieces of wood, just after he had declaimed proudly "Cæsar knows no fear." There was an agreeable number from Haydn's "Orfeo," the opera that was designed for London and was never finished. The ballads by Schumann and Loewe brought in sharp contrast the methods of the man of genius and the man of one talent. In the ballad the inferior composer conquered. Schumann's detail is not sympathetic nor dramatic, and there is no great and enduring impression of the whole, no overmastering rush as there is in the "Erlking" of Loewe. The song from Saint Saens's opera, in which Samson is wooed to his destruction, is sung in various keys. But the woman in the valley of Sorek, whose name was Delilah, was undoubtedly a contralto, with full, passionate lower tones, such as once came from the quivering, curling mouth of Eustacia Vye. The voice of Mrs. Henschel is not suited to such a chant of triumphant love. As sung by her, the song was sweet, ingenuous and with a touch of New England primness. But Samson would not have bowed his head, nor would he have whispered the secret of his strength to the beguiler. The four folk-songs of Mr. Henschel are more truly musical and more effective than the labored setting by him of Heine's "There was an ancient King," with its suggestions of the music of Rubinstein and Grieg.

To speak of the many beauties of the performance would necessitate an analysis of the programme, number by number. It may be said in general that it was one of the most thoroughly agreeable and entertaining concerts of this musical season. The singers were, perhaps, heard to peculiar advantage in the duets; but it would be a pleasure to speak at length of the fragrant charm of the singing of Mrs. Henschel in the Schubert and the Bizet selections and in the lieder of her husband: to dwell on Mr. Henschel's artistic delivery of the Mozart number and the songs by Rubinstein.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 6.

HENSCHEL CONCERT.

Third Vocal Recital Given at the Meionaon Yesterday.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave their last recital but one yesterday afternoon at the Meionaon, and this concert, like its predecessors, drew out a very large and fashionable audience.

These charming artists sang in the same artistic manner that has characterized their former recitals, and the variety of the programme numbers furnished ample scope for the display of their remarkable musical abilities.

The programme consisted of selections from Handel, Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, Loeure, Henschel, Rubinstein and other composers.

Two compositions by Mr. Henschel were repeated, in answer to encores. One duet by these cultured vocalists almost defied criticism, their voices harmonizing so beautifully, and this portion of the entertainment was particularly enjoyable on account of the selections offered.

The next entertainment will be given on Saturday afternoon, April 9.

(c) Wilt deign to be near me,
Forever to cheer me?
This is not a dream.

The brooklets are flowing,
The green woods are glowing
And murmurs the stream.

A prisoner taken,
In dungeon forsaken,
Now greets me the light.

The sunbeams are straying,
And gleaming and playing,
Rejoicing my sight.

And shall I enjoy, love,
Can no man destroy, love,
The prize of a day?

Bright visions are moving,
And living is loving,
Oh, welcome the way!

Now joyous, uncaring,
No further be faring,
With staff in thy hand.

Through wastes that surround it,
At last thou hast found it,
The holiest land.

(a) BALLAD. "THERE WAS AN ANCIENT KING." }
(b) Four "LIEDER IM VOLKSTON." } . . . HENSCHEL

MRS. HENSCHEL.

(a) There was an ancient King,
His hair was gray and dull his life —
The poor, the fond old King,
He took a fair young wife.

There was a youthful page,
Bright were his locks and gay his mien,
He bore the silken train,
The train of the fair young queen.

Knowest thou that olden song,
So sad and sweet upon the ear?
Alas! these two must die —
Their love was far too dear.

— From the German of Heine, by Mrs. Emily Pfeiffer.

I.

(b) To my turtle dove
Will I send
Happy songs of love
Without end.

For the maiden
Charmbeladen
Doth so graciously
To me bend.

Of her lovely eyne,
The deep blue
Cheers this heart of mine
Ever new;

Full of graces
Her sweet face is,
Like the rose in the Morning dew.

Praise her rosy mien
Now will I,
That the angels e'en
Dare not vie.

Would that ever
I could have her
Near, ah! near to me
Till I die!

II.

Oh, fair is my lass,
But no riches she has;
What care I for riches,
I cannot kiss gold.
Beauty I've none,
Wealth have I some,
Pence full as my purse can hold.
If I had three farthings more,
Just a shilling were my store.

So sweet is my lass,
Oh, so gentle and kind!
Such red lips, and dainty,
On earth you'll not find.
Joyous the hours,
Brighter than gold,
When my fair lass I behold;
With her might I always stay,
I'd not mind how long the day!

III.

Shouldst thou see my maiden fair,
Say how I am fond then;
Should she ask, "And how goes he?"
"On two feet," respond then.

Should she ask thee, "Is he sick?"
Say, I died in sorrow;
If she then begin to weep —
Say, I'll come to-morrow!

EUGEN D'ALBERT AND PADEREWSKI COMPARED.

The Former Is the Philosopher and the Latter Is the Poet of the Musical World—D'Albert's Recital Here Last Week Created a Favorable Impression — Gossip.

EUGEN D'ALBERT'S second appearance in St. Louis in a single recital at Entertainment Hall on Tuesday evening was welcomed by a large, attentive and highly appreciative audience, composed almost wholly of musicians, professional and amateur. The programme was an interesting and generous one, and D'Albert was great throughout. His playing was characterized by the fine, true touch, large breadth of style and absolute perfection of technique, which belong to him as one of the first of virtuosos. But those who looked for the immense dynamic force, the resistless, rushing impetuosity which so vividly impressed them when he played here two years ago must have felt a difference, subtle but unmistakable, in the D'Albert of last Tuesday evening. The dynamic power, the restless impetuosity and the tremendous climaxes were still there, but ordered, controlled.

The young giant has grown during the past two years and has happily attained that last best gift of noble minds, control of self. This was evident from the first phrases of the opening number, the Bach Prelude and Fugue, and appeared conspicuously in the closing one, Liszt's "Tarantelle," given with an ease and lightness which did not, however, detract from its brilliancy. His greatest effect was made without doubt in the splendid Raff Suite in D minor, rendered with a wealth and mastery of technical and intellectual resource which created a stir in the audience, culminating, in the concluding march movement, in a burst of irrepressible enthusiasm. A complete contrast to this, and, to some tastes, the gem of the whole performance, was the little A minor rondo of Mozart, given as an encore to the first part of the programme. It was a delicious bit of artistic work, and a delightful glimpse of the lost art of simplicity, very refreshing in this highly sophisticated, overwrought and self-conscious period.

It seems rather strange and is somewhat disappointing that D'Albert, who is known preeminently as a Beethoven player, should have given us on his first visit a single sonata of the master, and on Tuesday evening the little-known sonata, opus 90, which is properly not a sonata at all, having only two movements. It is, of course, not less valuable on that account, possessing many beauties of theme and treatment wholly Beethovenesque, but the whole is cast in a subdued minor key, wherein the voice of tragedy and the strife of passion and fate which we have learned to associate with the sombre majesty of his name are strangely absent.

D'ALBERT AND PADEREWSKI.

It seems almost inevitable to compare D'Albert with Paderewski, though such comparisons are more or less futile and unsatisfactory, and it hardly seems the square thing to set "one glory" against "another glory." I should say, however, that D'Albert is the expounder in musical art and Paderewski the singer. D'Albert is the philosopher and Paderewski the poet. But neither of these distinctions is quite exact, for if we are tempted to allow D'Albert the pre-eminence in intellectuality and power, we cannot fairly do so when we remember Paderewski in the "Erl King," for instance, and in certain Beethoven renditions, and his tenderness has something of an equivalent in the pathos and sentiment of D'Albert in the Beethoven number, opus 90. D'Albert may be drifting towards the cold and arid regions of "objective" art, but he is yet a great way off; while Paderewski, the tender, the strong, with the aureola of poesy about his young head, remains, will remain for many, the one—"the only!"

FREE PRESS.

Date 4-2

The D'Albert Recital.

Eugen D'Albert, the great pianist, gave a recital at the Detroit Opera House yesterday afternoon, the like of which has not been afforded to Detroit musicians since Rubinstein was here. During the past two seasons there has not been a lack of skilled pianists here and a glance over the following will give an idea of what opportunities this city has had, within a comparatively brief time, of judging what piano playing is: Ignatz Jan Paderewski, Von Bulow, Xaver Scharwenka, Vladmir De Pachmann, Joseffy, Alfred Gruenfeld, Adele Lewing, Constantin Sternberg, Helen Hopekirk, Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler and Henri Waller. When it comes to the greatest of this list of genuine artists discrimination narrows to a fine point, and no reasonable mind would care to tip the scale of merit one way or another.

D'Albert may unquestionably be placed at the head of the list as an artist, however, and if he is to be compared at all it will be with Von Bulow and Paderewski. In some respects D'Albert and Paderewski are alike—in their universality and in their absolute devotedness to the sentiment of each composition. This is said to be a divine spark of genius born with their respective abilities to create music, which both possess in no ordinary degree. No one in Detroit ever honestly felt that Paderewski's "Menuet a L'Antique" amounted to much until he played it himself here, and few pianists would be able to draw the charm from D'Albert's rondo, which he played as a closing encore piece yesterday, unless they first heard him interpret it.

In all of D'Albert's programme yesterday there were ever recurring instances of his masterful command of the piano, of his technical or mechanical ability; but the charm lay in his interpretations and in the absolute attention which he gave to his subject. Listeners were awed at times by his complete absorption in a passage and would a moment later be almost thrilled by a sudden fiery and dramatic transition. D'Albert did not play Chopin with any greater skill than De Pachmann, but the latter could not have executed Liszt's tarantelle, "Napoli." Neither can it be justly said that in strong dramatic work D'Albert is greater than Scharwenka, but the latter does not possess the infinite ability of D'Albert in finer and more poetic compositions. D'Albert's greatness lies in his ability to play everything perfectly. His programme yesterday included "Passacaglia" in C minor, Bach-D'Albert; Beethoven's "Sonata" in C op. 53 (four movements), Berceuse op. 57, Valse op. 42 and Sonata op. 58, Chopin; Schubert's "Impromptu" and Liszt's Valse "Impromptu" and Tarantelle, Napoli. For encore pieces he played Mozart's "Rondo" in A minor, and "The Sweet," a rondo by himself. The latter was his first composition. There was a very fair audience present and the pianist was very enthusiastically received. One of the pianist's admirers sent him a bouquet of flowers, which he received with evident embarrassment, but he passed it to a hand from the flies and covered his confusion by his music.

NEWS, Detroit, Mich.

Date 4-2

He May Not Be a Genius, but He Pleases.

There certainly has been no lack of opportunity here during the past few months for music-lovers to hear and judge for themselves regarding the merits of pianists whose qualities have received the highest commendation from what are recognized as the most reliable critical sources. In nearly every case the pianist has been given a reception which would compare favorably with the adulation accorded in other cities, notably in the east where art-devotees are given to lionizing the favored few in true Anglomaniac fashion. Eugen D'Albert, who appeared in a recital yesterday afternoon at the Detroit opera house, aroused his auditors to a fair degree of enthusiasm by his superb rendition of an interesting program. It was not the sort of an ovation that was accorded Paderewski who, surrounded by all manner of sensational attributes, found it an easy task to fill every seat in the theater upon two occasions with tickets at an advanced figure. The audience was not so large yesterday afternoon as the occasion merited, while the various numbers were received in a critical, appreciative and admiring spirit rather than with the blind, unthinking adulation that greeted the talented Pole.

With the perfect technique of the Liszt school, D'Albert's playing left nothing to be desired in the way of execution. Whether he is a genius is a matter of opinion and is still a subject for discussion among critics in the musical centers. But after all, geniuses are not always to be depended upon, and D'Albert is sufficiently great to command admiration from the best musicians at all times. He doesn't look exactly as you think a genius should. He has no marked peculiarities, but is in appearance a little man with a German type of face, not spirituelle like Liszt, strong and mighty like Rubinstein, or "weary and worn with conflicting passions" like Paderewski. On the contrary, it is a bright, rosy face, such as is attributed to a German student who is prone to sit by the festive board and to lift his mass of beer with a hearty "Prost." D'Albert's only mannerism was a tendency to lean over the keyboards when he came to a passage which required careful, soft treatment, and to listen to the tones with [illegible] about six inches above his fingers. [illegible] general bearing was agreeable and [illegible].

The program was highly appreciated, especially by musicians, its various numbers covering as they did compositions ranging from the stately, massive style of Bach to the rhapsodical Liszt.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
WEDNESDAY MORNING APRIL 6, 1892.

The Henschel Recital.

The third of the four song recitals given by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel in the Meionaon attracted an unusually large audience of friends and admirers yesterday afternoon. Despite the facts that the crowded room was warm almost to suffocation and that both artists were somewhat subject to the penalties of Boston spring weather, the recital proved another successful effort. Where two such eminent vocalists were concerned, that a thoroughly acceptable rendering of the programme was given, ça va sans dire. The succession of the various numbers afforded agreeable contrast, as much in difference of school as in sentiment.

In the first group, Mr. Henschel's excellent method, and true artistic feeling gave delightful expression to Mozart's great gift of melody in a song from "Il Seraglio," and rendered deeply impressive a contrite "Busslied" by Beethoven. Next followed three well-known Schubert lieder, "Mignon's Song," "Auf dem wasser zu singen"—a lovely barcarolle—and "Geheimes," all given by Mrs. Henschel with good effect. Continuing in the German vein, Mr. Henschel showed a masterly conception of Schumann's dramatic instinct in the "Loewenbrant," but hardly satisfied the demand for powerful vocal resource which this class of the great composer's music makes on most singers. The companion ballad, a setting of the "Erl King," by Loewé, though meritorious, and given with artistic regard to tone color in impersonating the four voices, suffered in comparison with Schubert's immortal version of the song. The next three numbers were sung charmingly by Mrs. Henschel in characteristically French style. An aria from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Dalila" was particularly well appreciated: the others, also French songs, being vocal bon-bons of agreeable flavor. Rubinstein's "Asra" and "Golden rolls here beneath me," were most acceptable, as they always are, and also a song of Brahms' from the "Magellane." Mr. Henschel's own compositions were among the gems; graceful, melodious and musicianly in accompaniment. His version of the familiar duet, "Oh, that we two were maying," still in manuscript, is well worthy to be linked with this sublime beat of Charles Kingsley's great human heart. Of the original ballads "O fair is the lass" is remarkably dainty, and called forth a hearty encore, to which Mrs. Henschel responded with a repetition.

The final number was a duetto buffo from Donizetti's "Don Pasquale." Mrs. Henschel had an excellent opportunity to display her facile technique, while Mr. Henschel's change of voice to suit the part evinced a wonderful versatility in voice production. His accompaniments during the recital formed a valuable lesson in this all-important and separate accomplishment.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 97.
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 6, 1892.

Third of the Henschel Recitals at the Meionaon.

The third of the series of vocal recitals by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel was given at the Meionaon yesterday afternoon, and the audience was limited only by the seating capacity of the auditorium.

The day's programme was rather severe in its characteristics as a whole, and, despite the earnest and always artistic efforts of the singers, it lacked some of the element of contrast which made the former recitals so uniformly interesting.

In the joint efforts of the singers the ever popular duet, "Oh, that we two were Maying," took the usual prominence, and this tuneful setting of the familiar verses has seldom been better sung by these artists than on this occasion. A duet from Handel's "Julius Cæsar" began the concert, and the familiar one from "Don Pasquale" ended the day's selections.

Mr. Henschel was particularly happy in his singing of "The song of the harem keeper," from Mozart's "Il Seraglio," and an aria from Haydn's "Orfeo," and he gave a sufficiently dramatic interpretation of Schumann's dreadful ballad, "Die Lowenbraut." He was heard with great pleasure in Loewe's ballad, "The Erl-King," and his singing of the song from Brahms' "Magellone" was also much enjoyed.

Mrs. Henschel was fairly inspired in her singing of the group of French compositions, consisting of "Le Soir," by Thomas; an air from Saint-Saens, "Samson et Dalila" and Bizet's "Vieille Chanson," all of which were given with the most captivating grace.

It is doubtless well nigh impossible to control the temperature in any auditorium in such changeable weather as has prevailed of late, but the fact remains that all the enjoyment given by the singers yesterday hardly compensated for the physical suffering endured by those who were compelled to breath the lifeless air of the hall over and over again.

The last recital of the Henschels will be given next Saturday afternoon.

Times, New York, N. Y.

Date 4-3

—The programme of Mr. Eugen d'Albert's first recital at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, on Tuesday afternoon next, includes Beethoven; thirty-two variations in C minor, and the same composer's sonatas, Opuses 53, 90, 109, and 110. Thursday, Mr. d'Albert will perform works by Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Schubert, Strauss-Tausig, and Liszt, and Saturday he will interpret compositions by Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubinstein, and Liszt.

N Y Sun
4/3

The Henschels.

The third recital given by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel yesterday afternoon, in response to many requests for a repetition of one of their charming afternoons of song, was as crowded as the former concerts had been, and the artists were warmly applauded and often encored. Mrs. Henschel sang many light and brilliant songs, among the prettiest of them all being a "Polish Song" by Paderewski, "Midi au Village," by Goring-Thomas, and a "Serenade" by Massenet. The refinement of style of these admirable musicians is a wonderful and potent lesson, as well as a delight, to all who hear them. No entertainment could be more truly musical, in the best sense of the word, or more refreshing and stimulating to the best thoughts than is a "Henschel Recital."

Eugen d'Albert is to be heard again in New York this week, and the reappearance of this famous pianist will be an event of great interest and pleasure to New York's music-loving public. He is to be heard in three recitals during the coming week, all to be given in the Madison Square Garden concert hall. They will occur on the afternoons of Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, April 5, 7, and 9. The first recital, on Tuesday, will be devoted exclusively to Beethoven's music, the programme being made up of his "Thirty-two Variations in C minor" and his Sonatas opuses 53, 90, 109, and 110. On Thursday D'Albert will play a mixed programme which includes numbers by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Schubert, Bach-d'Albert, Strauss-Taussig, and Liszt. Saturday's recital will include selections from Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubinstein, and Liszt.

Post

Date 4-5

Herr Eugen d'Albert will [illegible]

Eve. Post, New York, N

Date 4

The programme of Mr. Eugen d'A[illegible] first recital, at the Madison [illegible] Concert Hall, on Tuesday [illegible] includes Beethoven, thirty-[illegible] minor, and the same compose[illegible] 53, 90, 109, and 110. [illegible] will perform works [illegible] Mendelssohn, Raff, Sch[illegible] and Liszt, and [illegible] compositions [illegible]

(c) Wilt deign to be near me,
Forever to cheer me?
This is not a dream.

The brooklets are flowing,
The green woods are glowing
And murmurs the stream.

A prisoner taken,
In dungeon forsaken,
Now greets me the light.

The sunbeams are straying,
And gleaming and playing,
Rejoicing my sight.

And shall I enjoy, love,
Can no man destroy, love,
The prize of a day?

Bright visions are moving,
And living is loving,
Oh, welcome the way!

Now joyous, uncaring,
No further be faring,
With staff in thy hand.

Through wastes that surround it,
At last thou hast found it,
The holiest land.

(a) BALLAD. "THERE WAS AN ANCIENT KING." } . . . . HENSCHEL
(b) Four "LIEDER IM VOLKSTON." }

MRS. HENSCHEL.

(a) There was an ancient King,
His hair was gray and dull his life —
The poor, the fond old King,
He took a fair young wife.

There was a youthful page,
Bright were his locks and gay his mien,
He bore the silken train,
The train of the fair young queen.

Knowest thou that olden song,
So sad and sweet upon the ear!
Alas! these two must die —
Their love was far too dear.
— From the German of Heine, by Mrs. Emily Pfeiffer.

I.

(b) To my turtle dove
Will I send
Happy songs of love
Without end.

For the maiden
Charmbeladen
Doth so graciously
To me bend.

Of her lovely eyne,
The deep blue
Cheers this heart of mine
Ever new;

Full of graces
Her sweet face is,
Like the rose in the Morning dew.

Praise her rosy mien
Now will I,
That the angels e'en
Dare not vie.

Would that ever
I could have her
Near, ah! near to me
Till I die!

II.

Oh, fair is my lass,
But no riches she has;
What care I for riches,
I cannot kiss gold.
Beauty I've none,
Wealth have I some,
Pence full as my purse can hold.
If I had three farthings more,
Just a shilling were my store.

So sweet is my lass,
Oh, so gentle and kind!
Such red lips, and dainty,
On earth you'll not find.
Joyous the hours,
Brighter than gold,
When my fair lass I behold;
With her might I always stay,
I'd not mind how long the day!

III.

Shouldst thou see my maiden fair,
Say how I am fond then;
Should she ask, "And how goes he?"
"On two feet," respond then.

Should she ask thee, "Is he sick?"
Say, I died in sorrow;
If she then begin to weep —
Say, I'll come to-morrow!

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
WEDNESDAY MORNING APRIL 6, 1892.

The Henschel Recital.

The third of the four song recitals given by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel in the Meionaon attracted an unusually large audience of friends and admirers yesterday afternoon. Despite the facts that the crowded room was warm almost to suffocation and that both artists were somewhat subject to the penalties of Boston spring weather, the recital proved another successful effort. Where two such eminent vocalists were concerned, that a thoroughly acceptable rendering of the programme was given, ça va sans dire. The succession of the various numbers afforded agreeable contrast, as much in difference of school as in sentiment.

In the first group, Mr. Henschel's excellent method, and true artistic feeling gave delightful expression to Mozart's great gift of melody in a song from "Il Seraglio," and rendered deeply impressive a contrite "Busslied" by Beethoven. Next followed three well-known Schubert lieder, "Mignon's Song," "Auf dein wasser zu singen"—a lovely barcarolle—and "Geheimes," all given by Mrs. Henschel with good effect. Continuing in the German vein, Mr. Henschel showed a masterly conception of Schumann's dramatic instinct in the "Loewenbrant," but hardly satisfied the demand for powerful vocal resource which this class of the great composer's music makes on most singers. The companion ballad, a setting of the "Erl King," by Loewe, though meritorious, and given with artistic regard to tone color in impersonating the four voices, suffered in comparison with Schubert's immortal version of the song. The next three numbers were sung charmingly by Mrs. Henschel in characteristically French style. An aria from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Dalila" was particularly well appreciated: the others, also French songs, being vocal bon-bons of agreeable flavor. Rubinstein's "Asra" and "Golden rolls here beneath me," were most acceptable, as they always are, and also a song of Brahms' from the "Magellane." Mr. Henschel's own compositions were among the gems; graceful, melodious and musicianly in accompaniment. His version of the familiar duet, "Oh, that we two were maying," still in manuscript, is well worthy to be linked with this sublime beat of Charles Kingsley's great human heart. Of the original ballads "O fair is the lass" is remarkably dainty, and called forth a hearty encore, to which Mrs. Henschel responded with a repetition.

The final number was a duetto buffo from Donizetti's "Don Pasquale." Mrs. Henschel had an excellent opportunity to display her facile technique, while Mr. Henschel's change of voice to suit the part evinced a wonderful versatility in voice production. His accompaniments during the recital formed a valuable lesson in this all-important and separate accomplishment.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCL, NO. 97.
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 6, 1892.

Third of the Henschel Recitals at the Meionaon.

The third of the series of vocal recitals by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel was given at the Meionaon yesterday afternoon, and the audience was limited only by the seating capacity of the auditorium.

The day's programme was rather severe in its characteristics as a whole, and, despite the earnest and always artistic efforts of the singers, it lacked some of the element of contrast which made the former recitals so uniformly interesting.

In the joint efforts of the singers the ever popular duet, "Oh, that we two were Maying," took the usual prominence, and this tuneful setting of the familiar verses has seldom been better sung by these artists than on this occasion. A duet from Handel's "Julius Cæsar" began the concert, and the familiar one from "Don Pasquale" ended the day's selections.

Mr. Henschel was particularly happy in his singing of "The song of the harem keeper," from Mozart's "Il Seraglio," and an aria from Haydn's "Orfeo," and he gave a sufficiently dramatic interpretation of Schumann's dreadful ballad, "Die Lowenbraut." He was heard with great pleasure in Loewe's ballad, "The Erl-King," and his singing of the song from Brahms' "Magellone" was also much enjoyed.

Mrs. Henschel was fairly inspired in her singing of the group of French compositions, consisting of "Le Soir," by Thomas; an air from Saint-Saens, "Samson et Dalila" and Bizet's "Vieille Chanson," all of which were given with the most captivating grace.

It is doubtless well nigh impossible to control the temperature in any auditorium in such changeable weather as has prevailed of late, but the fact remains that all the enjoyment given by the singers yesterday hardly compensated for the physical suffering endured by those who were compelled to breath the lifeless air of the hall over and over again.

The last recital of the Henschels will be given next Saturday afternoon.

Times, New York, N.Y.

Date 4-3

—The programme of Mr. Eugen d'Albert's first recital at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, on Tuesday afternoon next, includes Beethoven; thirty-two variations in C minor, and the same composer's sonatas, Opuses 53, 90, 109, and 110. Thursday, Mr. d'Albert will perform works by Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Schubert, Strauss-Tausig, and Liszt, and Saturday he will interpret compositions by Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubinstein, and Liszt.

[174]

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

St Louis Mo

EUGEN D'ALBERT AND PADEREWSKI COMPARED.

4-3

The Former Is the Philosopher and the Latter Is the Poet of the Musical World—D'Albert's Recital Here Last Week Created a Favorable Impression — Gossip.

EUGEN D'ALBERT'S second appearance in St. Louis in a single recital at Entertainment Hall on Tuesday evening was welcomed by a large, attentive and highly appreciative audience, composed almost wholly of musicians, professional and amateur. The programme was an interesting and generous one, and D'Albert was great throughout. His playing was characterized by the fine, true touch, large breadth of style and absolute perfection of technique which belong to him as one of the first of virtuosos. But those who looked for the immense dynamic force, the resistless, rushing impetuosity which so vividly impressed them when he played here two years ago must have felt a difference, subtle but unmistakable, in the D'Albert of last Tuesday evening. The dynamic power, the restless impetuosity and the tremendous climaxes were still there, but ordered, controlled.

The young giant has grown during the past two years and has happily attained that last best gift of noble minds, control of self. This was evident from the first phrases of the opening number, the Bach Prelude and Fugue, and appeared conspicuously in the closing one, Liszt's "Tarantelle," given with an ease and lightness which did not, however, detract from its brilliancy. His greatest effect was made without doubt in the splendid Raff Suite in D minor, rendered with a wealth and mastery of technical and intellectual resource which created a stir in the audience, culminating, in the concluding march movement, in a burst of irrepressible enthusiasm. A complete contrast to this, and, to some tastes, the gem of the whole performance, was the little A minor rondo of Mozart, given as an encore to the first part of the programme. It was a delicious bit of artistic work, and a delightful glimpse of the lost art of simplicity, very refreshing in this highly sophisticated, overwrought and self-conscious period.

It seems rather strange and is somewhat disappointing that D'Albert, who is known pre-eminently as a Beethoven player, should have given us on his first visit a single sonata of the master, and on Tuesday evening the little-known sonata, opus 90, which is properly not a sonata at all, having only two movements. It is, of course, not less valuable on that account, possessing many beauties of theme and treatment wholly Beethovenesque, but the whole is cast in a subdued minor key, wherein the voice of tragedy and the strife of passion and fate which we have learned to associate with the sombre majesty of his name are strangely absent.

D'ALBERT AND PADEREWSKI.

It seems almost inevitable to compare D'Albert with Paderewski, though such comparisons are more or less futile and unsatisfactory, and it hardly seems the square thing to set "one glory" against "another glory." I should say, however, that D'Albert is the expounder in musical art and Paderewski the singer. D'Albert is the philosopher and Paderewski the poet. But neither of these distinctions is quite exact, for if we are tempted to allow D'Albert the pre-eminence in intellectuality and power, we cannot fairly do so when we remember Paderewski in the "Erl King," for instance, and in certain Beethoven renditions, and his tenderness has something of an equivalent in the pathos and sentiment of D'Albert in the Beethoven number, opus 90. D'Albert may be drifting towards the cold and arid regions of "objective" art, but he is yet a great way off; while Paderewski, the tender, the strong, with the aureola of poesy about his young head, remains, will remain for many, the one—"the only!"

N Y Sun 4-

The Henschels.

The third recital given by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel yesterday afternoon, in response to many requests for a repetition of one of their charming afternoons of song, was as crowded as the former concerts had been, and the artists were warmly applauded and often encored. Mrs. Henschel sang many light and brilliant songs, among the prettiest of them all being a "Polish Song" by Paderewski, "Midi au Village," by Goring-Thomas, and a "Serenade" by Massenet. The refinement of style of these admirable musicians is a wonderful and potent lesson, as well as a delight, to all who hear them. No entertainment could be more truly musical, in the best sense of the word, or more refreshing and stimulating to the best thoughts than is a "Henschel Recital."

Eugen d'Albert is to be heard again in New York this week, and the reappearance of this famous pianist will be an event of great interest and pleasure to New York's music-loving public. He is to be heard in three recitals during the coming week, all to be given in the Madison Square Garden concert hall. They will occur on the afternoons of Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, April 5, 7, and 9. The first recital, on Tuesday, will be devoted exclusively to Beethoven's music, the programme being made up of his "Thirty-two Variations in C minor" and his Sonatas opuses 53, 90, 109, and 110. On Thursday D'Albert will play a mixed programme which includes numbers by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Schubert, Bach-d'Albert, Strauss-Taussig, and Liszt. Saturday's recital will include selections from Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubinstein, and Liszt.

Date 4-5

Herr Eugen d'Albert will give three piano recitals this week at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday afternoons. The first programme is devoted to Beethoven, the second to Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Tausig and Liszt, and the third to Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubinstein and Liszt.

FREE PRESS, Detroit, Mich.

Date 4-2

The D'Albert Recital.

Eugen D'Albert, the great pianist, gave a recital at the Detroit Opera House yesterday afternoon, the like of which has not been afforded to Detroit musicians since Rubinstein was here. During the past two seasons there has not been a lack of skilled pianists here and a glance over the following will give an idea of what opportunities this city has had, within a comparatively brief time, of judging what piano playing is: Ignatz Jan Paderewski, Von Bulow, Xaver Scharwenka, Vladmir De Pachmann, Joseffy, Alfred Gruenfeld, Adele Lewing, Constantin Sternberg, Helen Hopekirk, Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler and Henri Waller. When it comes to the greatest of this list of genuine artists discrimination narrows to a fine point, and no reasonable mind would care to tip the scale of merit one way or another.

D'Albert may unquestionably be placed at the head of the list as an artist, however, and if he is to be compared at all it will be with Von Bulow and Paderewski. In some respects D'Albert and Paderewski are alike—in their universality and in their absolute devotedness to the sentiment of each composition. This is said to be a divine spark of genius born with their respective abilities to create music, which both possess in no ordinary degree. No one in Detroit ever honestly felt that Paderewski's "Menuet a L'Antique" amounted to much until he played it himself here, and few pianists would be able to draw the charm from D'Albert's rondo, which he played as a closing encore piece yesterday, unless they first heard him interpret it.

In all of D'Albert's programme yesterday there were ever recurring instances of his masterful command of the piano, of his technical or mechanical ability; but the charm lay in his interpretations and in the absolute attention which he gave to his subject. Listeners were awed at times by his complete absorption in a passage and would a moment later be almost thrilled by a sudden fiery and dramatic transition. D'Albert did not play Chopin with any greater skill than De Pachmann, but the latter could not have executed Liszt's tarantelle, "Napoli." Neither can it be justly said that in strong dramatic work D'Albert is greater than Scharwenka, but the latter does not possess the infinite ability of D'Albert in finer and more poetic compositions. D'Albert's greatness lies in his ability to play everything perfectly. His programme yesterday included "Passacaglia" in C minor, Bach-D'Albert; Beethoven's "Sonata" in C op. 53 (four movements), Berceuse op. 57, Valse op. 42 and Sonata op. 58, Chopin; Schubert's "Impromptu" and Liszt's Valse "Impromptu" and Tarantelle, Napoli. For encore pieces he played Mozart's "Rondo" in A minor, and "The Sweet," a rondo by himself. The latter was his first composition. There was a very fair audience present and the pianist was very enthusiastically received. One of the pianist's admirers sent him a bouquet of flowers, which he received with evident embarrassment, but he passed it to a hand from the flies and covered his confusion by his music.

NEWS, Detroit, Mich.

ate 4-2

THE D'ALBERT RECITAL.

He May Not Be a Genius, but He Pleases.

There certainly has been no lack of opportunity here during the past few months for music-lovers to hear and judge for themselves regarding the merits of pianists whose qualities have received the highest commendation from what are recognized as the most reliable critical sources. In nearly every case the pianist has been given a reception which would compare favorably with the adulation accorded in other cities, notably in the east where art-devotees are given to lionizing the favored few in true Angloманiac fashion. Eugen D'Albert, who appeared in a recital yesterday afternoon at the Detroit opera house, aroused his auditors to a fair degree of enthusiasm by his superb rendition of an interesting program. It was not the sort of an ovation that was accorded Paderewski who, surrounded by all manner of sensational attributes, found it an easy task to fill every seat in the theater upon two occasions with tickets at an advanced figure. The audience was not so large yesterday afternoon as the occasion merited, while the various numbers were received in a critical, appreciative and admiring spirit rather than with the blind, unthinking adulation that greeted the talented Pole.

With the perfect technique of the Liszt school, D'Albert's playing left nothing to be desired in the way of execution. Whether he is a genius is a matter of opinion and is still a subject for discussion among critics in the musical centers. But after all, geniuses are not always to be depended upon, and D'Albert is sufficiently great to command admiration from the best musicians at all times. He doesn't look exactly as you think a genius should. He has no marked peculiarities, but is in appearance a little man with a German type of face, not spirituelle like Liszt, strong and mighty like Rubinstein, or "weary and worn with conflicting passions" like Paderewski. On the contrary, it is a bright, rosy face, such as is attributed to a German student who is prone to sit by the festive board and to lift his maas of beer with a hearty "Prost." D'Albert's only mannerism was a tendency to lean over the keyboards when he came to a passage which required careful, soft treatment, and to listen to the tones with his head about six inches above his fingers. His general bearing was agreeable and modest.

The program was highly appreciated, especially by musicians, its various numbers covering as they did compositions ranging from the stately, massive style of Bach to the rhapsodical Liszt.

Eve. Post, New York, N.Y.

ate 4-4

The programme of Mr. Eugen d'Albert's first recital, at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, on Tuesday afternoon next, includes Beethoven, thirty-two variations in C minor, and the same composer's sonatas, opuses 53, 90, 109, and 110. Thursday, Mr. d'Albert will perform works by Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Schubert, Strauss-Tausig, and Liszt; and Saturday he will interpret compositions by Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubinstein, and Liszt.

IV.

Bluish eyes and rosy cheeks
  And little dimples in the chin,
And thus looks my sweetheart
  That my whole love did win.
And an A and an E,
  And to part worries me,
And to love keeps one tossing
  Like a boat on the sea.

If the forest is gloomy,
  'Tis because of the leaves;
That my love doth not love me
  One hardly believes;
And a rifle to shoot with,
  And a ball to be thrown,
And a maiden to fondle
  Must every lad own.

DUETTO BUFFO from "DON PASQUALE." . . . . DONIZETTI

MR. and MRS. HENSCHEL.

Norina. My part I'll play, if not offending
'Gainst my lover 's repose and quiet.
Faith I'll storm it, rage and riot,
Well the plot with me will fare.
Dr. Malatesta. Ernest long I've been befriending,
Ever his welfare my first care deeming,
Purport none has this our scheming,
Save Pasquale to ensnare.
Norina. For a bargain I will aid you.
Malatesta. In your part when I've perfect made you.
Norina. Would you have me haughty?
  Then perhaps dejected?
Malatesta. No, that's not what I've projected.
Norina. Shall I melt in tears,
Sob and sigh dejected?
Proudly refuse to weep or sigh?
Malatesta. For a moment, just to listen only try.
You must play the simple zany.
Norina. The simple zany!
  In that part I could teach many.
Malatesta. In your part I'll perfect make you—Neck low bending, lips tight closing,— Norina. Quite a picture thus composing,— "I'm a young girl and a shy one."
Malatesta. Brava, brava, little sly one,
  Nought can beat that air demure.
Norina. Thank you kindly, sir, I'm sure.
Norina. Haste we, fly we,
Haste we, and try we this plot enchanting.
Courage I've plenty, nought is wanting.
Malatesta. Charged the mine is,
Of its bursting erelong will be heard the sound.
Norina. Soon shall this old fellow's noddle
Be set spinning round and round.
Now my vengeance is nearly crowned.
Malatesta. E'en now of the storm that's nearing
I the flash and crash am hearing.
Norina. What I'd settle he'd undo it,
But my vengeance, he soon shall rue it.
Yes, my plans to win are bound.
Malatesta. Little thinks poor Don Pasquale
How the weather's getting squally.
How the storm that now is brewing
Soon will flash and crash around.
Brava, you'll do with that air demure.
Norina. Thank you kindly, sir, I'm sure.

Fourth Recital, Saturday Afternoon, April 9, at 2.30. Tickets on sale, Box Office, Music Hall.

GEO. H. ELLIS, PRINTER, 141 FRANKLIN ST., BOSTON.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
WEDNESDAY MORNING APRIL 6, 1892.

The Henschel Recital.

The third of the four song recitals given by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel in the Meionaon attracted an unusually large audience of friends and admirers yesterday afternoon. Despite the facts that the crowded room was warm almost to suffocation and that both artists were somewhat subject to the penalties of Boston spring weather, the recital proved another successful effort. Where two such eminent vocalists were concerned, that a thoroughly acceptable rendering of the programme was given, ça va sans dire. The succession of the various numbers afforded agreeable contrast, as much in difference of school as in sentiment.

In the first group, Mr. Henschel's excellent method, and true artistic feeling gave delightful expression to Mozart's great gift of melody in a song from "Il Seraglio," and rendered deeply impressive a contrite "Busslied" by Beethoven. Next followed three well-known Schubert lieder, "Mignon's Song," "Auf dein wasser zu singen"—a lovely barcarolle—and "Geheimes," all given by Mrs. Henschel with good effect. Continuing in the German vein, Mr. Henschel showed a masterly conception of Schumann's dramatic instinct in the "Loewenbrant," but hardly satisfied the demand for powerful vocal resource which this class of the great composer's music makes on most singers. The companion ballad, a setting of the "Erl King," by Loewé, though meritorious, and given with artistic regard to tone color in impersonating the four voices, suffered in comparison with Schubert's immortal version of the song. The next three numbers were sung charmingly by Mrs. Henschel in characteristically French style. An aria from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Dalila" was particularly well appreciated: the others, also French songs, being vocal bon-bons of agreeable flavor. Rubinstein's "Asra" and "Golden rolls here beneath me," were most acceptable, as they always are, and also a song of Brahms' from the "Magellane." Mr. Henschel's own compositions were among the gems; graceful, melodious and musicianly in accompaniment. His version of the familiar duet, "Oh, that we two were maying," still in manuscript, is well worthy to be linked with this sublime beat of Charles Kingsley's great human heart. Of the original ballads "O fair is the lass" is remarkably dainty, and called forth a hearty encore, to which Mrs. Henschel responded with a repetition.

The final number was a duetto buffo from Donizetti's "Don Pasquale." Mrs. Henschel had an excellent opportunity to display her facile technique, while Mr. Henschel's change of voice to suit the part evinced a wonderful versatility in voice production. His accompaniments during the recital formed a valuable lesson in this all-important and separate accomplishment.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 97.
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 6, 1892.

Third of the Henschel Recitals at the Meionaon.

The third of the series of vocal recitals by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel was given at the Meionaon yesterday afternoon, and the audience was limited only by the seating capacity of the auditorium.

The day's programme was rather severe in its characteristics as a whole, and, despite the earnest and always artistic efforts of the singers, it lacked some of the elements of contrast which made the former recitals so uniformly interesting.

In the joint efforts of the singers the ever popular duet, "Oh, that we two were Maying," took the usual prominence, and this tuneful setting of the familiar verses has seldom been better sung by these artists than on this occasion. A duet from Handel's "Julius Cæsar" began the concert, and the familiar one from "Don Pasquale" ended the day's selections.

Mr. Henschel was particularly happy in his singing of "The song of the harem keeper," from Mozart's "Il Seraglio," and an aria from Haydn's "Orfeo," and he gave a sufficiently dramatic interpretation of Schumann's dreadful ballad, "Die Lowenbraut." He was heard with great pleasure in Loewe's ballad, "The Erl-King," and his singing of the song from Brahms' "Magellone" was also much enjoyed.

Mrs. Henschel was fairly inspired in her singing of the group of French compositions, consisting of "Le Soir," by Thomas; an air from Saint-Saens, "Samson et Dalila" and Bizet's "Vieille Chanson," all of which were given with the most captivating grace.

It is doubtless well nigh impossible to control the temperature in any auditorium in such changeable weather as has prevailed of late, but the fact remains that all the enjoyment given by the singers yesterday hardly compensated for the physical suffering endured by those who were compelled to breath the lifeless air of the hall over and over again.

The last recital of the Henschels will be given next Saturday afternoon.

Times, New York, N. Y.
Date 4-3

—The programme of Mr. Eugen d'Albert's first recital at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, on Tuesday afternoon next, includes Beethoven; thirty-two variations in C minor, and the same composer's sonatas, Opuses 53, 90, 109, and 110. Thursday, Mr. d'Albert will perform works by Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Schubert, Strauss-Tausig, and Liszt, and Saturday he will interpret compositions by Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubinstein, and Liszt.

EUGEN D'ALBE
REWSKI C

The Former is the Philosopher a
Is the Poet of the Musical W bert's Recital Here Last Nig
a Favorable Impression — C

EUGEN D'
second appea
Louis in a si at Entertain on Tues
ing was by a larg and high ative aud posed al of music fessional teur. T gramme teresting erous c D'Albert
throughou playing w terized by true touch, large breadth of style lute perfection of technique which him as one of the first of virtuo those who looked for the immense force, the resistless, rushing im which so vividly impressed them played here two years ag have felt a difference, subtle mistakable, in the D'Albert of las evening. The dynamic power, the impetuosity and the tremendous were still there, but ordered, contr
The young giant has grown du past two years and has happily atta last best gift of noble minds, c self. This was evident from the first of the opening number, the Bach and Fugue, and appeared conspic the closing one, Liszt's "Tara given with an ease and lightness w not, however, detract from its br
His greatest effect was made withou in the splendid Raff Suite in D rendered with a wealth and mastery nical and intellectual resource which a stir in the audience, culminating concluding march movement, in of irrepressible enthusiasm. A c contrast to this, and, to some the gem of the whole performance.
little A minor rondo of Mozart, give encore to the first part of the progra was a delicious bit of artistic work, a lightful glimpse of the lost art of sim very refreshing in this highly sophist overwrought and self-conscious perio
It seems rather strange and is somew appointing that D'Albert, who is kno eminently as a Beethoven player, have given us on his first visit a single of the master, and on Tuesday even little-known sonata, opus 90, which i erly not a sonata at all, having o movements. It is, of course, not le uable on that account, possessing beauties of theme and treatment Beethovenesque, but the whole is ca subdued minor key, wherein the v tragedy and the strife of passion a which we have learned to associate w sombre majesty of his name are str absent.

D'ALBERT AND PADEREWSKI.

It seems almost inevitable to co D'Albert with Paderewski, though such parisons are more or less futile and u factory, and it hardly seems the square to set "one glory" against "a glory." I should say, however, that bert is the expounder in musical a Paderewski the singer. D'Albert philosopher and Paderewski the poet.
neither of these distinctions is quite for if we are tempted to allow D'Albe pre-eminence in intellectuality and p we cannot fairly do so when we rem Paderewski in the "Erl King," for inst and in certain Beethoven renditions, a tenderness has something of an equiv in the pathos and sentiment of D'Alb the Beethoven number, opus 90. D'A may be drifting towards the cold and regions of "objective" art, but he is great way off; while Paderewski, the te the strong, with the aureola of poesy his young head, remains, will remai many, the one—"the only!"

N Y Sun
4/3

The Henschels.

The third recital given by Mr. and Mrs.
schel yesterday afternoon, in response to m requests for a repetition of one of their cha ing afternoons of song, was as crowded as former concerts had been, and the artists warmly applauded and often encored.
Henschel sang many light and brilliant so among the prettiest of them all being a " lish Song" by Paderewski, "Midi au lage," by Goring-Thomas, and a "Serena by Massenet. The refinement of style of th admirable musicians is a wonderful potent lesson, as well as a delight, to all hear them. No entertainment could be m truly musical, in the best sense of the word, more refreshing and stimulating to the b thoughts than is a "Henschel Recital."

Eugen d'Albert is to be heard again in New York t week, and the reappearance of this famous pianist w be an event of great interest and pleasure to New Yor music-loving public. He is to be heard in three recit during the coming week, all to be given in the Madis Square Garden concert hall. They will occur on t afternoons of Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, Ap 5, 7, and 9. The first recital, on Tuesday, will be d voted exclusively to Beethoven's music, the programm being made up of his "Thirty-two Variations in minor" and his Sonatas opuses 53, 90, 109, and 110.
Thursday D'Albert will play a mixed programme whi includes numbers by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Ra Schubert, Bach-d'Albert, Strauss-Taussig, and Lis
Saturday's recital will include selections from Bac
Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubinstein, and Liszt.

Date 4-5

Date ....

A FINAL HENSCHEL RECITAL.

For the Henschels' supplementary recital, which was given before the usual large audience yesterday afternoon in Chickering hall, the programme was of a more modern and interesting character than at the previous recitals.

Nothing better in its way than Mrs. Henschel's singing of such dainty masterpieces as Goring Thomas' "Midi au Village" and Massenet's "Sérénade de Zanetto" can be heard anywhere, while in Mr. Henschel's songs heard yesterday she was, of course, equally perfect.

Mr. Henschel sang, among other things, two of Loewe's ballads and the "Two Grenadiers," and together Mr. and Mrs. Henschel gave great pleasure with Mr. Henschel's exquisite "Gondoliera" duo.

Clipping from Tribune, New York, N.Y.
Date 4-3

Eugen d' Albert's first recital will take place in the concert hall of the Madison Square Garden on next Tuesday afternoon. It will be devoted wholly to Beethoven's music, the compositions being the Thirty-two Variations in C minor, and the Sonatas op. 53, 90, 109 and 110.

Wagner himself and his nearest representatives have always regretfully admitted the need of better vocalism than has been the rule under German conditions. A race of singers trained to the Italian vocal method, but imbued with the earnestness and dramatic sincerity of the German traditions, was what Wagner always sighed for and what his widow now hopes to develop.

It is reported in the East that Mr. Higginson, of Boston, by whose munificent donations the Boston Symphony Orchestra was called into existence and supported, has, in his will, set aside the sum of $1,000,000 to be a fund for the maintenance of that organization after his decease. If this be true, and there is no reason to think that Mr. Higginson would leave this pet project of his unprovided for, he deserves the thanks of all music lovers. The Boston Symphony Orchestra stands to-day unsurpassed, and this has been made possible only by the firm financial backing it had in its younger days when it was crude in make-up and more local in its field of operations. There is a lesson here for our Chicago millionaires who are interested in the Thomas orchestra.—Presto.

---

ever picks up a musical paper, by the way, [illegible] programmes from various parts of the musical world containing the name of [illegible] Pittsburger, Mr. Ethelbert Nevin.

MR. AND MRS. GEORG HENSCHEL have begun the American tour which will bring them to Pittsburg next month with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Their peculiarly delightful song recitals, famous through both continents, will occupy most of the tour, in addition to some appearances with the peerless orchestra that Mr. Henschel organized and conducted for the first three years. Pittsburgers would enjoy hearing this rarely gifted artist-couple in both species of entertainment, and maybe we will.

N.Y. Herald
Apr 3

Eugen d'Albert will give three piano recitals this week at Madison Garden Concert Hall, on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday afternoon at 2.30.

The third and last Henschel Vocal Recital yesterday afternoon was very well attended and proved most enjoyable. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel now start on a tour through the Western cities, returning here later in the season.

The Boston
Symphony
Orchestra.

ELEVENTH SEASON,
1891-92.

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH,
Conductor.

. . PRESS COMMENTS . .

N.Y. World, November 4, 1891.
"Among the three or four foremost orchestras of the world."

N.Y. Sun, November 4, 1891.
"The palm of supremacy over all kindred organizations on this side of the water."

N.Y. Herald, November 4, 1891.
"The finest body of strings ever heard in this country."

N.Y. Recorder, November 4, 1891.
"Nothing like it in New York, neither in quality nor in ensemble."

N.Y. Evening Post, November 4, 1891.
"As a Schumann conductor, Mr. Nikisch has no superior, perhaps no equal."

Philadelphia Press, November 5, 1891.
"In the foreground of renown in America."

Philadelphia Inquirer, November 5, 1891.
"A prospect of the most brilliant season in its history."

Philadelphia Record, November 5, 1891.
"The most proficient band of musicians ever organized in this country."

Brooklyn Eagle, November 7, 1891.
"The rival of any force of the kind in the world."

Baltimore American, November 6, 1891.
"Enthusiastically received by the whole audience."

Boston Transcript
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 6, 1892.

THE HENSCHEL RECITALS.

Meionaon: The Henschel Recitals.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave their third vocal recital in the Meionaon yesterday afternoon, the programme being as follows:

Duet from "Giulio Cesare" .... Handel
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Song of the Harem-keeper, from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail" .... Mozart
Aria from "Orfeo" .... Haydn
Busslied .... Beethoven
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's Song / Auf dem Wasser zu singen / Geheimes .... Schubert
Mrs. Henschel.
Ballad, Die Löwenbraut .... Schumann
Ballad, Der Erlkönig .... Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
Le Soir .... Thomas
Air, "Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila" .... Saint-Saëns
Vieille Chanson .... Bizet
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet, "Oh, that we two were Maying!" .... Henschel
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Der Asra / Persisches Lied .... Rubinstein
Song from "Die schöne Magelone" .... Brahms
Mr. Henschel.
Ballad, "Es war ein alter König" / Four Lieder im Volkston .... Henschel
Mrs. Henschel.
Duetto buffo from "Don Pasquale" .... Donizetti
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

Another delightful concert, barring the sheolesque temperature of the hall. Handel's noble duet was admirably sung. Then came two of the finest pieces of singing that Mr. Henschel has ever given us; the harem-keeper's song, the melancholy humor of which, with its doleful "Tra-la-lera," he rendered to perfection, and Beethoven's great "Busslied," in which he rose to the most sublime heights of exalted religious fervor of expression. He was grand, too, in the two ballads by Schumann and Loewe, the immediate juxtaposition of which showed once more Loewe's superior mastery over this form of writing. In Schumann's "Löwenbraut," in spite of some vividly suggestive bits of tone-painting, especially in the accompaniment, one has a constant sense of effort; in Loewe's "Erlkönig," on the other hand, the inspiration flows as freely as water from a spring. Exceedingly fine, also, was Mr. Henschel's singing of the songs by Rubinstein and Brahms; we were particularly glad to hear him take the "Gold rollt mir zu Füssen" as slow as he did, thus preserving the true Oriental character and expression of the melody.

Mrs. Henschel was unspeakably delightful in the three Schubert songs—by the way, it seems that we are having "Mignon" dished up with every possible sauce: first by Beethoven, then by Liszt and now by Schubert—and she did what fine singing could do for the rather flaccid things by Ambroise Thomas and Bizet. It was a somewhat daring experiment, singing Saint-Saëns's mighty "Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix" transposed for soprano; Mrs. Henschel sang it with infinite beauty of expression and admirable finish of style; but her very purity and sincerity of feeling gave the music a strangely false character. Hers was a very innocent, earnestly pleading Dalila; one found none of the certainty of victorious seduction that is the prime essence of Saint-Saëns's "Verse-moi l'ivresse." There is no use arguing that Dalila's character may have been this, that or the other thing; Scriptural history, which was not written by the Philistines, may possibly have done her grievous injustice, and she may have been really a most estimable and patriotic person. But in legend she stands as the type of something not entirely estimable, and it is with her legendary character alone that art has anything to do; and it is just this character that Mrs. Henschel fails to portray. But, to make up for this, she sang the five songs by her husband as charmingly as possible.

Few people have yet tired of Mr. Henschel's lovely "Oh that we two were Maying," and it was good indeed to hear it again. It revived, however, in us a feeling that we remember having had before, namely, that this form of duet, canon in the unison, or octave, may very easily be made tiresome; this is particularly true in the case of a distinct and well articulated modern melody, like that of this duet. The two voices are so precisely the same, one catches the melody and retains it so easily, that, after a while, it becomes a little irksome to hear the second voice constantly singing on the wrong part of the measure; its melody seems somehow wrong and out of gear. This is far less to be felt in canons in other intervals, say in the second, or seventh; for here the second voice (the consequent) is not an exact reproduction of the first (the antecedent), and the ear is not led to accept it as the same tune, but as only an imitation of it; the enforced displacement of the rythmic accent is, accordingly, less perplexing, because less noticeable. Still, we would be understood to make this stricture rather upon the form of the melodious canon in the octave, in general, then upon this undeniably charming duet, in particular; for Mr. Henschel has shown no little skill in veiling this defect as well as might be. It was so deliciously sung that an encore was inevitable, and the two artists responded with Mr. Henschel's, to our thinking, still more bewitching little canon, "Kein Feuer, keine Kohle," which capped the climax of fascination. Norina and Dottore Malatesta's sparkling duet from "Don Pasquale" was given with all the brilliancy and humorous verve that belong to it, and brought the concert to a joyous close

The programme for the public rehearsal, Friday afternoon, and concert, Saturday night, of the Symphony Orchestra, at the Music Hall, is Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala"; "The Mermaid," ballad for orchestra, de Mihalovich (first time); Symphony No. 2, A major, "In the Spring," Paine.

Boston Journal.
FRIDAY, APRIL 8, 1892.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel are to give their final song recital to-morrow evening at the Meionaon.

Three piano recitals are to be given by Eugen D'Albert on the afternoons of April 18, 20 and 23. This eminent pianist will devote the first recital entirely to the works of Beethoven. The sale of seats opens this morning at Music Hall.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 6

After all is said, Boston is still entitled to her last word in music. When anything really worthy of appreciation becomes known, it will not lack the acknowledgment. The Henschels' for instance, always have crowded houses, because all musical Boston known that as artists they have few equals; and as individuals they are quite as delightful. Mrs. Henschel has a most peculiar face, almost of the Madonna type, if it were not for the mingling of the classic. Her forehead is low and broad, like that of a grecian statue, and she wears her chestnut hair drawn softly away with a parting in the middle and an entire absence of "bang" that contributes largely to the sweet serenity which is the distinguishing characteristic of her face.

* * * * *

What eclectic tastes we possess, most of us! Lillian Nordica comes and her gay coquetry of manner and espiègle face bewitch us all into unconditional surrender. Lillian Henschel comes, and her soft gravity and serene dignity seem the most charming attributes possible.

THE CLEVELAND PRESS
CLEVELAND, O., FRIDAY, APRIL 1, 1892

D'Albert's Concert.

Eugen D'Albert, one of the few really great pianists, played at Music hall before a small audience, Thursday night. Music hall is always full of distractions. People who have lived in Cleveland long enough to belong to the pioneer society and ought to know better trailed into the hall, way through the second number on the program Thursday night, while small boys on a fire escape outside an open window projected discordant whistles and cat-calls into the auditorium as D'Albert was hammering out the harmonies of Beethoven. In spite of this people enjoyed the music, especially was it enjoyable to those who like abstract music and who care more for intricate harmony and difficult problems of technique than for rhythm and tune. Coming just after Paderewsky it is impossible to avoid comparison. The difference between D'Albert and the Polander is the difference between science and art.

D'Albert is coldly correct and his rendering of Beethoven, the most intellectual of composers, is faultless. His left hand playing is simply marvelous.

The recital was made up of numbers from Mendelssohn, Raff, Chopin, Liszt, Beethoven and Bach. But D'Albert is not a romantic player and his rendering of Chopin was disappointing.

PLAIN DEALER.
FRIDAY, APRIL 1, 1892.

D'ALBERT'S CONCERT.

He Gives a Brilliant Recital in Music Hall—The Program.

Eugen D'Albert appeared in Music hall last night. His audience was not half what his performance merited. Indeed, it was very small, but D'Albert did not seem at all discouraged, for he played with fire and animation. There is much that is purely mechanical in piano playing. The mastery of the keyboard is a science that has been greatly simplified by improved methods of manipulation in recent years and anyone with natural aptitude and conscientious effort may become a fair player. But beyond the mere technique, which D'Albert has in perfection, there lies the great field of expression and poetic inspiration. D'Albert is a bold player. He is a vivid player. He is accounted the foremost exponent of Beethoven, and his fine rendition of the sonata in E minor, op. 90, justifies his reputation. Like a painter who splashes on color with a boldness that staggers the critic, knowing full well that he cannot o'erstep the modesty of nature, for the most brilliant pigments are several shades duller than nature, so D'Albert heaps on the coloring and makes a picture glowing in tone. There is breadth and depth and feeling to his playing. There is soul in it. Coming so soon after Paderewski it is but natural to compare him to the Polish genius. Both have great virility and both are sensational in their effects. D'Albert's program was long and embraced selections from Bach, Mendelssohn, Chopin and Liszt. The concluding number, Liszt's "Liebestraum No. 3" and tarentelle "Napoli," full of soft, liquid music, was given delicately and well and earned generous applause.

Times, New York, N.Y.
Date 4-7

AMUSEMENT NOTES.

—Eugen d'Albert's second piano recital will be given this afternoon in the Concert Hall of the Madison Square Garden. The programme will consist of Bach's prelude and fugue in D major, Beethoven's sonata, Opus 78; Mendelssohn's "Variations Sérieuses," Raff's suite in D minor, Opus 91; Schubert's impromptu, Opus 90, No. 3; the Strauss-Tausig valse, "Man lebt nur einmal," and Liszt's "Lieberstraum," No. 3, and "Rhapsodie Espagnole."

FRIDAY, APRIL 1,

"THE LITTLE GIANT."

He Captures a Cultured and Critical Audience at His Concert in Music Hall —The Manner of His Playing.

A fair sized audience, including a number of critical musicians and pianists, with a large complement of the upper ten, greeted the pianist D'Albert in Music Hall last evening. He is small in stature, but genius burns through his keen black eyes, and he has been aptly called "the little giant," for his power and talents are indeed tremendous. His work is master-work throughout, but too thoroughly stamped with his own individualism for comparison with that of others. He may be like Tausig, for technical difficulties are but child's play to him, his complete mastery over them challenging the admiration of his hearers. But there all comparison should cease. His Beethoven playing is superb, for he reads his lines according to the master's meaning, without affectation of giving any other. Joined to his wonderful technique he has an immense conception of musical sentiment, and has the easiest imaginable way of expressing it. His delicacy of touch and genius for charming the ear with clear liquid scale passages is wonderful, especially when contrasted with the equally wonderful gymnastic feats which his fingers and hands perform. His skips and jumps literally amaze those who see them, but he never fails to strike the right key. Withal he knows how to arouse the beautiful singing tone that so few pianists are able to coax from the instrument, and he knows, too, how to make the piano sing poetry. He holds his audience spellbound to the last. His programme was: "Prelude and Fugue," in D major, Bach-D'Albert; "Sonate" in E minor, Beethoven; "Variations Serieuses," Mendelssohn; "Suite" in D minor, Raff; "Berceuse" and "Valse op. 42," Chopin; "Liebestraum" and Tarentelle "Napoli," Liszt.

The Telegram.
THURSDAY, APRIL 7, 1892.

SIXTH AND LAST.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Brilliantly Closes the Season.

The sixth and last concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Infantry hall last night was a fitting ending to a series of concerts that have presented to Providence music lovers such rare entertainment as is available nowhere on the face of the globe except where the Boston Symphony orchestra appears. Sweeping as is this declaration, it is based upon the deliberate judgment of expert musicians who are qualified to pronounce judgment by their acquaintance with the present standing of the German orchestras and the work of the Boston.

The program last night included Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala," a Chopin in E minor, Schumann's symphony No. 1 in B flat, a triple number for the piano, including one Schubert and two Liszts, and Wagner's "Huldigungs March."

The soloist was Eugen d'Albert, who has just begun an American tour under Mr. Ellis's management. This excellent artist labored under the same disadvantage that afflicted De Pachman; that of coming in the wake of Paderewski; yet his delicate and sympathetic work was thoroughly appreciated by the audience, especially in the second and third movements of the Chopin concerto and the concluding Liszt number. He was recalled again and again, and only when the piano was moved away and the members of the orchestra flocked in again was the attempt to induce him to respond to the encore abandoned.

The three orchestra numbers were peculiarly adapted to leave the most delightful memories with the audience and stimulate the appetite for the prospective season of concerts next year. The resources of the splendid organization were exhibited to perfection in all the numbers. The Goldmark overture is eminently Goldmarkian, and therefore eminently enjoyable. The Wagnerian march is not like Wagner as we know him by his operas, but it is splendidly inspiring and stirring.

The audience was not quite as large as usual, owing doubtless to the interest in the election returns.

[175]

Clipping from 4-3

Date

A FINAL HENSCHEL RECITAL.

For the Henschels' supplementary recital, which was given before the usual large audience yesterday afternoon in Chickering hall, the programme was of a more modern and interesting character than at the previous recitals.

Nothing better in its way than Mrs. Henschel's singing of such dainty masterpieces as Goring Thomas' "Midi au Village" and Massenet's "Sérénade de Zanetto" can be heard anywhere, while in Mr. Henschel's songs heard yesterday she was, of course, equally perfect.

Mr. Henschel sang, among other things, two of Loewe's ballads and the "Two Grenadiers," and together Mr. and Mrs. Henschel gave great pleasure with Mr. Henschel's exquisite "Gondoliera" duo.

Clipping from Tribune, New York, N.Y.

Date 4-8

Eugen d' Albert's first recital will take place in the concert hall of the Madison Square Garden on next Tuesday afternoon. It will be devoted wholly to Beethoven's music, the compositions being the Thirty-two Variations in C minor, and the Sonatas op. 53, 90, 109 and 110.

Wagner himself and his nearest representatives have always regretfully admitted the need of better vocalism than has been the rule under German conditions. A race of singers trained to the Italian vocal method, but imbued with the earnestness and dramatic sincerity of the German traditions, was what Wagner always sighed for and what his widow now hopes to develop.

It is reported in the East that Mr. Higginson, of Boston, by whose munificent donations the Boston Symphony Orchestra was called into existence and supported, has, in his will, set aside the sum of $1,000,000 to be a fund for the maintenance of that organization after his decease. If this be true, and there is no reason to think that Mr. Higginson would leave this pet project of his unprovided for, he deserves the thanks of all music lovers. The Boston Symphony Orchestra stands to-day unsurpassed, and this has been made possible only by the firm financial backing it had in its younger days when it was crude in make-up and more local in its field of operations. There is a lesson here for our Chicago millionaires who are interested in the Thomas orchestra.—Presto.

---

ever picks up a musical paper, by the way, without seeing programmes from various parts of the musical world containing the name of a former Pittsburger, Mr. Ethelbert Nevin.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel have begun the American tour which will bring them to Pittsburg next month with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Their peculiarly delightful song recitals, famous through both continents, will occupy most of the tour, in addition to some appearances with the peerless orchestra that Mr. Henschel organized and conducted for the first three years. Pittsburgers would enjoy hearing this rarely gifted artist-couple in both species of entertainment, and maybe we will.

Mr. Eugen d'Albert will give three piano recitals this week at Madison Garden Concert Hall, on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday afternoon at 2.30.

The third and last Henschel Vocal Recital yesterday afternoon was very well attended and proved most enjoyable. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel now start on a tour through the Western cities, returning here later in the season.

The Boston
Symphony
Orchestra.

ELEVENTH SEASON,
1891-92.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH,
Conductor.

. . PRESS COMMENTS . .

N. Y. World, November 4, 1891.
"Among the three or four foremost orchestras of the world."

N. Y. Sun, November 4, 1891.
"The palm of supremacy over all kindred organizations on this side of the water."

N. Y. Herald, November 4, 1891
"The finest body of strings ever heard in this country."

N. Y. Recorder, November 4, 1891.
"Nothing like it in New York, neither in quality nor in ensemble."

N. Y. Evening Post, November 4, 1891.
"As a Schumann conductor, Mr. Nikisch has no superior, perhaps no equal"

Philadelphia Press, November 5, 1891.
"In the foreground of renown in America."

Philadelphia Inquirer, November 5, 1891.
"A prospect of the most brilliant season in its history."

Philadelphia Record, November 5, 1891.
"The most proficient band of musicians ever organized in this country."

Brooklyn Eagle, November 7, 1891.
"The rival of any force of the kind in the world."

Baltimore American, November 6, 1891.
"Enthusiastically received by the whole audience."

Boston Transcript
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 6, 1892.

THE HENSCHEL RECITALS.

Meionaon: The Henschel Recitals.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave their third vocal recital in the Meionaon yesterday afternoon, the programme being as follows:

Duet from "Giulio Cesare" .... Handel
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Song of the Harem-keeper, from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail" .... Mozart
Aria from "Orfeo" .... Haydn
Bussiied .... Beethoven
Mr. Henschel.
Mignon's Song
Auf dem Wasser zu singen } .... Schubert
Geheimes
Mrs. Henschel.
Ballad, Die Löwenbraut .... Schumann
Ballad, Der Erlkönig .... Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
Le Soir .... Thomas
Air, "Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila" .... Saint-Saëns
Vieille Chanson .... Bizet
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet, "Oh, that we two were Maying!" .... Henschel
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Der Asra
Persisches Lied } .... Rubinstein
Song from "Die schöne Magelone" .... Brahms
Mr. Henschel.
Ballad, "Es war ein alter König"
Four Lieder im Volkston } .... Henschel
Mrs. Henschel.
Duetto buffo from "Don Pasquale" .... Donizetti
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

Another delightful concert, barring the sheolesque temperature of the hall. Handel's noble duet was admirably sung. Then came two of the finest pieces of singing that Mr. Henschel has ever given us; the harem-keeper's song, the melancholy humor of which, with its doleful "Tra-la-lera," he rendered to perfection, and Beethoven's great "Busslied," in which he rose to the most sublime heights of exalted religious fervor of expression. He was grand, too, in the two ballads by Schumann and Loewe, the immediate juxtaposition of which showed once more Loewe's superior mastery over this form of writing. In Schumann's "Löwenbraut," in spite of some vividly suggestive bits of tone-painting, especially in the accompaniment, one has a constant sense of effort; in Loewe's "Erlkönig," on the other hand, the inspiration flows as freely as water from a spring. Exceedingly fine, also, was Mr. Henschel's singing of the songs by Rubinstein and Brahms; we were particularly glad to hear him take the "Gold rollt mir zu Füssen" as slow as he did, thus preserving the true Oriental character and expression of the melody.

Mrs. Henschel was unspeakably delightful in the three Schubert songs—by the way, it seems that we are having "Mignon" dished up with every possible sauce: first by Beethoven, then by Liszt and now by Schubert—and she did what fine singing could do for the rather flaccid things by Ambroise Thomas and Bizet. It was a somewhat daring experiment, singing Saint-Saëns's mighty "Mon cœur s'ouvre á ta voix" transposed for soprano; Mrs. Henschel sang it with infinite beauty of expression and admirable finish of style; but her very purity and sincerity of feeling gave the music a strangely false character. Hers was a very innocent, earnestly pleading Dalila; one found none of the certainty of victorious seduction that is the prime essence of Saint-Saëns's "Verse-moi l'inresse." There is no use arguing that Dalila's character may have been this, that or the other thing: Scriptural history, which was not written by the Philistines, may possibly have done her grievous injustice, and she may have been really a most estimable and patriotic person. But in legend she stands as the type of something not entirely estimable, and it is with her legendary character alone that art has anything to do; and it is just this character that Mrs. Henschel fails to portray. But, to make up for this, she sang the five songs by her husband as charmingly as possible.

Few people have yet tired of Mr. Henschel's lovely "Oh that we two were Maying," and it was good indeed to hear it again. It revived, however, in us a feeling that we remember having had before, namely, that this form of duet, canon in the unison, or octave, may very easily be made tiresome; this is particularly true in the case of a distinct and well articulated modern melody, like that of this duet. The two voices are so precisely the same, one catches the melody and retains it so easily, that, after a while, it becomes a little irksome to hear the second voice constantly singing on the wrong part of the measure; its melody seems somehow wrong and out of gear. This is far less to be felt in canons in other intervals, say in the second, or seventh; for here the second voice (the consequent) is not an exact reproduction of the first (the antecedent), and the ear is not led to accept it as the same tune, but as only an imitation of it; the enforced displacement of the rythmic accent is, accordingly, less perplexing, because less noticeable. Still, we would be understood to make this stricture rather upon the form of the melodious canon in the octave, in general, then upon this undeniably charming duet, in particular; for Mr. Henschel has shown no little skill in veiling this defect as well as might be. It was so deliciously sung that an encore was inevitable, and the two artists responded with Mr. Henschel's, to our thinking, still more bewitching little canon, "Kein Feuer, keine Kohle," which capped the climax of fascination. Norina and Dottore Malatesta's sparkling duet from "Don Pasquale" was given with all the brilliancy and humorous verve that belong to it, and brought the concert to a joyous close

The programme for the public rehearsal, Friday afternoon, and concert, Saturday night, of the Symphony Orchestra, at the Music Hall, is Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala"; "The Mermaid," ballad for orchestra, de Mihalovich (first time); Symphony No. 2, A major, "In the Spring," Paine.

Boston Journal.
FRIDAY, APRIL 8, 1892.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel are to give their final song recital to-morrow evening at the Meionaon.

Three piano recitals are to be given by Eugen D'Albert on the afternoons of April 18, 20 and 23. This eminent pianist will devote the first recital entirely to the works of Beethoven. The sale of seats opens this morning at Music Hall.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 6.

After all is said, Boston is still entitled to her last word in music. When anything really worthy of appreciation becomes known, it will not lack the acknowledgment. The Henschels' for instance, always have crowded houses, because all musical Boston known that as artists they have few equals; and as individuals they are quite as delightful. Mrs. Henschel has a most peculiar face, almost of the Madonna type, if it were not for the mingling of the classic. Her forehead is low and broad, like that of a grecian statue, and she wears her chestnut hair drawn softly away with a parting in the middle and an entire absence of "bang" that contributes largely to the sweet serenity which is the distinguishing characteristic of her face.

* * * * *

What eclectic tastes we possess, most of us! Lillian Nordica comes and her gay coquetry of manner and espiègle face bewitch us all into unconditional surrender. Lillian Henschel comes, and her soft gravity and serene dignity seem the most charming attributes possible.

THE CLEVELAND PRESS
CLEVELAND, O., FRIDAY, APRIL 1, 1892

D'Albert's Concert.

Eugen D'Albert, one of the few really great pianists, played at Music hall before a small audience, Thursday night. Music hall is always full of distractions. People who have lived in Cleveland long enough to belong to the pioneer society and ought to know better trailed into the hall, way through the second number on the program, Thursday night, while small boys on a fire escape outside an open window projected discordant whistles and cat-calls into the auditorium as D'Albert was hammering out the harmonies of Beethoven. In spite of this people enjoyed the music, especially was it enjoyable to those who like abstract music and who care more for intricate harmony and difficult problems of technique than for rhythm and tune. Coming just after Paderewsky it is impossible to avoid comparison. The difference between D'Albert and the Polander is the difference between science and art.

D'Albert is coldly correct and his rendering of Beethoven, the most intellectual of composers, is faultless. His left hand playing is simply marvelous.

The recital was made up of numbers from Mendelssohn, Raff, Chopin, Liszt, Beethoven and Bach. But D'Albert is not a romantic player and his rendering of Chopin was disappointing.

PLAIN DEALER.
FRIDAY, APRIL 1, 1892.

D'ALBERT'S CONCERT.

He Gives a Brilliant Recital in Music Hall—The Program.

Eugen D'Albert appeared in Music hall last night. His audience was not half what his performance merited. Indeed, it was very small, but D'Albert did not seem at all discouraged, for he played with fire and animation. There is much that is purely mechanical in piano playing. The mastery of the keyboard is a science that has been greatly simplified by improved methods of manipulation in recent years and anyone with natural aptitude and conscientious effort may become a fair player. But beyond the mere technique, which D'Albert has in perfection, there lies the great field of expression and poetic inspiration. D'Albert is a bold player. He is a vivid player. He is accounted the foremost exponent of Beethoven, and his fine rendition of the sonata in E minor, op. 90, justifies his reputation. Like a painter who splashes on color with a boldness that staggers the critic, knowing full well that he cannot o'erstep the modesty of nature, for the most brilliant pigments are several shades duller than nature, so D'Albert heaps on the coloring and makes a picture glowing in tone. There is breadth and depth and feeling to his playing. There is soul in it. Coming so soon after Paderewski it is but natural to compare him to the Polish genius. Both have great virility and both are sensational in their effects. D'Albert's program was long and embraced selections from Bach, Mendelssohn, Chopin and Liszt. The concluding number, Liszt's "Liebestraum No. 3" and tarentelle "Napoli," full of soft, liquid music, was given delicately and well and earned generous applause.

Times, New York, N.Y.

Date 4-7

AMUSEMENT NOTES.

—Eugen d'Albert's second piano recital will be given this afternoon in the Concert Hall of the Madison Square Garden. The programme will consist of Bach's prelude and fugue in D major, Beethoven's sonata, Opus 78; Mendelssohn's "Variations Sérieuses," Raff's suite in D minor, Opus 91; Schubert's impromptu, Opus 90, No. 3; the Strauss-Tausig valse, "Man lebt nur einmal," and Liszt's "Lieberstraum," No. 3, and "Rhapsodie Espagnole."

The Cleveland Leader.
FRIDAY, APRIL 1, 1892.

"THE LITTLE GIANT."

He Captures a Cultured and Critical Audience at His Concert in Music Hall —The Manner of His Playing.

A fair sized audience, including a number of critical musicians and pianists, with a large complement of the upper ten, greeted the pianist D'Albert in Music Hall last evening. He is small in stature, but genius burns through his keen black eyes, and he has been aptly called "the little giant," for his power and talents are indeed tremendous. His work is master-work throughout, but too thoroughly stamped with his own individualism for comparison with that of others. He may be like Tausig, for technical difficulties are but child's play to him, his complete mastery over them challenging the admiration of his hearers. But there all comparison should cease. His Beethoven playing is superb, for he reads his lines according to the master's meaning, without affectation of giving any other. Joined to his wonderful technique he has an immense conception of musical sentiment, and has the easiest imaginable way of expressing it. His delicacy of touch and genius for charming the ear with clear liquid scale passages is wonderful, especially when contrasted with the equally wonderful gymnastic feats which his fingers and hands perform. His skips and jumps literally amaze those who see them, but he never fails to strike the right key. Withal he knows how to arouse the beautiful singing tone that so few pianists are able to coax from the instrument, and he knows, too, how to make the piano sing poetry. He holds his audience spellbound to the last. His programme was: "Prelude and Fugue," in D major, Bach-D'Albert; "Sonate" in E minor, Beethoven; "Variations Serieuses," Mendelssohn; "Suite" in D minor, Raff; "Berceuse" and "Valse op. 42," Chopin; "Liebestraum" and Tarentelle "Napoli," Liszt.

The Telegram.
THURSDAY, APRIL 7, 1892.

SIXTH AND LAST.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Brilliantly Closes the Season.

The sixth and last concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Infantry hall last night was a fitting ending to a series of concerts that have presented to Providence music lovers such rare entertainment as is available nowhere on the face of the globe except where the Boston Symphony orchestra appears. Sweeping as is this declaration, it is based upon the deliberate judgment of expert musicians who are qualified to pronounce judgment by their acquaintance with the present standing of the German orchestras and the work of the Boston.

The program last night included Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala," a Chopin in E minor, Schumann's symphony No. 1 in B flat, a triple number for the piano, including one Schubert and two Liszts, and Wagner's "Huldigungs March."

The soloist was Eugen d'Albert, who has just begun an American tour under Mr. Ellis's management. This excellent artist labored under the same disadvantage that afflicted De Pachman; that of coming in the wake of Paderewski; yet his delicate and sympathetic work was thoroughly appreciated by the audience, especially in the second and third movements of the Chopin concerto and the concluding Liszt number. He was recalled again and again, and only when the piano was moved away and the members of the orchestra flocked in again was the attempt to induce him to respond to the encore abandoned.

The three orchestra numbers were peculiarly adapted to leave the most delightful memories with the audience and stimulate the appetite for the prospective season of concerts next year. The resources of the splendid organization were exhibited to perfection in all the numbers. The Goldmark overture is eminently Goldmarkian, and therefore eminently enjoyable. The Wagnerian march is not like Wagner as we know him by his operas, but it is splendidly inspiring and stirring.

The audience was not quite as large as usual, owing doubtless to the interest in the election returns.

[175]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 6, 1892.

BOSTON OFFICE OF THE MUSICAL COURIER,
157 TREMONT STREET, April 2, 1892.

THE twenty-first concert by the Symphony Orchestra was given this evening. The soloists were Mr. Ch. Molé, Mr. Heinrich Schuëcker and Mr. Heinrich Meyn, and the program was:

Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch"	Mendelssohn
Andante and Allegro from concerto for flute and harp	Mozart
Serenade for string orchestra, in F major	Volkmann
"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walküre"	Wagner

In his reading of the familiar but ever delightful "Scotch" symphony Mr. Nikisch was guilty of taking undue liberties with the score. In several instances, two at least, the tempi were radically changed from the explicit metronomic directions of Mendelssohn, on account of which alteration the whole effect was entirely different from that intended by the composer.

Mendelssohn also caused to be printed upon the first page of the score, immediately following the dedication to Her Majesty Queen Victoria, instructions to the effect that between the movements no pauses should be made, and that the audience should be told so through the medium of the program.

It is customary, however, to make these waits, and between the first and second movements is almost unavoidable, owing to the interruption caused by that insufferable nuisance, the late comer. Between the following movements we think Mendelssohn's intentions should be respected and observed.

In the two movements from the Mozart concerto for flute and harp, both Mr. Molé and Mr. Schuëcker won very hearty applause.

Both deserved it, as their performance was quite faultless from all points of view. Mr. Schuëcker, since his coming to Boston, has shown us what the harp can be as a solo instrument. His execution is most facile and clean, and his tone deliciously musical and sweet.

Last in order was "Wotan's Farewell," and the "Fire Charm," with Mr. Meyn as the singer. Mr. Meyn is a gentleman who, barring the lack of a few trifles in the way of voice method and musical intelligence generally, would have been quite acceptable. What we could hear of his effort indicated, at least, no lack of earnestness.

The orchestra, as usual, was prompt in attack, smooth in its light and shade, and finished in every detail. The program for the next concert will be:

Overture, "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
Ballade for orchestra, "The Mermaid" (First time.)	Edmond de Mihalovich
Symphony No. 2, in A major, "In the Spring"	J. K. Paine

The Last Henschel Recital.

A THIRD and supplementary recital was given by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel last Saturday afternoon at Chickering Hall, with the following delightful program:

Duet from "Giannina and Bernardone"	Cimarosa
"Vergissmeinnicht"	J. S. Bach
Aria from "Rinaldo"	Händel
Mr. Henschel.
"Nymphs and Shepherds"	Purcell
Old Irish songs—
"The Little Red Lark"
"The Glen of Kenmare"
Mrs. Henschel.
Ballad, "Archibald Douglas"	Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
Polish song	Paderewski
"Midi au Village"	A. Goring Thomas
"Sérénade du Passant" ("Zanetta")	Massenet
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet, "Gondoliera"	Henschel
Ballad, "The Ruined Mill"	Loewe
Ballad, "The Grenadiers"	Schumann
Mr. Henschel.
Three songs from Kingsley's "Water Babies"	Henschel
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet from "Les Voitures Versées"	Boieldieu

The public were so charmed with these artists' incomparable interpretations that they could have sung double the quantity and yet the audience would not have had enough.

Mrs. Henschel gave perfect gems in all that is meant by bel canto, viz., beauty of tone, tone coloring, tone spinning, wonderful articulation and true expression.

Mr. Henschel's dramatic interpretation of the Händel aria and Löwe's much too rarely heard ballad "Archibald Douglas" and the more popular "Grenadiers" by Schumann also deserves unqualified praise, especially for absolute technical perfection and mastery of tone and pronunciation as well as musical intelligence.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will be the soloists at the last Boston symphony orchestra concert and the next concert of the Musurgia.

Mr. Eugen d'Albert will give three piano recitals in Music Hall on the afternoons of April 18, 21 and 23. The program for the first recital will be devoted exclusively to the compositions of Beethoven.

Owing to the unusual amount of information which it will contain and the consequent additional labor its com-

---

EVENING BULLETIN.

THURSDAY, APRIL 7, 1892.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Closing Performance of the Boston Orchestra at Infantry Hall.

The annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have long been justly regarded as the chief events of the musical season in this city. So high an authority as the great Russian composer, Anton Rubinstein, has declared that the highest expression of musical art comes through its instrumental forms. Another musician of high repute, the great pianist, Paderewski, has voiced the belief of many when he declared that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the finest organization of its kind in existence. It is therefore a matter for congratulation that we have been favored this season with six concerts by this magnificent band in place of the usual three or four. Some notable programmes have been offered and some excellent playing done, but it is safe to say that the programme of last night's concert has not been exceeded in interest by any of the others, and that it received an interpretation which will long be remembered by those who heard it as surpassing even the usual finished excellence which we have learned to expect. The soloist for the evening was Mr. Eugen D'Albert, and the programme ran as follows:

Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Concerto for Pianoforte in E-minor, op. 11, Chopin; Symphony, No. 1, in B-flat, Schumann; soli for pianoforte, (a) Impromptu, op. 90, No. 3, Schubert; (b) Valse, Impromptu, Liszt; (c) Tarentelle, "Venezia e Napoli," Liszt; "Huldigungs March," Wagner.

The overture by Goldmark, which opened the concert, is a striking piece of orchestration. It abounds in sudden surprises, violent contrasts of piano and forte, etc., while yet adhering closely to recognized musical forms, and proceeding on the usual lines of both harmonic and symphonic development. This composer first obtained a hearing through the generosity of Rubinstein, and his works, though comparatively few in number, are highly thought of abroad. Although a Hungarian by birth, his compositions lack the flavor usually found in the musicians of that nationality, and seem patterned rather after the German school, though by no means deficient in originality or power. A tendency to over elaboration and a fondness for striking contrasts run through all his music. This "Sakuntala" overture is one of his best works, and it is needless to say that its beauties were fully displayed and enhanced by the superb rendering accorded it at the hands of Mr. Nikisch and his players.

Schumann's symphony in B-flat, which formed the second orchestral number, was his first attempt in the larger forms of musical composition. But, although the work of one young in years, it shows little, if any, trace of immaturity of musical thought, or lack of mastery of the means of musical expression. The themes are fresh and melodious, and lend themselves easily to the demands of counterpoint and the devices of imitation and development. Though not so highly esteemed by musicians as some of his later orchestral works, it is perhaps to the average listener the most pleasing of them all, from the very fact that it does not grope in mystic depths after the unattainable, but speaks with the voice of youth and happiness, the spirit of poetry and romance, and the sound of melodious, untrammelled harmony. Hearty applause followed the close of each of its four movements, showing that the audience fully enjoyed its manifold beauties and the combined delicacy and force with which every shade of expression was faithfully reproduced in its rendering.

The march of Wagner's which closed the evening's performance made a brilliant ending to a thoroughly enjoyable programme, and displayed in a marked degree the original and peculiar methods of this greatest of modern composers and most remarkable of all orchestral writers. No one save Wagner could construct such a bewildering maze of gorgeous tone color, intricate interweaving of impressive themes, and contrast of wood, brass and strings, or so pile climax upon climax till it would seem impossible to mount any higher. It needs such a combination of artists as the Boston orchestra presents, however, to bring out the full effect of such a work. It is only necessary to say that ample justice was done the music on this occasion, and that so the orchestral season closed with one of its most impressive performances.

The pianist of the evening, Mr. Eugen D'Albert, is the youngest player now before the public, that is to say, of acknowledged ability and high reputation. A pupil for years of Liszt, he has been hailed by many as the legitimate successor of that undisputed monarch of the keyboard. Whether future development of his admitted remarkable ability will land him on that lofty pinnacle, remains to be seen. At present there are other—and very formidable—competitors in the field. But there can be no question as to his right to a place in the very front rank of living pianists. Mr. D'Albert has the reputation, among other things, of being a Beethoven player par excellence, yet his contributions to last night's programme did not include any of that composer's works. But the Chopin concerto in E-minor, which he played with the orchestra, offers ample scope for the exploiting of a pianist's ability besides being an extremely agreeable one to listen to. His performance of this greatest work of the famous "piano poet" was beyond criticism, and at its conclusion conductor Nikisch and the orchestra joined in the applause which the audience bestowed in liberal measure. In his group of solos the Schubert number and the Liszt waltz served to exhibit his complete mastery of melody playing and delicacy of touch, and the closing "Tarantelle" was an example of bravura playing which has not been exceeded by any of the noted pianists whom we have had the pleasure of hearing here this season.

The concert, as a whole, was certainly one of the best of the series. Every number on the programme was of more than ordinary interest, and the orchestra played with exceptional fire and vigor. Their shading was wonderful in its accuracy and perfect balance, while the power brought out in their phenomenal crescendos was fairly startling. Mr. Nikisch is a model conductor. The most admirable taste characterizes his readings, and his complete mastery of himself no less than of his men is so evident that it lends an added charm as well as a comfortable sense of security in listening to the playing of this magnificent orchestra. The yearly visits of this organization to our city have been a fruitful source of gain in general musical culture, as well as a means of much pleasure, and many expressions of regret were to be heard last night that the close of the symphony season had arrived.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, APRIL 7, 1892.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Closing Performance of the Boston Orchestra at Infantry Hall.

The annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have long been justly regarded as the chief events of the musical season in this city. So high an authority as the great Russian composer, Anton Rubinstein, has declared that the highest expression of musical art comes through its instrumental forms. Another musician of high repute, the great pianist, Paderewski, has voiced the belief of many when he declared that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the finest organization of its kind in existence. It is therefore a matter for congratulation that we have been favored this season with six concerts by this magnificent band in place of the usual three or four. Some notable programmes have been offered and some excellent playing done, but it is safe to say that the programme of last night's concert has not been exceeded in interest by any of the others, and that it received an interpretation which will long be remembered by those who heard it as surpassing even the usual finished excellence which we have learned to expect. The soloist for the evening was Mr. Eugen D'Albert, and the programme ran as follows:

Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Concerto for Pianoforte in E-minor, op. 11, Chopin; Symphony, No. 1, in B-flat, Schumann; soli for pianoforte, (a) Impromptu, op. 90, No. 3, Schubert; (b) Valse, Impromptu, Liszt; (c) Tarentelle, "Venezia e Napoli," Liszt; "Huldigungs March," Wagner.

The overture by Goldmark, which opened the concert, is a striking piece of orchestration. It abounds in sudden surprises, violent contrasts of piano and forte, etc., while yet adhering closely to recognized musical forms, and proceeding on the usual lines of both harmonic and symphonic development. This composer first obtained a hearing through the generosity of Rubinstein, and his works, though comparatively few in number, are highly thought of abroad. Although a Hungarian by birth, his compositions lack the flavor usually found in the musicians of that nationality, and seem patterned rather after the German school, though by no means deficient in originality or power. A tendency to over elaboration and a fondness for striking contrasts run through all his music. This "Sakuntala" overture is one of his best works, and it is needless to say that its beauties were fully displayed and enhanced by the superb rendering accorded it at the hands of Mr. Nikisch and his players.

Schumann's symphony in B-flat, which formed the second orchestral number, was his first attempt in the larger forms of musical composition. But, although the work of one young in years, it shows little, if any, trace of immaturity of musical thought, or lack of mastery of the means of musical expression. The themes are fresh and melodious, and lend themselves easily to the demands of counterpoint and the devices of imitation and development. Though not so highly esteemed by musicians as some of his later orchestral works, it is perhaps to the average listener the most pleasing of them all, from the very fact that it does not grope in mystic depths after the unattainable, but speaks with the voice of youth and happiness, the spirit of poetry and romance, and the sound of melodious, untrammelled harmony. Hearty applause followed the close of each of its four movements, showing that the audience fully enjoyed its manifold beauties and the combined delicacy and force with which every shade of expression was faithfully reproduced in its rendering.

The march of Wagner's which closed the evening's performance made a brilliant ending to a thoroughly enjoyable programme, and displayed in a marked degree the original and peculiar methods of this greatest of modern composers and most remarkable of all orchestral writers. No one save Wagner could construct such a bewildering maze of gorgeous tone color, intricate interweaving of impressive themes, and contrast of wood, brass and strings, or so pile climax upon climax till it would seem impossible to mount any higher. It needs such a combination of artists as the Boston orchestra presents, however, to bring out the full effect of such a work. It is only necessary to say that ample justice was done the music on this occasion, and that so the orchestral season closed with one of its most impressive performances.

The pianist of the evening, Mr. Eugen D'Albert, is the youngest player now before the public, that is to say, of acknowledged ability and high reputation. A pupil for years of Liszt, he has been hailed by many as the legitimate successor of that undisputed monarch of the keyboard. Whether future development of his admitted remarkable ability will land him on that lofty pinnacle, remains to be seen. At present there are other—and very formidable—competitors in the field. But there can be no question as to his right to a place in the very front rank of living pianists. Mr. D'Albert has the reputation, among other things, of being a Beethoven player par excellence, yet his contributions to last night's programme did not include any of that composer's works. But the Chopin concerto in E-minor, which he played with the orchestra, offers ample scope for the exploiting of a pianist's ability besides being an extremely agreeable one to listen to. His performance of this greatest work of the famous "piano poet" was beyond criticism, and at its conclusion conductor Nikisch and the orchestra joined in the applause which the audience bestowed in liberal measure. In his group of solos the Schubert number and the Liszt waltz served to exhibit his complete mastery of melody playing and delicacy of touch, and the closing "Tarantelle" was an example of bravura playing which has not been exceeded by any of the noted pianists whom we have had the pleasure of hearing here this season.

The concert, as a whole, was certainly one of the best of the series. Every number on the programme was of more than ordinary interest, and the orchestra played with exceptional fire and vigor. Their shading was wonderful in its accuracy and perfect balance, while the power brought out in their phenomenal crescendos was fairly startling. Mr. Nikisch is a model conductor. The most admirable taste characterizes his readings, and his complete mastery of himself no less than of his men is so evident that it lends an added charm as well as a comfortable sense of security in listening to the playing of this magnificent orchestra. The yearly visits of this organization to our city have been a fruitful source of gain in general musical culture, as well as a means of much pleasure, and many expressions of regret were to be heard last night that the close of the symphony season had arrived.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 9, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

People who like to get excitement and effect out of their Symphony concerts ought to have been satisfied at the twenty-first of the series; for although the middle part of the programme moved placidly enough, the last number was intrinsically tremendous in noise, while in the first Mr. Nikisch exceeded even the extravagant limits of false reading which he is wont to allow himself when the fantasy takes him. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony is so well known and its beauties are so obvious that the Music Hall audience is always prepared to welcome it. Perhaps on this account and to give the hearers something to astonish them, or perhaps again to contend against the almost mephitic torpor and torridity of the atmosphere, Mr. Nikisch chose to deliver this work in frequent violation of principle, custom, good sense and the author's express injunctions. It is probably idle now to protest against the wrong which Mr. Nikisch does to the cause, the study and the understanding of music; he seems to feel himself so firm in his position as to defy any criticism and to set at naught judgment and propriety. But truth demands that his unmusicianly freaks shall be set down as falsifications of art and that the thoughtless and ignorant shall be warned against being led by nervous excitement into accepting them as true and good expositions. The symphony was followed by the andante and allegro from a harp and flute concerto by Mozart, which Mr. Schuecker and Mr. Molé played delightfully after they got into tune with the band. Not great music nor exciting—such could not be got out of these two instruments; but suave, fluent, bright, naive and wholesome. The honesty and purity of it deserve to be kept fresh in mind by an occasional performance in these days of sophistication and learned dogmatism. Next came Volkmann's serenade in F for strings, which might better have been omitted, for it has no particular quality except an easy-going cleverness and a respectable prettiness to recommend it to a place in an important programme. The concert ended with one of the few extracts from the master which the Wagnerians ever dare to put forward as absolute music—"Wotan's Farewell" and the "Fire Charm" from the "Valkyre." The orchestra went at it with a will and all the earlier part roared and blared and crashed so that only now and then could anybody hear Mr. Meyn, who was making herculean efforts to have Wotan's speeches appear (rari nantes in gurgite vasto) now and then in the oceanic volumes of sound. The fire music had a lighter movement and a more elastic force, but even this not only lost some character by displacement from the stage, but did not equal in brilliancy, flash and sweep some other renderings which we remember.

For tonight the programme will be Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture; a new Russian work, the orchestral ballad called "The Mermaid," by Edmond De Mihalovikh, and Professor J. K. Paine's "Spring" symphony.

D'ALBERT.

Mr. D'Albert's concert tour follows so closely upon that of the distinguished Polish pianist, that amateurs of pianoforte music will be glad to have the opportunity of comparing the two artists while the memory of Paderewski's playing is still fresh. The D'Albert tour has already begun advantageously in New York, and the dates are now set for three recitals to be given in Boston Music Hall, these being the afternoons of the 18th, 20th and 23d of this month. At the first, the programme will be composed entirely of five Beethoven sonatas, the selection being so made as to show D'Albert's strength as an interpreter of that music—a department in which he ranks among the first.

THE HENSCHELS.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will give this afternoon in the Meionaon the last of their four recitals. To dwell upon the exceeding interest and delight of these concerts would be little better than an aggravation of a desire which must probably go unsatisfied unless the reader have possessed himself betimes of tickets, for there have been almost no seats unfilled hitherto. The recital of Tuesday was full of fine contrasts, artfully chosen selections and perfect renderings. Mr. Henschel has not a voice of malleable or generally sympathetic quality; but when he delivers a romantic or descriptive ballad of Löwe—who is unsurpassed in that field—such a passionate outcry as Rubinstein's "Der Azra," or some grave or genial air in which interpenetrative sense is shown in infallible phrasing, he instructs and satisfies fully. Mrs. Henschel was at her best on that afternoon and gave a beautiful touch to her husband's admirably simple and fresh folk-songs, and to the selection from Bizet. Nor should the duets pass without their remembrance, for in them these artists have an unsurpassed unity of understanding and expression. The programme for this afternoon contains many of the choicest things of their repertory, for they have so rich and ample a store in all departments of song that even after many concerts they can always appear yet once more with a bouquet so fresh and fair that one fancies that their garden has known no previous culling.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 6, 1892.

BOSTON OFFICE OF THE MUSICAL COURIER,
157 TREMONT STREET, April 2, 1892.

THE twenty-first concert by the Symphony Orchestra was given this evening. The soloists were Mr. Ch. Molé, Mr. Heinrich Schuëcker and Mr. Heinrich Meyn, and the program was:

Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch"	Mendelssohn
Andante and Allegro from concerto for flute and harp	Mozart
Serenade for string orchestra, in F major	Volkmann
"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walküre"	Wagner

In his reading of the familiar but ever delightful "Scotch" symphony Mr. Nikisch was guilty of taking undue liberties with the score. In several instances, two at least, the tempi were radically changed from the explicit metronomic directions of Mendelssohn, on account of which alteration the whole effect was entirely different from that intended by the composer.

Mendelssohn also caused to be printed upon the first page of the score, immediately following the dedication to Her Majesty Queen Victoria, instructions to the effect that between the movements no pauses should be made, and that the audience should be told so through the medium of the program.

It is customary, however, to make these waits, and between the first and second movements is almost unavoidable, owing to the interruption caused by that insufferable nuisance, the late comer. Between the following movements we think Mendelssohn's intentions should be respected and observed.

In the two movements from the Mozart concerto for flute and harp, both Mr. Molé and Mr. Schuëcker won very hearty applause.

Both deserved it, as their performance was quite faultless from all points of view. Mr. Schuëcker, since his coming to Boston, has shown us what the harp can be as a solo instrument. His execution is most facile and clean, and his tone deliciously musical and sweet.

Last in order was "Wotan's Farewell," and the "Fire Charm," with Mr. Meyn as the singer. Mr. Meyn is a gentleman who, barring the lack of a few trifles in the way of voice method and musical intelligence generally, would have been quite acceptable. What we could hear of his effort indicated, at least, no lack of earnestness.

The orchestra, as usual, was prompt in attack, smooth in its light and shade, and finished in every detail. The program for the next concert will be:

Overture, "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
Ballade for orchestra, "The Mermaid" (First time.)	Edmond de Mihalovich
Symphony No. 2, in A major, "In the Spring"	J. K. Paine

The Last Henschel Recital.

A THIRD and supplementary recital was given by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel last Saturday afternoon at Chickering Hall, with the following delightful program:

Duet from "Giannina and Bernardone"	Cimarosa
"Vergissmeinnicht"	J. S. Bach
Aria from "Rinaldo"	Händel
Mr. Henschel.
"Nymphs and Shepherds"	Purcell
Old Irish songs—
"The Little Red Lark"
"The Glen of Kenmare"
Mrs. Henschel.
Ballad, "Archibald Douglas"	Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
Polish song	Paderewski
"Midi au Village"	A. Goring Thomas
"Sérénade du Passant" ("Zanetta")	Massenet
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet, "Gondoliera"	Henschel
Ballad, "The Ruined Mill"	Loewe
Ballad, "The Grenadiers"	Schumann
Mr. Henschel.
Three songs from Kingsley's "Water Babies"	Henschel
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet from "Les Voitures Versées"	Boieldieu

The public were so charmed with these artists' incomparable interpretations that they could have sung double the quantity and yet the audience would not have had enough.

Mrs. Henschel gave perfect gems in all that is meant by bel canto, viz., beauty of tone, tone coloring, tone spinning, wonderful articulation and true expression.

Mr. Henschel's dramatic interpretation of the Händel aria and Löwe's much too rarely heard ballad "Archibald Douglas" and the more popular "Grenadiers" by Schumann also deserves unqualified praise, especially for absolute technical perfection and mastery of tone and pronunciation as well as musical intelligence.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will be the soloists at the last Boston symphony orchestra concert and the next concert of the Musurgia.

Mr. Eugen d'Albert will give three piano recitals in Music Hall on the afternoons of April 18, 21 and 23. The program for the first recital will be devoted exclusively to the compositions of Beethoven.

Owing to the unusual amount of information which it will contain and the consequent additional labor its com-

---

EVENING BULLETIN.

THURSDAY, APRIL 7, 1892.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.,

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Closing Performance of the Boston Orchestra at Infantry Hall.

The annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have long been justly regarded as the chief events of the musical season in this city. So high an authority as the great Russian composer, Anton Rubinstein, has declared that the highest expression of musical art comes through its instrumental forms. Another musician of high repute, the great pianist, Paderewski, has voiced the belief of many when he declared that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the finest organization of its kind in existence. It is therefore a matter for congratulation that we have been favored this season with six concerts by this magnificent band in place of the usual three or four. Some notable programmes have been offered and some excellent playing done, but it is safe to say that the programme of last night's concert has not been exceeded in interest by any of the others, and that it received an interpretation which will long be remembered by those who heard it as surpassing even the usual finished excellence which we have learned to expect. The soloist for the evening was Mr. Eugen D'Albert, and the programme ran as follows:

Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Concerto for Pianoforte in E-minor, op. 11, Chopin; Symphony, No. 1, in B-flat, Schumann; soli for pianoforte, (a) Impromptu, op. 90, No. 3, Schubert; (b) Valse, Impromptu, Liszt; (c) Tarentelle, "Venezia e Napoli," Liszt; "Huldigungs March," Wagner.

The overture by Goldmark, which opened the concert, is a striking piece of orchestration. It abounds in sudden surprises, violent contrasts of piano and forte, etc., while yet adhering closely to recognized musical forms, and proceeding on the usual lines of both harmonic and symphonic development. This composer first obtained a hearing through the generosity of Rubinstein, and his works, though comparatively few in number, are highly thought of abroad. Although a Hungarian by birth, his compositions lack the flavor usually found in the musicians of that nationality, and seem patterned rather after the German school, though by no means deficient in originality or power. A tendency to over elaboration and a fondness for striking contrasts run through all his music. This "Sakuntala" overture is one of his best works, and it is needless to say that its beauties were fully displayed and enhanced by the superb rendering accorded it at the hands of Mr. Nikisch and his players.

Schumann's symphony in B-flat, which formed the second orchestral number, was his first attempt in the larger forms of musical composition. But, although the work of one young in years, it shows little, if any, trace of immaturity of musical thought, or lack of mastery of the means of musical expression. The themes are fresh and melodious, and lend themselves easily to the demands of counterpoint and the devices of imitation and development. Though not so highly esteemed by musicians as some of his later orchestral works, it is perhaps to the average listener the most pleasing of them all, from the very fact that it does not grope in mystic depths after the unattainable, but speaks with the voice of youth and happiness, the spirit of poetry and romance, and the sound of melodious, untrammelled harmony. Hearty applause followed the close of each of its four movements, showing that the audience fully enjoyed its manifold beauties and the combined delicacy and force with which every shade of expression was faithfully reproduced in its rendering.

The march of Wagner's which closed the evening's performance made a brilliant ending to a thoroughly enjoyable programme, and displayed in a marked degree the original and peculiar methods of this greatest of modern composers and most remarkable of all orchestral writers. No one save Wagner could construct such a bewildering maze of gorgeous tone color, intricate interweaving of impressive themes, and contrast of wood, brass and strings, or so pile climax upon climax till it would seem impossible to mount any higher. It needs such a combination of artists as the Boston orchestra presents, however, to bring out the full effect of such a work. It is only necessary to say that ample justice was done the music on this occasion, and that so the orchestral season closed with one of its most impressive performances.

The pianist of the evening, Mr. Eugen D'Albert, is the youngest player now before the public, that is to say, of acknowledged ability and high reputation. A pupil for years of Liszt, he has been hailed by many as the legitimate successor of that undisputed monarch of the keyboard. Whether future development of his admitted remarkable ability will land him on that lofty pinnacle, remains to be seen. At present there are other—and very formidable—competitors in the field. But there can be no question as to his right to a place in the very front rank of living pianists. Mr. D'Albert has the reputation, among other things, of being a Beethoven player par excellence, yet his contributions to last night's programme did not include any of that composer's works. But the Chopin concerto in E-minor, which he played with the orchestra, offers ample scope for the exploiting of a pianist's ability besides being an extremely agreeable one to listen to. His performance of this greatest work of the famous "piano poet" was beyond criticism, and at its conclusion conductor Nikisch and the orchestra joined in the applause which the audience bestowed in liberal measure. In his group of solos the Schubert number and the Liszt waltz served to exhibit his complete mastery of melody playing and delicacy of touch, and the closing "Tarantelle" was an example of bravura playing which has not been exceeded by any of the noted pianists whom we have had the pleasure of hearing here this season.

The concert, as a whole, was certainly one of the best of the series. Every number on the programme was of more than ordinary interest, and the orchestra played with exceptional fire and vigor. Their shading was wonderful in its accuracy and perfect balance, while the power brought out in their phenomenal crescendos was fairly startling. Mr. Nikisch is a model conductor. The most admirable taste characterizes his readings, and his complete mastery of himself no less than of his men is so evident that it lends an added charm as well as a comfortable sense of security in listening to the playing of this magnificent orchestra. The yearly visits of this organization to our city have been a fruitful source of gain in general musical culture, as well as a means of much pleasure, and many expressions of regret were to be heard last night that the close of the symphony season had arrived.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, APRIL 7, 1892.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Closing Performance of the Boston Orchestra at Infantry Hall.

The annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have long been justly regarded as the chief events of the musical season in this city. So high an authority as the great Russian composer, Anton Rubinstein, has declared that the highest expression of musical art comes through its instrumental forms. Another musician of high repute, the great pianist, Paderewski, has voiced the belief of many when he declared that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the finest organization of its kind in existence. It is therefore a matter for congratulation that we have been favored this season with six concerts by this magnificent band in place of the usual three or four. Some notable programmes have been offered and some excellent playing done, but it is safe to say that the programme of last night's concert has not been exceeded in interest by any of the others, and that it received an interpretation which will long be remembered by those who heard it as surpassing even the usual finished excellence which we have learned to expect. The soloist for the evening was Mr. Eugen D'Albert, and the programme ran as follows:

Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Concerto for Pianoforte in E-minor, op. 11, Chopin; Symphony, No. 1, in B-flat, Schumann; soli for pianoforte, (a) Impromptu, op. 90, No. 3, Schubert; (b) Valse, Impromptu, Liszt; (c) Tarentelle, "Venezia e Napoli," Liszt; "Huldigungs March," Wagner.

The overture by Goldmark, which opened the concert, is a striking piece of orchestration. It abounds in sudden surprises, violent contrasts of piano and forte, etc., while yet adhering closely to recognized musical forms, and proceeding on the usual lines of both harmonic and symphonic development. This composer first obtained a hearing through the generosity of Rubinstein, and his works, though comparatively few in number, are highly thought of abroad. Although a Hungarian by birth, his compositions lack the flavor usually found in the musicians of that nationality, and seem patterned rather after the German school, though by no means deficient in originality or power. A tendency to over elaboration and a fondness for striking contrasts run through all his music. This "Sakuntala" overture is one of his best works, and it is needless to say that its beauties were fully displayed and enhanced by the superb rendering accorded it at the hands of Mr. Nikisch and his players.

Schumann's symphony in B-flat, which formed the second orchestral number, was his first attempt in the larger forms of musical composition. But, although the work of one young in years, it shows little, if any, trace of immaturity of musical thought, or lack of mastery of the means of musical expression. The themes are fresh and melodious, and lend themselves easily to the demands of counterpoint and the devices of imitation and development. Though not so highly esteemed by musicians as some of his later orchestral works, it is perhaps to the average listener the most pleasing of them all, from the very fact that it does not grope in mystic depths after the unattainable, but speaks with the voice of youth and happiness, the spirit of poetry and romance, and the sound of melodious, untrammelled harmony. Hearty applause followed the close of each of its four movements, showing that the audience fully enjoyed its manifold beauties and the combined delicacy and force with which every shade of expression was faithfully reproduced in its rendering.

The march of Wagner's which closed the evening's performance made a brilliant ending to a thoroughly enjoyable programme, and displayed in a marked degree the original and peculiar methods of this greatest of modern composers and most remarkable of all orchestral writers. No one save Wagner could construct such a bewildering maze of gorgeous tone color, intricate interweaving of impressive themes, and contrast of wood, brass and strings, or so pile climax upon climax till it would seem impossible to mount any higher. It needs such a combination of artists as the Boston orchestra presents, however, to bring out the full effect of such a work. It is only necessary to say that ample justice was done the music on this occasion, and that so the orchestral season closed with one of its most impressive performances.

The pianist of the evening, Mr. Eugen D'Albert, is the youngest player now before the public, that is to say, of acknowledged ability and high reputation. A pupil for years of Liszt, he has been hailed by many as the legitimate successor of that undisputed monarch of the keyboard. Whether future development of his admitted remarkable ability will land him on that lofty pinnacle, remains to be seen. At present there are other—and very formidable—competitors in the field. But there can be no question as to his right to a place in the very front rank of living pianists. Mr. D'Albert has the reputation, among other things, of being a Beethoven player par excellence, yet his contributions to last night's programme did not include any of that composer's works. But the Chopin concerto in E-minor, which he played with the orchestra, offers ample scope for the exploiting of a pianist's ability besides being an extremely agreeable one to listen to. His performance of this greatest work of the famous "piano poet" was beyond criticism, and at its conclusion conductor Nikisch and the orchestra joined in the applause which the audience bestowed in liberal measure. In his group of solos the Schubert number and the Liszt waltz served to exhibit his complete mastery of melody playing and delicacy of touch, and the closing "Tarantelle" was an example of bravura playing which has not been exceeded by any of the noted pianists whom we have had the pleasure of hearing here this season.

The concert, as a whole, was certainly one of the best of the series. Every number on the programme was of more than ordinary interest, and the orchestra played with exceptional fire and vigor. Their shading was wonderful in its accuracy and perfect balance, while the power brought out in their phenomenal crescendos was fairly startling. Mr. Nikisch is a model conductor. The most admirable taste characterizes his readings, and his complete mastery of himself no less than of his men is so evident that it lends an added charm as well as a comfortable sense of security in listening to the playing of this magnificent orchestra. The yearly visits of this organization to our city have been a fruitful source of gain in general musical culture, as well as a means of much pleasure, and many expressions of regret were to be heard last night that the close of the symphony season had arrived.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 9, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

People who like to get excitement and effect out of their Symphony concerts ought to have been satisfied at the twenty-first of the series; for although the middle part of the programme moved placidly enough, the last number was intrinsically tremendous in noise, while in the first Mr. Nikisch exceeded even the extravagant limits of false reading which he is wont to allow himself when the fantasy takes him. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony is so well known and its beauties are so obvious that the Music Hall audience is always prepared to welcome it. Perhaps on this account and to give the hearers something to astonish them, or perhaps again to contend against the almost mephitic torpor and torridity of the atmosphere, Mr. Nikisch chose to deliver this work in frequent violation of principle, custom, good sense and the author's express injunctions. It is probably idle now to protest against the wrong which Mr. Nikisch does to the cause, the study and the understanding of music; he seems to feel himself so firm in his position as to defy any criticism and to set at naught judgment and propriety. But truth demands that his unmusicianly freaks shall be set down as falsifications of art and that the thoughtless and ignorant shall be warned against being led by nervous excitement into accepting them as true and good expositions. The symphony was followed by the andante and allegro from a harp and flute concerto by Mozart, which Mr. Schuecker and Mr. Molé played delightfully after they got into tune with the band. Not great music nor exciting—such could not be got out of these two instruments; but suave, fluent, bright, naive and wholesome. The honesty and purity of it deserve to be kept fresh in mind by an occasional performance in these days of sophistication and learned dogmatism. Next came Volkmann's serenade in F for strings, which might better have been omitted, for it has no particular quality except an easy-going cleverness and a respectable prettiness to recommend it to a place in an important programme. The concert ended with one of the few extracts from the master which the Wagnerians ever dare to put forward as absolute music—"Wotan's Farewell" and the "Fire Charm" from the "Valkyre." The orchestra went at it with a will and all the earlier part roared and blared and crashed so that only now and then could anybody hear Mr. Meyn, who was making herculean efforts to have Wotan's speeches appear (rari nantes in gurgite vasto) now and then in the oceanic volumes of sound. The fire music had a lighter movement and a more elastic force, but even this not only lost some character by displacement from the stage, but did not equal in brilliancy, flash and sweep some other renderings which we remember.

For tonight the programme will be Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture; a new Russian work, the orchestral ballad called "The Mermaid," by Edmond De Mihalovikh, and Professor J. K. Paine's "Spring" symphony.

D'ALBERT.

Mr. D'Albert's concert tour follows so closely upon that of the distinguished Polish pianist, that amateurs of pianoforte music will be glad to have the opportunity of comparing the two artists while the memory of Paderewski's playing is still fresh. The D'Albert tour has already begun advantageously in New York, and the dates are now set for three recitals to be given in Boston Music Hall, these being the afternoons of the 18th, 20th and 23d of this month. At the first, the programme will be composed entirely of five Beethoven sonatas, the selection being so made as to show D'Albert's strength as an interpreter of that music—a department in which he ranks among the first.

THE HENSCHELS.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will give this afternoon in the Meionaon the last of their four recitals. To dwell upon the exceeding interest and delight of these concerts would be little better than an aggravation of a desire which must probably go unsatisfied unless the reader have possessed himself betimes of tickets, for there have been almost no seats unfilled hitherto. The recital of Tuesday was full of fine contrasts, artfully chosen selections and perfect renderings. Mr. Henschel has not a voice of malleable or generally sympathetic quality; but when he delivers a romantic or descriptive ballad of Löwe—who is unsurpassed in that field—such a passionate outcry as Rubinstein's "Der Azra," or some grave or genial air in which interpenetrative sense is shown in infallible phrasing, he instructs and satisfies fully. Mrs. Henschel was at her best on that afternoon and gave a beautiful touch to her husband's admirably simple and fresh folk-songs, and to the selection from Bizet. Nor should the duets pass without their remembrance, for in them these artists have an unsurpassed unity of understanding and expression. The programme for this afternoon contains many of the choicest things of their repertory, for they have so rich and ample a store in all departments of song that even after many concerts they can always appear yet once more with a bouquet so fresh and fair that one fancies that their garden has known no previous culling.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, APRIL 9.

THE HENSCHELS.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel gave their third vocal recital on Tuesday afternoon at Meionaon Hall before another such fashionable and interested audience as their singing always calls out. The program on this occasion was made up of selections from Handel, Haydn, Loewe, Schumann, Saint-Saens, Henschel, Schubert, Bizet, Mozart, and Rubenstein. Mr. Henschel's programs must have been arranged with a view to reaching a great climax with the last recital, for they have steadily unfolded increasing beauties at each succeeding performance, and Tuesday's concert was an hour and a half of almost unalloyed delight. Mrs. Henschel's lovely voice was in perfect condition, and she was heard as always to great advantage in the duets with Mr. Henschel. It may be only fancy, but it seems as if the sound of another voice gave her a little less consciousness of her own, and she sings with charming abandon. Mrs. Henschel's work was all so satisfying that it is hard to make special choice, but certain it is that her dainty style suits well the Bizet selections, and she sings always her husband's compositions with an added interest and sympathy in her work that is very taking. Mr. Henschel was heard to great advantage in a dramatic and effective rendering of the "Erlking" of Loewe, songs by Rubenstein and in the duets.

DROPPED NOTES PICKED UP.

Mr. Georg Henschel in a recent lecture before a musical school near London satirized many things of the musical stage, and among others he mentioned something which we saw during the grand opera season. He asked why we should read in the advertisements something like this: "To-night, the successful opera, 'Artineria di Marina,' which has made a universal success, will be followed (or preceded) by Gluck's 'Orfeo,' ending with 'Che Faro.'" He adds: "Just fancy a modern English playwright having written a very successful one-act play which draws crowded houses but does not fill the evening bill, and the manager advertising Mr. So-and-So's successful play will be given to-night followed (or preceded) by Shakespeare's 'Hamlet,' ending with 'To Be or Not to Be!'"

Eugene D'Albert's three piano recitals will be given at Music Hall on the afternoons of Monday, April 18, Wednesday, April 20th, and Saturday, April 23rd. The programs announced are of much interest, and will doubtless attract a host of lovers of the master's work.

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 11, 1892.

Saturday night's Symphony concert presented a programme of excellence, notwithstanding the fact that the numbers were all familiar ones, and rarely has the orchestra appeared to such advantage. Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, John K. Paine's symphony, "In the Spring," consisting of five movements—the departure of winter, the awakening of nature, May night fantasy, a romance of springtime, and the glory of nature—with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, served to make this concert one of the most enjoyable of the course. The absence of a soloist was a most refreshing change, as the opportunities for hearing the orchestra in a programme specially adapted to bring out its best points have been rare. The best number, if there could be a choice in a performance of such uniform merit, was the symphony, "In the Spring." It is a grand work and calls for brilliancy of orchestration, for unusually fine gradations of tone and precision in the solo instruments.

Next week's public rehearsal will take place Thursday afternoon, instead of Friday, and the programme for both Thursday afternoon and evening will consist of D'Albert's symphony in F major, Op.4, first time in America; Handel's aria, "Alessandro"; Henschel's suite from the music to Shakspere's "Hamlet," written for Beerbohm Tree; Massenet's aria from "Herodiade"; Weber's overture, "Oberon." The music of "Hamlet" will receive its first American production on this occasion and will be conducted by the composer. Mrs. Henschel will be the soloist.

Fourth Henschel Recital.

The last recital by this clever couple was given at Meionaon Saturday afternoon. The thorough excellence of their performance, the total absence of even a suspicion of fault in method or interpretation, grows more apparent at each appearance of these modest, unassuming artists. Mr. Henschel exhibited consummate skill in the manner in which he adapted his full baritone voice to the light, sweet soprano of Mrs. Henschel in the closing duet of his own composition, "Gondoliera," which was the best double number of the programme. Mrs. Henschel's best numbers were "Dov e la Lovella," by Henschel; an old Irish ballad, "The Little Red Lark"; Hervey's May Song," and "The Glen of Kenmare," which she gave as an encore.

Music Notices.

Those who attended the Henschel recitals can have little doubt concerning Mrs. Henschel's artistic temperament. All her gowns were made to harmonize with the quaint old ballads in which she excels. She was a veritable picture on Saturday, dressed in a short waisted gown of yellow figured silk, made with a Watteau back, full wrinkled sleeves, the neck cut square and edged with the same pattern of dainty lace that fell over her hands. A band of dull gold against her dark hair was the finishing touch of the costume.

WORLD, Baltimore, Md.

Date 4-8

Eugen D'Albert, who is called "the greatest pianist after Liszt" and who will be heard as a soloist Monday night in the city, is now but 28 years of age, and at the age of 15 composed his first overture, which was performed at St. James hall, London. His first public appearance was at the Philharmonic concerts in Vienna, and in 1882 he was appointed court pianist by the grand duke of Wiemar. His wonderful talent has placed him in the front rank as master of the piano.

The Kneisel quartette will give its second [illegible] concert at Lehmann's April [illegible]

[illegible] symphony orchestra will [illegible] at the Academy [illegible] The so- [illegible]

Season of 1892

Mr. & Mrs. Georg Henschel's

. . Vocal Recitals . .

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

Fourth Recital

MEIONAON,
BOSTON.

Saturday Afternoon, April 9, at 2.30.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

THE BOSTON TIMES

TWENTY-SEVENTH YEAR.

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 10, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-FIRST CONCERT.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert in Music hall, Saturday evening, April 2, was:

Mendelssohn.	Symphony No. 3, in A minor. "Scotch." Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato. — Vivace non troppo. — Adagio. — Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestoso assai.
Mozart.	Andante and Allegro from Concerto for Flute and Harp.
Volkmann.	Serenade for String Orchestra, in F major.
Wagner.	"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkure."

Soloists—Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Charles Molé, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker.

The symphony was played in such a fascinating manner as to elicit hearty commendation and praise from an unusually large audience. There is absolute music in all the movements, but the second was so faultlessly performed that its beauties were made more prominent than the others. One can forgive Mendelssohn for the Scotch suggestions, for they are so beautifully worked in as to remind, without becoming too prominent or offensive. It is really a delight to hear melodious music once in a while, even if it be considered tame and commonplace beside the modern ultra school now so much in vogue.

Then, again, the two movements from Mozart's Concerto for flute and harp were delightful, both in music and manner of performance.

The Volkmann serenade for strings is an uneven composition. If the last half had been omitted, people would have been perfectly charmed, for it ruined the favorable impressions of the first, which was seductively beautiful.

The Wagner selection destroyed all the lovely effects of Mendelssohn and Mozart. If there was chaos at the beginning or will be at the ending of the world, it was vividly brought to mind by the performance of this piece. We looked for Prof. Totten, thinking he had an understanding with Gabriel, or, I should say, with Director Nikisch to sound the last trumpets [illegible] was there, the trumpets pealed forth "their clarion voices," the drums beat, the strings scratched with velocity, heavenwards or elsewhere. The noise and confusion were terrific and Mr. Nikisch was in the height of his glory. He beat time, slashed to the right and left, leaving no doubt on the minds of his hearers that it was diabolical noise, not music he was evoking from the orchestra with that tiny little stick of his. Did Mr. Nikisch bring these pieces together for comparison, to show how little music Wagner could write, and how very musical Mendelssohn and Mozart are? The contrast could not possibly have been greater, and Mr. Wagner suffered.

JAMES M. TRACY.

EUGEN D'ALBERT'S RECITALS.

A series of piano recitals is to be given in Music hall on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday afternoons, April 18, 20 and 23, by Eugen D'Albert, whose playing with the Symphony orchestra recently created such a marked sensation. This "little giant" of the pianoforte is so grand an artist, so perfect in technique and expressive in interpretation, and so famed as a player, especially of Beethoven, that the liveliest anticipations are awakened in the coming recitals. The opening one is by special request devoted to the music of Beethoven and will possess an interest as marked as in that given a few years ago by Von Bülow. The others contain selections from Bach, Mendelssohn, Tausig, Rubinstein, Chopin, Liszt and others, which call for such varied treatment and such brilliant work that none but a master could attempt them with success; and success has attended D'Albert to a marked degree on his brief tour. Tickets, season and single, can be procured at Music hall.

Eugen D'Albert will give concerts of pianoforte music at Music hall, Monday, April 18, Thursday, April 21, and Saturday, April 23, afternoons. The first programme, made up of works by Beethoven, includes 32 variations, C minor; and the sonatas, op. 53, 90, 109 and 110.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO.

SUNDAY, APRIL [illegible] 1892.

The Symphony Concert—New York's Orchestra to Be Heard Here Again—The Oratorios of the Handel and Haydn—D'Albert's Recitals—News Notes, Gossip, Comment.

The programme performed last evening in Music Hall at the 22d of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra had nothing of novelty, but was made interesting by the generally excellent way in which the familiar selections were played under Mr. Nikisch's direction.

The "Sakuntala" overture began the programme, and this wonderfully clever bit of tone coloring was given with splendid effect throughout, the orchestra showing the skilful direction of its leader in all the masterly combinations with which the composer has treated its tuneful themes.

Prof. John K. Paine's "Spring" symphony followed, and the reading given this scholarly work revealed all its beauties to the best advantage. The graceful "scherzo' was given with a dainty airiness that was quite charming, and the noble theme of the final movement was brought out with grand effect. All in all, the symphony has never had a better performance than that given it on this occasion.

A satisfying interpretation of the familiar "Egmont" overture ended the programme, and left a very pleasant impression of the evening's concert.

Next Saturday evening Mr. and Mrs. Henschel appear, the former taking his old place at the conductor's desk to direct the first American performance of a suite from his "Hamlet" music, and the latter contributing arias from "Alessandre" and "Herodiade."

The public rehearsal, it should be noted, will be given on Thursday, instead of Friday afternoon, the coming week.

THE D'ALBERT RECITALS.

A series of three piano recitals by Herr Eugen d'Albert is announced at Music Hall on Monday afternoon, April 18, Wednesday afternoon, April 20, and Saturday afternoon, April 23.

A Beethoven programme is announced for the first recital, which will include the 32 variations in C minor; the sonata in C major, op. 53; the sonata in E minor, op. 90; the sonata in E major, op. 109, and the sonata in A-flat major, op. 110.

THE HENSCHEL RECITAL.

The last of their four vocal recitals was given by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel at the Meionaon yesterday afternoon, every seat in the hall having been sold long before the doors were opened.

Both singers were heard at their best on this occasion, and the programme was an admirably varied one, with many of the gems which have been heard in their recitals in earlier years.

Among the most charming numbers for the two singers were the two duets by Saint Saens, in which the voices were heard with rare delight.

Mrs. Henschel's singing of the "May Song," by A. Hervey, and, as an encore, the old Scotch ballad, "The Glen of Kenmare," marked the highest point of perfection in the vocal art, and fairly disarmed criticism.

The recital ended with the duet, "Gondoliera," by Mr. Henschel, which called out a grand ovation for the two artists, and the audience left the hall with the most delightful memories of this series of artistic triumphs for the two singers.

Without doubt an additional programme given in English throughout would be hailed with great satisfaction by the patrons of this series, as the vernacular has been persistently ignored by both Mr. and Mrs. Henschel in the concerts just concluded.

Mme. Lillian Nordica was recently complimented by being asked to act as one of three judges to award the prize for singing known as the Llewyn Thomas gold medal at the Royal Academy of Music, London.

The third and last of the Adamowski quartet concerts is announced at Union Hall, next Tuesday evening, when the programme will include Bazzini's quartet No. 4, Loeffler's two movements from quartet, and Beethoven's quartet, op. 18, No. 4.

THE · PRESTO ·

APRIL 7, 1892

In May Chicago is to have a visit from the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One concert by this unsurpassed organization will close up our musical season. D'Albert will be the soloist. I am rather anxious to see whether our local critics will "damn with faint praise" when he appears again. The critical clique that has things pretty much its own way at the present time, will be obliged to furbish up its arsenal of non-committal weapons or come out boldly and give him the praise that will be justly due him.

[177]

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, APRIL 9.

THE HENSCHELS.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel gave their third vocal recital on Tuesday afternoon at Meionaon Hall before another such fashionable and interested audience as their singing always calls out. The program on this occasion was made up of selections from Handel, Haydn, Loewe, Schumann, Saint-Saens, Henschel, Schubert, Bizet, Mozart, and Rubenstein. Mr. Henschel's programs must have been arranged with a view to reaching a great climax with the last recital, for they have steadily unfolded increasing beauties at each succeeding performance, and Tuesday's concert was an hour and a half of almost unalloyed delight. Mrs. Henschel's lovely voice was in perfect condition, and she was heard as always to great advantage in the duets with Mr. Henschel. It may be only fancy, but it seems as if the sound of another voice gave her a little less consciousness of her own, and she sings with charming abandon. Mrs. Henschel's work was all so satisfying that it is hard to make special choice, but certain it is that her dainty style suits well the Bizet selections, and she sings always her husband's compositions with an added interest and sympathy in her work that is very taking. Mr. Henschel was heard to great advantage in a dramatic and effective rendering of the "Erlking" of Loewe, songs by Rubenstein and in the duets.

DROPPED NOTES PICKED UP.

Mr. Georg Henschel in a recent lecture before a musical school near London satirized many things of the musical stage, and among others he mentioned something which we saw during the grand opera season. He asked why we should read in the advertisements something like this: "To-night, the successful opera, 'Artineria di Marina,' which has made a universal success, will be followed (or preceded) by Gluck's 'Orfeo,' ending with 'Che Faro.'" He adds: "Just fancy a modern English playwright having written a very successful one-act play which draws crowded houses but does not fill the evening bill, and the manager advertising Mr. So-and-So's successful play will be given to-night followed (or preceded) by Shakespeare's 'Hamlet,' ending with 'To Be or Not to Be!'"

Eugene D'Albert's three piano recitals will be given at Music Hall on the afternoons of Monday, April 18, Wednesday, April 20th, and Saturday, April 23rd. The programs announced are of much interest, and will doubtless attract a host of lovers of the master's work.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 11, 1892.

Saturday night's Symphony concert presented a programme of excellence, notwithstanding the fact that the numbers were all familiar ones, and rarely has the orchestra appeared to such advantage. Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, John K. Paine's symphony, "In the Spring," consisting of five movements—the departure of winter, the awakening of nature, May night fantasy, a romance of springtime, and the glory of nature—with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, served to make this concert one of the most enjoyable of the course. The absence of a soloist was a most refreshing change, as the opportunities for hearing the orchestra in a programme specially adapted to bring out its best points have been rare. The best number, if there could be a choice in a performance of such uniform merit, was the symphony, "In the Spring." It is a grand work and calls for brilliancy of orchestration, for unusually fine gradations of tone and precision in the solo instruments.

Next week's public rehearsal will take place Thursday afternoon, instead of Friday, and the programme for both Thursday afternoon and evening will consist of D'Albert's symphony in F major, Op.4, first time in America; Handel's aria, "Alessandro"; Henschel's suite from the music to Shakspere's "Hamlet," written for Beerbohm Tree; Massenet's aria from "Herodiade"; Weber's overture, "Oberon." The music of "Hamlet" will receive its first American production on this occasion and will be conducted by the composer. Mrs. Henschel will be the soloist.

Fourth Henschel Recital.

The last recital by this clever couple was given at Meionaon Saturday afternoon. The thorough excellence of their performance, the total absence of even a suspicion of fault in method or interpretation, grows more apparent at each appearance of these modest, unassuming artists. Mr. Henschel exhibited consummate skill in the manner in which he adapted his full baritone voice to the light, sweet soprano of Mrs. Henschel in the closing duet of his own composition, "Gondoliera," which was the best double number of the programme. Mrs. Henschel's best numbers were "Dov e la Loveila," by Henschel; an old Irish ballad, "The Little Red Lark"; Hervey's May Song," and "The Glen of Kenmare," which she gave as an encore.

Music Notices.

Those who attended the Henschel recitals can have little doubt concerning Mrs. Henschel's artistic temperament. All her gowns were made to harmonize with the quaint old ballads in which she excels. She was a veritable picture on Saturday, dressed in a short-waisted gown of yellow figured silk, made with a Watteau back, full wrinkled sleeves, the neck cut square and edged with the same pattern of dainty lace that fell over her hands. A band of dull gold against her dark hair was the finishing touch of the costume.

WORLD, Baltimore, Md.

Date 4-8

Engen D'Albert, who is called "the greatest pianist after Liszt" and who will be heard as a soloist Monday night in the city, is now but 28 years of age, and at the age of 15 composed his first overture, which was performed at St. James hall, London. His first public appearance was at the Philharmonic concerts in Vienna, and in 1882 he was appointed court pianist, by the grand duke of Wiemar. His wonderful talent has placed him in the front rank as master of the piano.

The Kneisel quartette will give its second season concert at Lehmann's April 27.

The Boston symphony orchestra will give the sixth concert at the Academy hall Thursday evening April 28. The soloists on this occasion will be Mr. and Mrs.

Season of 1892

Mr. & Mrs. Georg Henschel's

. . Vocal Recitals . .

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

Fourth Recital ❋ MEIONAON, BOSTON.

Saturday Afternoon, April 9, at 2.30.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

THE BOSTON TIMES

TWENTY-SEVENTH YEAR.

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 10, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-FIRST CONCERT.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert in Music hall, Saturday evening, April 2, was:

Mendelssohn.	Symphony No. 3, in A minor. "Scotch." Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato. — Vivace non troppo. — Adagio. — Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestoso assai.
Mozart.	Andante and Allegro from Concerto for Flute and Harp.
Volkmann.	Serenade for String Orchestra, in F major.
Wagner.	"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkure."

Soloists—Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Charles Molé, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker.

The symphony was played in such a fascinating manner as to elicit hearty commendation and praise from an unusually large audience. There is absolute music in all the movements, but the second was so faultlessly performed that its beauties were made more prominent than the others. One can forgive Mendelssohn for the Scotch suggestions, for they are so beautifully worked in as to remind, without becoming too prominent or offensive. It is really a delight to hear melodious music once in a while, even if it be considered tame and commonplace beside the modern ultra school now so much in vogue.

Then, again, the two movements from Mozart's Concerto for flute and harp were delightful, both in music and manner of performance.

The Volkmann serenade for strings is an uneven composition. If the last half had been omitted, people would have been perfectly charmed, for it ruined the favorable impressions of the first, which was seductively beautiful.

The Wagner selection destroyed all the lovely effects of Mendelssohn and Mozart. If there was chaos at the beginning or will be at the ending of the world, it was vividly brought to mind by the performance of this piece. We looked for Prof. Totten, thinking he had an understanding with Gabriel, or, I should say, with Director Nikisch to sound the last trumpets for Gabriel. Be this as it may, the chaos was there, the trumpets pealed forth "their clarion voices," the drums beat, the strings scratched with velocity, heavenwards or elsewhere. The noise and confusion were terrific and Mr. Nikisch was in the height of his glory. He beat time, slashed to the right and left, leaving no doubt on the minds of his hearers that it was diabolical noise, not music he was evoking from the orchestra with that tiny little stick of his. Did Mr. Nikisch bring these pieces together for comparison, to show how little music Wagner could write, and how very musical Mendelssohn and Mozart are? The contrast could not possibly have been greater, and Mr. Wagner suffered.

JAMES M. TRACY.

EUGEN D'ALBERT'S RECITALS.

A series of piano recitals is to be given in Music hall on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday afternoons, April 18, 20 and 23, by Eugen D'Albert, whose playing with the Symphony orchestra recently created such a marked sensation. This "little giant" of the pianoforte is so grand an artist, so perfect in technique and expressive in interpretation, and so famed as a player, especially of Beethoven, that the liveliest anticipations are awakened in the coming recitals. The opening one is by special request devoted to the music of Beethoven and will possess an interest as marked as in that given a few years ago by Von Bülow. The others contain selections from Bach, Mendelssohn, Tausig, Rubinstein, Chopin, Liszt and others, which call for such varied treatment and such brilliant work that none but a master could attempt them with success; and success has attended D'Albert to a marked degree on his brief tour. Tickets, season and single, can be procured at Music hall.

Eugen D'Albert will give concerts of pianoforte music at Music hall, Monday, April 18, Thursday, April 21, and Saturday, April 23, afternoons. The first programme, made up of works by Beethoven, includes 32 variations, C minor; and the sonatas, op. 53, 90, 109 and 110.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR. VOL. XCI., NO.

SUNDAY, APRIL [illegible] 1892.

5

The Symphony Concert—New York's Orchestra to Be Heard Here Again—The Oratorios of the Handel and Haydn—D'Albert's Recitals—News Notes, Gossip, Comment.

The programme performed last evening in Music Hall at the 22d of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra had nothing of novelty, but was made interesting by the generally excellent way in which the familiar selections were played under Mr. Nikisch's direction.

The "Sakuntala" overture began the programme, and this wonderfully clever bit of tone coloring was given with splendid effect throughout, the orchestra showing the skilful direction of its leader in all the masterly combinations with which the composer has treated its tuneful themes.

Prof. John K. Paine's "Spring" symphony followed, and the reading given this scholarly work revealed all its beauties to the best advantage. The graceful "scherzo' was given with a dainty airiness that was quite charming, and the noble theme of the final movement was brought out with grand effect. All in all, the symphony has never had a better performance than that given it on this occasion.

A satisfying interpretation of the familiar "Egmont" overture ended the programme, and left a very pleasant impression of the evening's concert.

Next Saturday evening Mr. and Mrs. Henschel appear, the former taking his old place at the conductor's desk to direct the first American performance of a suite from his "Hamlet" music, and the latter contributing arias from "Alessandro" and "Herodiade."

The public rehearsal, it should be noted, will be given on Thursday, instead of Friday afternoon, the coming week.

THE D'ALBERT RECITALS.

A series of three piano recitals by Herr Eugen d'Albert is announced at Music Hall on Monday afternoon, April 18, Wednesday afternoon, April 20, and Saturday afternoon, April 23.

A Beethoven programme is announced for the first recital, which will include the 32 variations in C minor; the sonata in C major, op. 53; the sonata in E minor, op. 90; the sonata in E major, op. 109, and the sonata in A-flat major, op. 110.

THE HENSCHEL RECITAL.

The last of their four vocal recitals was given by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel at the Meionaon yesterday afternoon, every seat in the hall having been sold long before the doors were opened.

Both singers were heard at their best on this occasion, and the programme was an admirably varied one, with many of the gems which have been heard in their recitals in earlier years.

Among the most charming numbers for the two singers were the two duets by Saint Saens, in which the voices were heard with rare delight.

Mrs. Henschel's singing of the "May Song," by A. Hervey, and, as an encore, the old Scotch ballad, "The Glen of Kenmare," marked the highest point of perfection in the vocal art, and fairly disarmed criticism.

The recital ended with the duet, "Gondoliera," by Mr. Henschel, which called out a grand ovation for the two artists, and the audience left the hall with the most delightful memories of this series of artistic triumphs for the two singers.

Without doubt an additional programme given in English throughout would be hailed with great satisfaction by the patrons of this series, as the vernacular has been persistently ignored by both Mr. and Mrs. Henschel in the concerts just concluded.

Mme. Lillian Nordica was recently complimented by being asked to act as one of three judges to award the prize for singing known as the Llewyn Thomas gold medal at the Royal Academy of Music, London.

The third and last of the Adamowski quartet concerts is announced at Union Hall, next Tuesday evening, when the programme will include Bazzini's quartet No. 4, Loeffler's two movements from quartet, and Beethoven's quartet, op. 18, No. 4.

THE · PRESTO ·

APRIL 7, 1892

EVERY THURSDAY. FRANK D. ABBOTT EDITOR. MUSIC THE PRESTO 323 & 325. DEARBORN STREET. CHICAGO. THE MUSIC TRADE

In May Chicago is to have a visit from the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One concert by this unsurpassed organization will close up our musical season. D'Albert will be the soloist. I am rather anxious to see whether our local critics will "damn with faint praise" when he appears again. The critical clique that has things pretty much its own way at the present time, will be obliged to furbish up its arsenal of non-committal weapons or come out boldly and give him the praise that will be justly due him.

5

MEIONAON, BOSTON. Saturday Afternoon, April 9,

Fourth Recital, at 2.30 o'clock.

PROGRAMME.

TWO DUETS { (a) from "JOSEPH." . . . . MÉHUL
{ (b) from "RICHARD CŒUR DE LION." . . . . . GRÉTRY

MR. and MRS. HENSCHEL.

(Translation.)

(a) Jacob. Sole stay of my declining age,
Thou ne'er hast wandered from my side.
Benjamin. O Father! may my cares assuage
Thy sorrows, and thy footsteps guide!
Jacob. Though now these eyes forever fail me,
No fear forebodes a danger nigh.
Benjamin Nor e'er shall aught of harm assail thee,
Be thine my willing hand and eye.
Jacob. In vain would age of hope bereave me,
And whisper all my friends are gone.
Though all the world beside should leave me,
I still have thee, my dearest son!
Benjamin. Though all the world beside should leave thee,
Thou hast me, thy faithful son!
Jacob. A thousand blessings still attend thee,
And heavenly grace around thee shine!
Though I no longer can befriend thee,
Yet I can join my prayers with thine.
Benjamin Ah! what joy is mine that I attend thee,
Still to console thee, still befriend thee,
May heavenly grace around thee shine;
Oh, let me join my prayers with thine!

(b) Blondel. A bandage covereth the eyes
Of the god who sends love's sighs.
This teacheth us, I say,
That the little god so gay
Is never half so shy
As when naught he can spy.
Lauretta. Sing once again, I pray,
That pretty roundelay;
Ah! I must not forget it quite,
I fain would sing it to the knight.
Blondel. With great delight.
(Lauretta repeats after him the couplet.)

(a) IF THOU THY HEART BESTOWEST. . . . . . . GIOVANNINI
(b) LE PORTRAIT. . . . . PACINI
(c) LA CHARMANTE MARGUERITE. . . . . . . OLD FRENCH

MRS. HENSCHEL.

(a) If thou thy heart bestowest,
Some secret way devise;
That I love and thou knowest,
Let not the world surmise.
Our love must be forever
Held silent and apart,
Though great thy joy be, never
Unlock thy guarded heart.

Keep silent and be wary,
The watchful walls may hear;
The warm love need not vary,
But let no sign appear.
Suspicion must not waken,
Disguise must be thine art;
Enough if faith unshaken
Thou hast in me, dear heart.

A thoughtless look endangers,
A single step betrays;
Among the greatest strangers,
A trait'rous eye may gaze.
Since thou my maxim knowest,
Take counsel and be wise:
If thou thy heart bestowest,
Some secret way devise.

(b) Portrait charmant, portrait de mon amie,
Gage d'amour, par l'amour obtenu,
Ah! viens m'offrir le bien que j'ai perdu,

Meionaon, Saturday, April 9, 1892.

THE ORDER OF

MR. HENSCHEL'S SONGS

WILL BE

a BALLAD, "Die Vätergruft." . . . . Liszt
b BALLAD, "Jung Dieterich." . . . . Henschel

BALLAD, "Archibald Douglas," . . . . Loewe

a BALLAD, "Belsatzar." . . . . Schumann
b BALLAD, "The Grenadiers." . . . . Schumann

The wine doth swell his ardor so.

And, blindly led on by his ardor's wiles,
The Godhead with blasphemous words he reviles.

And wildly he curses and raves aloud,
Approvingly bellow the serving crowd.

The king commands with a look that burns,
The servant hastens, and soon returns.

Many golden vessels he bears on his head,
The spoils of Jehovah's temple dread.

[illegible] HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO.

SUNDAY, APRIL [illegible] 1892.

The Symphony Concert—New York's Orchestra to Be Heard Here Again—The Oratories of the Handel and Haydn—D'Albert's Recitals—News Notes, Gossip, Comment.

The programme performed last evening in Music Hall at the 22d of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra had nothing of novelty, but was made interesting by the generally excellent way in which the familiar selections were played under Mr. Nikisch's direction.

The "Sakuntala" overture began the programme, and this wonderfully clever bit of tone coloring was given with splendid effect throughout, the orchestra showing the skilful direction of its leader in all the masterly combinations with which the composer has treated its tuneful themes.

Prof. John K. Paine's "Spring" symphony followed, and the reading given this scholarly work revealed all its beauties to the best advantage. The graceful "scherzo' was given with a dainty airiness that was quite charming, and the noble theme of the final movement was brought out with grand effect. All in all, the symphony has never had a better performance than that given it on this occasion.

A satisfying interpretation of the familiar "Egmont" overture ended the programme, and left a very pleasant impression of the evening's concert.

Next Saturday evening Mr. and Mrs. Henschel appear, the former taking his old place at the conductor's desk to direct the first American performance of a suite from his "Hamlet" music, and the latter contributing arias from "Alessandro" and "Herodiade."

The public rehearsal, it should be noted, will be given on Thursday, instead of Friday afternoon, the coming week.

THE D'ALBERT RECITALS.

A series of three piano recitals by Herr Eugen d'Albert is announced at Music Hall on Monday afternoon, April 18, Wednesday afternoon, April 20, and Saturday afternoon, April 23.

A Beethoven programme is announced for the first recital, which will include the 32 variations in C minor; the sonata in C major, op. 53; the sonata in E minor, op. 90; the sonata in E major, op. 109, and the sonata in A-flat major, op. 110.

THE HENSCHEL RECITAL.

The last of their four vocal recitals was given by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel at the Meionaon yesterday afternoon, every seat in the hall having been sold long before the doors were opened.

Both singers were heard at their best on this occasion, and the programme was an admirably varied one, with many of the gems which have been heard in their recitals in earlier years.

Among the most charming numbers for the two singers were the two duets by Saint Saens, in which the voices were heard with rare delight.

Mrs. Henschel's singing of the "May Song," by A. Hervey, and, as an encore, the old Scotch ballad, "The Glen of Kenmare," marked the highest point of perfection in the vocal art, and fairly disarmed criticism.

The recital ended with the duet, "Gondoliera," by Mr. Henschel, which called out a grand ovation for the two artists, and the audience left the hall with the most delightful memories of this series of artistic triumphs for the two singers.

Without doubt an additional programme given in English throughout would be hailed with great satisfaction by the patrons of this series, as the vernacular has been persistently ignored by both Mr. and Mrs. Henschel in the concerts just concluded.

Mme. Lillian Nordica was recently complimented by being asked to act as one of three judges to award the prize for singing known as the Llewyn Thomas gold medal at the Royal Academy of Music, London.

The third and last of the Adamowski quartet concerts is announced at Union Hall, next Tuesday evening, when the programme will include Bazzini's quartet No. 4, Loeffler's two movements from quartet, and Beethoven's quartet, op. 18, No. 4.

THE · PRESTO.

APRIL 7, 1892

In May Chicago is to have a visit from the Bosto Symphony Orchestra. One concert by this unsur passed organization will close up our musical season D'Albert will be the soloist. I am rather anxious t see whether our local critics will "damn with fain praise" when he appears again. The critical cliqu that has things pretty much its own way at th present time, will be obliged to furbish up its arsena of non-committal weapons or come out boldly an give him the praise that will be justly due him.

---

programme specially adapted to bring out its best points have been rare. The best number, if there could be a choice in a performance of such uniform merit, was the symphony, "In the Spring." It is a grand work and calls for brilliancy of orchestration, for unusually fine gradations of tone and precision in the solo instruments.

Next week's public rehearsal will take place Thursday afternoon, instead of Friday, and the programme for both Thursday afternoon and evening will consist of D'Albert's symphony in F major, Op. 4, first time in America; Handel's aria, "Alessandro"; Henschel's suite from the music to Shakspere's "Hamlet," written for Beerbohm Tree; Massenet's aria from "Herodiade"; Weber's overture, "Oberon." The music of "Hamlet" will receive its first American production on this occasion and will be conducted by the composer. Mrs. Henschel will be the soloist.

Fourth Henschel Recital.

The last recital by this clever couple was given at Meionaon Saturday afternoon. The thorough excellence of their performance, the total absence of even a suspicion of fault in method or interpretation, grows more apparent at each appearance of these modest, unassuming artists. Mr. Henschel exhibited consummate skill in the manner in which he adapted his full baritone voice to the light, sweet soprano of Mrs. Henschel in the closing duet of his own composition, "Gondoliera," which was the best double number of the programme. Mrs. Henschel's best numbers were "Dov e la Lovella," by Henschel; an old Irish ballad, "The Little Red Lark"; Hervey's May Song," and "The Glen of Kenmare," which she gave as an encore.

Music Notices.

Those who attended the Henschel recitals can have little doubt concerning Mrs. Henschel's artistic temperament. All her gowns were made to harmonize with the quaint old ballads in which she excels. She was a veritable picture on Saturday, dressed in a short-waisted gown of yellow figured silk, made with a Watteau back, full wrinkled sleeves, the neck cut square and edged with the same pattern of dainty lace that fell over her hands. A band of dull gold against her dark hair was the finishing touch of the costume.

WORLD, Baltimore, Md.

Date 4-8

Eugen D'Albert, who is called "the greatest pianist after Liszt" and who will be heard as a soloist Monday night in the city, is now but 28 years of age, and at the age of 15 composed his first overture, which was performed at St. James hall, London. His first public appearance was at the Philharmonic concerts in Vienna, and in 1882 he was appointed court pianist by the grand duke of Wiemar. His wonderful talent has placed him in the front rank as master of the piano.

[illegible] quartette will give its [illegible] concert at Lehmann's April [illegible]

[illegible] Symphony orchestra will [illegible]

THE BOSTON TIMES

TWENTY-SEVENTH YEAR.

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 10, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-FIRST CONCERT.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert in Music hall, Saturday evening, April 2, was:

Mendelssohn.	Symphony No. 3, in A minor. "Scotch." Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato. — Vivace non troppo. — Adagio. — Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestoso assai.
Mozart.	Andante and Allegro from Concerto for Flute and Harp.
Volkmann.	Serenade for String Orchestra, in F major.
Wagner.	"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkure."

Soloists—Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Charles Molé, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker.

The symphony was played in such a fascinating manner as to elicit hearty commendation and praise from an unusually large audience. There is absolute music in all the movements, but the second was so faultlessly performed that its beauties were made more prominent than the others. One can forgive Mendelssohn for the Scotch suggestions, for they are so beautifully worked in as to remind, without becoming too prominent or offensive. It is really a delight to hear melodious music once in a while, even if it be considered tame and commonplace beside the modern ultra school now so much in vogue.

Then, again, the two movements from Mozart's Concerto for flute and harp were delightful, both in music and manner of performance.

The Volkmann serenade for strings is an uneven composition. If the last half had been omitted, people would have been perfectly charmed, for it ruined the favorable impressions of the first, which was seductively beautiful.

The Wagner selection destroyed all the lovely effects of Mendelssohn and Mozart. If there was [illegible] the beginning or will be at the ending of the world, it was vividly brought to mind by the performance of this piece. We looked for [illegible], thinking he had an understanding with Gabriel, or, I should say, with Director [illegible] to sound the last trumpets [illegible]. Be this as it may, the chaos was there, the trumpets pealed forth "their clarion voices," the drums beat, the strings scratched with velocity, heavenwards or elsewhere. The noise and confusion were terrific and Mr. Nikisch was in the height of his glory. He beat time, slashed to the right and left, leaving no doubt on the minds of his hearers that it was diabolical noise, not music he was evoking from the orchestra with that tiny little stick of his. Did Mr. Nikisch bring these pieces together for comparison, to show how little music Wagner could write, and how very musical Mendelssohn and Mozart are? The contrast could not possibly have been greater, and Mr. Wagner suffered.

JAMES M. TRACY.

EUGEN D'ALBERT'S RECITALS.

A series of piano recitals is to be given in Music hall on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday afternoons, April 18, 20 and 23, by Eugen D'Albert, whose playing with the Symphony orchestra recently created such a marked sensation. This "little giant" of the pianoforte is so grand an artist, so perfect in technique and expressive in interpretation, and so famed as a player, especially of Beethoven, that the liveliest anticipations are awakened in the coming recitals. The opening one is by special request devoted to the music of Beethoven and will possess an interest as marked as in that given a few years ago by Von Bülow. The others contain selections from Bach, Mendelssohn, Tausig, Rubinstein, Chopin, Liszt and others, which call for such varied treatment and such brilliant work that none but a master could attempt them with success; and success has attended D'Albert to a marked degree on his brief tour. Tickets, season and single, can be procured at Music hall.

Eugen D'Albert will give concerts of pianoforte music at Music hall, Monday, April 18, Thursday, April 21, and Saturday, April 23, afternoons. The first programme, made up of works by Beethoven, includes 32 variations, C minor; and the sonatas, op. 53, 90, 109 and 110.

[177]

MEIONAON, BOSTON.

Saturday Afternoon, April 9,

Fourth Recital,

at 2.30 o'clock.

PROGRAMME.

TWO DUETS (a) from "JOSEPH." . . . . MÉHUL
(b) from "RICHARD CŒUR DE LION." . . . . GRÉTRY
MR. and MRS. HENSCHEL.

(Translation.)

(a) Jacob. Sole stay of my declining age,
Thou ne'er hast wandered from my side.
Benjamin. O Father! may my cares assuage
Thy sorrows, and thy footsteps guide!
Jacob. Though now these eyes forever fail me,
No fear forebodes a danger nigh.
Benjamin Nor e'er shall aught of harm assail thee,
Be thine my willing hand and eye.
Jacob. In vain would age of hope bereave me,
And whisper all my friends are gone.
Though all the world beside should leave me,
I still have thee, my dearest son!
Benjamin. Though all the world beside should leave thee,
Thou hast me, thy faithful son!
Jacob. A thousand blessings still attend thee,
And heavenly grace around thee shine!
Though I no longer can befriend thee,
Yet I can join my prayers with thine.
Benjamin Ah! what joy is mine that I attend thee,
Still to console thee, still befriend thee,
May heavenly grace around thee shine;
Oh, let me join my prayers with thine!

(b) Blondel. A bandage covereth the eyes
Of the god who sends love's sighs.
This teacheth us, I say,
That the little god so gay
Is never half so shy
As when naught he can spy.
Lauretta. Sing once again, I pray,
That pretty roundelay;
Ah! I must not forget it quite,
I fain would sing it to the knight.
Blondel. With great delight.
(Lauretta repeats after him the couplet.)

(a) IF THOU THY HEART BESTOWEST. . . . . . . GIOVANNINI
(b) LE PORTRAIT. . . . . PACINI
(c) LA CHARMANTE MARGUERITE. . . . . . . OLD FRENCH
MRS. HENSCHEL.

(a) If thou thy heart bestowest,
Some secret way devise;
That I love and thou knowest,
Let not the world surmise.
Our love must be forever
Held silent and apart,
Though great thy joy be, never
Unlock thy guarded heart.

Keep silent and be wary,
The watchful walls may hear;
The warm love need not vary,
But let no sign appear.
Suspicion must not waken,
Disguise must be thine art;
Enough if faith unshaken
Thou hast in me, dear heart.

A thoughtless look endangers,
A single step betrays;
Among the greatest strangers,
A trait'rous eye may gaze.
Since thou my maxim knowest,
Take counsel and be wise:
If thou thy heart bestowest,
Some secret way devise.

(b) Portrait charmant, portrait de mon amie,
Gage d'amour, par l'amour obtenu,
Ah! viens m'offrir le bien que j'ai perdu,

Meionaon, Saturday, April 9, 1892.

THE ORDER OF

MR. HENSCHEL'S SONGS

WILL BE

a BALLAD, "Die Vätergruft." . . . . Liszt
b BALLAD, "Jung Dieterich." . . . . Henschel

BALLAD, "Archibald Douglas," . . . . Loewe

a BALLAD, "Belsatzar." . . . . Schumann
b BALLAD, "The Grenadiers." . . . . Schumann

The wine doth swell his ardor so.
And, blindly led on by his ardor's wiles,
The Godhead with blasphemous words he reviles.
And wildly he curses and raves aloud.
Approvingly bellow the serving crowd.
The king commands with a look that burns,
The servant hastens, and soon returns.
Many golden vessels he bears on his head,
The spoils of Jehovah's temple dread.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO.
SUNDAY, APRIL [illegible] 1892.

The Symphony Concert—New York's Orchestra to Be Heard Here Again—The Oratorios of the Handel and Haydn—D'Albert's Recitals—News Notes, Gossip, Comment.

The programme performed last evening in Music Hall at the 22d of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra had nothing of novelty, but was made interesting by the generally excellent way in which the familiar selections were played under Mr. Nikisch's direction.

The "Sakuntala" overture began the programme, and this wonderfully clever bit of tone coloring was given with splendid effect throughout, the orchestra showing the skilful direction of its leader in all the masterly combinations with which the composer has treated its tuneful themes.

Prof. John K. Paine's "Spring" symphony followed, and the reading given this scholarly work revealed all its beauties to the best advantage. The graceful "scherzo" was given with a dainty airiness that was quite charming, and the noble theme of the final movement was brought out with grand effect. All in all, the symphony has never had a better performance than that given it on this occasion.

A satisfying interpretation of the familiar "Egmont" overture ended the programme, and left a very pleasant impression of the evening's concert.

Next Saturday evening Mr. and Mrs. Henschel appear, the former taking his old place at the conductor's desk to direct the first American performance of a suite from his "Hamlet" music, and the latter contributing arias from "Alessandro" and "Herodiade."

The public rehearsal, it should be noted, will be given on Thursday, instead of Friday afternoon, the coming week.

THE D'ALBERT RECITALS.

A series of three piano recitals by Herr Eugen d'Albert is announced at Music Hall on Monday afternoon, April 18, Wednesday afternoon, April 20, and Saturday afternoon, April 23.

A Beethoven programme is announced for the first recital, which will include the 32 variations in C minor; the sonata in C major, op. 53; the sonata in E minor, op. 90; the sonata in E major, op. 109, and the sonata in A-flat major, op. 110.

THE HENSCHEL RECITAL.

The last of their four vocal recitals was given by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel at the Meionaon yesterday afternoon, every seat in the hall having been sold long before the doors were opened.

Both singers were heard at their best on this occasion, and the programme was an admirably varied one, with many of the gems which have been heard in their recitals in earlier years.

Among the most charming numbers for the two singers were the two duets by Saint Saens, in which the voices were heard with rare delight.

Mrs. Henschel's singing of the "May Song," by A. Hervey, and, as an encore, the old Scotch ballad, "The Glen of Kenmare," marked the highest point of perfection in the vocal art, and fairly disarmed criticism.

The recital ended with the duet, "Gondoliera," by Mr. Henschel, which called out a grand ovation for the two artists, and the audience left the hall with the most delightful memories of this series of artistic triumphs for the two singers.

Without doubt an additional programme given in English throughout would be hailed with great satisfaction by the patrons of this series, as the vernacular has been persistently ignored by both Mr. and Mrs. Henschel in the concerts just concluded.

Mme. Lillian Nordica was recently complimented by being asked to act as one of three judges to award the prize for singing known as the Llewyn Thomas gold medal at the Royal Academy of Music, London.

The third and last of the Adamowski quartet concerts is announced at Union Hall, next Tuesday evening, when the programme will include Bazzini's quartet No. 4, Loeffler's two movements from quartet, and Beethoven's quartet, op. 18, No. 4.

THE · PRESTO ·
APRIL 7, 1892
EVERY THURSDAY.
FRANK D. ABBOTT. EDITOR.
MUSIC TRADE
PRESTO
323 & 325.
DEARBORN STREET.
CHICAGO.

In May Chicago is to have a visit from the Bosto[n] Symphony Orchestra. One concert by this unsur-passed organization will close up our musical season. D'Albert will be the soloist. I am rather anxious t[o] see whether our local critics will "damn with fain[t] praise" when he appears again. The critical cliqu[e] that has things pretty much its own way at th[e] present time, will be obliged to furbish up its arsena[l] of non-committal weapons or come out boldly and give him the praise that will be justly due him.

---

orchestra in a programme specially adapted to bring out its best points have been rare. The best number, if there could be a choice in a performance of such uniform merit, was the symphony, "In the Spring." It is a grand work and calls for brilliancy of orchestration, for unusually fine gradations of tone and precision in the solo instruments.

Next week's public rehearsal will take place Thursday afternoon, instead of Friday, and the programme for both Thursday afternoon and evening will consist of D'Albert's symphony in F major, Op. 4, first time in America; Handel's aria, "Alessandro"; Henschel's suite from the music to Shakspere's "Hamlet," written for Beerbohm Tree; Massenet's aria from "Herodiade"; Weber's overture, "Oberon." The music of "Hamlet" will receive its first American production on this occasion and will be conducted by the composer. Mrs. Henschel will be the soloist.

Fourth Henschel Recital.

The last recital by this clever couple was given at Meionaon Saturday afternoon. The thorough excellence of their performance, the total absence of even a suspicion of fault in method or interpretation, grows more apparent at each appearance of these modest, unassuming artists. Mr. Henschel exhibited consummate skill in the manner in which he adapted his full baritone voice to the light, sweet soprano of Mrs. Henschel in the closing duet of his own composition, "Gondoliera," which was the best double number of the programme. Mrs. Henschel's best numbers were "Dov e la Lovella," by Henschel; an old Irish ballad, "The Little Red Lark"; Hervey's May Song," and "The Glen of Kenmare," which she gave as an encore.

Music Notices.

Those who attended the Henschel recitals can have little doubt concerning Mrs. Henschel's artistic temperament. All her gowns were made to harmonize with the quaint old ballads in which she excels. She was a veritable picture on Saturday, dressed in a short-waisted gown of yellow figured silk, made with a Watteau back, full wrinkled sleeves, the neck cut square and edged with the same pattern of dainty lace that fell over her hands. A band of dull gold against her dark hair was the finishing touch of the costume.

WORLD, Baltimore, Md.

Date 4-8

Engen D'Albert, who is called "the greatest pianist after Liszt" and who will be heard as a soloist Monday night in the city, is now but 28 years of age, and at the age of 15 composed his first overture, which was performed at St. James hall, London. His first public appearance was at the Philharmonic concerts in Vienna, and in 1882 he was appointed court pianist, by the grand duke of Wiemar. His wonderful talent has placed him in the front rank as master of the piano.

The Kneisel quartette will give its second season concert at Lehmann's April 27.

The Boston symphony orchestra will give the sixth concert at the Academy [illegible] Thursday evening April 28. The so-[illegible] will be Mr. and Mrs.

THE BOSTON TIMES
TWENTY-SEVENTH YEAR.
BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 10, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-FIRST CONCERT.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert in Music hall, Saturday evening, April 2, was:

Mendelssohn. Symphony No. 3, in A minor. "Scotch."
Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato. — Vivace non troppo. — Adagio. — Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestoso assai.
Mozart. Andante and Allegro from Concerto for Flute and Harp.
Volkmann. Serenade for String Orchestra, in F major.
Wagner. "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkure."

Soloists—Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Charles Molé, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker.

The symphony was played in such a fascinating manner as to elicit hearty commendation and praise from an unusually large audience. There is absolute music in all the movements, but the second was so faultlessly performed that its beauties were made more prominent than the others. One can forgive Mendelssohn for the Scotch suggestions, for they are so beautifully worked in as to remind, without becoming too prominent or offensive. It is really a delight to hear melodious music once in a while, even if it be considered tame and commonplace beside the modern ultra school now so much in vogue.

Then, again, the two movements from Mozart's Concerto for flute and harp were delightful, both in music and manner of performance.

The Volkmann serenade for strings is an uneven composition. If the last half had been omitted, people would have been perfectly charmed, for it ruined the favorable impressions of the first, which was seductively beautiful.

The Wagner selection destroyed all the lovely effects of Mendelssohn and Mozart. If there was chaos at the beginning or will be at the ending of the world, it was vividly brought to mind by the performance of this piece. We looked for Prof. Totten, thinking he had an understanding with Gabriel, or, I should say, with Director Nikisch to sound the last [illegible] Be this as it may the chaos was there, the trumpets pealed forth "their clarion voices," the drums beat, the strings scratched with velocity, heavenwards or elsewhere. The noise and confusion were terrific and Mr. Nikisch was in the height of his glory. He beat time, slashed to the right and left, leaving no doubt on the minds of his hearers that it was diabolical noise, not music he was evoking from the orchestra with that tiny little stick of his. Did Mr. Nikisch bring these pieces together for comparison, to show how little music Wagner could write, and how very musical Mendelssohn and Mozart are? The contrast could not possibly have been greater, and Mr. Wagner suffered.

JAMES M. TRACY.

EUGEN D'ALBERT'S RECITALS.

A series of piano recitals is to be given in Music hall on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday afternoons, April 18, 20 and 23, by Eugen D'Albert, whose playing with the Symphony orchestra recently created such a marked sensation. This "little giant" of the pianoforte is so grand an artist, so perfect in technique and expressive in interpretation, and so famed as a player, especially of Beethoven, that the liveliest anticipations are awakened in the coming recitals. The opening one is by special request devoted to the music of Beethoven and will possess an interest as marked as in that given a few years ago by Von Bülow. The others contain selections from Bach, Mendelssohn, Tausig, Rubinstein, Chopin, Liszt and others, which call for such varied treatment and such brilliant work that none but a master could attempt them with success; and success has attended D'Albert to a marked degree on his brief tour. Tickets, season and single, can be procured at Music hall.

Eugen D'Albert will give concerts of pianoforte music at Music hall, Monday, April 18, Thursday, April 21, and Saturday, April 23, afternoons. The first programme, made up of works by Beethoven, includes 32 variations, C minor; and the sonatas, op. 53, 90, 109 and 110.

MEIONAON, BOSTON. Saturday Afternoon,
April 9,
Fourth Recital, at 2.30 o'clock.

PROGRAMME.

[redacted]

(a) If thou thy Heart bestowest. . . . . GIOVANNINI
(b) Le Portrait. . . . . PACINI
(c) La Charmante Marguerite. . . . . OLD FRENCH

Mrs. Henschel.

(a) If thou thy heart bestowest,
Some secret way devise;
That I love and thou knowest,
Let not the world surmise.
Our love must be forever
Held silent and apart,
Though great thy joy be, never
Unlock thy guarded heart.

Keep silent and be wary,
The watchful walls may hear;
The warm love need not vary,
But let no sign appear.
Suspicion must not waken,
Disguise must be thine art;
Enough if faith unshaken
Thou hast in me, dear heart.

A thoughtless look endangers,
A single step betrays;
Among the greatest strangers,
A trait'rous eye may gaze.
Since thou my maxim knowest,
Take counsel and be wise:
If thou thy heart bestowest,
Some secret way devise.

(b) Portrait charmant, portrait de mon amie,
Gage d'amour, par l'amour obtenu,
Ah! viens m'offrir le bien que j'ai perdu,
Te voir encore me rappelle à la vie.

Non, tu n'as pas pour moi les mêmes charmes,
Muet têmoin de nos tendres soupirs;
En retraçant nos fugitifs plaisirs,
Cruel portrait! tu fais couler mes larmes.

Pardonne-moi mon injuste langage,
Pardonne aux cris de ma vive douleur;
Portrait charmant, tu n'es pas le bonheur,
Mais bien souvent tu m'en offres l'image.

(c) Praise not to me the new-born rose,
Though she's called the beauteous Queen of ev'ry bow'r.
I'll tell you where a blossom grows,
More lovely far than ev'ry other flow'r.
Thou'rt all my heart's delight,
Thou alone canst make it beat.
Shine like a star, then, in my night,
My fairest flow'ret, my Marguerite.

Tender tulip is both bright and gay,
She enchants with her vivacity;
But to my mind, I still must say,
She wants the charm of true simplicity.
Thou'rt all my heart's delight, etc.

No! I confess, I'm not in love
With the violet that bends her head so low;
Though she looks tender as a dove,
At heart she's but a fickle flirt, I know!
Thou'rt all my heart's delight, etc.

(a) BALLAD. "Belsatzar." . . . . SCHUMANN
(b) BALLAD. "Die Vätergruft." . . . . LISZT

Mr. Henschel.

(a) The midnight hour was coming on,
In deathlike calm lay Babylon.

But in the monarch's castle high
Held the monarch's attendants gay revelry.

And in the regal hall upstairs
A regal feast Belshazzar shares.

The servants in glittering circles recline,
And empty the goblets of sparkling wine.

The servants are shouting, the goblets ring,
Delighting the heart of the ruthless king.

The king's cheeks feel a ruddy glow,
The wine doth swell his ardor so.

And, blindly led on by his ardor's wiles,
The Godhead with blasphemous words he reviles.

And wildly he curses and raves aloud,
Approvingly bellow the serving crowd.

The king commands with a look that burns,
The servant hastens, and soon returns.

Many golden vessels he bears on his head,
The spoils of Jehovah's temple dread.

[illegible] programme specially adapted to bring out its best points have been rare. The best number, if there could be a choice in a performance of such uniform merit, was the symphony, "In the Spring." It is a grand work and calls for brilliancy of orchestration, for unusually fine gradations of tone and precision in the solo instruments.

Next week's public rehearsal will take place Thursday afternoon, instead of Friday, and the programme for both Thursday afternoon and evening will consist of D'Albert's symphony in F major, Op.4, first time in America; Handel's aria, "Alessandro"; Henschel's suite from the music to Shakspere's "Hamlet," written for Beerbohm Tree; Massenet's aria from "Herodiade"; Weber's overture, "Oberon." The music of "Hamlet" will receive its first American production on this occasion and will be conducted by the composer. Mrs. Henschel will be the soloist.

Fourth Henschel Recital.

The last recital by this clever couple was given at Meionaon Saturday afternoon. The thorough excellence of their performance, the total absence of even a suspicion of fault in method or interpretation, grows more apparent at each appearance of these modest, unassuming artists. Mr. Henschel exhibited consummate skill in the manner in which he adapted his full baritone voice to the light, sweet soprano of Mrs. Henschel in the closing duet of his own composition, "Gondoliera," which was the best double number of the programme. Mrs. Henschel's best numbers were "Dov e la Lovella," by Henschel; an old Irish ballad, "The Little Red [illegible]"; Hervey's May Song," and "The Glen of Kenmare," which she gave as an encore.

Music Notices.

Those who attended the Henschel recitals can have little doubt concerning Mrs. Henschel's artistic temperament. All her gowns were made to harmonize with the quaint old ballads in which she excels. She was a [illegible] picture on Saturday, dressed in a short-waisted gown of yellow figured silk, made with a Watteau back, full wrinkled sleeves, the neck cut square and edged with the same pattern of dainty lace that fell over her hands. A band of dull gold against her dark hair was the finishing touch of the costume.

WORLD, Baltimore, Md.

Date 4-8

Eugen D'Albert, who is called "the greatest pianist after Liszt" and who will be heard as a soloist Monday night in the [illegible] is now but 28 years of age, and at the age of 15 composed his first overture, which was performed at St. James hall, London. His first public appearance was [illegible] Philharmonic concerts in Vienna, [illegible] 1882 he was appointed court pianist to the grand duke of Wiemar. His [illegible] talent has placed him in the [illegible] rank as master of the piano.

[illegible] will give its [illegible] at Lehmann's April [illegible]

[illegible] orchestra will [illegible]

THE BOSTON TIMES

TWENTY-SEVENTH YEAR.

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 10, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-FIRST CONCERT.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert in Music hall, Saturday evening, April 2, was:

Mendelssohn.	Symphony No. 3, in A minor. "Scotch." Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato. — Vivace non troppo. — Adagio. — Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestoso assai.
Mozart.	Andante and Allegro from Concerto for Flute and Harp.
Volkmann.	Serenade for String Orchestra, in F major.
Wagner.	"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkure."

Soloists—Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Charles Molé, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker.

The symphony was played in such a fascinating manner as to elicit hearty commendation and praise from an unusually large audience. There is absolute music in all the movements, but the second was so faultlessly performed that its beauties were made more prominent than the others. One can forgive Mendelssohn for the Scotch suggestions, for they are so beautifully worked in as to remind, without becoming too prominent or offensive. It is really a delight to hear melodious music once in a while, even if it be considered tame and commonplace beside the modern ultra school now so much in vogue.

Then, again, the two movements from Mozart's Concerto for flute and harp were delightful, both in music and manner of performance.

The Volkmann serenade for strings is an uneven composition. If the last half had been omitted, people would have been perfectly charmed, for it ruined the favorable impressions of the first, which was seductively beautiful.

The Wagner selection destroyed all the lovely effect of Mendelssohn and Mozart. If there was [illegible] the beginning or will be at the ending [illegible] world, it was vividly brought to mind by [illegible] performance of this piece. We looked for [illegible] Gabriel, or, I should say, [illegible] to sound the last trumpet [illegible] this as it may, the close was there, the trumpets pealed forth "their clarion voices," the drums beat, the strings scratched with velocity, heavenwards or elsewhere. The noise and confusion were terrific and Mr. Nikisch was in the height of his glory. He beat time, slashed to the right and left, leaving no doubt on the minds of his hearers that it was diabolical noise, not music he was evoking from the orchestra with that tiny little stick of his. Did Mr. Nikisch bring these pieces together for comparison, to show how little music Wagner could write, and how very musical Mendelssohn and Mozart are? The contrast could not possibly have been greater, and Mr. Wagner suffered.

James M. Tracy.

EUGEN D'ALBERT'S RECITALS.

A series of piano recitals is to be given in Music hall on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday afternoons, April 18, 20 and 23, by Eugen D'Albert, whose playing with the Symphony orchestra recently created such a marked sensation. This "little giant" of the pianoforte is so grand an artist, so perfect in technique and expressive in interpretation, and so famed as a player, especially of Beethoven, that the liveliest anticipations are awakened in the coming recitals. The opening one is by special request devoted to the music of Beethoven and will possess an interest as marked as in that given a few years ago by Von Bülow. The others contain selections from Bach, Mendelssohn, Tausig, Rubinstein, Chopin, Liszt and others, which call for such varied treatment and such brilliant work that none but a master could attempt them with success; and success has attended D'Albert to a marked degree on his brief tour. Tickets, season and single, can be procured at Music hall.

Eugen D'Albert will give concerts of pianoforte music at Music hall, Monday, April 18, Thursday, April 21, and Saturday, April 23, afternoons. The first programme, made up of works by Beethoven, includes 32 variations, C minor; and the sonatas, op. 53, 90, 109 and 110.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO.

SUNDAY, APRIL ? 1892.

The Symphony Concert—New York's Orchestra to Be Heard Here Again—The Oratorios of the Handel and Haydn—D'Albert's Recitals—News Notes, Gossip, Comment.

The programme performed last evening in Music Hall at the 22d of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra had nothing of novelty, but was made interesting by the generally excellent way in which the familiar selections were played under Mr. Nikisch's direction.

The "Sakuntala" overture began the programme, and this wonderfully clever bit of tone coloring was given with splendid effect throughout, the orchestra showing the skilful direction of its leader in all the masterly combinations with which the composer has treated its tuneful themes.

Prof. John K. Paine's "Spring" symphony followed, and the reading given this scholarly work revealed all its beauties to the best advantage. The graceful "scherzo' was given with a dainty airiness that was quite charming, and the noble theme of the final movement was brought out with grand effect. All in all, the symphony has never had a better performance than that given it on this occasion.

A satisfying interpretation of the familiar "Egmont" overture ended the programme, and left a very pleasant impression of the evening's concert.

Next Saturday evening Mr. and Mrs. Henschel appear, the former taking his old place at the conductor's desk to direct the first American performance of a suite from his "Hamlet" music, and the latter contributing arias from "Alessandro" and "Herodiade."

The public rehearsal, it should be noted, will be given on Thursday, instead of Friday afternoon, the coming week.

THE D'ALBERT RECITALS.

A series of three piano recitals by Herr Eugen d'Albert is announced at Music Hall on Monday afternoon, April 18, Wednesday afternoon, April 20, and Saturday afternoon, April 23.

A Beethoven programme is announced for the first recital, which will include the 32 variations in C minor; the sonata in C major, op. 53; the sonata in E minor, op. 90; the sonata in E major, op. 109, and the sonata in A-flat major, op. 110.

THE HENSCHEL RECITAL.

The last of their four vocal recitals was given by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel at the Meionaon yesterday afternoon, every seat in the hall having been sold long before the doors were opened.

Both singers were heard at their best on this occasion, and the programme was an admirably varied one, with many of the gems which have been heard in their recitals in earlier years.

Among the most charming numbers for the two singers were the two duets by Saint Saens, in which the voices were heard with rare delight.

Mrs. Henschel's singing of the "May Song," by A. Hervey, and, as an encore, the old Scotch ballad, "The Glen of Kenmare," marked the highest point of perfection in the vocal art, and fairly disarmed criticism.

The recital ended with the duet, "Gondoliera," by Mr. Henschel, which called out a grand ovation for the two artists, and the audience left the hall with the most delightful memories of this series of artistic triumphs for the two singers.

Without doubt an additional programme given in English throughout would be hailed with great satisfaction by the patrons of this series, as the vernacular has been persistently ignored by both Mr. and Mrs. Henschel in the concerts just concluded.

Mme. Lillian Nordica was recently complimented by being asked to act as one of three judges to award the prize for singing known as the Llewyn Thomas gold medal at the Royal Academy of Music, London.

The third and last of the Adamowski quartet concerts is announced at Union Hall, next Tuesday evening, when the programme will include Bazzini's quartet No. 4, Loeffler's two movements from quartet, and Beethoven's quartet, op. 18, No. 4.

THE · PRESTO ·

APRIL 7, 1892

In May Chicago is to have a visit from the Bosto
Symphony Orchestra. One concert by this unsu passed organization will close up our musical seaso D'Albert will be the soloist. I am rather anxious see whether our local critics will "damn with fai praise" when he appears again. The critical cliq that has things pretty much its own way at t present time, will be obliged to furbish up its arsen of non-committal weapons or come out boldly an give him the praise that will be justly due him.

And the monarch straight seized on a sacred cup
With impious hand, and filled it up.

And down to the dregs he drains it fast,
And with foaming mouth exclaims at last:

"Jehovah, thy power I here defy,
The King of Babylon am I!"

But scarcely had sounded the fearful word,
When the heart of the king with terror was stirred.

The yelling laughter is silenced all,
And deathlike silence fills the hall.

And see! And see! On the wall so white
A human hand appears in sight.

And letters of flame on the wall so white
It wrote and wrote, and vanished from sight.

The king the writing with wonderment sees,
As pale as death and with trembling knees.

The awestruck servants sat around,
And silent sat, and uttered no sound.

The magicians appeared, but none 'mongst them all
Could rightly interpret the words on the wall.

But Belshazzar, the king, the selfsame night
Was slain by his servants,— a ghastly sight.

(English Version.)

(b) To the church on the moorland dreary
  Came a mail-clad gray-beard sire,
His step was heavy and weary
  As he strode up the gloomy choir.

A row of gloomy tombs
  Stood grimly the aisle along;
Then arose from the catacombs
  A mournful ghostly song.

"I've heard your solemn greeting,
  Ye spirits of my sires;
Cease your sorrowful entreating,
  I yield to your desires."

Hard by was empty lying
  A marble couch of rest,
And there lay the warrior dying,
  His shield spread over his breast.

His soul to Heav'n resigning,
  He drew a last long breath.
The spirits ceased repining,
  And all was still as death!

Wm. Beatty-Kingston.

(a) SCHLUMMERLIED from the "MAGELLONE." }
(b) DES MÄDCHEN'S FLUCH. } . . . . BRAHMS

MRS. HENSCHEL.

(a) Rest thee, my lady, in shadow
Of darkling glimmering brakes;
The grass is awave in the meadow,
And cool is thy couch in the shadow,
And true love near thee wakes.
Sleep, Love, mine own,
Woods make drowsy moan.
Ever I'm thine own.

Birds in the boughs that are hiding,
Ah! break not her softest repose;
All hushed the song at my chiding,
The birds fall asleep in their hiding,
Sweet Love, let thine eyelids close.
Sleep, Love, mine own,
Until night be flown.
Safe will I guard mine own.

Murmur forth, ye songs of slumber;
Ripple on, thou silent stream.
Lovely phantoms beyond number
Whisper in the songs of slumber
Through the folding of thy dream.
In the woods making moan,
Swarms of golden bees have flown,
And lull thee to slumber, mine own.

(b) Calls the mother, calls her daughter,
'Cross the hills of heather:
"Say, O Mara, say, my daughter,
Hast thou bleached thy linen?"

Then to her the maid gives answer,
'Cross the hills of heather:
"Nay, good mother, yet in water
I've not steeped my linen!

"For, alas! my crystal water
Javo sore hath troubled!
How could I, O good my mother,
By this hour have bleached it?

"Thou wilt curse him, O my mother,
And I, too, will curse him.
Would the pow'rs that rule bright heaven
Grant that he might hang him,
Hang him on a tree that's blighted,
On my white throat slender!

"Would the pow'rs that rule bright heaven
Cast him into prison,
Cast him in the deepest dungeon,
On my white breast tender!

"Would the pow'rs that rule but grant me
That he went in fetters,
Fetters binding, adamantine,
My white arms enlacing!

"Would the pow'rs that rule bright heaven
Grant the flood might take him,—
That the surging flood might take him,
Bear him safe to Mara!"

BALLAD. "ARCHIBALD DOUGLAS." . . . . LOEWE

MR. HENSCHEL.

"For seven long years I've borne a grief
  That I no more can bear;
The world to me is sad and drear,
  Where once it was most fair.

"Before his presence I'll appear,
  Clad in this churl's attire;
And, when he sees me old and bowed,
  He'll grant what I desire.

"But, if he bears the old-time hate
  As in that bygone day,
What destined is to come, let come;
  Let come whatever may."

Lord Douglas spoke; a wayside stone
  Invited him to rest:
O'er fields and woods he gazed, then sank
  His head upon his breast.

In rusty armor he was clad,
  Beneath his pilgrim's gown.
But hark! a horn! from forest depth
  A hunting train swept down.

Through whirling dust the pack tore on,
  On, on, the huntsmen hied!
Lord Douglas barely rose before
  The train was at his side.

King James sat on his mighty steed,
  Lord Douglas bowed his head;
The hot blood swept the monarch's face,
  As Douglas spoke and said:

"King James, in mercy hark to me,
  For me be patience thine:
What wrongs my brothers did to thee,
  They were no fault of mine!

"Remember envious Douglas not
  Who traitors are to thee,— Bethink thee of thy childhood days
  I rocked thee on my knee.

"Bethink thee of the days that were,
  Be merciful to me!
For seven long years my shame has been A Douglas I should be!"

"I see thee not, Lord Archibald,
  Thy voice I will not hear!
'Tis but the forest murmuring low
  Of many a bygone year.

"How sweet and clear the whisper sounds
  That holds me 'gainst my will;
But through it all I seem to hear,
  'He is a Douglas still.'

---

to bring out its best points have been rare. The best number, if there could be a choice in a performance of such uniform merit, was the symphony, "In the Spring." It is a grand work and calls for brilliancy of orchestration, for unusually fine gradations of tone and precision in the solo instruments.

Next week's public rehearsal will take place Thursday afternoon, instead of Friday, and the programme for both Thursday afternoon and evening will consist of D'Albert's symphony in F major, Op.4, first time in America; Handel's aria, "Alessandro"; Henschel's suite from the music to Shakspere's "Hamlet," written for Beerbohm Tree; Massenet's aria from "Herodiade"; Weber's overture, "Oberon." The music of "Hamlet" will receive its first American production on this occasion and will be conducted by the composer. Mrs. Henschel will be the soloist.

Fourth Henschel Recital.

The last recital by this clever couple was given at Meionaon Saturday afternoon. The thorough excellence of their performance, the total absence of even a suspicion of fault in method or interpretation, grows more apparent at each appearance of these modest, unassuming artists. Mr. Henschel exhibited consummate skill in the manner in which he mated his full baritone voice to the light sweet soprano of Mrs. Henschel in the [illegible] duet of his own composition, "Gondoliera," which was the best double number of the programme. Mrs. Henschel's best numbers were "Dov e la Loveila," by Hen[illegible] an old Irish ballad, "The Little Red [illegible]"; Hervey's May Song," and "The Glen of Kenmare," which she gave as an encore.

Music Notices.

Those who attended the Henschel recitals can have little doubt concerning Mrs. Henschel's artistic temperament. All her gowns were made to harmonize with the quaint old ballads in which she excels. She was a veritable picture on Saturday, dressed in a short-waisted gown of yellow figured silk, made with a Watteau back, full wrinkled sleeves, the neck cut square and edged with the same pattern of dainty lace that fell over her hands. A band of dull gold against her dark hair was the finishing touch of the costume.

WORLD, Baltimore, Md.

Date 4-8

Eugen D'Albert, who is called "the greatest pianist after Liszt" and who will be heard as a soloist Monday night in the [illegible], is now but 28 years of age, and at the age of 15 composed his first overture, which was performed at St. James hall, London. His first public appearance was [illegible] Philharmonic concerts in Vienna, [illegible] in 1882 he was appointed court pianist [illegible] the grand duke of Wiemar. His [illegible] talent has placed him in the [illegible] as master of the piano.

[illegible] quartette will give its [illegible] concert at Lehmann's April

[illegible] orchestra will

THE BOSTON TIMES

TWENTY-SEVENTH YEAR.

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 10, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-FIRST CONCERT.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert in Music hall, Saturday evening, April 2, was:

Mendelssohn.	Symphony No. 3, in A minor. "Scotch." Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato. — Vivace non troppo. — Adagio. — Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestoso assai.
Mozart.	Andante and Allegro from Concerto for Flute and Harp.
Volkmann.	Serenade for String Orchestra, in F major.
Wagner.	"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkure."

Soloists—Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Charles Molé, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker.

The symphony was played in such a fascinating manner as to elicit hearty commendation and praise from an unusually large audience. There is absolute music in all the movements, but the second was so faultlessly performed that its beauties were made more prominent than the others. One can forgive Mendelssohn for the Scotch suggestions, for they are so beautifully worked in as to remind, without becoming too prominent or offensive. It is really a delight to hear melodious music once in a while, even if it be considered tame and commonplace beside the modern ultra school now so much in vogue.

Then, again, the two movements from Mozart's Concerto for flute and harp were delightful, both in music and manner of performance.

The Volkmann serenade for strings is an uneven composition. If the last half had been omitted, people would have been perfectly charmed, for it ruined the favorable impressions of the first, which was seductively beautiful.

The Wagner selection destroyed all the lovely effect of Mendelssohn and Mozart. If there was [illegible] the beginning or will be at the ending [illegible] world, it was vividly brought to mind by the performance of this piece. We looked for [illegible] thinking he had an understanding [illegible] Gabriel, or, I should say, with [illegible] to sound the last trumpets for [illegible]. Be this as it may, the chaos was there, the trumpets pealed forth "their clarion voices," the drums beat, the strings scratched with velocity, heavenwards or elsewhere. The noise and confusion were terrific and Mr. Nikisch was in the height of his glory. He beat time, slashed to the right and left, leaving no doubt on the minds of his hearers that it was diabolical noise, not music he was evoking from the orchestra with that tiny little stick of his. Did Mr. Nikisch bring these pieces together for comparison, to show how little music Wagner could write, and how very musical Mendelssohn and Mozart are? The contrast could not possibly have been greater, and Mr. Wagner suffered.

JAMES M. TRACY.

EUGEN D'ALBERT'S RECITALS.

A series of piano recitals is to be given in Music hall on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday afternoons, April 18, 20 and 23, by Eugen D'Albert, whose playing with the Symphony orchestra recently created such a marked sensation. This "little giant" of the pianoforte is so grand an artist, so perfect in technique and expressive in interpretation, and so famed as a player, especially of Beethoven, that the liveliest anticipations are awakened in the coming recitals. The opening one is by special request devoted to the music of Beethoven and will possess an interest as marked as in that given a few years ago by Von Bülow. The others contain selections from Bach, Mendelssohn, Tausig, Rubinstein, Chopin, Liszt and others, which call for such varied treatment and such brilliant work that none but a master could attempt them with success; and success has attended D'Albert to a marked degree on his brief tour. Tickets, season and single, can be procured at Music hall.

Eugen D'Albert will give concerts of pianoforte music at Music hall, Monday, April 18, Thursday, April 21, and Saturday, April 23, afternoons. The first programme, made up of works by Beethoven, includes 32 variations, C minor; and the sonatas, op. 53, 90, 109 and 110.

[illegible]

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO.

SUNDAY, APRIL [illegible] 1892.

The Symphony Concert—New York's Orchestra to Be Heard Here Again—The Oratorios of the Handel and Haydn—D'Albert's Recitals—News Notes, Gossip, Comment.

The programme performed last evening in Music Hall at the 22d of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra had nothing of novelty, but was made interesting by the generally excellent way in which the familiar selections were played under Mr. Nikisch's direction.

The "Sakuntala" overture began the programme, and this wonderfully clever bit of tone coloring was given with splendid effect throughout, the orchestra showing the skilful direction of its leader in all the masterly combinations with which the composer has treated its tuneful themes.

Prof. John K. Paine's "Spring" symphony followed, and the reading given this scholarly work revealed all its beauties to the best advantage. The graceful "scherzo" was given with a dainty airiness that was quite charming, and the noble theme of the final movement was brought out with grand effect. All in all, the symphony has never had a better performance than that given it on this occasion.

A satisfying interpretation of the familiar "Egmont" overture ended the programme, and left a very pleasant impression of the evening's concert.

Next Saturday evening Mr. and Mrs. Henschel appear, the former taking his old place at the conductor's desk to direct the first American performance of a suite from his "Hamlet" music, and the latter contributing arias from "Alessandro" and "Herodiade."

The public rehearsal, it should be noted, will be given on Thursday, instead of Friday afternoon, the coming week.

THE D'ALBERT RECITALS.

A series of three piano recitals by Herr Eugen d'Albert is announced at Music Hall on Monday afternoon, April 18, Wednesday afternoon, April 20, and Saturday afternoon, April 23.

A Beethoven programme is announced for the first recital, which will include the 32 variations in C minor; the sonata in C major, op. 53; the sonata in E minor, op. 90; the sonata in E major, op. 109, and the sonata in A-flat major, op. 110.

THE HENSCHEL RECITAL.

The last of their four vocal recitals was given by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel at the Meionaon yesterday afternoon, every seat in the hall having been sold long before the doors were opened.

Both singers were heard at their best on this occasion, and the programme was an admirably varied one, with many of the gems which have been heard in their recitals in earlier years.

Among the most charming numbers for the two singers were the two duets by Saint Saens, in which the voices were heard with rare delight.

Mrs. Henschel's singing of the "May Song," by A. Hervey, and, as an encore, the old Scotch ballad, "The Glen of Kenmare," marked the highest point of perfection in the vocal art, and fairly disarmed criticism.

The recital ended with the duet, "Gondoliera," by Mr. Henschel, which called out a grand ovation for the two artists, and the audience left the hall with the most delightful memories of this series of artistic triumphs for the two singers.

Without doubt an additional programme given in English throughout would be hailed with great satisfaction by the patrons of this series, as the vernacular has been persistently ignored by both Mr. and Mrs. Henschel in the concerts just concluded.

Mme. Lillian Nordica was recently complimented by being asked to act as one of three judges to award the prize for singing known as the Llewyn Thomas gold medal at the Royal Academy of Music, London.

The third and last of the Adamowski quartet concerts is announced at Union Hall, next Tuesday evening, when the programme will include Bazzini's quartet No. 4, Loeffler's two movements from quartet, and Beethoven's quartet, op. 18, No. 4.

THE · PRESTO ·

APRIL 7, 1892

EVERY THURSDAY.
[illegible] ABBOTT. EDITOR.
THE MUSIC TRA[illegible]
[illegible] & 325.
DEARBORN STREET.
CHICAGO.

In May Chicago is to have a visit from the Bost
Symphony Orchestra. One concert by this unsu passed organization will close up our musical seas D'Albert will be the soloist. I am rather anxious see whether our local critics will "damn with fa praise" when he appears again. The critical cliq that has things pretty much its own way at t
present time, will be obliged to furbish up its arsen of non-committal weapons or come out boldly a give him the praise that will be justly due him.

[177]

"I see thee not, I hear thee not,
No more than that I can!
I swore a Douglas in my sight
Should be a ruined man."

King James spurred on his mighty steed,
Uphill now lay his ride,
But Douglas grasped his bridle-rein,
And kept the King beside.

The way was steep, the sun was hot,
Heavy his armor old;
But though his weary limbs should fail,
The Douglas kept his hold.

"King James, I was thy Seneschal,
That no more I may be;
I only ask to be the churl
Who tends thy steed for thee.

"Will strew his bed, will give him corn,
With ever faithful hand,—
But let me breathe the air again
In our dear fatherland.

"And wilt thou not, then take a heart,
And grateful shall I be;
Thy good sword draw, take well thy aim,
And make an end of me."

Then from his steed King James leaped [down,
His face with light aflame,
His sword from out its scabbard drew,
But not for deadly aim.

"Oh, take, oh, take thy sword again,
My trusty Seneschal!
His soul indeed is true, who loves
His fatherland so well.

"To horse! we'll ride to Linlithgow,
Thy place is at my side!
As in the past, to sport and war
Together we will ride!"

TWO DUETS. . . . . SAINT-SAËNS

MR. and MRS. HENSCHEL.

(a) Ici les tendres oiseaux
Goûtent cent douceurs secrètes,
Et l'on entend ces côteaux
Retentir des chansonnettes
Qu'ils apprennent aux échos.

Sur ce gazon les ruisseaux
Murmurent leurs amourettes,
Et l'on voit jusqu'aux ormeaux,
Pour embrasser les fleurettes,
Pencher leurs jeunes rameaux.

(b) Viens! Une flûte invisible
Soupire dans les vergers.
La chanson la plus paisible
Est la chanson des bergers.

Le vent ride sous l'yeuse
Le sombre miroir des eaux.
La chanson la plus joyeuse
Est la chanson des oiseaux.

Que nul soin ne te tourmente,
Aimons nous! Aimons toujours.
La chanson la plus charmante
Est la chanson des amours.

Victor Hugo.

(a) DOV' È LA SORELLA? . . . . HENSCHEL
(b) THE LITTLE RED LARK. . . . . OLD IRISH
(c) MAY SONG. . . . . A. HERVEY

MRS. HENSCHEL.

(a) Hark! the nightingales are singing
Soft and sweet, as yesterday;
But, alas! their dulcet voices
Seem to ask in mournful lay:
Sister, why hast parted,
Graceful, tender-hearted?

No, their old song 'tis no longer;
In my ears I hear it ring
What the nightingales so sadly
In the dusky bushes sing:
Graceful, tender-hearted,
Sister, why hast parted?

(b) Oh, swan of slenderness,
Dove of tenderness,
Jewel of joys, arise!
The little red lark,
Like a soaring spark
Of song, to his sunburst flies.
But till thou'rt risen
Earth is a prison
Full of my lonesome sighs;
Then awake and discover
To thy fond lover
The morn of thy matchless eyes.

The morn is dark to me,
Hark, oh, hark to me,
Pulse of my heart, I pray!
And out of thy hiding
With blushes gliding,
Dazzle me with thy day.
And then once more to thee
Flying I'll pour to thee
Passion so sweet and gay;
The lark shall listen,
And dewdrops glisten,
Laughing on ev'ry spray.

(c) With a dance in joyous measure
May's return long wished for, hail,
Bringing with it charm and pleasure,
Blessings over hill and dale!

Each green leaf and blossom tender
Clothed in new-born beauty seem,
Budding forth in vernal splendor,
Freshened by the sunlit stream.

Dance, gay youth and love-inspiring
Maiden fairer still in May,
Dance, and with a voice untiring
Sing the fleeing hours away.

When the morning bells are ringing
Raise your tuneful notes again,
When the nightingale is singing
Wake an echo to her strain.

With sweet blossoms of the cherry
Deck your hats of springlike green,
Dance in circles, blithe and merry
As the shepherds wont has been!

Bees are humming on each flower,
And the west wind's gentle sigh
Breathes on you a snowy shower
From each laden branch on high.

(a) BALLAD. "JUNG DIETERICH." . . . . HENSCHEL
(b) BALLAD. "THE GRENADIERS." . . . . SCHUMANN

MR. HENSCHEL.

(a) Defeated and slain with half of his host,
Was Theodemerus, King of the Goths.

The Huns were shouting with fiendish mirth,
The vultures hastened down to earth.

The moon was bright, the wind was cold,
The wolves were howling in distant wold.

Three men were riding through heather and field,
Their helmets battered, and broken their shield.

The first one bore in his saddle-sling
The broken spear of his murdered king.

The second, he bore the king's crown, O woe!
Split straight in two by the axe of a foe.

The third, he hid with faithful arm
A secret veiled in his mantle warm.

And, when they the river Ister espied,
The first one rested his horse and cried:

"Save a battered crown and a broken spear,
Of the Gothic kingdom there's nought to fear!"

And the second said: "In those waters deep
Let us bury our treasure for ever to sleep;

"Then follow ourselves by a leap from the sand,— Why tarry, Master Hildebrand?"

"Ye carry the king's own crown and spear,
My faithful companions, far more have I here!"

Thus saying, he opened his cloak so warm:
"I carry the hope of the Goths in my arm.

"Ye saved spear and crown, 'twas bravely done;
I, I have rescued the king's own son!

"Awake now, my boy, see how homage I bring;
I greet thee, Young Diet'rich, the Goths' new king!"

G. H.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO.

SUNDAY, APRIL 1892.

The Symphony Concert—New York's Orchestra to Be Heard Here Again—The Oratorios of the Handel and Haydn—D'Albert's Recitals—News Notes, Gossip, Comment.

The programme performed last evening in Music Hall at the 22d of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra had nothing of novelty, but was made interesting by the generally excellent way in which the familiar selections were played under Mr. Nikisch's direction.

The "Sakuntala" overture began the programme, and this wonderfully clever bit of tone coloring was given with splendid effect throughout, the orchestra showing the skilful direction of its leader in all the masterly combinations with which the composer has treated its tuneful themes.

Prof. John K. Paine's "Spring" symphony followed, and the reading given this scholarly work revealed all its beauties to the best advantage. The graceful "scherzo' was given with a dainty airiness that was quite charming, and the noble theme of the final movement was brought out with grand effect. All in all, the symphony has never had a better performance than that given it on this occasion.

A satisfying interpretation of the familiar "Egmont" overture ended the programme, and left a very pleasant impression of the evening's concert.

Next Saturday evening Mr. and Mrs. Henschel appear, the former taking his old place at the conductor's desk to direct the first American performance of a suite from his "Hamlet" music, and the latter contributing arias from "Alessandro" and "Herodiade."

The public rehearsal, it should be noted, will be given on Thursday, instead of Friday afternoon, the coming week.

THE D'ALBERT RECITALS.

A series of three piano recitals by Herr Eugen d'Albert is announced at Music Hall on Monday afternoon, April 18, Wednesday afternoon, April 20, and Saturday afternoon, April 23.

A Beethoven programme is announced for the first recital, which will include the 32 variations in C minor; the sonata in C major, op. 53; the sonata in E minor, op. 90; the sonata in E major, op. 109, and the sonata in A-flat major, op. 110.

THE HENSCHEL RECITAL.

The last of their four vocal recitals was given by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel at the Meionaon yesterday afternoon, every seat in the hall having been sold long before the doors were opened.

Both singers were heard at their best on this occasion, and the programme was an admirably varied one, with many of the gems which have been heard in their recitals in earlier years.

Among the most charming numbers for the two singers were the two duets by Saint Saens, in which the voices were heard with rare delight.

Mrs. Henschel's singing of the "May Song," by A. Hervey, and, as an encore, the old Scotch ballad, "The Glen of Kenmare," marked the highest point of perfection in the vocal art, and fairly disarmed criticism.

The recital ended with the duet, "Gondoliera," by Mr. Henschel, which called out a grand ovation for the two artists, and the audience left the hall with the most delightful memories of this series of artistic triumphs for the two singers.

Without doubt an additional programme given in English throughout would be hailed with great satisfaction by the patrons of this series, as the vernacular has been persistently ignored by both Mr. and Mrs. Henschel in the concerts just concluded.

Mme. Lillian Nordica was recently complimented by being asked to act as one of three judges to award the prize for singing known as the Llewyn Thomas gold medal at the Royal Academy of Music, London.

The third and last of the Adamowski quartet concerts is announced at Union Hall, next Tuesday evening, when the programme will include Bazzini's quartet No. 4, Loeffler's two movements from quartet, and Beethoven's quartet, op. 18, No. 4.

---

to bring out its best points have been rare. The best number, if there could be a choice in a performance of such uniform merit, was the symphony, "In the Spring." It is a grand work and calls for brilliancy of orchestration, for unusually fine gradations of tone and precision in the solo instruments.

Next week's public rehearsal will take place Thursday afternoon, instead of Friday, and the programme for both Thursday afternoon and evening will consist of D'Albert's symphony in F major, Op.4, first time in America; Handel's aria, "Alessandro"; Henschel's suite from the music to Shakspere's "Hamlet," written for Beerbohm Tree; Massenet's aria from "Herodiade"; Weber's overture, "Oberon." The music of "Hamlet" will receive its first American production on this occasion and will be conducted by the composer. Mrs. Henschel will be the soloist.

Fourth Henschel Recital.

The last recital by this clever couple was given at Meionaon Saturday afternoon. The thorough excellence of their performance, the total absence of even a suspicion of fault in method or interpretation, grows more apparent at each appearance of these modest, unassuming artists. Mr. Henschel exhibited consummate skill in the manner in which he adapted his full baritone voice to the light, sweet soprano of Mrs. Henschel in the [illegible] duet of his own composition, "Gondoliera," which was the best double number of the programme. Mrs. Henschel's best numbers were "Dov e la Lovella," by Henschel; an old Irish ballad, "The Little Red Lark"; Hervey's May Song," and "The Glen of Kenmare," which she gave as an encore.

Music Notices.

Those who attended the Henschel recitals can have little doubt concerning Mrs. Henschel's artistic temperament. All her gowns were made to harmonize with the quaint old ballads in which she excels. She was a veritable picture on Saturday, dressed in a short-waisted gown of yellow figured silk, made with a Watteau back, full wrinkled sleeves, the neck cut square and edged with the same pattern of dainty lace that fell over her hands. A band of dull gold against her [illegible] hair was the finishing touch of the costume.

WORLD, Baltimore, Md.

Date 4-8

Eugen D'Albert, who is called "the greatest pianist after Liszt" and who will be heard as a soloist Monday night in the city, is now but 28 years of age, and at the age of 15 composed his first overture, which was performed at St. James hall, London. His first public appearance was at the Philharmonic concerts in Vienna, [illegible] he was appointed court pianist [illegible] grand duke of Wiemar. His [illegible] talent has placed him in the [illegible] rank as master of the piano.

[illegible] will give its [illegible] Lehmann's April

[illegible] orchestra will [illegible]

THE BOSTON TIMES

TWENTY-SEVENTH YEAR.

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 10, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-FIRST CONCERT.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert in Music hall, Saturday evening, April 2, was:

Mendelssohn.	Symphony No. 3, in A minor. "Scotch." Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato. — Vivace non troppo. — Adagio. — Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestoso assai.
Mozart.	Andante and Allegro from Concerto for Flute and Harp.
Volkmann.	Serenade for String Orchestra, in F major.
Wagner.	"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkure."

Soloists—Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Charles Molé, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker.

The symphony was played in such a fascinating manner as to elicit hearty commendation and praise from an unusually large audience. There is absolute music in all the movements, but the second was so faultlessly performed that its beauties were made more prominent than the others. One can forgive Mendelssohn for the Scotch suggestions, for they are so beautifully worked in as to remind, without becoming too prominent or offensive. It is really a delight to hear melodious music once in a while, even if it be considered tame and commonplace beside the modern ultra school now so much in vogue.

Then, again, the two movements from Mozart's Concerto for flute and harp were delightful, both in music and manner of performance.

The Volkmann serenade for strings is an uneven composition. If the last half had been omitted, people would have been perfectly charmed, for it ruined the favorable impressions of the first, which was seductively beautiful.

The Wag[illegible] selection destroyed all the lovely eff[illegible]delssohn and Mozart. If there was [illegible] the beginning or will be at the ending [illegible] world, it was vividly brought to mind by [illegible]mance of this piece. We looked for [illegible]tten, thinking he had an understandin[illegible] Gabriel, or, I should say, with [illegible] to sound the last trumpet [illegible] Be this as it may, the [illegible] was there, the trumpets pealed forth "their clarion voices," the drums beat, the strings scratched with velocity, heavenwards or elsewhere. The noise and confusion were terrific and Mr. Nikisch was in the height of his glory. He beat time, slashed to the right and left, leaving no doubt on the minds of his hearers that it was diabolical noise, not music he was evoking from the orchestra with that tiny little stick of his. Did Mr. Nikisch bring these pieces together for comparison, to show how little music Wagner could write, and how very musical Mendelssohn and Mozart are? The contrast could not possibly have been greater, and Mr. Wagner suffered.

JAMES M. TRACY.

EUGEN D'ALBERT'S RECITALS.

A series of piano recitals is to be given in Music hall on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday afternoons, April 18, 20 and 23, by Eugen D'Albert, whose playing with the Symphony orchestra recently created such a marked sensation. This "little giant" of the pianoforte is so grand an artist, so perfect in technique and expressive in interpretation, and so famed as a player, especially of Beethoven, that the liveliest anticipations are awakened in the coming recitals. The opening one is by special request devoted to the music of Beethoven and will possess an interest as marked as in that given a few years ago by Von Bülow. The others contain selections from Bach, Mendelssohn, Tausig, Rubinstein, Chopin, Liszt and others, which call for such varied treatment and such brilliant work that none but a master could attempt them with success; and success has attended D'Albert to a marked degree on his brief tour. Tickets, season and single, can be procured at Music hall.

Eugen D'Albert will give concerts of pianoforte music at Music hall, Monday, April 18, Thursday, April 21, and Saturday, April 23, afternoons. The first programme, made up of works by Beethoven, includes 32 variations, C minor; and the sonatas, op. 53, 90, 109 and 110.

THE · PRESTO ·

APRIL 7, 1892

EVERY THURSDAY. ABBOTT. EDITOR. & 325. DEARBORN STREET. CHICAGO.

In May Chicago is to have a visit from the Bos Symphony Orchestra. One concert by this uns passed organization will close up our musical seas D'Albert will be the soloist. I am rather anxious see whether our local critics will "damn with fa praise" when he appears again. The critical cli that has things pretty much its own way at present time, will be obliged to furbish up its arse of non-committal weapons or come out boldly a
give him the praise that will be justly due him.

(b) To France were returning two Grenadiers,
In Russia they long did languish,
And as they came to the German frontiers,
They hung down their heads with anguish

'Twas there that they heard that story of woe,
The fair realm of France had been shaken,
Besieged and defeated, o'erwhelmed by the foe,
And the Emperor, their Emperor, was taken!

Then shed bitter tears those brave Grenadiers,
To hear such news on returning;
And then one said: "Would I were dead!
Once more my old wounds are burning!"

The other said, "My song is o'er,
I'd die with thee most gladly,
But I've a wife and child at home,
Without me they live sadly."

"For wife or child what can I care,
Such grief in my soul deep is lying.
Wife and child can beg when they hungry are;
In prison my Emperor is sighing!

"Oh, grant me, brother, but one prayer,—
If I indeed am dying,
My corpse to my dear native country bear,—
In French soil I fain would be lying "My cross of honor, clasp, and band,

Close to the heart lay on me;
My gun then place within my hand,
And gird my sword upon me.

"So will I lie and listen there,
Like sentry on guard o'er the forces,
Till waked by the loud cannon's deafening roar,
And the tramp of the proud neighing horses.

"O'er my head, then, will ride mine Emperor so brave,
While swords are clashing and flashing,
Their rays with the sunlight blending;
In that hour fully armed I will rise from the grave,
The cause of my Emperor defending!"

After Heine.

DUET. "GONDOLIERA." . . . . HENSCHEL

MR. and MRS. HENSCHEL.

Evening around is falling,
All with the day is sleeping,
Gondolas light are calling,
Come to the open sea.
Silence the ocean steeping,
Come, my love, sail there with me.

Night is its mantle flinging,
Earth in the gloom lies darkling,
Ah! now a gleam upspringing,
Like an enchantment, see!
Stars in the moonlight sparkling,
Come, my love, sail there with me.

In our loved waves confiding,
Peace on our hearts bestowing,
Only the soft breeze blowing,
Only the stars and sea,—
Safe o'er the waters gliding,
Come, love, and sail with me.

GEO. H. ELLIS, PRINTER, 141 FRANKLIN ST., BOSTON.

---

to bring out its best points have been rare. The best number, if there could be a choice in a performance of such uniform merit, was the symphony, "In the Spring." It is a grand work and calls for brilliancy of orchestration, for unusually fine gradations of tone and precision in the solo instruments.

Next week's public rehearsal will take place Thursday afternoon, instead of Friday, and the programme for both Thursday afternoon and evening will consist of D'Albert's symphony in F major, Op.4, first time in America; Handel's aria, "Alessandro"; Henschel's suite from the music to Shakspere's "Hamlet," written for Beerbohm Tree; Massenet's aria from "Herodiade"; Weber's overture, "Oberon." The music of "Hamlet" will receive its first American production on this occasion and will be conducted by the composer. Mrs. Henschel will be the soloist.

Fourth Henschel Recital.

The last recital by this clever couple was given at Meionaon Saturday afternoon. The thorough excellence of their performance, the total absence of even a suspicion of fault in method or interpretation, grows more apparent at each appearance of these modest, unassuming artists. Mr. Henschel exhibited consummate skill in the manner in which he adapted his full baritone voice to the light, sweet soprano of Mrs. Henschel in the closing duet of his own composition, "Gondoliera," which was the best double number of the programme. Mrs. Henschel's best numbers were "Dov e la Lovella," by Henschel; an old Irish ballad, "The Little Red Lark"; Hervey's May Song," and "The Glen of Kenmare," which she gave as an encore.

Music Notices.

Those who attended the Henschel recitals can have little doubt concerning Mrs. Henschel's artistic temperament. All her gowns were made to harmonize with the quaint old ballads in which she excels. She was a veritable picture on Saturday, dressed in a short-waisted gown of yellow figured silk, made with a Watteau back, full wrinkled sleeves, the neck cut square and edged with the same pattern of dainty lace that fell over her hands. A band of dull gold against her dark hair was the finishing touch of the costume.

WORLD, Baltimore, Md.

Date 4-8

Eugen D'Albert, who is called "the greatest pianist after Liszt" and who will be heard as a soloist Monday night in the city, is now but 28 years of age, and at the age of 15 composed his first overture, which was performed at St. James hall, London. His first public appearance was at the Philharmonic concerts in Vienna, and in 1882 he was appointed court pianist by the grand duke of Wiemar. His wonderful talent has placed him in the front rank as master of the piano.

The Kneisel quartette will give its second season concert at Lehmann's April [illegible]

The Boston symphony orchestra will [illegible] at the Academy [illegible]

THE BOSTON TIMES

TWENTY-SEVENTH YEAR.

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 10, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-FIRST CONCERT.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert in Music hall, Saturday evening, April 2, was:

Mendelssohn.	Symphony No. 3, in A minor. "Scotch." Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato. — Vivace non troppo. — Adagio. — Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestoso assai.
Mozart.	Andante and Allegro from Concerto for Flute and Harp.
Volkmann.	Serenade for String Orchestra, in F major.
Wagner.	"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkure."

Soloists—Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Charles Molé, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker.

The symphony was played in such a fascinating manner as to elicit hearty commendation and praise from an unusually large audience. There is absolute music in all the movements, but the second was so faultlessly performed that its beauties were made more prominent than the others. One can forgive Mendelssohn for the Scotch suggestions, for they are so beautifully worked in as to remind, without becoming too prominent or offensive. It is really a delight to hear melodious music once in a while, even if it be considered tame and commonplace beside the modern ultra school now so much in vogue.

Then, again, the two movements from Mozart's Concerto for flute and harp were delightful, both in music and manner of performance.

The Volkmann serenade for strings is an uneven composition. If the last half had been omitted, people would have been perfectly charmed, for it ruined the favorable impressions of the first, which was seductively beautiful.

The Wagner selection destroyed all the lovely effects of Mendelssohn and Mozart. If there was chaos at the beginning or will be at the ending of the world, it was vividly brought to mind by the performance of this piece. We looked for Prof. Totten, thinking he had an understanding with Gabriel, or, I should say, with Director Nikisch to sound the last trumpets for [illegible] was there, the trumpets pealed forth "their clarion voices," the drums beat, the strings scratched with velocity, heavenwards or elsewhere. The noise and confusion were terrific and Mr. Nikisch was in the height of his glory. He beat time, slashed to the right and left, leaving no doubt on the minds of his hearers that it was diabolical noise, not music he was evoking from the orchestra with that tiny little stick of his. Did Mr. Nikisch bring these pieces together for comparison, to show how little music Wagner could write, and how very musical Mendelssohn and Mozart are? The contrast could not possibly have been greater, and Mr. Wagner suffered.

JAMES M. TRACY.

EUGEN D'ALBERT'S RECITALS.

A series of piano recitals is to be given in Music hall on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday afternoons, April 18, 20 and 23, by Eugen D'Albert, whose playing with the Symphony orchestra recently created such a marked sensation. This "little giant" of the pianoforte is so grand an artist, so perfect in technique and expressive in interpretation, and so famed as a player, especially of Beethoven, that the liveliest anticipations are awakened in the coming recitals. The opening one is by special request devoted to the music of Beethoven and will possess an interest as marked as in that given a few years ago by Von Bülow. The others contain selections from Bach, Mendelssohn, Tausig, Rubinstein, Chopin, Liszt and others, which call for such varied treatment and such brilliant work that none but a master could attempt them with success; and success has attended D'Albert to a marked degree on his brief tour. Tickets, season and single, can be procured at Music hall.

Eugen D'Albert will give concerts of pianoforte music at Music hall, Monday, April 18, Thursday, April 21, and Saturday, April 23, afternoons. The first programme, made up of works by Beethoven, includes 32 variations, C minor; and the sonatas, op. 53, 90, 109 and 110.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO.

SUNDAY, APRIL [illegible] 1892.

The Symphony Concert—New York's Orchestra to Be Heard Here Again—The Oratorios of the Handel and Haydn—D'Albert's Recitals—News Notes, Gossip, Comment.

The programme performed last evening in Music Hall at the 22d of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra had nothing of novelty, but was made interesting by the generally excellent way in which the familiar selections were played under Mr. Nikisch's direction.

The "Sakuntala" overture began the programme, and this wonderfully clever bit of tone coloring was given with splendid effect throughout, the orchestra showing the skilful direction of its leader in all the masterly combinations with which the composer has treated its tuneful themes.

Prof. John K. Paine's "Spring" symphony followed, and the reading given this scholarly work revealed all its beauties to the best advantage. The graceful "scherzo' was given with a dainty airiness that was quite charming, and the noble theme of the final movement was brought out with grand effect. All in all, the symphony has never had a better performance than that given it on this occasion.

A satisfying interpretation of the familiar "Egmont" overture ended the programme, and left a very pleasant impression of the evening's concert.

Next Saturday evening Mr. and Mrs. Henschel appear, the former taking his old place at the conductor's desk to direct the first American performance of a suite from his "Hamlet" music, and the latter contributing arias from "Alessandre" and "Herodiade."

The public rehearsal, it should be noted, will be given on Thursday, instead of Friday afternoon, the coming week.

THE D'ALBERT RECITALS.

A series of three piano recitals by Herr Eugen d'Albert is announced at Music Hall on Monday afternoon, April 18, Wednesday afternoon, April 20, and Saturday afternoon, April 23.

A Beethoven programme is announced for the first recital, which will include the 32 variations in C minor; the sonata in C major, op. 53; the sonata in E minor, op. 90; the sonata in E major, op. 109, and the sonata in A-flat major, op. 110.

THE HENSCHEL RECITAL.

The last of their four vocal recitals was given by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel at the Meionaon yesterday afternoon, every seat in the hall having been sold long before the doors were opened.

Both singers were heard at their best on this occasion, and the programme was an admirably varied one, with many of the gems which have been heard in their recitals in earlier years.

Among the most charming numbers for the two singers were the two duets by Saint Saens, in which the voices were heard with rare delight.

Mrs. Henschel's singing of the "May Song," by A. Hervey, and, as an encore, the old Scotch ballad, "The Glen of Kenmare," marked the highest point of perfection in the vocal art, and fairly disarmed criticism.

The recital ended with the duet, "Gondoliera," by Mr. Henschel, which called out a grand ovation for the two artists, and the audience left the hall with the most delightful memories of this series of artistic triumphs for the two singers.

Without doubt an additional programme given in English throughout would be hailed with great satisfaction by the patrons of this series, as the vernacular has been persistently ignored by both Mr. and Mrs. Henschel in the concerts just concluded.

Mme. Lillian Nordica was recently complimented by being asked to act as one of three judges to award the prize for singing known as the Llewyn Thomas gold medal at the Royal Academy of Music, London.

The third and last of the Adamowski quartet concerts is announced at Union Hall next Tuesday evening, when the programme will include Bazzini's quartet No. 4, Loeffler's two movements from quartet, and Beethoven's quartet, op. 18, No. 4.

THE · PRESTO ·

APRIL 7, 1892

In May Chicago is to have a visit from the Bosto Symphony Orchestra. One concert by this unsu passed organization will close up our musical seaso D'Albert will be the soloist. I am rather anxious see whether our local critics will "damn with fai praise" when he appears again. The critical cliqu that has things pretty much its own way at th present time, will be obliged to furbish up its arsen of non-committal weapons or come out boldly an give him the praise that will be justly due him.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 10, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The last concert of the Kneisel Quartet series was given in Union Hall, Monday evening, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Otto Novacek and Mr. Leo Schulz assisting. Brahms's sextet for strings in G major, opus 36, was the opening number, and was splendidly performed. It is seldom indeed that such virile, evenly balanced, well sustained sextet playing is heard. The work shows Brahms in one of his most charming moods; there are many beauties of theme and treatment in the five movements that appeal directly to the cultivated musical taste. Of course it would not be Brahms if it did not contain many passages that, on casual acquaintance, seem obscure and devoid of imagination; but so seemed much of Beethoven's music, once upon a time. The performance lasted nearly an hour, partly owing to the accidents (breaking of strings) that happened to Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Novacek near the end of the third and fourth movements. Their brief retirement from the stage, however, afforded a respite which, judging by the cheerful buzz heard through the hall, was far from unwelcome.

The performance of Beethoven's sonata in D for pianoforte and 'cello by Messrs. Perabo and Schroeder was on the whole fine; it would have been notably so if Mr. Perabo had not fallen into his old habit of subduing his accompaniments to an entirely unreasonable extent. The appearance of an extended theme in the 'cello part was regularly the signal for him to drop into an almost inaudible pianissimo, which practically left these passages without a harmonic "leg to stand on."

Such accompanying, no matter how perfect it may be in other respects (no other fault could be found in this instance) cannot be considered artistic. Otherwise. Mr. Perabo's playing generally was admirable. His passage work was unusually clear and fluent, his legato was delightful and his wrists were remarkably free. It is true, however, that his reading of his part of the sonata, though instinct with feeling and refinement, was not a virile one; and his accentuation was certainly at times, spasmodic and unmusical in effect. Mr. Schroeder's playing deserves the warmest commendation. Such warmth, fullness and nobility of tone, combined with such delicate, clean-cut, musical velocity have not, it seems to us, been found in the playing of any other 'cellist who has come to this city to live.

Beethoven's string quartet in E minor, opus 59, was played with great expression and wonderful finish, and brought to a close this fruitful and highly enjoyable series of concerts.

THE HENSCHEL RECITALS.

If the programme of the third Henschel song recital, given at the Meionaon Tuesday afternoon, contained fewer novelties than were vouchsafed at either of the two of the week before, its interesting character and the generally admirable manner in which it was performed, rendered the concert scarcely less enjoyable. Once more Mrs. Henschel was to some extent out of condition. Her tones had not their usual roundness and sweetness, and at times a decided tremolo was apparent. Nevertheless, greatly as the former exquisite purity of her voice was missed, her charming personality and highly artistic interpretations would have covered even a multitude of vocal sins. Three songs by Schubert, "Mignon's song." "Auf dem wasser zu singen," and "Geheimes," were beautifully rendered, the second with a warmth of sentiment that was fully appreciated by her listeners; and "Le Soir," by A. Thomas, the familiar air from Saint-Saens's "Samson et Dalila," and a "Vieille Chanson," by Bizet, were given with exquisite taste and finish, although the sensuous warmth which pervades Mrs. Wyman's always admirable interpretation of the second number was wanting. Equally delightful was her singing of the ballad, "There was an Ancient King," and four "Lieder im Volkston," all compositions of Mr. Henschel.

Mr. Henschel was heard in a song from Mozart's "Il Seraglio," an aria from "Orfeo," by Haydn, "Busslied," by Beethoven; two ballads, "Die Loewenbraut," by Schumann, and "The Erl-king," by Loewe; "Der Asra," and "Persisches Lied," by Rubinstein, and a song from Brahms's "Magelone." Although he attained great beauty of expression in the Beethoven and Rubinstein numbers, he was at his best in the ballads, his delivery of both being a marvel of lyrical declamation. Two of the three duets of the afternoon were taken from Handel's "Giulio Cesare," and Donizetti's "Don Pasquale;" the third being Mr. Henschel's setting of Kingsley's "Oh that we two were Maying," all of which were perfectly sung.

The programme of the last recital, yesterday afternoon, was rich in new and unfamiliar things. To Mrs. Henschel was assigned songs from the old French and old Irish collections, and others by Giovannini, Pacini, Brahms, Hervey and Henschel; Mr. Henschel sang five ballads, by Schumann, Loewe, Liszt and Henschel; and the five duets performed were by Mehul, Gretry, Saint-Saens and Henschel. No exceptions can be taken to the work of either artist on this occasion, Mrs. Henschel's voice was in perfect condition and her singing both in her solos and the duets was indescribably beautiful. Mr. Henschel touched high water mark in "Archibald Douglas," which he gave with great breadth, pathos, fire and dramatic effect. The hall was crowded by an enthusiastic audience. These recitals have certainly proved one of the events of the extraordinary musical season, which is now rapidly drawing to a close.

THE SYMPHONY.

Goldmark's now familiar overture to "Sakuntala" was the first number on the programme of the twenty-second symphony rehearsal and concert. The tale of Hindu mythology concerning this beautiful maiden, certain phases of whose life are portrayed in Goldmark's music, is well known, and nothing more need be said except that the performance was fine, both technically and dramatically considered. It was a pleasure to hear Professor John K. Paine's "Spring" symphony once more and an added pleasure to discover that this admirable work, written and first performed in 1880, still holds its own as one of the strongest orchestral compositions that have yet come from the hand of an American composer. There can be no doubt about its sterling worth. That Professor Paine could have adhered so closely to the classic symphonic form, and yet have produced a work so full of buoancy and melody, so picturesque in treatment, without its pages being subject to the charge of freely suggesting those of its models, is proof sufficient of the nature of his musical ability. It is true that there are moments when his inspiration seems to have failed him, when his presentation of his ideas seems a trifle pedantic and diffuse. One feels this at times in the development of the first allegro, in the treatment of the broad and beautiful theme of the adagio, and even in the finale, in spite of its strength and fire and triumphant ending. On the other hand its almost restless activity, relieved by reposeful passages, charming in thought and execution, and the spirit of unity which pervades the entire work easily command attention, and preserve one's interest throughout. The smooth, expressive and brilliant performance, and the fidelity with which Mr. Nikisch adhered to the spirit and letter of the score, gave evidence of careful preparation. Each movement was heartily appreciated, and the close of the symphony was followed by prolonged applause. Another overture made the third and concluding number, Beethoven's "Egmont." The withdrawal of a ballade for orchestra, "The Mermaid," by Edmond de Mihalovich, which was at first announced for this concert, caused disappointment. Mihalovich is, if we mistake not, a Bohemian. He is not a young composer, yet he is, comparatively speaking, unknown. He has written many works which seem to have shared the same fate that has overtaken those of—well, of Bruckner, for instance. They have been published, have excited great interest among musicians, have been performed under distinguished auspices, and then have been practically dropped. It is to be hoped that the one announced may be given before the season closes.

Eugen D'Albert is winning golden opinions by his magnificent playing. His is the triumph of masterly skill, intelligent interpretation and a sympathetic rendering of the works of great masters. Of his three piano recitals to be given the afternoons of April 18, 20 and 23, the first will, by request, be devoted entirely to the works of Beethoven, the second to the compositions of Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Schubert, Tausig and Lizst, and the third of Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubinstien and Lizst. They are magnificent programmes and it is safe to say will be played in an irreproachable style, for D'Albert ranks among the very first of living players on the piano. Seats, single or for the series, at Music Hall.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 9, 1892.

NIKISCH by no means equaled his standard in the finale of the Walkure music, played at the 21st Symphony Concert. Perhaps there was disproportion among the instruments, for the Firecharm seemed to lose its lam-bent quality. Heinrich Meyn sang Wotan's Farewell. Volkmann's Serenade in F was finely rendered by the strings. Moté and Schuecker were the soloists in part of Mozart's Concerto for Flute and Harp, a soothing composition. Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony is a perpetual delight.

THE HENSCHEL CONCERTS greatly enjoyed by their many friends.

New York Pr

EVENING POST: NEW Y

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

The D'Albert Recitals.

There was a larger audience at Mr. D'Albert's second recital than at the first, and for this the more inviting programme was doubtless largely responsible. Variety is the spice of concerts, and it is better to have Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Schubert, Strauss, and Liszt than to have Beethoven only. In an arrangement by himself of a Bach fugue in D, Mr. D'Albert showed his gigantic power and dramatic impetuosity in working up a climax, at the same time showing once more what a delightfully modern composer Bach is—more modern than Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. Mendelssohn's variations, opus 15, were played in a thoughtful way which gave to each variation a distinct individuality. A long suite by Raff, in D minor, was chosen evidently to show off the virtuoso rather than the artist; it is, as a whole, a weary waste of tones, but in the last part it gives occasion for dazzling pyrotechnics such as are apt to provoke an encore. Mr. D'Albert, on being recalled, added Rubinstein's Staccato Étude. He also played Liszt's "Liebestraum" and "Rhapsodie Espagnole," and that he is a great Liszt player need not be said again at this date. The audience was notably enthusiastic, and another appreciative audience will doubtless greet him to-morrow afternoon, when he will play pieces by Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubinstein, and Liszt.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 10.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

Music Notes.

The programme of the concert of Saturday evening, April 2, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was: "Scotch Symphony, Mendelssohn; concerto for flute and harp, Mozart; serenade for strings, in F, Volkmann, and "Wotan's Farewell" and the "Fire Charm" from "Die Walküre," Wagner. The soloists were Mr. H. Meyn, Mr. C. Molé and Mr. H. Schuecker. The symphony was un-Mendelssohnized and subjected to a Nikischization that wholly misrepresented the composer's clearly-expressed intentions. The opening movement is marked "allegro un poco agitato"; but Mr. Nikisch, for some undiscoverable motive, began it at a pace closely bordering on andante, and the poco agitato was conspicuous by its absence. The second movement, marked "vivace non troppo," was, on the contrary, hurried along at a break neck speed, the non troppo being wholly ignored. The slow movement was better used, but the finale was subjected to an almost complete revision in respect to tempo. Not only this, but the dynamic marks were boldly disregarded. Mr. Nikisch doubtless imagined that he improved the symphony by subjecting it to this treatment; but we must confess, in view of the immense distance between the reputation of the composer and that of the conductor, that we greatly prefer Mendelssohn to Mr. Nikisch, to say nothing of the fact that the former took the trouble to indicate, with great exactness, the manner in which he desired his work to be read. It would seem, however, that in regard to this symphony, at least, that he had no rights which Mr. Nikisch felt bound to respect, for in addition to the other liberties taken by him, he utterly pooh-poohed Mendelssohn's injunction that the separate movements of the work must follow each other without any wait between them. When we add that the playing was rough and noisy, we feel that we are not unjustified in claiming that the performance was radically bad and thoroughly reprehensible. The trouble seems to be either that Mr. Nikisch fancies it to be imperative on him to inject his own individuality into every work that he conducts, or that he does it through ignorance. In any case, the result is an exasperating mispresentation, not to say belittling, of great masterpieces. If our conductor would only remember that it is of great consequence that Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, and other famous composers should be read according to the directions they have given, and that it is of no consequence whatever if Mr. Nikisch thinks they ought to be read differently, we should reach a consummation devoutly to be wished. The Mozart concerto was delightfully played by Messrs. Molé and Schuecker; but, unfortunately, the pitch of the harp was painfully at variance with that of the orchestra in the first movement. The Volkmann serenade has some graceful moments of melody and effect, but does not as a whole rise above the level of labored, highly proper Kapellmeister music. It was well played. The Wagner selections were given with immense vigor and almost deafening noisiness. Mr. Meyn sang his share in them in a style wholly in sympathy with the turmoil. It was a struggle between him and the orchestra; but he bore himself bravely, and though now and then his voice was nearly extinguished by the storm of tone against which it was pitted, it was never quite eclipsed, and if he did not come in a winner in the race, he was not left far in the rear.

Mr. Eugene d'Albert announces three piano recitals, to be given in Music Hall on the afternoons of Monday, the 18th inst., Wednesday, the 20th, and Saturday, the 23d. The first programme will be devoted to Beethoven, and will consist of five sonatas. Tickets may be procured at Music Hall.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were again welcomed by large and critical audiences last week at their two closing vocal recitals. The programmes were remarkably interesting and as at the earlier recitals covered a wide field of song. To enter on a consideration of the performances in detail would be only to repeat what has been said so often. Both recitals were delightful; the artists were at their very best, and the refined pleasure they afforded was vigorously emphasized by the fervor of the well-deserved applause that rewarded their efforts.

One Monday evening the Kneisel Quartet gave their last concert of the current season. They were assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo, and Messrs. Novacek and Schulz. The programme was: Sextet for strings, in G, Brahms; Sonata for piano and 'cello, Beethoven; and Quartet E minor, op. 59, No. 2, Beethoven. The sextet is a profound work but despite the fine skill and the labored thought that the composer has brought to bear on it, and the deep scholarship that it shows, it is far from clear, is dry and pedantic, and is spun out to a tiresome length. It was played with immense vitality, but we doubt if it afforded much pleasure except to the few who are clever in solving musical puzzles. The lovely Beethoven Sonata, one of the most genial and charming of its composer's works, was beautifully read and played by Messrs. Perabo and Shroeder the former acquitting himself with exceptional warmth and grace of style and in a spirit of keen sympathy with the work throughout. Nothing better in the way of ensemble playing as illustrated by these artists, could be desired, and the hearty applause and the as hearty recall that rewarded them were fairly earned and wholly deserved. The concert ended with a masterly performance of the Beethoven Quartet. The season of this admirable organization has been abundant in work of the highest order in its kind, and it is pleasing to know that it has been successful from both an artistic and a financial standpoint.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was: Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Symphony No. 2 in A, "In the Spring," J. K. Paine; Overture "Egmont," Beethoven. The "Sakuntala" overture was read with something too much of sickly sentimentality now and then, and something too much of blatant noisiness at other times; but it was brilliantly played and with much richness of tone color. Mr. Paine's fine symphony gave much delight in the rehearing, and would have given more if due attention had been paid to the composer's time indications and dynamic marks. As it was, the composer's ideas, according to the custom unhappily prevalent at these concerts, were persistently disregarded in favor of the conductor's ideas of what they ought to be. Not only this, but the tempi, especially of the lovely scherzo and of the finale, were taken so rapidly that there was a painful hurry-skurry on the part of the players to bring out all the notes clearly. The work has been much more intelligently read and much better performed here than it was on this occasion. The "Egmont" overture was the best played work of the concert, but Beethoven was again submitted to Mr. Nikisch's improving process, which has about passed its vexatious stage and is becoming amusing. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in F, D'Albert, (first time); Aria "Alessandro," Handel; Suite from the music to Shakspeare's Hamlet, Henschel, (first time); aria from "Herodiade," Massenet; overture, "Oberon," Weber. Mrs. Georg Henschel is to be the soloist, and Mr. Henschel will conduct his suite.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, APRIL 11, 1892.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday Evening.

Thoughts Suggested by the Fourth Henschel Recital.

The programme of the twenty-second Symphony concert, given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Overture, "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
Symphony No. 2, A major, "In the Spring"	Paine
Overture, "Egmont"	Beethoven

⁂

This programme does not call for extended criticism, for the numbers are familiar. "The Mermaid," one of the orchestral ballades of Edmond de Mihalovich, was announced and rehearsed; the Beethoven overture was substituted for it, and the ballade of the Slavonic composer disappeared, as the boy Xury in Robinson Crusoe. The performance of the numbers of the programme was not wholly satisfactory; and here the conductor was chiefly in fault. His readings, especially in the matter of tempo, were at times injudicious, and at times contrary to the expressed intentions of the composers. In the Goldmark overture, for instance, the sensuous theme was treated sympathetically and with effect; but the opposing allegro was taken at such a pace that the notes were without apparent value; the players, particularly the workers in brass, suffered thereby; there was scrambling, there was raggedness.

⁂

Prof. Paine's "Island Fantasy" was played at a Symphony concert, under the direction of Mr. William Gericke, April 20, 1889. For nearly three years no one of his orchestral compositions has been heard at a Symphony concert in Music Hall. The tardy recognition of the just claims of a local composer, who is held in honor in this country and in Germany, was, unfortunately, incomplete. For the Spring symphony was read carelessly, almost recklessly. Little attention was paid to the wishes of the composer. The tempi of Prof. Paine were not respected. Pianissimo was mezzo forte; forte was fortissimo. The balance of the parts was so neglected that the effect was often wholly lost. Calm cantabile was fretted into spasmodic eruption. Ingenious and delicate figuration was roughly hurried over. Nor did Beethoven escape. Unwarrantable liberties were taken with the tempo, that there might be a greater effect.

⁂

In connection with the performance of last Saturday evening, it may be of advantage to consider the words of Ferdinand Hiller, who was, in his day, a conductor of no mean skill. "A conductor is a necessary evil. The more completely his individuality disappears from the sight of the audience the better it is. There is nothing worse than a conductor who usurps the place of the virtuoso and seeks to direct the attention of the public to his own personality, to his own performance. 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' The conductor should hide behind the performance of his orchestra and find his chief reward in its excellence. Nor should he ever forget, nor should he ever wish it to be forgotten, that he himself serves a superior officer, the composer—even when it happens by chance that he himself is really the superior man."

⁂

The fourth and the last of the vocal recitals of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel was given Saturday afternoon in the Meionaon. The programme included the duet, "O Toi! Le Digne Appui," from Mehul's "Joseph;" the couplets, "Un Bandeau," from Gretry's "Richard;" two duets by Saint-Saens, and Mr. Henschel's duet, "Gondoliera." Mrs. Henschel sang the following numbers: "If Thou Thy Heart," Giovannini; "Le Portrait," Pacini; "La Charmante Marguerite;" slumber song from the "Magellone," and "The Maiden's Curse" by Brahms; "Dov' e la Sorella," Henschel; "The Little Red Lark;" May song, Hervey. Mr. Henschel was heard in these ballads: Liszt's "Die Vaetergruft;" his own "Jung Dieterich;" Loewe's "Archibald Douglass;" Schumann's "Belsatzar," and "The Grenadiers,"

⁂

This concert, in programme and performance, gave great pleasure to the large audience. The first two duets were of peculiar charm. "Joseph" and "Richard" are operas that are almost wholly unknown in this country; but "Joseph" is still heard in the opera houses of France and Germany, and "Richard" was given as recently as '89 at the Opera Comique in Paris. The French may well be proud of these operas. "Richard," first brought out in 1857, was in advance of its time. In many ways it was an epoch-making work. In an age of artificiality, it appealed to common humanity. "Farewell to guardians, teased by amorous wards and roguish servants! Farewell to gallant lords and noble dames with ribbons, the little figures painted on folding screen and fan! Farewell, at last, to bombastic heroes, Xerxes, Pyrrhus and other plumed tyrants, cardboard dolls of the old Italian opera. Behold simple and true sentiments; behold nature and life. At the breaking of a day when monarchs learn misfortune, behold a King, prisoner, unhappy—a King who is only a man and one of us." Truthful, dramatic melody is found throughout this work. Simple means work irresistible results. In reviewing such a masterpiece, well may Camille Bellaigue conclude as follows: "Our own epoch is prodigiously, yes, terribly expert. We have arrived at the summit of talent. It is time that the musical current runs back to the heart, the point of departure, the point of return in the eternal circuit of the human spirit. Wagner has perhaps closed, rather than opened, a period, a cycle of music. After the most complex of great men, there will come, undoubtedly, some man of great simplicity to reassure and comfort us by clearness, by the obviousness of things. We have for a long time been disquieted by mystery."

⁂

And in like manner set the simple melodies sung so delightfully last Saturday by Mrs. Henschel against the Liszt ballad with its gropings after effect, or the wearisome detail of "Belshazar" or "The Maiden's Curse" of Brahms. The simple melody conquers in each and every case. But your simple, spontaneous, haunting melody is not easily invented. The advanced pupil in a foreign music school writes fugues of respectability by the dozen, but how many melodists are found in the annual crop of graduates? Here is the case of Mr. Henschel, for example, and his ballad "Jung Dieterich." He worked at it industriously, no doubt; he enlarged it here, and he revised it there; he sings it with all his well-known, acknowledged skill; and what is the result? The effect at the moment of the performance was slight, and afterward not a measure lingers in the memory of the hearer. Mr. Henschel sings the ballads of other composers so artistically that it seems a pity he should not meet with greater success in making them. Nor should he ever mourn over the natural limitations of his vocal art. Loewe, who enchanted all hearers by the delivery of his ballads, had a comparatively insignificant voice, and when he sang in Vienna in 1844 he had no voice [illegible]. Hanslick even goes so far as to claim that the Loewe ballads do not demand a voice of sensuous charm, and, in fact, fantasy is more needed in the singer of them than great range or noble tones.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 10, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The last concert of the Kneisel Quartet series was given in Union Hall, Monday evening, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Otto Novacek and Mr. Leo Schulz assisting. Brahms's sextet for strings in G major, opus 36, was the opening number, and was splendidly performed. It is seldom indeed that such virile, evenly balanced, well sustained sextet playing is heard. The work shows Brahms in one of his most charming moods; there are many beauties of theme and treatment in the five movements that appeal directly to the cultivated musical taste. Of course it would not be Brahms if it did not contain many passages that, on casual acquaintance, seem obscure and devoid of imagination; but so seemed much of Beethoven's music, once upon a time. The performance lasted nearly an hour, partly owing to the accidents (breaking of strings) that happened to Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Novacek near the end of the third and fourth movements. Their brief retirement from the stage, however, afforded a respite which, judging by the cheerful buzz heard through the hall, was far from unwelcome.

The performance of Beethoven's sonata in D for pianoforte and 'cello by Messrs. Perabo and Schroeder was on the whole fine; it would have been notably so if Mr. Perabo had not fallen into his old habit of subduing his accompaniments to an entirely unreasonable extent. The appearance of an extended theme in the 'cello part was regularly the signal for him to drop into an almost inaudible pianissimo, which practically left these passages without a harmonic "leg to stand on."

Such accompanying, no matter how perfect it may be in other respects (no other fault could be found in this instance) cannot be considered artistic. Otherwise. Mr. Perabo's playing generally was admirable. His passage work was unusually clear and fluent, his legato was delightful and his wrists were remarkably free. It is true, however, that his reading of his part of the sonata, though instinct with feeling and refinement, was not a virile one; and his accentuation was certainly at times, spasmodic and unmusical in effect. Mr. Schroeder's playing deserves the warmest commendation. Such warmth, fullness and nobility of tone, combined with such delicate, clean-cut, musical velocity have not, it seems to us, been found in the playing of any other 'cellist who has come to this city to live.

Beethoven's string quartet in E minor, opus 59, was played with great expression and wonderful finish, and brought to a close this fruitful and highly enjoyable series of concerts.

THE HENSCHEL RECITALS.

If the programme of the third Henschel song recital, given at the Meionaon Tuesday afternoon, contained fewer novelties than were vouchsafed at either of the two of the week before, its interesting character and the generally admirable manner in which it was performed, rendered the concert scarcely less enjoyable. Once more Mrs. Henschel was to some extent out of condition. Her tones had not their usual roundness and sweetness, and at times a decided tremolo was apparent. Nevertheless, greatly as the former exquisite purity of her voice was missed, her charming personality and highly artistic interpretations would have covered even a multitude of vocal sins. Three songs by Schubert, "Mignon's song." "Auf dem wasser zu singen," and "Geheimes," were beautifully rendered, the second with a warmth of sentiment that was fully appreciated by her listeners; and "Le Soir," by A. Thomas, the familiar air from Saint-Saens's "Samson et Dalila," and a "Vieille Chanson," by Bizet, were given with exquisite taste and finish, although the sensuous warmth which pervades Mrs. Wyman's always admirable interpretation of the second number was wanting. Equally delightful was her singing of the ballad, "There was an Ancient King," and four "Lieder im Volkston," all compositions of Mr. Henschel.

Mr. Heuschel was heard in a song from Mozart's "Il Seraglio," an aria from "Orfeo," by Haydn, "Busslied," by Beethoven; two ballads, "Die Loewenbraut," by Schumann, and "The Erl-king," by Loewe; "Der Asra," and "Persisches Lied," by Rubinstein, and a song from Brahms's "Magellone." Although he attained great beauty of expression in the Beethoven and Rubinstein numbers, he was at his best in the ballads, his delivery of both being a marvel of lyrical declamation. Two of the three duets of the afternoon were taken from Handel's "Giulio Cesare," and Donizetti's "Don Pasquale;" the third being Mr. Henschel's setting of Kingsley's "Oh that we two were Maying," all of which were perfectly sung.

The programme of the last recital, yesterday afternoon, was rich in new and unfamiliar things. To Mrs. Henschel was assigned songs from the old French and old Irish collections, and others by Giovannini, Pacini, Brahms, Hervey and Henschel; Mr. Henschel sang five ballads, by Schumann, Loewe, Liszt and Henschel; and the five duets performed were by Mehul, Gretry, Saint-Saens and Henschel. No exceptions can be taken to the work of either artist on this occasion, Mrs. Henschel's voice was in perfect condition and her singing both in her solos and the duets was indescribably beautiful. Mr. Henschel touched high water mark in "Archibald Douglas," which he gave with great breadth, pathos, fire and dramatic effect. The hall was crowded by an enthusiastic audience. These recitals have certainly proved one of the events of the extraordinary musical season, which is now rapidly drawing to a close.

THE SYMPHONY.

Goldmark's now familiar overture to "Sakuntala" was the first number on the programme of the twenty-second symphony rehearsal and concert. The tale of Hindu mythology concerning this beautiful maiden, certain phases of whose life are portrayed in Goldmark's music, is well known, and nothing more need be said except that the performance was fine, both technically and dramatically considered. It was a pleasure to hear Professor John K. Paine's "Spring" symphony once more and an added pleasure to discover that this admirable work, written and first performed in 1880, still holds its own as one of the strongest orchestral compositions that have yet come from the hand of an American composer. There can be no doubt about its sterling worth. That Professor Paine could have adhered so closely to the classic symphonic form, and yet have produced a work so full of buoancy and melody, so picturesque in treatment, without its pages being subject to the charge of freely suggesting those of its models, is proof sufficient of the nature of his musical ability. It is true that there are moments when his inspiration seems to have failed him, when his presentation of his ideas seems a trifle pedantic and diffuse. One feels this at times in the development of the first allegro, in the treatment of the broad and beautiful theme of the adagio, and even in the finale, in spite of its strength and fire and triumphant ending. On the other hand its almost restless activity, relieved by reposeful passages, charming in thought and execution, and the spirit of unity which pervades the entire work easily command attention, and preserve one's interest throughout. The smooth, expressive and brilliant performance, and the fidelity with which Mr. Nikisch adhered to the spirit and letter of the score, gave evidence of careful preparation. Each movement was heartily appreciated, and the close of the symphony was followed by prolonged applause. Another overture made the third and concluding number, Beethoven's "Egmont." The withdrawal of a ballade for orchestra, "The Mermaid," by Edmond de Mihalovich, which was at first announced for this concert, caused disappointment. Mihalovich is, if we mistake not, a Bohemian. He is not a young composer, yet he is, comparatively speaking, unknown. He has written many works which seem to have shared the same fate that has overtaken those of—well, of Bruckner, for instance. They have been published, have excited great interest among musicians, have been performed under distinguished auspices, and then have been practically dropped. It is to be hoped that the one announced may be given before the season closes.

Eugen D'Albert is winning golden opinions by his magnificent playing. His is the triumph of masterly skill, intelligent interpretation and a sympathetic rendering of the works of great masters. Of his three piano recitals to be given the afternoons of April 18, 20 and 23, the first will, by request, be devoted entirely to the works of Beethoven, the second to the compositions of Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Schubert, Tausig and Lizst, and the third of Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubinstien and Lizst. They are magnificent programmes and it is safe to say will be played in an irreproachable style, for D'Albert ranks among the very first of living players on the piano. Seats, single or for the series, at Music Hall.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 9, 1892.

NIKISCH by no means equaled his standard in the finale of the Walkure music, played at the 21st Symphony Concert. Perhaps there was disproportion among the instruments, for the Firecharm seemed to lose its lam-bent quality. Heinrich Meyn sang Wotan's Farewell. Volkmann's Serenade in F was finely rendered by the strings. Moté and Schuecker were the soloists in part of Mozart's Concerto for Flute and Harp, a soothing composition. Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony is a perpetual delight.

THE HENSCHEL CONCERTS greatly enjoyed by their many friends.

New York 4/

EVENING POST: NEW Y

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

The D'Albert Recitals.

There was a larger audience at Mr. D'Albert's second recital than at the first, and for this the more inviting programme was doubtless largely responsible. Variety is the spice of concerts, and it is better to have Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Schubert, Strauss, and Liszt than to have Beethoven only. In an arrangement by himself of a Bach fugue in D, Mr. D'Albert showed his gigantic power and dramatic impetuosity in working up a climax, at the same time showing once more what a delightfully modern composer Bach is—more modern than Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. Mendelssohn's variations, opus 15, were played in a thoughtful way which gave to each variation a distinct individuality. A long suite by Raff, in D minor, was chosen evidently to show off the virtuoso rather than the artist; it is, as a whole, a weary waste of tones, but in the last part it gives occasion for dazzling pyrotechnics such as are apt to provoke an encore. Mr. D'Albert, on being recalled, added Rubinstein's Staccato Étude. He also played Liszt's "Liebestraum" and "Rhapsodie Espagnole," and that he is a great Liszt player need not be said again at this date. The audience was notably enthusiastic, and another appreciative audience will doubtless greet him to-morrow afternoon, when he will play pieces by Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubinstein, and Liszt.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 10.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

Music Notes.

The programme of the concert of Saturday evening, April 2, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was: "Scotch Symphony, Mendelssohn; concerto for flute and harp, Mozart; serenade for strings, in F. Volkmann, and "Wotan's Farewell" and the "Fire Charm" from "Die Walküre," Wagner. The soloists were Mr. H. Meyn, Mr. C. Molé and Mr. H. Schuecker. The symphony was un-Mendelssohnized and subjected to a Nikischization that wholly misrepresented the composer's clearly-expressed intentions. The opening movement is marked "allegro un poco agitato"; but Mr. Nikisch, for some undiscoverable motive, began it at a pace closely bordering on andante, and the poco agitato was conspicuous by its absence. The second movement, marked "vivace non troppo," was, on the contrary, hurried along at a break neck speed, the non troppo being wholly ignored. The slow movement was better used, but the finale was subjected to an almost complete revision in respect to tempo. Not only this, but the dynamic marks were boldly disregarded. Mr. Nikisch doubtless imagined that he improved the symphony by subjecting it to this treatment; but we must confess, in view of the immense distance between the reputation of the composer and that of the conductor, that we greatly prefer Mendelssohn to Mr. Nikisch, to say nothing of the fact that the former took the trouble to indicate, with great exactness, the manner in which he desired his work to be read. It would seem, however, that in regard to this symphony, at least, that he had no rights which Mr. Nikisch felt bound to respect, for in addition to the other liberties taken by him, he utterly pooh-poohed Mendelssohn's injunction that the separate movements of the work must follow each other without any wait between them. When we add that the playing was rough and noisy, we feel that we are not unjustified in claiming that the performance was radically bad and thoroughly reprehensible. The trouble seems to be either that Mr. Nikisch fancies it to be imperative on him to inject his own individuality into every work that he conducts, or that he does it through ignorance. In any case, the result is an exasperating mispresentation, not to say belittling, of great masterpieces. If our conductor would only remember that it is of great consequence that Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, and other famous composers should be read according to the directions they have given, and that it is of no consequence whatever if Mr. Nikisch thinks they ought to be read differently, we should reach a consummation devoutly to be wished. The Mozart concerto was delightfully played by Messrs. Molé and Schuecker; but, unfortunately, the pitch of the harp was painfully at variance with that of the orchestra in the first movement. The Volkmann serenade has some graceful moments of melody and effect, but does not as a whole rise above the level of labored, highly proper Kapellmeister music. It was well played. The Wagner selections were given with immense vigor and almost deafening noisiness. Mr. Meyn sang his share in them in a style wholly in sympathy with the turmoil. It was a struggle between him and the orchestra; but he bore himself bravely, and though now and then his voice was nearly extinguished by the storm of tone against which it was pitted, it was never quite eclipsed, and if he did not come in a winner in the race, he was not left far in the rear.

Mr. Eugene d'Albert announces three piano recitals, to be given in Music Hall on the afternoons of Monday, the 18th inst., Wednesday, the 20th, and Saturday, the 23d. The first programme will be devoted to Beethoven, and will consist of five sonatas. Tickets may be procured at Music Hall.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were again welcomed by large and critical audiences last week at their two closing vocal recitals. The programmes were remarkably interesting and as at the earlier recitals covered a wide field of song. To enter on a consideration of the performances in detail would be only to repeat what has been said so often. Both recitals were delightful; the artists were at their very best, and the refined pleasure they afforded was vigorously emphasized by the fervor of the well deserved applause that rewarded their efforts.

One Monday evening the Kneisel Quartet gave their last concert of the current season. They were assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo, and Messrs. Novacek and Schulz. The programme was: Sextet for strings, in G, Brahms; Sonata for piano and 'cello, Beethoven; and Quartet E minor, op. 59, No. 2, Beethoven. The sextet is a profound work but despite the fine skill and the labored thought that the composer has brought to bear on it, and the deep scholarship that it shows, it is far from clear, is dry and pedantic, and is spun out to a tiresome length. It was played with immense vitality, but we doubt if it afforded much pleasure except to the few who are clever in solving musical puzzles. The lovely Beethoven Sonata, one of the most genial and charming of its composer's works, was beautifully read and played by Messrs. Perabo and Shroeder the former acquitting himself with exceptional warmth and grace of style and in a spirit of keen sympathy with the work throughout. Nothing better in the way of ensemble playing as illustrated by these artists, could be desired, and the hearty applause and the as hearty recall that rewarded them were fairly earned and wholly deserved. The concert ended with a masterly performance of the Beethoven Quartet. The season of this admirable organization has been abundant in work of the highest order in its kind, and it is pleasing to know that it has been successful from both an artistic and a financial standpoint.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was: Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Symphony No. 2 in A, "In the Spring," J. K. Paine; Overture "Egmont," Beethoven. The "Sakuntala" overture was read with something too much of sickly sentimentality now and then, and something too much of blatant noisiness at other times; but it was brilliantly played and with much richness of tone color. Mr. Paine's fine symphony gave much delight in the rehearing, and would have given more if due attention had been paid to the composer's time indications and dynamic marks. As it was, the composer's ideas, according to the custom unhappily prevalent at these concerts, were persistently disregarded in favor of the conductor's ideas of what they ought to be. Not only this, but the tempi, especially of the lovely scherzo and of the finale, were taken so rapidly that there was a painful hurry-skurry on the part of the players to bring out all the notes clearly. The work has been much more intelligently read and much better performed here than it was on this occasion. The "Egmont" overture was the best played work of the concert, but Beethoven was again submitted to Mr. Nikisch's improving process, which has about passed its vexatious stage and is becoming amusing. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in F, D'Albert, (first time); Aria "Alessandro," Handel; Suite from the music to Shakspeare's Hamlet, Henschel, (first time); aria from "Herodiade," Massenet; overture, "Oberon," Weber. Mrs. Georg Henschel is to be the soloist, and Mr. Henschel will conduct his suite.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, APRIL 11, 1892.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday Evening.

Thoughts Suggested by the Fourth Henschel Recital.

The programme of the twenty-second Symphony concert, given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Overture, "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
Symphony No. 2, A major, "In the Spring"	Paine
Overture, "Egmont"	Beethoven

⁂

This programme does not call for extended criticism, for the numbers are familiar. "The Mermaid," one of the orchestral ballades of Edmond de Mihalovich, was announced and rehearsed; the Beethoven overture was substituted for it, and the ballade of the Slavonic composer disappeared, as the boy Xury in Robinson Crusoe. The performance of the numbers of the programme was not wholly satisfactory; and here the conductor was chiefly in fault. His readings, especially in the matter of tempo, were at times injudicious, and at times contrary to the expressed intentions of the composers. In the Goldmark overture, for instance, the sensuous theme was treated sympathetically and with effect; but the opposing allegro was taken at such a pace that the notes were without apparent value; the players, particularly the workers in brass, suffered thereby; there was scrambling, there was raggedness.

⁂

Prof. Paine's "Island Fantasy" was played at a Symphony concert, under the direction of Mr. William Gericke, April 20, 1889. For nearly three years no one of his orchestral compositions has been heard at a Symphony concert in Music Hall. The tardy recognition of the just claims of a local composer, who is held in honor in this country and in Germany, was, unfortunately, incomplete. For the Spring symphony was read carelessly, almost recklessly. Little attention was paid to the wishes of the composer. The tempi of Prof. Paine were not respected. Pianissimo was mezzo forte; forte was fortissimo. The balance of the parts was so neglected that the effect was often wholly lost. Calm cantabile was fretted into spasmodic eruption. Ingenious and delicate figuration was roughly hurried over. Nor did Beethoven escape. Unwarrantable liberties were taken with the tempo, that there might be a greater effect.

⁂

In connection with the performance of last Saturday evening, it may be of advantage to consider the words of Ferdinand Hiller, who was, in his day, a conductor of no mean skill. "A conductor is a necessary evil. The more completely his individuality disappears from the sight of the audience the better it is. There is nothing worse than a conductor who usurps the place of the virtuoso and seeks to direct the attention of the public to his own personality, to his own performance. 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' The conductor should hide behind the performance of his orchestra and find his chief reward in its excellence. Nor should he ever forget, nor should he ever wish it to be forgotten, that he himself serves a superior officer, the composer—even when it happens by chance that he himself is really the superior man."

⁂

The fourth and the last of the vocal recitals of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel was given Saturday afternoon in the Meionaon. The programme included the duet, "O Toi! Le Digne Appui," from Mehul's "Joseph;" the couplets, "Un Bandeau," from Gretry's "Richard;" two duets by Saint-Saens, and Mr. Henschel's duet, "Gondoliera." Mrs. Henschel sang the following numbers: "If Thou Thy Heart," Giovannini; "Le Portrait," Pacini; "La Charmante Marguerite;" slumber song from the "Magellone," and "The Maiden's Curse" by Brahms; "Dov' e la Sorella," Henschel; "The Little Red Lark;" May song, Hervey. Mr. Henschel was heard in these ballads: Liszt's "Die Vaetergruft;" his own "Jung Dieterich;" Loewe's "Archibald Douglass;" Schumann's "Belsatzar," and "The Grenadiers,"

⁂

This concert, in programme and performance, gave great pleasure to the large audience. The first two duets were of peculiar charm. "Joseph" and "Richard" are operas that are almost wholly unknown in this country; but "Joseph" is still heard in the opera houses of France and Germany, and "Richard" was given as recently as '89 at the Opera Comique in Paris. The French may well be proud of these operas. "Richard," first brought out in 1857, was in advance of its time. In many ways it was an epoch-making work. In an age of artificiality, it appealed to common humanity. "Farewell to guardians, teased by amorous wards and roguish servants! Farewell to gallant lords and noble dames with ribbons, the little figures painted on folding screen and fan! Farewell, at last, to bombastic heroes, Xerxes, Pyrrhus and other plumed tyrants, cardboard dolls of the old Italian opera. Behold simple and true sentiments; behold nature and life. At the breaking of a day when monarchs learn misfortune, behold a King, prisoner, unhappy—a King who is only a man and one of us." Truthful, dramatic melody is found throughout this work. Simple means work irresistible results. In reviewing such a masterpiece, well may Camille Bellaigue conclude as follows: "Our own epoch is prodigiously, yes, terribly expert. We have arrived at the summit of talent. It is time that the musical current runs back to the heart, the point of departure, the point of return in the eternal circuit of the human spirit. Wagner has perhaps closed, rather than opened, a period, a cycle of music. After the most complex of great men, there will come, undoubtedly, some man of great simplicity to reassure and comfort us by clearness, by the obviousness of things. We have for a long time been disquieted by mystery."

⁂

And in like manner set the simple melodies sung so delightfully last Saturday by Mrs. Henschel against the Liszt ballad with its gropings after effect, or the wearisome detail of "Belshazar" or "The Maiden's Curse" of Brahms. The simple melody conquers in each and every case. But your simple, spontaneous, haunting melody is not easily invented. The advanced pupil in a foreign music school writes fugues of respectability by the dozen, but how many melodists are found in the annual crop of graduates? Here is the case of Mr. Henschel, for example, and his ballad "Jung Dieterich." He worked at it industriously, no doubt; he enlarged it here, and he revised it there; he sings it with all his well-known, acknowledged skill; and what is the result? The effect at the moment of the performance was slight, and afterward not a measure lingers in the memory of the hearer. Mr. Henschel sings the ballads of other composers so artistically that it seems a pity he should not meet with greater success in making them. Nor should he ever mourn over the natural limitations of his vocal art. Loewe, who enchanted all hearers by the delivery of his ballads, had a comparatively insignificant voice, and when he sang in Vienna in 1844 he had no voice at all. Hanslick even goes so far as to claim that the Loewe ballads do not demand a voice of sensuous charm, and, in fact, fantasy is more needful to the singer of them than great range or noble tones.

[illegible] DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING APRIL 11, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

Goldmark is one of the most oriental of modern composers. Not that he uses the oriental scale in his tone progressions, or that even the monotonous and constantly recurring rhythms of the East are present in his music, but he presents a sumptuous orchestration combined with a languor of melody that suggests the eastern subjects more thoroughly to the occidental mind than a faithful reproduction of Hindu themes could do. The overture to "Sakuntala" once more showed this heavy, incense-laden vein, in the concert of Saturday. It received a good performance; what there was of caprice in the interpretation seemed not only permissible but commendable. The thematic treatment was clear, and the violas for once, sounded forth with their effective and sombre tone, without being obliterated by their rich relations, the first violins. The climaxes which are so well worked up by the composer, also lost nothing in the performance.

Almost as much can be said of the "Egmont" overture, which was given with great spirit, although its beginning was not free from exaggeration. The overture is of course, according to Goethe, and Motley's unflattering picture of the hero is widely departed from, but at least the voice of freedom is in the finale, and Beethoven, more than any other composer, was the bard of liberty. It was refreshing, in this part, to hear the piccolo, with its proper predominance; the phrase in the last measures (the final cadence) is one of the most characteristic piccolo touches ever written, yet in previous performances the snapping runs on this instrument have been curbed and repressed too much, while this time freedom shrieked (without any falling Kosciusko) to her heart's content.

Prof. Paine's spring symphony is as yet the best work in this form which America has produced. It is not so great a work as the composer's "Œdipus" (which I hold to be the high water mark of American music) but it is shapely, has well contrasted themes, is developed with musicianly skill, and displays more versatility than any native symphony. It was but just that our Boston orchestra should recognize American music in a work by its leading representative, yet I wish that another symphony by one of the best of the younger composers in Boston, Mr. Templeton Strong, had not been forced to go to New York and to Mr. Seidl, for its first performance. The Spring Symphony has been much better played in this city than it was on this occasion; the Adagio was given with much expression, and here the cellos did some excellent work, and the swing of the Scherzo was also effective, but the nobility of the finale was thoroughly eliminated. In this finale there is a broad and massive theme like a hymn of thanksgiving, in splendid contrast with the bubbling joy of the other themes; the composer marked this "Meno Mosso, e Maestoso"; three times does this occur, and three times was it disregarded. What should have been majesty became mere bluster, and even the Allegro Giojoso became a wild Allegro Furioso. Possibly the conductor, but newly accustomed to our climate, endeavored to adapt the Spring symphony to New England conditions, but I cannot believe that Prof. Paine had a Boston spring in mind when he evolved this tone picture, and in any case his marks of Tempo should have been respected without regard to the local thermometers.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Henschel Recital.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave their fourth recital for the season of 1892 at Meionaon Hall Saturday afternoon, to an audience whose appreciation equalled its size. Both the singers are especially dear to Boston people, and their appearance was the signal for a most generous outburst of applause. The programme was made up of numbers well adapted to display the merits of the artists, and was especially rich in Henschel compositions. To say that it was enjoyed to the fullest, and that the raptures over the rich and sonorous timbre of Mr. Henschel's voice, and the rare sweetness of Mrs. Henschel's notes, into which Boston audiences are fond of falling were not abated on this occasion is only to do justice to the admirable entertainment. If, however, there be a rare pleasure in digesting the sweetness of Mrs. Henschel's strains, there is almost an equal pain in the fact that the voice bears witness to the march of time, perhaps only slightly, and to the average listener unheeded, but, nevertheless, noticeably. Perhaps the thinness of the highest notes are more remarked from the effort attending their expression than from the expression itself, but it is none the less a reality, although it is in part concealed by the general and admirable mobility of the voice.

The first numbers were two duets, one from Méhul's "Joseph," and the other from Grétry's "Richard Cœur de Lion." The first was the familiar majestic scene between Jacob and Benjamin, and the second a dainty composition, florid but sweet, and of an amorous turn. Both were splendidly rendered and received with bountiful approbation. Mrs. Henschel then sang in a charming manner three love songs, "If thou thy heart bestowest," by Giovannini, "Le Portrait" by Pacini and "La Charmante Marguerite," from the old French. The second was especially well sung, with exquisite fidelity to the sentiment. Liszt's ballad, "Die Vatergruft," is one of that kind which is suited to Mr. Henschel's voice and it was as well declaimed as sung, in all its gruesomeness. "Jung Dieterich," of his own composition, also gave great pleasure, the subject likewise affording scope for his talent for dramatic vocalism. The "Schlummerlied" from the "Magellone" and "Des Maedchen's Fluck," both by Brahms, was sung by Mrs. Henschel and were warmly applauded. Loewe's "Archibald Douglas" was Mr. Henschel's next selection, and was rendered with all the mingled pathos and joyousness in which the number abounds. Two duets, both by Saint-Saëns, the first commencing, "Ici les les tendres oiseaux," and the second, "Viens! Une flute invisible," was next prettily rendered according to their delicate nature.

Mrs. Henschel then followed with three [illegible], the first a Henschel composition, "[illegible] la Sorella," graceful, tender air, tenderly sung. The second, the old Irihs [illegible], "The Little Red Lark," was os [illegible] performed that the audience demanded [illegible] and was accorded a repetition. A [illegible] by A. Hervey was equally en[illegible] as an encore the old Irish ballad, [illegible]," was given. Mr. [illegible] part of the pro[illegible]

[illegible]
SUNDAY, APRIL 10, 1892.

Echoes from Last Night's Symphony Concert.

There were no novelties on the programme of yesterday's symphony concert, but the familiar offerings, splendidly played by Mr. Nikisch's band, proved thoroughly welcome to the large assemblage. "The Mermaid," a ballade for orchestra, by Edmond de Mihalovich, was promised for a first performance, but a postponement was necessary.

The programme as given consisted of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, J. K. Paine's "In the Sp ing" symphony, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

The expressive music, brilliant, weird and sentimental in swiftly changing moods which Goldmark has given his famous overture was most sympathetically read by Mr. Nikisch, and afforded exceeding pleasure to his audience.

The master work of one of the few really eminent American composers was naturally listened to with rapt attention by a gathering which is presumed to represent the musical intelligence of Boston. Mr. Paine is broad, dignified and scholarly in his writings: his style is graceful and free from affectation, his ideas are bright and original and clearly expressed; his treatment of a theme is always scholarly and follows the best of classic models; his command of orchestral resources is most uncommon, and refinement of taste ever characterizes the rich ornamentations which he gives his works.

The "Spring" symphony is truly a grand composition, and the oftener it is heard the greater becomes one's admiration for its beauties. It is distinctly programme music, and thoroughly effective is the instrumentation inpresenting the composer's thoughts.

The orchestra's performance of the work was most enjoyable, even more satisfying than when last played here.

Beethoven's overture was played, as it has been in the past, under Mr. Nikisch's direction with superb effect.

The next public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra will take place Thursday afternoon instead of Friday afternoon. The programme of that rehearsal and the concert of the following Saturday evening will be this: Symphony, F major, op. 4, D'Albert; suite, "Hamlet," Henschel; overture, "Oberon," Weber. Mrs. Georg Henschel will sing arias from Handel's "Alessandro" and Massenet's "Herodiade." Mr. Henschel will conduct his suite.

D'Albert's Piano Recitals.

Eugen D'Albert is to give three piano recitals at Music Hall on Monday, Wednesday and Friday afternoons, 18th, 20th and 22d inst. The first programme, by special request, is devoted entirely to the music of Beethoven, in the interpretation of which D'Albert is pre-eminent.

His masterly work at a recent symphony concert showed how well equipped he is to give effect to the subtle beauties of that master mind. No programme since Von Bulow was here has contained such representative works, and if all that has been written about D'Albert's playing be true, it will be of exceeding interest to music lovers, as well as students.

The second and third recitals are to be varied in character, and will call in play his astounding technique, intellectual acuteness and polished style, a little of which was displayed in his response to the encore demanded of him at the orchestral concert. Season and single tickets can now be obtained at Music Hall.

Farewell Henschel Concert.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave their fourth and last vocal recital at the Meionaon yesterday afternoon. The hall was crowded and the artists were accorded the most hearty appreciation for their charming entertainment.

Mrs. Henschel's solos were characterized by that sweetness and delicate expression which is a marked feature in all her vocal work, and Mr. Henschel's songs were given in his usual artistic manner.

The gifted pair were heard in duets by Mehul, Gretry, Saint-Saens and Henschel, the latter number most beautifully sung and fittingly closing a thoroughly enjoyable programme.

New York World
4/10

If Mr. D'Albert cannot be surpassed as a Beethoven player, Mr. De Pachmann is equally great as an interpreter of Chopin, while Mr. Rummel has that considered and classic repose which make his interpretation of composers, like Bach in particular, wholly admirable. It is a pity that after so long a musical season so much really excellent piano music should have burst upon us at once. There comes a time when the power of musical assimilation seems to be gone, and the pleasure in it seems to vanish also. This week there is a decided lull in musical matters, which precedes the storm of anniversary and commemorative concerts, which will bring the season to a close.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will be the soloists at the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on April 26. A series of six concerts, which will again take place at Chickering Hall, this time on Thursday evenings, has already been arranged for next season.

Boston Transcript
TUESDAY, APRIL 12, 1892.

A License for the "Pop Concerts."

At the present time there are 1200 applications before the Board of Police for the 896 liquor licenses to be issued for the year ensuing from May 1. It is understood that Charles A. Ellis will receive a license for the Music Hall Popular Concerts during the coming summer.

There are twenty-five new applications for licenses from the North End.

Date 4-8

SOME PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

A hearty and honest appreciation of the pianoforte recitals which Messrs. Rummel and d'Albert are giving on alternate days in the concert-room of the Madison Square Garden would be hailed as a most gratifying sign of the times by many sincere lovers of music who, with the warmest admiration for the departed Paderewski, unite a sufficient power of discrimination to realize that there are other artists besides him. It is not at all necessary to depreciate the genius of the marvellous Pole to say that the notion that the last word was spoken in his recitals and concerts is fantastic to a degree. There was a mysterious spell in his playing, a charm whose essence was so distinctively musical that no unselfish lover of the art felt inclined to quarrel with him no matter how greatly he might dissent from the pianist's reading; yet this did not in all cases close the gates of the understanding to his limitations. Messrs. Rummel and d'Albert in their recitals given thus far have demonstrated most convincingly and eloquently their right to ask the public to give heed to some things which in the popular ecstasy caused by Paderewski were in danger of being forgotten. Mr. d'Albert on Tuesday showed a side of Beethoven's genius which the Polish pianist did not discover, and Mr. Rummel on Wednesday accomplished a similar task in connection with the music of Schumann. It is unfortunate that circumstances compel a presentation of the matter in terms which, in the exalted mood in which Mr. Paderewski left so many of our concert-goers, are bound to be misunderstood; but truth ought not to be permitted to wait on sentiment at a time when its fruits are so significant and valuable. The sanity, the fine intellectual poise, the fire and the technical brilliancy which marks the playing of the present concert givers are deserving of generous recognition and challenge enthusiastic approbation. An intelligent lover of pianoforte music cannot afford to ignore the splendid work which they are doing simply because he was recently under the sway of another's unique achievements. The art of music has rights which are higher than those of any one of its votaries.

Mr. d' Albert's second recital yesterday was of a miscellaneous character. The programme consisted of his own transcription of a Bach prelude and fugue in D-major, Beethoven's Sonata op. 78, Mendelssohn's Variations op. 15, Raff's Suite in D-minor, Schubort's Impromptu op. 90 No. 3, the Strauss-Tausig waltz "Man lebt nur Iinmal," and Liszt's "Liebestraum" No. 3 and Rhapsodie Espagnole—familiar music all of it. The fine Suite by Raff called out great enthusiasm, which the player rewarded by his stupendous performance of Rubinstein's Staccato Study and after the Liszt pieces, that is at the close of the recital, is added a Barcarolle by Rubinstein, another of his battle horses. The third recital will take place to-morrow, when Mr. d' Albert will play Bach's sixth English Suite, Mozart's Rondo in A-minor, Brahms's Rhapsody op. 79, No. 2, Chopin's Sonata in B-minor, Rubinstein's Barcarolle in A-minor, and Liszt's "Sonetto di Petrarca," Feux follets" and Tarantelle "Napolii"

THE COMMONWEALTH.
ESTABLISHED IN 1862.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 9, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartette brought its seventh season to an end with the concert of Monday evening. There was a large audience, Mr. Perabo sat at the piano and Mr. Novacek and Mr. Schulz assisted in the Brahms sextet. Like the preceding concerts of this series, it was highly enjoyable.

These concerts of chamber music have been among the most delightful which this season, or any other season, has produced. Both in selection and in performance, the musicianly taste and the artistic skill of Mr. Kneisel have been manifest in a very gratifying measure. And it may be hoped that the support given this undertaking now for seven years may encourage the establishment of the Kneisel Quartette as a fixed institution of music Boston.

EVENING POST, Chicago, Ill.
te 4-7

Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel, the finished singers who will give a series of private recitals here next month, will be under the management of F. Wight Neumann.

D'Albert will appear once more in concert in Chicago. He will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the evening of May 7.

Boston Daily Traveller
MONDAY, APRIL 11, 1892.
SINGLE COPIES TWO CENTS

The Twenty-second Symphony Concert.

The programme of the 22d Symphony concert was listened to by the smallest audience of the season at the Music Hall on Saturday evening. It was as follows: Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; "Spring" Symphony, No. 2, in A-major, John K. Paine; overture, "Egmont," Beethoven.

The remarkable feature of this concert is that for the first time in his engagement of three years Mr. Nikisch has presented a work of the most eminent American composer, and more than that, a resident composer and the professor of music at Harvard University—national and local reasons that the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should have recognized at the very beginning of his engagement.

Prof. Paine's "Spring" Symphony, in its spontaneity, its wealth of ideas and its classic model of the highest form, resting entirely upon the most exalted plane of symphonic writing, throws down the gauntlet to any work of its class that has ever been composed.

Prof. Paine is a master in every form of musical composition, as well as in the art of modern orchestration, and this rare gift is displayed in this noble symphony in a superb degree. Prof. Paine's fine symphony, however, fell into poor hands when Mr. Nikisch undertook its interpretation, for a more coarse, careless and misconceived performance could hardly have been expected from the leader of an orchestra that formerly stood so highly as did our local organization. This symphony has been played here under the direction of Prof. Paine, Theodore Thomas, Carl Zerrahn and Mr. Bernard Listemann, and as the three conductors named played it in accordance with the composer's ideas and indications, we have had a good model presented of its worth and beauties. There has been much said in the public prints regarding Mr. Nikisch's ability to comprehend and interpret a composer, and he has been most severely arraigned for the vulgarities of his efforts with the classics.

There has been some doubt whether this misrepresentation of great composers is a matter of a coarse individuality or of ignorance. To such an extent has this reprehensible display been exhibited by Mr. Nikisch that, to quote the criticism of the eminent critic of the Saturday Evening Gazette, "It has passed its vexatious stage and is becoming amusing." When Mr. Nikisch first came here it was announced in an interview that he would pay particular attention to a liberal presentation of the works of native composers. Perhaps when he came to look at Prof. Paine's works and found that they were of magnificent proportions, and had been performed under the baton of that great conducter, Theodore Thomas, he may have felt some timidity in undertaking the task himself.

In producing this symphony he would have to expose his own ability as one capable of comprehending and interpreting an author or in displaying his inability to successfully do so.

Whatever his feelings may have been, the performance on Saturday evening left no doubt in the minds of his critical listeners, for the symphony was played regardless of the composer's indication, and its effect was ruined. The manner in which Mr. Nikisch galloped off the magnificent great theme of praise and thanksgiving in the last movement marked Meno mosso e maestoso, and which appears three times, should in my opinion be evidence enough to stamp the incapacity of a conductor. The intention of the composer is so evident and so plainly indicated that even the merest tyro of a conductor should comprehend the meaning. It matters little whether it be Nikischism or ignorance it is equally reprehensible.

The Goldmark overture and the Beethoven overture were both subjected to the coarse grinding of Nikisch's grist mill, and the public will have to wait for some other hand to set the gauge if the more refined brand is desirable. In the mean time the judicious grieve. Concerning this performance of Prof. Paine's symphony, Mr. Woolf of the Gazette says the "composer's ideas were persistently disregarded in favor of the conductor's ideas of what they ought to be." Mr. Hale of the Journal says "the symphony was read carelessly, almost recklessly; little attention was paid to the wishes of the composer. The tempi of Prof. Paine was not respected. Piano was mezzo forte and forte was fortissimo. The balance of the parts was so neglected that the effect was often wholly lost. Calm cantabile was fretted into spasmodic eruption. Ingenious and delicate figuration was roughly hurried over." Mr. Elson of the Advertiser says that "What should have been majesty became mere bluster, and even the allegro giojoso became allegro furioso." Unfortunate is the composer who trusts to such hands a revelation of his genius. When our minds turn back to the delicate, artistic, conscientious and at the same time viril interpretation under the baton of that superb conductor and musician, Wilhelm Gericke, we yearn for his reappearance, and shiver over our present experiences with his follower in office.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

NONDAY MORNING APRIL 11, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

Goldmark is one of the most oriental of modern composers. Not that he uses the oriental scale in his tone progressions, or that even the monotonous and constantly recurring rhythms of the East are present in his music, but he presents a sumptuous orchestration combined with a languor of melody that suggests the eastern subjects more thoroughly to the occidental mind than a faithful reproduction of Hindu themes could do. The overture to "Sakuntala" once more showed this heavy, incense-laden vein, in the concert of Saturday. It received a good performance; what there was of caprice in the interpretation seemed not only permissible but commendable. The thematic treatment was clear, and the violas for once, sounded forth with their effective and sombre tone, without being obliterated by their rich relations, the first violins. The climaxes which are so well worked up by the composer, also lost nothing in the performance.

Almost as much can be said of the "Egmont" overture, which was given with great spirit, although its beginning was not free from exaggeration. The overture is of course, according to Goethe, and Motley's unflattering picture of the hero is widely departed from, but at least the voice of freedom is in the finale, and Beethoven, more than any other composer, was the bard of liberty. It was refreshing, in this part, to hear the piccolo, with its proper predominance; the phrase in the last measures (the final cadence) is one of the most characteristic piccolo touches ever written, yet in previous performances the snapping runs on this instrument have been curbed and repressed too much, while this time freedom shrieked (without any falling Kosciusko) to her heart's content.

Prof. Paine's spring symphony is as yet the best work in this form which America has produced. It is not so great a work as the composer's "Œdipus" (which I hold to be the high water mark of American music) but it is shapely, has well contrasted themes, is developed with musicianly skill, and displays more versatility than any native symphony. It was but just that our Boston orchestra should recognize American music in a work by its leading representative, yet I wish that another symphony by one of the best of the younger composers in Boston, Mr. Templeton Strong, had not been forced to go to New York and to Mr. Seidl, for its first performance. The Spring Symphony has been much better played in this city than it was on this occasion; the Adagio was given with much expression, and here the cellos did some excellent work, and the swing of the Scherzo was also effective, but the nobility of the finale was thoroughly eliminated. In this finale there is a broad and massive theme like a hymn of thanksgiving, in splendid contrast with the bubbling joy of the other themes; the composer marked this "Meno Mosso, e Maestoso"; three times does this occur, and three times was it disregarded. What should have been majesty became mere bluster, and even the Allegro Giojoso became a wild Allegro Furioso. Possibly the conductor, but newly accustomed to our climate, endeavored to adapt the Spring symphony to New England conditions, but I cannot believe that Prof. Paine had a Boston spring in mind when he evolved this tone picture, and in any case his marks of Tempo should have been respected without regard to the local thermometers.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Henschel Recital.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave their fourth recital for the season of 1892 at Meionaon Hall Saturday afternoon, to an audience whose appreciation equalled its size. Both the singers are especially dear to Boston people, and their appearance was the signal for a most generous outburst of applause. The programme was made up of numbers well adapted to display the merits of the artists, and was especially rich in Henschel compositions. To say that it was enjoyed to the fullest, and that the raptures over the rich and sonorous timbre of Mr. Henschel's voice, and the rare sweetness of Mrs. Henschel's notes, into which Boston audiences are fond of falling were not abated on this occasion is only to do justice to the admirable entertainment. If, however, there be a rare pleasure in digesting the sweetness of Mrs. Henschel's strains, there is almost an equal pain in the fact that the voice bears witness to the march of time, perhaps only slightly, and to the average listener unheeded, but, nevertheless, noticeably. Perhaps the thinness of the highest notes are more remarked from the effort attending their expression than from the expression itself, but it is none the less a reality, although it is in part concealed by the general and admirable mobility of the voice.

The first numbers were two duets, one from Méhul's "Joseph," and the other from Grétry's "Richard Cœur de Lion." The first was the familiar majestic scene between Jacob and Benjamin, and the second a dainty composition, florid but sweet, and of an amorous turn. Both were splendidly rendered and received with bountiful approbation. Mrs. Henschel then sang in a charming manner three love songs, "If thou thy heart bestowest," by Giovannini, "Le Portrait" by Pacini and "La Charmante Marguerite," from the old French. The second was especially well sung, with exquisite fidelity to the sentiment. Liszt's ballad, "Die Vatergruft," is one of that kind which is suited to Mr. Henschel's voice and it was as well declaimed as sung, in all its gruesomeness. "Jung Dieterich," of his own composition, also gave great pleasure, the subject likewise affording scope for his talent for dramatic vocalism. The "Schlummerlied" from the "Magellone" and "Des Maedchen's Fluck," both by Brahms, was sung by Mrs. Henschel and were warmly applauded. Loewe's "Archibald Douglas" was Mr. Henschel's next selection, and was rendered with all the mingled pathos and joyousness in which the number abounds. Two duets, both by Saint-Saëns, the first commencing, "Ici les les tendres oiseaux," and the second, "Viens! Une flute invisible," was next prettily rendered according to their delicate nature.

Mrs. Henschel then followed with three soli. the first a Henschel composition, "Dov'è la Sorella," graceful, tender air, tenderly sung. The second, the old Irihs song, "The Little Red Lark," was os charmingly performed that the audience demanded and was accorded a repetition. A May song by A. Hervey was equally enjoyed and as an encore the old Irish ballad, "The Glen of Kenman," was given. Mr. Henschel's individual part of the programme was concluded with the rendition [illegible] "Belsatzar" [illegible]

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 10, 1892.

Echoes from Last Night's Symphony Concert.

There were no novelties on the programme of yesterday's symphony concert, but the familiar offerings, splendidly played by Mr. Nikisch's band, proved thoroughly welcome to the large assemblage. "The Mermaid," a ballade for orchestra, by Edmond de Mihalovich, was promised for a first performance, but a postponement was necessary.

The programme as given consisted of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, J. K. Paine's "In the Sp ing" symphony, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

The expressive music, brilliant, weird and sentimental in swiftly changing moods which Goldmark has given his famous overture was most sympathetically read by Mr. Nikisch, and afforded exceeding pleasure to his audience.

The master work of one of the few really eminent American composers was naturally listened to with rapt attention by a gathering which is presumed to represent the musical intelligence of Boston. Mr. Paine is broad, dignified and scholarly in his writings; his style is graceful and free from affectation, his ideas are bright and original and clearly expressed; his treatment of a theme is always scholarly and follows the best of classic models; his command of orchestral resources is most uncommon, and refinement of taste ever characterizes the rich ornamentations which he gives his works.

The "Spring" symphony is truly a grand composition, and the oftener it is heard the greater becomes one's admiration for its beauties. It is distinctly programme music, and thoroughly effective is the instrumentation inpresenting the composer's thoughts.

The orchestra's performance of the work was most enjoyable, even more satisfying than when last played here.

Beethoven's overture was played, as it has been in the past, under Mr. Nikisch's direction with superb effect.

The next public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra will take place Thursday afternoon instead of Friday afternoon. The programme of that rehearsal and the concert of the following Saturday evening will be this: Symphony, F major, op. 4, D'Albert; suite, "Hamlet," Henschel; overture, "Oberon," Weber. Mrs. Georg Henschel will sing arias from Handel's "Alessandro" and Massenet's "Herodiade." Mr. Henschel will conduct his suite.

D'Albert's Piano Recitals.

Eugen D'Albert is to give three piano recitals at Music Hall on Monday, Wednesday and Friday afternoons, 18th, 20th and 22d inst. The first programme, by special request, is devoted entirely to the music of Beethoven, in the interpretation of which D'Albert is pre-eminent.

His masterly work at a recent symphony concert showed how well equipped he is to give effect to the subtle beauties of that master mind. No programme since Von Bulow was here has contained such representative works, and if all that has been written about D'Albert's playing be true, it will be of exceeding interest to music lovers, as well as students.

The second and third recitals are to be varied in character, and will call in play his astounding technique, intellectual acuteness and polished style, a little of which was displayed in his response to the encore demanded of him at the orchestral concert. Season and single tickets can now be obtained at Music Hall.

Farewell Henschel Concert.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave their fourth and last vocal recital at the Meionaon yesterday afternoon. The hall was crowded and the artists were accorded the most hearty appreciation for their charming entertainment.

Mrs. Henschel's solos were characterized by that sweetness and delicate expression which is a marked feature in all her vocal work, and Mr. Henschel's songs were given in his usual artistic manner.

The gifted pair were heard in duets by Mehul, Gretry, Saint-Saens and Henschel, the latter number most beautifully sung and fittingly closing a thoroughly enjoyable programme.

New York [illegible]

4/

If Mr. D'Albert cannot be surpassed as a Beethoven player, Mr. De Pachmann is equally great as an interpreter of Chopin, while Mr. Rummel has that considered and classic repose which make his interpretation of composers, like Bach in particular, wholly admirable. It is a pity that after so long a musical season so much really excellent piano music should have burst upon us at once. There comes a time when the power of musical assimilation seems to be gone, and the pleasure in it seems to vanish also. This week there is a decided lull in musical matters, which precedes the storm of anniversary and commemorative concerts, which will bring the season to a close.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will be the soloists at the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on April 26. A series of six concerts, which will again take place at Chickering Hall, this time on Thursday evenings, has already been arranged for next season.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, APRIL 12, 1892.

A License for the "Pop Concerts."

At the present time there are 1200 applications before the Board of Police for the 896 liquor licenses to be issued for the year ensuing from May 1. It is understood that Charles A. Ellis will receive a license for the Music Hall Popular Concerts during the coming summer.

There are twenty-five new applications for licenses from the North End.

Tribune, New York, N. Y.

Date 4-8

SOME PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

A hearty and honest appreciation of the pianoforte recitals which Messrs. Rummel and d'Albert are giving on alternate days in the concert-room of the Madison Square Garden would be hailed as a most gratifying sign of the times by many sincere lovers of music who, with the warmest admiration for the departed Paderewski, unite a sufficient power of discrimination to realize that there are other artists besides him. It is not at all necessary to depreciate the genius of the marvellous Pole to say that the notion that the last word was spoken in his recitals and concerts is fantastic to a degree. There was a mysterious spell in his playing, a charm whose essence was so distinctively musical that no unselfish lover of the art felt inclined to quarrel with him no matter how greatly he might dissent from the pianist's reading; yet this did not in all cases close the gates of the understanding to his limitations. Messrs. Rummel and d'Albert in their recitals given thus far have demonstrated most convincingly and eloquently their right to ask the public to give heed to some things which in the popular ecstasy caused by Paderewski were in danger of being forgotten. Mr. d'Albert on Tuesday showed a side of Beethoven's genius which the Polish pianist did not discover, and Mr. Rummel on Wednesday accomplished a similar task in connection with the music of Schumann. It is unfortunate that circumstances compel a presentation of the matter in terms which, in the exalted mood in which Mr. Paderewski left so many of our concert-goers, are bound to be misunderstood; but truth ought not to be permitted to wait on sentiment at a time when its fruits are so significant and valuable. The sanity, the fine intellectual poise, the fire and the technical brilliancy which marks the playing of the present concert givers are deserving of generous recognition and challenge enthusiastic approbation. An intelligent lover of pianoforte music cannot afford to ignore the splendid work which they are doing simply because he was recently under the sway of another's unique achievements. The art of music has rights which are higher than those of any one of its votaries.

Mr. d' Albert's second recital yesterday was of a miscellaneous character. The programme consisted of his own transcription of a Bach prelude and fugue in D-major, Beethoven's Sonata op. 78, Mendelssohn's Variations op. 15, Raff's Suite in D-minor, Schubert's Impromptu op. 90 No. 3, the Strauss-Tausig waltz "Man lebt nur linmal," and Liszt's "Liebestraum" No. 3 and Rhapsodie Espagnole—familiar music all of it. The fine Suite by Raff called out great enthusiasm, which the player rewarded by his stupendous performance of Rubinstein's Staccato Study and after the Liszt pieces, that is at the close of the recital, is added a Barcarolle by Rubinstein, another of his battle horses. The third recital will take place to-morrow, when Mr. d' Albert will play Bach's sixth English Suite, Mozart's Rondo in A-minor, Brahms's Rhapsody op. 79, No. 2, Chopin's Sonata in B-minor, Rubinstein's Barcarolle in A-minor, and Liszt's "Sonetto di Petrarca," Feux follets" and Tarantelle "Napolii"

THE COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 9, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartette brought its seventh season to an end with the concert of Monday evening. There was a large audience, Mr. Perabo sat at the piano and Mr. Novacek and Mr. Schulz assisted in the Brahms sextet. Like the preceding concerts of this series, it was highly enjoyable.

These concerts of chamber music have been among the most delightful which this season, or any other season, has produced. Both in selection and in performance, the musicianly taste and the artistic skill of Mr. Kneisel have been manifest in a very gratifying measure. And it may be hoped that the support given this undertaking now for seven years may encourage the establishment of the Kneisel Quartette as a fixed institution of musical Boston.

EVENING POST, Chicago, Ill.

te 4-7

Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel, the finished singers who will give a series of private recitals here next month, will be under the management of F. Wight Neumann.

D'Albert will appear once more in concert in Chicago. He will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the evening of May 7.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, APRIL 11, 1892.

SINGLE COPIES TWO CENTS

The Twenty-second Symphony Concert.

The programme of the 22d Symphony concert was listened to by the smallest audience of the season at the Music Hall on Saturday evening. It was as follows: Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; "Spring" Symphony, No. 2, in A-major, John K. Paine; overture, "Egmont," Beethoven.

The remarkable feature of this concert is that for the first time in his engagement of three years Mr. Nikisch has presented a work of the most eminent American composer, and more than that, a resident composer and the professor of music at Harvard University—national and local reasons that the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should have recognized at the very beginning of his engagement.

Prof. Paine's "Spring" Symphony, in its spontaneity, its wealth of ideas and its classic model of the highest form, resting entirely upon the most exalted plane of symphonic writing, throws down the gauntlet to any work of its class that has ever been composed.

Prof. Paine is a master in every form of musical composition, as well as in the art of modern orchestration, and this rare gift is displayed in this noble symphony in a superb degree. Prof. Paine's fine symphony, however, fell into poor hands when Mr. Nikisch undertook its interpretation, for a more coarse, careless and misconceived performance could hardly have been expected from the leader of an orchestra that formerly stood so highly as did our local organization. This symphony has been played here under the direction of Prof. Paine, Theodore Thomas, Carl Zerrahn and Mr. Bernard Listemann, and as the three conductors named played it in accordance with the composer's ideas and indications, we have had a good model presented of its worth and beauties. There has been much said in the public prints regarding Mr. Nikisch's ability to comprehend and interpret a composer, and he has been most severely arraigned for the vulgarities of his efforts with the classics.

There has been some doubt whether this misrepresentation of great composers is a matter of a coarse individuality or of ignorance. To such an extent has this reprehensible display been exhibited by Mr. Nikisch that, to quote the criticism of the eminent critic of the Saturday Evening Gazette, "it has passed its vexatious stage and is becoming amusing." When Mr. Nikisch first came here it was announced in an interview that he would pay particular attention to a liberal presentation of the works of native composers. Perhaps when he came to look at Prof. Paine's works and found that they were of magnificent proportions, and had been performed under the baton of that great conducter, Theodore Thomas, he may have felt some timidity in undertaking the task himself.

In producing this symphony he would have to expose his own ability as one capable of comprehending and interpreting an author or in displaying his inability to successfully do so.

Whatever his feelings may have been, the performance on Saturday evening left no doubt in the minds of his critical listeners, for the symphony was played regardless of the composer's indication, and its effect was ruined. The manner in which Mr. Nikisch galloped off the magnificent great theme of praise and thanksgiving in the last movement marked M-no mosso e maestoso, and which appears three times, should in my opinion be evidence enough to stamp the incapacity of a conductor. The intention of the composer is so evident and so plainly indicated that even the merest tyro of a conductor should comprehend the meaning. It matters little whether it be Nikischism or ignorance it is equally reprehensible.

The Goldmark overture and the Beethoven overture were both subjected to the coarse grinding of Nikisch's grist mill, and the public will have to wait for some other hand to set the gauge if the more refined brand is desirable. In the mean time the judicious grieve. Concerning this performance of Prof. Paine's symphony, Mr. Woolf of the Gazette says the "composer's ideas were persistently disregarded in fa or of the conductor's ideas of what they ought to be." Mr. Hale of the Journal says "the symphony was read carelessly, almost recklessly; little attention was paid to the wishes of the composer. The tempi of Prof. Paine was not respected. Piano was mezzo forte and forte was fortissimo. The balance of the parts was so neglected that the effect was often wholly lost. Calm cantabile was fretted into spasmodic eruption. Ingenious and delicate figuration was roughly hurried over." Mr. Elson of the Advertiser says that "What should have been majesty became mere bluster, and even the alleg o giojoso became allegro furioso." Unfortunate is the composer who trusts to such hands a revelation of his genius. When our minds turn back to the delicate, artistic, conscientious and at the same time viril interpretation under the baton of that superb conductor and musician, Wilhelm Gericke, we yearn for his reappearance, and shiver over our present experiences with his follower in office.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 11, 1892.

Meionaon: The Henschel Recitals.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave the last of their four vocal recitals in the Meionaon on Saturday afternoon, the programme being as follows:

Duet, O toi le digne appui d'un père, from "Joseph," ..... Méhul Duet, from "Richard Cœur de Lion" ..... Grétry
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
If thou thy heart bestowest ..... Giovannini
Le Portrait ..... Pacini
La charmante Marguerite ..... Old French
Mrs. Henschel.
Ballad, Die Vätergruft ..... Liszt
Ballad, Jung Dietrich ..... Henschel
Mr. Henschel.
Schlummerlied, from "Die schöne Magelone;"
Des Mädchens Fluch ..... Brahms
Mrs. Henschel.
Ballad, Archibald Douglas ..... Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
Duets, Ici les tendres oiseaux; Viens! Une flute invisible ..... Saint-Saëns
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Dov' è la sorella? ..... Henschel
The Little Red Lark ..... Old Irish
May Song ..... Hervey
Mrs. Henschel.
Ballads, Belsazar; Die beiden Grenadiere ... Schumann
Mr. Henschel.
Duet, Gondoliera ..... Henschel
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

Mr. Henschel is giving us a good deal of the German ballad, but not too much; the form has not been very familiar here, and what little we know of it we owe almost entirely to him. In earlier days August Kreissmann, the only song-singer of real importance we have had before Mr. Henschel, used to confine himself almost wholly to the Lied; we cannot remember his singing the Schubert, Schumann, or Loewe ballads. Of those Mr. Henschel has sung here, those by Carl Loewe must be recognized as standing head and shoulders above the others; Loewe had just the right gifts to make him an almost ideal ballad writer: a facile melodic invention, a well-sustained vivacity of style, above all, the power of doing things simply and directly.

If we look into the matter a little more deeply, we find that the natural gifts which make a man a ballad composer, to the manner born, correspond in a sense to those which make a poet a good ballad writer. The easy melodic invention which marks the ballad composer is intimately related to the facile handling of rhyme and rhythm that belongs to the ballad-writing poet. A certain simple homeliness is common to both. And note here one prevailing trait of Loewe's melody; its general cut, especially its rhythm, may connect it ideally with some prominent feature in the poem he is setting to music; thus its general character may be martial or rustic, light or serious, suggestive of the dance or the chase. In a word, it is almost invariably pertinent to the occasion. But mark this: it is simply and purely a melody per se; it is a bit of pure musical invention, a melody schlechtweg, as the Germans would say. It does not present itself, like the Wagnerian Leitmotiv, as the musical expression of any particular line or sentiment in the poem, but its emotional expressiveness is—as Hanslick says that of every pure melody is—absolutely vague and indeterminate. It is, so to speak, a melody of all-work; one which will be serviceable at any juncture in the ballad, and to which any expression you please may be given, by changes of tempo, dynamic force, rhythm, or vocal inflection. It is the musical counterpart of the usually persistent and unchanging rhythm of the poetic ballad.

